ENQUIRER.—The Teachers' Guild of Great Britain and Ireland, for men and women, has several local branches and correspondents in all parts of England. It also issues valuable papers. The secretary for the women's section is Miss Brough, 17, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

DORA.—We can only give you the dictionary meanings (see Haydn's "Dictionary of Dates"), "Atheism," from the Greek "A," without; "Theos," God; see Ps. xiv. 1. It was professed by Epicurus, Lucretius, and others. Spinoza was the defender of a similar doctrine, 1677. Atheism was the ruling doctrine of the French Republic, 1794 till 1804. Lord Bacon says, "Though a small draught of philosophy may lead a man into atheism, a deep draught will certainly bring him back to the belief of a God." "Secularism" is explained in the same work as "being a name given to the principles advocated by Messrs. G. J. and A. Holyoake, in 1846, and since then by Mr. Bradlaugh. Its central idea is freethought. It is not specially directed against Christianity, but independent of it. Its standard is utilitarian. It is the religion of the present life only, teaching men to seek happiness in duty and morality in nature. Mr. Austin Holyoake and other secularists repudiated atheism; Mr. Bradlaugh and others profess it." 2. The fee paid to the Civil Service examiners is 1s. only.

EINE LEHRERIN AND ONE IN TROUBLE.—Miss Leigh's address in Paris, is 77, Avenue Wagram. The Governesses' Home is 8, Rue Neuve Fortin. In Vienna there is the Victoria Jubilee Home for British Governesses. In Paris there is also Miss Pryde's excellent Home for Governesses and Lady Art Students, 23, Avenue du Bois de Boulogne (L'Arc de Triomphe), to which you might write for terms. You could study French there, and a French teacher lives in the home.

A. E. MARQUAND.—We fear we shall disappoint you in making our usual answer, i.e., that such situations are only obtained by advertisement, by answering advertisements, or through an agency. We should imagine that the Times would be the best paper.

GUSSIE AND TINA.—The Simoom—Arabic, samma, or "hot"—is a hot, arid wind, peculiar to the sandy deserts of Africa and Western Asia. The air, heated by contact with the noonday burning sand, ascends, and the influx of colder air from all sides forms a whirlwind or miniature cyclone, which is borne across the desert laden with sand and dust. It occurs at the equinoxes, and has a very destructive effect on both animal and vegetable life. In the Sahara Desert, in North Africa, these winds are especially frequent at certain seasons, and are felt in all the countries bordering the Mediterranean. The sirocco of South Italy, the samel of Turkey, the salano of Spain, and the namsin of Egypt have their origin as simooms in the Sahara. The word "tornado" is from the Spanish and Italian word "tornare," to turn, that is, a whirling wind. This word is used in America, as well as "cyclone," for the violent storms there. The subject of the laws of storms is a little too big to be approached in our small space; but we have explained as far as possible.

HOUSEKEEPING.

E. I. BORRACLOUGH.—We strongly advise you to send your tapestry curtains to a professional cleaner's, as it requires an experienced hand. You will find it a great deal cheaper and will save yourself not trouble only, but almost certain disappointment. We have many times given directions for drying flowers. Coloured leaves should be brushed over with a delicate coating of white artist's varnish or thin gum-arabic. Flowers should be pressed between sheets of clean blotting paper, and these changed daily.

P. D. O. J., SARAH CLIFFE.—How can we tell you "how to get a stain out of a linen tablecloth," when you do not say whether of iron-mould, ink, wine, or fruit, or of mildew? We think you had better refer to vol. iv., page 817, and read the last part of the series called "The Fairy of the Family," entitled "Spots and Stains." 2. The stains of mud are of a composite nature, some grease being mixed with it, especially in London mud.

X. Y. Z.—Both your queries point to a damp house. Damp is a great cause of moths, and the only plan for keeping them away is to have the rooms kept as dry as possible, and the carpet so arranged as to be easily taken up. Ironing a carpet over with hot irons is said to kill the moths' eggs and the grubs.

LIZZIE.—If the dye has rubbed off the leather you might use one of Judson's dyes to recolor it, and when dry apply white of egg to restore the polish. SUSSEX must nodd the wrong side of the velvet over the steam of boiling water to take the marks out. Well shake and brush afterwards.

M. I. B. S.—The discolouration of the marble is due to smoke only, we should think. Make a mixture of equal parts of soft soap, washing soda, powdered whiting, and a small piece of stone blue. Add a little water to the powder, which should be as fine as possible, and then the soap, heat all together and apply hot to the mantelpiece, leaving it on for twenty-four hours, and washing off with hot water and soap. This will restore the colour.

LAURETTE.—An old ink-stain is rather difficult to remove from a carpet. Wet the spot first, and then apply salts of sorrel. Wash off immediately with clean water for fear of its making a hole.

M. P. E.—Real bronze may be cleaned with a sponge and soap and water, then rinsed in a little beer, and dried (without wiping) before the fire. But if the articles be not real bronze they should only be carefully dusted, as washing will take off the bronzing. You may use a leather to polish them.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MARIE DE V.—Are the stories in English or French? If in the former, you could easily send one with stamps for return postage if not accepted. This is the only test of their value.

M. J. B. S.—We think it would depend on the age of the girl. Before she attains the age of nineteen or twenty her reading should be carefully looked after, so as to ensure its doing unmitigated good.

IRENE ALEXANDRA G.—Our answers are for all our girls, and we well know they often speak volumes to those for whom they were not written, for comfort and council are sent by God in His own ways, and we must always be ready to find the word He sends in season, if we wait for it. He sends us all our parts in this world, and to you He gives the two difficult ones of "being and suffering." Living to show forth His glory in patience, godliness, sweetness, and love, so that where your couch is will be the family abiding place of all good example and true happiness.

EMSE.—We have made inquiries into the subject of old stamps, and there seems no doubt that they are used for the purpose of defrauding the Government by discharging the "erasing stamp" and using them again as new stamps. We hear there is a large trade in Germany always going on, and the fictions of "orphans to be got into hospitals," etc., are kept up to obtain stamps. We should not advise you to collect them, unless for decorative purposes. We return your paper with thanks.

CLARA and LUCY write to suggest that an excellent use for Christmas and other cards is to put them up in packets of fifty or so, and lend them out to invalids and old people to look at. When one packet is finished with, another can be sent. When used in this way they have been found a great resource to those who cannot go out to see the shops. 2. With reference to your question, perhaps you might get some addresses from the Edinburgh or Perth branches of the Girls' Friendly Society, which has a department for members in professions and business. That in Edinburgh is Central Lodge, 16, India Street; in Perth, G. F. S. Lodge, South Tay Street. Many thanks for your letter.

A LOVER OF MEDICUS does not, evidently, read his articles very carefully, as she does not do him justice. He has written several very valuable articles for business girls, of which "Healthy Lives for Working Girls," page 76, vol. viii., is one of the best. 2. Your composition is not poetry, but is well thought out as to its subject, and is told in an interesting way.

A DELIGHTED READER.—"The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington" is a ballad taken from Bishop Percy's "Reliques of English Poetry." This Islington is supposed to be in Norfolk, not near London. Bishop Percy gathered together old materials and fragments of old ballads, to which he added stanzas of his own to connect them together. He was a poet himself, and there is no doubt that the issue of these ballads had a great effect on English poetry.

AN ERRING BESSIE must be guided by her parents and guardians on all such subjects as these, until she be of an age to think and act for herself. Obedience is put before us as a first duty, we must remember, and the plea of conscience is often used as a plea for independence, and the shaking off of parental authority and guidance.

A LOVER OF THE "G.O.P."—We think you could translate it very easily—the French is not difficult. "Maudlin" is the corrupt appellation of "Magdalene," who is represented by painters with swollen eyes and disordered hair. Magdalen College at Oxford is usually termed "Maudlin," which is considered to make this etymology the more probable.

STAPLETON.—Such inscriptions are best as simple in character as possible. "To our father and mother on their silver wedding, from their children." The initials may be added below if liked.

ONE IN STEPNEY.—We have altered your pseudonym to something more suitable for our pages, and less sacred in its sound. We think your trouble arises from your health, and should advise you to consult a doctor, if you know of a good one near you, to whom you could describe your symptoms.

PAT MOSS.—The words "filthy lucre" are from the Bible, and will be found in Titus i. 7, 11; 1 Peter v. 2.

ONLY A WEAK MORTAL will find many pretty stories amongst the works of Miss Carey, Anne Beale, Hesba Stretton, Grace Stebbing, Agnes Giberne, and others.

E. A. C.—The tale has not been republished, nor do we know that it will be.

SYRACUSE, B.C. 732.—The Lord Say—mentioned in Shakespeare's Henry

VII., part ii., act 4—was James Fiennes, Governor of Arques, 1410, Constable of Dover, created Lord Say and Sele, 1447. He was Lord Treasurer, Oct., 1449; charged with treason in the Commons, imprisoned in the Tower, June, 1450, and beheaded by Jack Cade in July in the same year. He was an ancestor of the present peer.

BLANK BEAMS must order the health maps of the publishers through a bookseller in her own city. We were much interested in her letter.

CLARA.—1. We notice that some doctors are advising people with dry skins to use oatmeal or bran to soften the water used for the bath; and also to return to the old practice of anointing, using a pure olive oil in small quantities, to nourish the skin. Perhaps this may help you. 2. The dictionary gives "further" as the correct and genuine orthography; but when distance is signified the word "farther" seems in more general use, and both Milton and Dryden use it in this way. Dryden always uses "further" in the sense of promotion or "helping forward," as "to further your interests."

J. WADSWORTH.—There is an excellent life of Pascal, by Principal Tulloch, in Blackwood's "Foreign Classics for English Readers," in which his works are also noticed and commented upon.

BEAUTIES OF NATURE.—The leaves on the hedges must be more sheltered from the frost and the rain than the beech trees in the open park, which are exposed to every wind likely to blow off the leaves.

MISS "MUCH AFRAID" wants more fresh air and exercise, more cheerful companionship, and good reading. She should get some good tales, such as Sir Walter Scott's, and try to put fresh ideas, and turn out the old, foolish, sorrowful ones, and fill the mind with helpful, kind thoughts for others.

MARGARET.—Queensland would be the best climate, we should think, for you. You could only obtain such a situation by advertisement, stating that you were willing to be a nurse and mother's help.

M. A. B.—Flannels worn during the day should, of course, always be taken off at night, and hung on a chair to air during the night, after being well shaken. The best thing to wear at night is a flannel gown over the ordinary nightgown. This will preserve you from cold.

VICKIE.—We do not know about the eating of camphor being injurious, but the practice of constantly "nibbling" is certainly bad. You should eat nothing between your meals at all. It is an idle habit, and an idle question, we fear.

THE HAY-FIELDS.

THE sun had risen, the air was sweet,
And brightly shone the dew,
And cheerful sounds and busy feet
Passed the lone meadows through;
And waving, like a flowery sea
Of gay and spiry bloom,
The hay-fields rippled merrily
In beauty and perfume.

I saw the early mowers pass
Along that pleasant dell,
And rank on rank the shining grass
Around them quickly fell;
I looked, and far and wide at noon
The fallen flowers were spread,
And all, as rose the evening moon,
Beneath the scythe were dead.

"All flesh is grass," the Scriptures say,
And so we truly find;
Cut down, as in a summer's day,
Are all of human kind;
Some, while the morning still is fair,
Taken in earliest prime;
Some, mid-day's heat and burden bear,
But all, laid low in time.

A fable full of truth to me
Is this, the mower's tale;
I soon a broken stem shall be,
Like hay that strews the vale;
At early dawn, or closing light,
The scythe of death may fall;
Then let me learn the lesson right,
So full of truth to all.

By JAMES MASON.

FIRE TEMPLE AT BAKU.

V.—THE FOLKLORE OF FIRE.

The gift of fire, of all the gifts which a bountiful Creator has bestowed on mankind, is perhaps the most useful; certainly it is the most wonderful. Being such an everyday sight we think nothing of it, but suppose it were seen for the first time, what a marvel it would appear! Wonders of wonders lie hidden in every lucifer match, and by those who have eyes to see them may be observed in a farthing candle or in the flickering flame on our own domestic hearths.

This being so, it is one of the most natural things in the world that in early days, when everything was a subject of amazement and nothing seemed commonplace, fire gave rise to a great deal of folklore. Its mysterious origin and varied powers were subjects which the popular fancy seemed never weary of dwelling upon.

As to how fire first became known to the inhabitants of the earth there is a Persian tradition that it was discovered by Hushenk, a powerful hero, in an encounter with a dragon. He hurled a huge stone at the monster, but it missed the mark, struck a rock, and so was broken in pieces. "Light shone from the dark pebble, the heart of the rock flashed out in glory, and fire was seen for the first time in the world."

The blacks of Gippsland, in the colony of Victoria, tell that fire was brought to earth by a man who was changed into a bird. Fire was then in the possession of two women who detested the blacks. A man friendly disposed to them stole it when the women's backs were turned, and was changed into "a little bird with a red mark on its tail, which is the mark of fire."

Another Australian legend has it that fire was stolen by the hawk from the bandicoot and given to men. In a third it is said that a man held his spear to the sun and so got a light, which reminds one of the classical tale of how Prometheus brought to earth the torch he had lighted at the sun's chariot.

The golden or fire-crested wren is said in Brittany to have been the fire bringer. We mentioned when writing about birds that the ancients held the wren in great veneration as the heavenly messenger that brought fire to the earth, though it disputed this honour with the eagle.

One of the primitive races of North America has a tradition that fire was originally stolen by animals from the cuttle-fish. The Dakotas assert that their ancestors obtained fire from the sparks which a friendly panther struck with its sharp claws as it scampered over a stony hillside.

The reverence shown at the present day to fire in many parts of the world carries us back to the old time when fire was looked upon as a divinity, and every hearth was an altar. In many places it is held that nothing unclean should be thrown into it. To spit in one's fire is an unpardonable offence in Albania. Fire is held to be so sacred by some of the inhabitants of Russian Turkestan that they will not even blow out a light for fear of rendering the flame impure with their breath.

The fire is the central point of family life. In fact, in the distant past, says M. Elie Reclus, "the family, as it is called nowadays, developed itself after the human couple and their children had their own fireplace and not before." The hearth is woman's special sphere, and we find some odd notions connecting her with the fire, over which she presides as the guardian angel. When a bride returns from church in some parts of Germany, upon entering her new home, she bows to the fire, walks thrice round it, burns three of her hairs, and then binds a red string round her body.

A safe haven for scolds was pointed out to the traveller Pallas when he was amongst the Mongols of Central Asia. A woman, he was told, might indulge in the vilest abuse and insult, and no one would dare to touch her, so long as she stood between the bed and the fireplace.

The Deity was adored in this country at one time under the image of fire. Traces of this worship long existed in the form of the Beltane celebration, which was held every year on the first of May. The name Beltane is made up of bel, the Celtic god of light, and tin, meaning fire. Similar festivals took place at midsummer and in the beginning of November. The earliest notice of Beltane dates from the beginning of the tenth century, and we learn from it that it was the custom to kindle two fires quite close together. Between these fires both men and cattle were driven, under the belief that health was in that way promoted, and disease charmed away.

These superstitious fires were observed in Ireland about the close of the eighteenth century by a clergyman during his visit to that country. "At the house where I was entertained," he says, "in the summer of 1782, it was told me that we should see at midnight the most singular sight in Ireland, which was the lighting of fires in honour of the sun. Accordingly, exactly at midnight the fires began to appear, and taking the advantage of going up to the leads of the house, which had a widely extended view, I saw on a radius of thirty miles all around, the fires burning on every eminence which the country afforded. I had a further satisfaction in learning from undoubted authority that the people danced round the fires, and at the close went through these fires, and made their sons and daughters, together with their cattle, pass through the fire; and the whole was conducted with religious solemnity."

Until quite a recent period bonfires were lighted on Midsummer Eve in the northern parts of England and Wales. The 1st of November was devoted by the ancient Welsh to fire-worship, and in the Highlands of Scotland bonfires at Hallowe'en were long a recognised institution. "In 1860," says Mr. James Napier, "I was residing near the head of Loch Tay during the season of the Hallowe'en feast. For several days before Hallowe'en, boys and youths collected wood, and conveyed it to the most prominent places on the hillsides in their neighbourhood. Some of the heaps were as large as a cornstack or hayrick. After dark on Hallowe'en these heaps were kindled, and for several hours both sides of Loch Tay were illuminated as far as the eye could see. I was told by old men that at the beginning of this century men as well as boys took part in getting up the bonfires, and that when the fire was ablaze, all joined hands and danced round the fire and made a great noise; but that as these gatherings generally ended in drunkenness and rough and dangerous fun, the ministers set their faces against the observance, and were seconded in their efforts by the more intelligent and well-behaved in the community, and so the practice was discontinued by adults and relegated to schoolboys."

Fire has been often used by the superstitious to expel the demons of sickness. The Australian sorcerer in cases of accident touches with fire the part that is injured. The fire-cure in Patagonia is to throw burning brands into the air, accompanied by the discharge of guns and revolvers. When children are ill in Turkestan they are made to jump over burning fires, and are struck on the back seven times, whilst with every stroke the demon is ordered to "Come out!" "Begone to the sea!" and "Hurry off to the desert!"

For warding off and curing disease amongst cattle, fire has been extensively employed in Europe. It was supposed effectually to defeat the sorcery to which the disease was assigned. The fire for this purpose was obtained by the primitive method of rubbing wood against wood, or by the friction of a rope against a wooden stake. Fire struck from metal was supposed not to have the requisite virtue, and in some instances the persons who performed the ceremony were required to divest themselves of any metal which might be about them.

In a Mecklenburg village some time ago there was a murrain amongst the cattle. To charm it away the authorities ordered a "wild fire" to be lit. For two hours they tried in vain to obtain a spark, but the want of success was set down neither to the greenness of the wood nor to the dampness of the air, but to the contrariness of an old lady who, disbelieving in the superstition, refused to extinguish her night lamp. It seems that to be of any service the "wild fire" must burn alone. At last the old lady was induced to give in and fire was obtained. It must, however, have been of bad quality, for it did not put a stop to the murrain.

When disease came to cut off the pigs in outlandish places on the Continent, the "wild fire" was also often kindled. It had to be lit by married men: bachelors for the purpose were of no use at all. Similar practices are still followed by the shepherds in the mountainous districts of France, and it is not so long since they became extinct in the Highlands of Scotland.

In 1810 it was in use at the village of Balnaguard, in Perthshire, and notes regarding it were taken on the spot by a Mr. Joseph Train. "When the ceremony of getting fire by the friction of the two sticks is ended," says Mr. Train, "they consider the cure of the cattle complete; after which they drink whisky and dance to the bagpipe or fiddle round the celestial fire till the last spark is extinguished."

Extraordinary notions have been held regarding the information as to the future to be derived by keeping a watchful eye on the fire. The ancient Greeks and Romans were great believers in this sort of prophetic business. If the flames did not crackle, but burned silently in a pyramidal form, the omen was held to be favourable. Sometimes they threw pitch on the fire, and if it blazed up immediately it was looked on as a lucky sign.

Omen-mongers of modern times, who see as much in the fire as ever the ancients did, are referred to by Defoe in his "Memoirs of Duncan Campbell." "They perceive," he says, "swords, guns, castles, churches, prisons, coffins, wedding-rings, bags of money, men and women, or whatever they wish or fear, plainly deciphered in the glowing coals."

When a hollow cinder is thrown out of the fire by a jet of gas from burning coals, it is looked on as a coffin if it be long in shape, but if it be round it is a money-purse. Readers of "The Vicar of Wakefield" will remember how the vicar's daughters—the wish father to the thought—"saw rings in the candle, purses bounced from the fire, and true love-knots lurked in the bottom of every teacup."

A flake of soot hanging at the bars of the grate denotes the visit of a stranger, and he is believed to be coming from the part of the country nearest the soot. This fireside tradition is thus pleasantly recorded by Cowper in his "Winter Evening":—

"Me oft has fancy, ludicrous and wild, Soothed with a waking dream of houses, towers,
Trees, churches, and strange visages, expressed
In the red cinders, while with poring eye
I gazed, myself creating what I saw.
Nor less amused have I quiescent watched
The sooty films that play upon the bars
Pendulous and foreboding in the view Of superstition, prophesying still, Though still deceived, some stranger's near approach."

The hands were clapped close to the flake of soot, and if the current produced blew it off at the first clap, the stranger was said to be coming that very day. If the second clap blew it off, he was coming the day after, and so on.

When the fire suddenly blazed up it was held to be another warning of a stranger being near. The sudden breaking out of flame from an almost dead fire betokened joy.

The popular superstition regarding the falling of salt towards any person extends also to fire. The latter is to be taken as ominous of evil; he or she will soon suffer from the effects of anger.

In Lancashire young people lightly stir the fire with the poker to test the humour of their lovers. If the fire blazes brightly the lover is good-humoured, if not he is "cross as two sticks."

Another superstitious practice in Lancashire is to throw a person's hair on the fire with a view to finding out whether he will live long. If it burns brightly it is held to be a sure sign that the individual will reach a good old age. The brighter the flame the longer the life.

"If a youth," says Mr. James Napier, writing of the folklore of the W.s of Scotland, "sat musing and intently looking into the fire it was a sign that someone was throwing an evil spell over him, or fascinating him for evil. When this was observed, if anyone without speaking were to take the tongs and turn the centre coal or piece of wood in the grate right over, and while doing so say 'Gude preserve us from all skaith,' it would break the spell and cause the intended evil to revert on the ill-disposed person who was working the spell. I have not only seen the operation performed several times, but have had it performed in my own favour by my worthy grandfather, whose belief in such things could never be shaken."

It used to be thought a fatal omen if a fire died out on the hearth. In Lancashire it is held that if any householder's fire does not burn through the night of New Year's Eve, it betokens bad luck for all the ensuing year.

If anyone allows another to take a live coal to light up her extinguished fire on that eve the bad luck extends to the one granting the favour. "My maid," says a contributor to the third series of Notes and Queries, "who comes from the neighbourhood of Pendle, informs me that an unlucky old woman in her native village having allowed her fire to go out on New Year's Eve, had to wait till one o'clock on the following day before any neighbour would supply her with a light." In some districts of Lancashire the most kindly and charitable woman will sternly refuse to give anyone a light on the morning of New Year's Day as most unlucky to him or her who then gives away fire.

In Yorkshire the unlucky day for letting a light be taken out of the house appears to be Christmas Day. The Rev. T. F. Thiselton Dyer, in his interesting "Domestic Folklore," tells that "a few years ago a man was summoned at Bradford on a charge of wilful damage by breaking a pane of glass in a cottage window. Having entered for the purpose of lighting his candle, the woman of the house strongly remonstrated, but offered him instead a few matches. The man then created a disturbance, and on the husband trying to eject him he broke the window."

To the folklore of the weather our fires contribute a considerable number of items. These are amongst the "Nature's Secrets" disclosed by Willsford. When, he says, our common fires burn with a pale flame they presage foul weather. If the fire makes a buzzing noise it is a sign of tempests near at hand. When the fire sparkles very much it is a sign of rain. When pots are newly taken off the fire if they sparkle (the soot upon them being aflame) it presages rain.

When the fire scorches and burns more vehemently than usual it is a sign of frosty weather; but if the live coals shine brighter than ordinary at other times rain may be looked for. If wood or any other fuel crackles and emits wind more than ordinary, it is an evident sign of tempestuous weather near at hand; and the sudden and plentiful falling of soot heralds rain.

"A very popular charm," says Mr. Dyer, "for reviving a fire when it has burned down, is to set the poker across the hearth, with the forepart leaning against the top bar of the grate. The poker and top bar thus combined form a cross, and so defeat the malice of the witches and demons who preside over smoky chimneys. One notion is that the poker when in this position creates a draught, but the real meaning of this harmless superstition is, perhaps, the one we have just given."

Candles have many superstitions connected with them. The "fungous parcels," as Sir Thomas Browne calls them, about the wicks of candles, are usually said to foretell the arrival of strangers. In several places in England they were known as letters at the candle, as if, says Brand, "they were the fore-runners of some strange news."

Innkeepers in Amsterdam, about the close of the seventeenth century, called them "good men," and held that they were lucky when they burned long and brilliant, in which case they supposed they would bring customers; but when they soon went out they imagined that the customers already under their roofs would soon pack up and go.

To snuff out a candle by accident was held to be a sign of matrimony.

Something may be learned from the way a candle burns. "If a candle burn blue," says an old writer, "it is a sign there is a spirit in the house, or not far from it." Candles burning blue are amongst the favourite furniture of ghost stories.

In Willsford's "Nature's Secrets," from which we have already quoted, the burning of a candle is set down as an indicator of the weather. "If the flame of a candle, lamp, or any other fire," we are told, "does wave or wind itself when there is no sensible or visible cause, expect some windy weather." "When candles or lamps will not so readily kindle as at other times, it is a sign of wet weather near at hand." "When candles or lamps do sparkle and rise up with little fumes, or their wicks swell with things on them like mushrooms, these are signs of ensuing wet weather."

A collection of tallow rising up against the wick of a candle is known as a winding-sheet. When it is seen, say the superstitious, there will soon be a death in the family.

Girls who want to know the state of their sweetheart's affections have been known to practise a curious piece of divination with a candle and a pin. She who makes the trial takes a pin and cautiously sticks it through the substance of the candle, making sure at the same time that it pierces the wick. Whilst doing so she repeats the following rhyme:—

"It's not this candle alone I stick,
But A. B.'s heart I mean to prick;
Whether he be asleep or awake,
I'd have him come to me and speak."

She then watches the candle as it burns away, and if the pin remains in the wick after the flame has made its way below the place in which it was inserted, she may go to rest with an easy mind, for the loved one will be sure to visit her in dreams. If the pin drops out, however, it is a sign that he is faithless and not worth thinking about any more.

A pleasing saying used to be uttered in Ireland when they extinguished a candle. It was this:—"May the Lord renew the light of Heaven!"

A fiery appearance which, from its mysterious character, has given rise to a considerable quantity of folklore, is the ignis fatuus, or "vain or foolish fire." It is familiarly known by quite a number of names—Jack-o'-the-lantern, Spunkie, Will-o'-the-Wisp, Fair Maid of Ireland, and others, and is a common phenomenon in old-fashioned story books.

The inhabitants of some of the districts in Germany where Will-o'-the-Wisp appear believe them to be the souls of unchristened children, which, through being unbaptised, ceaselessly hover between heaven and earth.

A story is told of a simple-minded clergyman going home one evening, when he saw three Will-o'-the-Wisp floating before him in the air. Calling to mind the superstition, he dipped his hand in a pond and repeated the words of the baptismal service over them.

In an instant—quick as thought, in fact—the good man was surrounded by thousands of little flickering blue lights, all anxious to have the same ceremony repeated over them. The clergyman got such a fright that he took to his heels, and never stopped till he got safely to his own door.

It is sometimes said that if kindly disposed people will only throw a handful of consecrated earth after any Will-o'-the-Wisp that cross their path, these unhappy children will be released from their wanderings.

The belief in Ireland used to be that a Jack-o'-Lantern was a soul which had broken loose from purgatory. There was a book published in 1704, called "A Wonderful History of all the Storms, Hurricanes, Earthquakes, &c., and Lights that Lead People out of Their Way in the Night." In this we are told about these "lights usually seen in churchyards and moorish places," that in superstitious times "the popish clergy persuaded the ignorant people that they were souls come out of purgatory all in flame, to move the people to pray for their deliverance; by which they gulled them of much money to say mass for them, everyone thinking it might be the soul of his or her deceased relations."

The Will-o'-the-Wisp was long supposed to be an omen of death, and information as to the house in which the death was to take place was sometimes derived from the direction in which it moved in the air.

An illustration of this belief is given by Brand, from an account of the surprising preservation and happy deliverance of three women who were buried thirty-seven days in the ruins of a stable by a heavy fall of snow from the mountains, at the village of Berge-moletto, in Italy. The writer, who was the physician to the King of Sardinia, states that when the unhappy prisoners "seemed for the first time to perceive some glimpse of light, the appearance of it scared Anne and Margaret to the last degree, as they took it for a forerunner of death, and thought it was occasioned by the dead bodies; for it is a common opinion with the peasants that those wandering wild-fires which one frequently sees in the open country are a sure presage of death to the persons constantly attended by them, whichever way they turn themselves, and they accordingly call them death-fires."

In his "Popular Antiquities," published in 1777, Brand also mentions that "a species of this phenomenon, known in Buckinghamshire by the name of 'the Wat,' is said also to haunt prisons." At that time executions were common even for small offences, and when on the night before the arrival of the judge at the assizes the little flame was seen, it was accounted a fatal omen by every felon. "The moment the unhappy wretch sees it," says Brand, "he reckons his case hopeless, and resigns himself to the gallows."

It used to be a very common notion that Will-o'-the-Wisp delighted in the mischief of leading men astray on dark nights. Indeed, there have been many instances of people being decoyed by these lights into marshy places, where they perished. The poet Gay tells us "How Will-o'-Wisp misleads nightfaring O'er hill and sinking bogs, and pathless downs."

Milton also refers to it as "A wandering fire

Compact of unctuous vapour, which the night

Condenses, and the cold environs round,
Kindled through agitation to a flame,
Which oft, they say, some evil spirit attends,

Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
Misleads th' amazed night wanderer from his way

To bogs and mires, and oft through pond or pool,

There swallowed up and lost, from succour far."

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

By SOPHIA F. A. CAULFEILD.

the Hawthorn (Crataegus) is so familiar to most of us, not only as a hedge tree or bush, but as having a special history, interwoven with pretty and curious legends, it cannot be omitted from its place in this series of historical flowers.

Its name is supposed to be a corruption of the Dutch Hag, or "hedge thorn," and the name given it by the country folks, "May," is merely one denoting the month in which it beautifies the roadsides. The pink variety was first, accidentally, discovered in a hedge near Perth, and was long since introduced into England. The wreaths of Greek brides are composed of this flower, and it is otherwise very largely used at wedding festivities; besides which, on May-day boughs of it are hung over their doors, as we use holly at Christmas time. The use of the hawthorn, as being a tree of good augury, dates back to the time of the ancient Greeks, and was to them a symbol of conjugal union. On the other hand, it was connected with the rites for the dead by the ancient Germans, who consumed the wood on their funeral pyres, and believed that the souls of the deceased ascended to heaven in the flames that shot upwards. To the student of the Holy Scriptures this must recall the wonderful historical incident that occurred when the angel of the Lord went up to heaven in the flame from the altar raised by Manoah (Judges xiii. 20).

One legend in connection with this thorn is that it was of its branches that the crown of thorns was composed which encircled the brow of the Redeemer; and in France it is distinguished as l'épine noble on that account. Indeed, it is supposed there that the original crown was given by the Venetians to St. Louis, who placed it in the Ste. Chapelle which he had erected.

The house of Tudor assumed, as a specially distinguishing badge, a crown in a bush of hawthorn. This circumstance was accounted for by the hiding of the crown which encircled the helmet of Richard III., in a hawthorn bush, after he was killed at the battle of Bosworth Field. This same crown was presented by his father-in-law to Henry VII.

The "Glastonbury thorn," credited from ancient times to have been the pilgrim's staff of St. Joseph of Arimathea, stuck by him into the ground on Werrall (anciently called "Weary-all") Hill, is now no more; although we may believe that the numberless thorn trees and bushes in that neighbourhood were cuttings raised from that original tree. A flat memorial stone now indicates the spot where it stood. In the days of Queen Elizabeth it was cut down by a zealous Puritan, and again in those of Charles I., and from time immemorial a thriving trade was carried on, both with the young offshoots, and the blossoms of the original much-suffering parent thorn.

The miraculous character attributed to this particular tree seems to have exhibited further development in the fact of its budding and blossoming annually on Old Christmas Day, the 6th of January. In the Gentleman's Magazine for January, 1753, it is stated that "a vast concourse of people attended the noted thorn on Christmas Day, new style; but, to their great disappointment, there was no appearance of its blowing; which made them watch it narrowly the 6th of January—the Christmas Day, old style—when it blew as usual!"

Few trees have been the subject of so many superstitions. In some countries misfortune is attached to both bringing it into a house or cutting it down. In others it is regarded as a tree of good influences, and to bring it into the home is to ensure the latter against storm and lightning and the visitation of evil spirits. The presentation of a branch by a Turkish lover is an indication that he desires the favour of a kiss!

There is a very ancient specimen enclosed in Cawdor Castle (Inverness-shire), round which it has been the usage of guests to meet and drink a toast to the prosperity of the House of Cawdor; the venerable tree having been an indication to the original proprietor where the Castle was to be built.

Heather (Erica, of the natural order of Ericacea) must follow next in our series; little, albeit, that I may have to say about it. To our Scotch friends it is a kind of national flower, almost as dear as their royal badge, the thistle. To no less than nine of their clans the heather, or heath, serves as a badge.

Although this plant grows in such luxuriance on the Scottish mountains, from their base up to a height of 3,300 feet above the sea, a greater variety of it abounds in Ireland, where it has been less affectionately regarded, and with which country it has not been specially identified. Altogether, distributed throughout Europe, North Asia, and the Cape of Good

HEATHER, OR PLANTA GENISTA.

Hope, some 400 species are to be found. It is also a native of North America and Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Cape Bréton, etc. This is the common Ling (Calluna vulgaris).

There is an allusion to "the heath in the desert" by the prophet Jeremiah, but it is supposed that the plant to which he alludes, translated "heath," was the juniper. The Erica tetralix and the E. Cinerea, though more rare than the Ling, are very abundant on the Scottish hills, and occasionally produce white flowers. The former is the badge of the Clan Macdonald, the latter that of the Clan McAlister, and the white heather that of the Captain of Clanronald. Those acquainted with the early history of the country will remember that "Con, of a hundred fights," adopted heather as his special badge.

There is tradition that after the slaughter of the Picts by Kenneth, two only having survived the extermination, the Conqueror was desirous of learning the valuable secret that this people possessed of making beer from heather. When brought before him he demanding it of the father, with the promise of his life as the reward; but his son was first put to death before his eyes, to enforce consent, by order of the cruel monster. Naturally, this was just the way to make the brave prisoner of war hold faster to the secret than ever. "Your threats," he said, "might, perhaps, have influenced my son, but they have no effect on me!" The heroism of the fine old soldier told on the Conqueror, now vanquished in his turn, and he allowed him to live out his life in bereavement, still keeping the coveted secret, which died with him at last. Nevertheless, the natives of Isla in the Jura and that neighbourhood have a recipe for brewing a mixture of considerable strength, composed of two-thirds of the tops of the heather to one of malt.

Poets have each respectively sung the praises of some particular flower. Burns, Gray, Sir W. Scott, Mary Howitt, Mrs. Grant, and many more have written with enthusiasm about heather. Walter von der Vogelweide says, in one of his minnie-lieder, "The heather blushes red in spring to see how green the forest is growing; so sorrow is ashamed at sight of joy."

At the present time white heather is much worn as a wedding decoration.

The Hemlock (old English, Hemleac—leac a plant) which has been illustrated, it will at once be seen, is not Longfellow's "hemlock tree." This latter may be better known as the "Canadian spruce" fir (Abies Canadensis); the description of its unchanging greenness—in the lines by which that charming writer has immortalised it—does not apply to the wild flower so named, of sinister reputation and lugubrious historical associations.

"Oh, hemlock tree! oh, hemlock tree!

How faithful are thy branches.

Green, not alone in summer time,

But in the winter's frost and rime.

Oh, hemlock tree! oh, hemlock tree!

How faithful are thy branches."

The tree in appearance is worthy of notice, for it is a fine one in height and size, and the bark is employed for tanning purposes, though the timber, I believe, is not of much value.

The wild flowering hemlock plant (Conium maculatum) is distinguished by its poisonous properties, and the ancients availed themselves of a deadly decoction made from it to escape from the troubles of their mortal life, or the privations and infirmities of age. On these occasions they bedecked themselves with garlands, and drank the fatal draught with much ostentation before admiring spectators, who praised them for what they misnamed "heroism." True fortitude is shown in braving all trials, rather than in running away from them and turning the coward's back on the dreaded enemy.

"The brave live on."

A great truth, which these worthies failed to see, and to be recognised quite apart from any knowledge which we possess of Christian endurance, or trust in a higher Power for help to triumph over all. The great Socrates, Phocion, and Theramenes were victims to the influences of this deadly narcotic, which has, it would seem, a chilling effect on the blood.

(A) YELLOW IRIS.

(B) SMALL-HEADED IRIS.

But my young readers may remember that Socrates did not fly of his own accord from the troubles of life, like so many of his countrymen, but was condemned to death by the magnates of the Areopagus, B.C. 300, having been falsely accused of impiety by Anytus and Melitus. He was a reformer, and taught that there was but one supreme Deity, although there were many minor gods or agencies under Him, and he protested against the evil stories which became matters of faith about these multitudinous and fabulous deities, and thus he raised a persecution against him by those who were censured by his highly moral life and teachings. But the details of this story are almost out of place in dealing with the history of a flower.

As one of evil physical influences, it has always been associated with bad spiritual ones. Offensive in odour, and growing in waste places, we can understand the reference made to it by the prophet Hosea, when he said: "Judgment springeth up as hemlock, in the furrows of the field." What a significant emblem of a terrible miscarriage of justice, and what a putting of "sweet for bitter, and bitter for sweet" in that land!

The hemlock plant is known also by country folks as "Cowbane," from its effects on the cattle that chance to eat it. There is one species (Cicuta virosa) equally dangerous in its character, growing along the margin of locks and ponds. But with all its baleful properties, it has much medicinal value, and amongst other evils for which it is employed as a palliative or cure, it is a direct sedative, more especially in its action on the spinal cord.

What can I say of Holly that my readers could not tell me themselves? And, moreover, some may object that while it has a small white flower, it is not the flower, but the berry, that is its special characteristic, and that it is therefore an interloper amongst the historical flowers of this series. But so national an emblem has it been from time immemorial of our great winter festival, and connected with our own family reunions, dating from the happy spring time of life, that it possesses too dear and sacred a significance to be excluded from the list of historical flowers. In making such a concession to the berry-bearing holly, the berry-bearing Mistletoe must share an equal privilege, although it be not, as the former, the offspring of a flower. Associated as it is with the early history of our country, and with the Yule-tide merry-makings of our English homes, it could no less be omitted than the holly. It is too closely bound up with "The days that are no more,"

and the "Voices that are heard in dreams alone!"

The Holly (Ilex aquifolium) derives its English name from the Anglo-Saxon Holegn. Chaucer called it Hulfeere, from the old Norse, Hulfr. It is known in Germany as Christdorn, because supposed by them to have supplied, by its sharply-pointed leaves, the crown of thorns that encircled the Redeemer's head, although not at all likely, when thorns exceptionally long abound in Palestine. But there is a fable tradition respecting the holly, derived from the red berries, symbolic of drops of blood, and the name resembling the word "holy," as well as the thorny nature of the leaf, which name also renders it specially obnoxious to witches (so say the "Folklore" historians). This idea is to be recognised in one of the old carols.

"The holly bears a berry
As red as any blood,
And Mary bore sweet Jesus Christ,
To do poor sinners good.
Oh! the rising of the sun,
The running of the deer,
The playing of the merry organ,
The singing of the choir!"

It is a sacred plant in India and Persia, and the fire worshippers (Zoroastrians) are under the curious delusion that the tree casts no shadow. Boughs of holly were mutually exchanged by friends amongst the ancient Romans during the Saturnalia; and while the early Christian Church objected to the continuance of any practices by the believers in Christ, however innocent, which had any connection with the heathen rites, yet the Roman Christians would not be deprived of a natural provision so beautiful for the decoration of their own churches on the anniversary of the Blessed Redeemer's birth.

I have already incidentally referred to the Iris as supplying the origin of the conventional Fleurs-de-Lys, or de Luce. Further than this I shall only make a few additional notes respecting it. The name ("all hues") is derived from a fabulous deity and special attendant on Juno. She was entitled "the Goddess of the Rainbow," and was represented with variegated colours on her wings, and as the Greeks supposed that she guided the souls of the women to their spiritual resting-place (as Mercury those of men), they planted her emblematic flower round the tombs of their women. The Egyptians, Babylonians, and Assyrians held the Iris in much esteem; with it they crowned the brows of the sphinx, and adorned the sceptres of their kings; and the flower may be seen as the terminal ornament on the latter, and on the monuments of the kings of Assyria and Babylon. The same idea of its regal character or its stately beauty caused the selection of this flower-crowned reed or flag, by the ancient Franks (the yellow Pseud-acorus) as a sceptre, which they placed in the hand of a newly-proclaimed king, when they elevated him upon a shield, and bore him in state upon their shoulders.

This beautiful flower has been immortalised by poets, from the time when Virgil sang of the goddess of whom it was the chosen emblem, down to that of Longfellow—some of my readers recognising the quotation—

"O! flower de luce, bloom on, and let the river
Linger to kiss thy feet!
O flower of song, bloom on, and make for ever
The world more fair and sweet."

LOVE VERSUS MONEY.

By L. SHARP, Author of "Nan's Story," "May's Dream," etc.

CHAPTER II.

A GOOD deal can happen in six months, and the months that followed the introduction to Dr. Owen seemed to Leslie the fullest and the happiest that she had ever known. She had never worked so hard in her life. Fortunately for her, Mr. Barton had allowed her to do as she liked, being persuaded by Miss Cameron that it was only a whim which would ere long pass away.

"She will soon grow tired, dear Mr. Barton," Miss Cameron had remarked on his expostulating with her; "believe me, Leslie is very self-willed, and it is best to let these fits of enthusiasm die a natural death. After some time, say about Christmas, you could fill the house with guests, and that would be quite enough excuse to withdraw her from her present work."

"You ought to know best, my dear young lady," had been the gallant reply. "I shall leave her in your hands until then, but I ain't going to put up with her ways after Christmas."

And thus Leslie had had peace, and began to be a familiar sight in the homes of the mill hands of Hazeldean. She had a class for girls two hours twice a week; one afternoon devoted to the mothers, either in teaching them cooking or sewing; one afternoon at the Infirmary, where her bright presence was a very sunbeam in the wards; and one evening given up to the weekly entertaining of men and women, boys and girls, which Dr. Owen had started in the public hall. This, with horse exercise, driving, occasional calls, and tramps over the hills, kept her constantly employed. While as for her free evenings, somehow it grew to be an established thing to find Dr. Owen quite frequently at Fern Tower.

It wanted but a week to Christmas. The invitations for the festivities with which Mr. Barton had determined to wean back his niece to her former gay if useless life had been issued, and were the subject of many comments among the young people of the neighbourhood.

Sir Philip and Miss Seymour had duly received theirs, but it was not Leslie's dainty note that the former was twisting fiercely in his hand this stormy day in the large morning room of Hazeldean Castle.

"I'm in a wretched mess!" he muttered, glaring angrily at his sister and Captain Northbrook, who were laughing merrily over some old reminiscences. "I say, Ethel," he added, sullenly, rising from his almost untasted breakfast, "if I cannot bring that girl to book I'm done for. Can't you do something to help a fellow on with her?"

"My dear boy," replied his sister, calmly, "heiresses are not to be won every day; you must not be so impatient; you will have plenty of time during our fortnight's stay at Fern Tower to win your charmer, though I am afraid that you are superseded in that quarter now."

"What do you mean?" sharply.

"What you would have seen for yourself, Philip, were you not always so much taken up with number one," was the petulant reply; "the continual presence of a clever, handsome young biped, of course."

Captain Northbrook whistled.

"Oh, sits the wind so?" he exclaimed, glancing at Philip's darkening face. "Never mind, old fellow, we'll do our best to help you to cut him out."

Philip bit his lips, his usual drawl disappearing as he asked, curtly—

"Is it that poor Dr. Owen that is my rival?"

"The very same."

"Surely the doctor of a small place like Hazeldean can have no chance with a girl of old Barton's stamp compared with you, Phil, the owner of a name and place as old as the very town itself," queried Captain Northbrook, incredulously. "I would put it to the test if I were you."

"Unfortunately for my plans, Leslie is not the least like her noble uncle," retorted Seymour, drily.

"No; I am afraid that she appreciates brains more than anything," said Ethel, with a mischievous glance at her fiancé.

"I don't exactly see the connection!" And Sir Philip scowled at his sister as she spoke.

"Stupid boy; 'none so blind as won't see'; however, why can't we ride over there by-and-by, provided the snowstorm condescends to take a rest, and see how the land lies?"

"We might do worse," assented Sir Philip, staring gloomily at the fire, "but I won't know where to turn to if your suspicions are correct."

"Never say die, Seymour," cried his friend, gaily; "there are more on your side than the bipeds, and we will do our utmost to put a spoke in his wheel."

About two hours after the above conversation Leslie Barton might be seen wending her way from the Infirmary. A wild wind swept over the wood, part of which she had to pass through, bending and driving the branches of the snow-laden trees into fantastic forms. She stood still for a moment's rest from the fierce blast that had nearly taken her breath away, and it seemed to her for the time as if she stood alone in a great white world of silence. A curious dread took possession of her; a nameless terror at the sudden solitude which surrounded her on every side.

"Miss Barton! This is surely never you out on such a day?"

Leslie started, then her whole face brightened beautifully as she sprang forward to meet the owner of the voice, saying, with a pretty mixture of relief and shyness—

"Dr. Owen! Oh, I am so glad to see you! I was just beginning to be frightened; I felt as if I could not move."

"Whither away?" he asked, quietly taking her hand and placing it on his arm.

"Home, now; I have been at the Infirmary. I would not have gone in such a storm had I not promised to do so to that poor girl Effie Brown. However, the snow has stopped and the wind is not quite so violent. Do you know, Dr. Owen," she continued, rather wistfully, "they are all telling me that enthusiasm never lasts. Do you think that that is really the case?"

There was a ring of sadness in her tone, and the flush that mantled in her cheeks did not escape her companion. He understood what she was dreading; how that the natural depression consequent on seeing such unusual sights of misery and suffering had made her shrink often from her work, and fear that she was going to be a failure.

"What does it matter if we lose in enthusiasm," he answered, gently, "provided we gain in earnestness? I only know that personal weariness or sadness is nothing, nothing; that cannot be helped. The one thing that is of any importance is that we should 'bear witness to the truth.'"

Leslie looked up at him gratefully.

"You act like a tonic on me, Dr. Owen," she said, with a bright smile; "you always say something to brace me mentally."

"To prevent mental dyspepsia, eh? I am not afraid of that with you, however," he added earnestly; then, in a lower tone, "Are you going to Mrs. Wilson's this evening?"

"Yes; and you?"

"I had not made up my mind, but I shall certainly go now," was the significant reply, which, as much as the look that accompanied the words, made the colour leap to the young girl's face. "I have some lovely camellias in my little greenhouse; if I send you a few will you condescend to wear them this evening?"

"Of course I shall," replied Leslie, frankly, "and be delighted too, but," the faint far-off sound of a gong recalling her to the fact that luncheon must be nearly ready, "won't you come in? I see uncle at the study window."

"No, thanks; I have to visit a patient farther on. You will not forget to wear my flowers this evening, Miss Leslie, for I hall —" He stopped abruptly, scanning the upturned face with a keen, though wistful glance.

"What?" she asked, nervously, for his dark-blue eyes were dilated with a strange light that seemed to be seeking something within her own.

"I shall look upon them as an emblem of hope. Adieu for the present." And with a warm pressure of her hand he turned to retrace his steps to the public road.

The storm of wind had sobbed itself away, and the sun was trying to struggle through the misty clouds; the dark avenue of trees seemed to be whispering in unison with the eager fluttering of the little heart that sped past them.

"Was it really the same dreary avenue that she had passed through in the morning?" Leslie asked herself wonderingly, as she stood for a moment on the doorstep and glanced down the walk. Everything looked so different then! "It must be the sun," she said softly; "sunshine always makes the greatest difference." And she ran upstairs with a heart so light and joyous, that when she entered the dining-room not even the unexpected presence of Sir Philip Seymour could annoy her. She did not notice her uncle's evident ill-humour, or Miss Cameron's valiant efforts to keep up the flow of conversation. Unfortunately for the deluded young person, her short period of bliss had a rapid ending.

The late little scene in the avenue was not much of an incident, but it had evidently roused in Mr. Barton's mind a new train of thought. Whatever the idea, its immediate result was a hastily-worded note to Dr. Owen, to come to a private interview next morning to Fern Tower. The inquiries regarding the latter had not been satisfactory in a monetary point of view, neither had the relationship to the Welsh nobleman been of much value; therefore the young man's pretensions to equality with the rich merchant were, to say the least of it, impertinent and audacious.

"May I have a few minutes with you alone, Mr. Barton?" asked Sir Philip, rising languidly from the table as the old man pushed back his chair.

"Yes, certainly. Go to the study, my boy, and I shall follow you immediately. Leslie," turning sharply to his niece, regardless of the presence of his guests, "don't you be encouraging that doctor fellow to come here again. We've had quite enough of him of late, and I'm not going to have it—do you hear?—or any more of your running about under his auspices."

Leslie looked up in astonishment.

"Why, uncle," she began, indignantly, "it was you who first asked Dr. Owen to the house! Do you think," she continued with flushing cheeks, "that I shall disown any of my friends out of mere caprice? Minnie," with an appealing glance at that lady, "have you nothing to say for one whose friendship you appear to value?"

"My dear child," replied Miss Cameron, coldly, "surely your uncle is the best judge as to the fitness of the guests he asks to his own house!"

"And understand, miss, that I mean what I say," was Mr. Barton's parting growl, as he slammed the door behind him.

Leslie's lip curled disdainfully as she eyed Miss Cameron.

"You are only a fair-weather friend, Minnie, I see; I shall know what to expect at your hands when I fall out of favour."

"I should hope that you are too wise to do that, my dear," said Miss Cameron, complacently, thinking of the approving glance which Mr. Barton had cast on her for her former reply.

"Always know on which side your bread is buttered, in fact," remarked Captain Northbrook, drily. "Come, Miss Leslie, what does it matter whether you give this fellow his conge or not? You surely have plenty of friends to choose from without him?"

There was a sneer in his words which did not escape the girl; but though she saw that he was trying to make her angry, and was evidently enjoying her discomfiture, she was determined to stick bravely to her colours.

"You are mistaken," she said very quietly, though her face burned with the effort at composure. "There is no friendship that I value more than Dr. Owen's; but as we are all at variance on the subject, let us talk of something else."

"Now, Leslie," cried Ethel Seymour, impertinently, "when you know that there is nothing of half so much interest to you? How grateful somebody would be if he could only have heard what you said!"

"He knows," said Leslie, proudly, "that I would do the same for anyone whose absence prevented their own defence."

"Very high-flown and all that, you know, but take care, my dear young lady, that this entertaining friendship does not ripen into anything more serious." And Ethel smiled significantly as she spoke.

Leslie looked straight at the mocking face of the girl, and then, with a brave, sweet dignity that struck Ethel with a sudden remorse, she said, "A true friend is a gift from God, Ethel. I wish," slowly, "that you felt the sacredness of friendship more." And she turned and left the room.

"Now, Miss Cameron, let us do our part to help poor Philip," exclaimed Captain Northbrook, eagerly; "let us keep as much as possible altogether to-night at the Wilsons, so that she may have no chance of being alone with that beggar. Then you can gently insinuate to him the probable engagement of a certain couple. Do you understand?"

"Yes." Then as the door opened and the butler handed in a lovely bouquet, "For Miss Leslie, ma'am," Miss Cameron calmly held out her hand, saying, "Just give it to me, Forest; it is all right." And as he withdrew, "Well," glancing at the others, "what are we to do with these?"

"So!" answered Ethel, decidedly, tossing the flowers into the blazing fire. "It is necessary for Phil's sake to try foul as well as fair means."

"You had better not treat my bouquets in that way, mademoiselle!" said Northbrook, laughingly. "I wonder what Miss Barton would say to you now, eh? Another tirade on friendship, perhaps?"

Ethel smiled complacently. "She shall be none the wiser. We have only to follow up the game now to be the winners in the field. I shall give you absolutism to-night, Henry," she added archly, "so that whenever Philip retires from her side you can be his proxy; will you?"

"Exactly. And now for a scamper along the road. Ta-ta, ladies." And one of the conspirators against Leslie's peace took his departure, while the other two rejoined their unconscious victim.

In the meantime Sir Philip had been closeted with Mr. Barton.

"I shall not detain you long, sir," the former had begun, politely, as soon as they were alone. "I only wish to ask you for your niece's hand. You must have noticed my admiration of her, and that it has been my one ambition to make her the lady of Hazeldean Castle. True, I have little more than a name to offer her (except a lot of debts," he muttered inwardly), "but such as I have I beg to lay at her feet."

To tell the truth Mr. Barton had no idea that Sir Philip was so deeply in debt; he knew that the greater part of the land was mortgaged; but then the Seymours were the only people who had allowed him to treat them with intimacy, and he was determined to see his niece "my lady somebody."

"You shall have her with my heartiest consent," he replied, seizing the young man's hand with a grasp that made him wince, "and fifty thousand pounds besides on the wedding-day—not to speak of what she will step into ultimately."

"I wish I was as sure of the young lady herself," drawled Sir Philip, watching keenly through his half-closed eyes at the effect of his words; "she seems rather épris with that objectionable Owen."

"What do you mean, sir? Do you think that my niece would dare to set my wishes at defiance? If she does not listen to you, Seymour, my word but she will listen to me!" And Mr. Barton's face grew purple as he brought his foot with a fierce stamp to the floor. "You can have your innings first, my boy," with a harsh laugh, "and then I'll have mine."

Sir Philip smiled grimly.

"I shall speak to her this evening. Thanks so much for your kind approval." And he sauntered lazily out of the room. "Fifty thousand pounds!" he muttered; "fifty—thousand—pounds. I must have her! The girl has beauty enough to tempt one without her wealth, though she is not my style. Anyway," with an unpleasant chuckle, "I shall cut that fellow out of the concern."

A KISS.

THERE is a kiss repulsive, cold,
Void of the sacred flame;
'Tis but a counterfeit, a mock,
Unworthy of the name.

What benefit can be derived
From such a Judas kiss?
It only kindles angry fire
When you the motive guess.

'Tis often given to gain respect,
Or favour to secure;
How cruel thus to make a sale
Of emblems half so pure!

Alas! how many heartless hearts
The hypocrite disguise,
By actions that betoken love,
But which true love denies.

There is a kiss, how calm, how pure,
The true heart's chief delight;
Its register is kept in heaven,
Its sweetness is its might.

Its gentleness great conquests make,
It checks an angry thought;
It causes stubborn wills to bend,
And give in when they ought.

When all has failed, this holy kiss
Can raise its banners high;
Can conquering unto conquering go,
And hellish hosts defy.

Its memory cheers us through the day
While in the world we toil;
When often tempted to do wrong
Satanic power is foiled.

How vain, how cold this world would be Without some dear one's care,
Striving to win the kiss, the smile,
And each one's griefs to share.

How sweet the memory of a kiss
Of a departed friend,
Whose life had been our very own;
So true did friendship blend.

It is the mightiest, sharpest sword
Which love delights to wield;
Fierce are its thrusts and deep its wounds,
But by true love they're healed.

A victory by love thus gained Deserves a rich reward;
What nobler laurels can be won
Than to have love restored?

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER VII. THE HILL OF ANGELS.

EMPTYING is the path that winds upwards over the craggy moorland shoulder towards the Joch Pass; fair and wild are the views revealed to the climber, of snowfield, peak and ravine. But lovely as it was, Evelyn's feet trod it unwillingly after her encounter with Mrs. Allingham West. She would fain have turned back and followed her idol down to the valley. To be under the same roof with her! to have the opportunity, through this brief interview and offer of service, of acquaintance, possibly friendship! The perspective was bewilderingly delightful; and to turn her back on it, even for twenty-four hours, was a trial.

Once Evelyn actually proposed that they should go back. The ascent was steep and hot. Miss Wentworth's horse could not climb, and was proving neither ornamental nor useful, as he had to be hauled up by the bridle, with wild shouts and cries from the driver. These circumstances were relied upon by the girl as aids to her suggestion, but it was indignantly negatived.

"We shall no doubt see the gifted authoress as much as we wish when we get back," asserted Miss Wentworth, stopping to rest. "She did not impress me as favourably as I could have hoped; she did not offer to shake hands. In my country, even the President will shake hands with the poorest citizen."

"It is not the English custom," rejoined Evelyn, tartly.

"Well, that is an answer to every objection one could urge against anything, is it not?" responded the American, in such a tone Evelyn could hardly tell if she were jesting or in earnest.

But Dottie broke out,

"Why, Evelyn, I am sure it is enough to give up my bedroom, without giving up my excursion as well, all to please somebody I only saw once, and don't care if I never see again."

The usually perfect temper of Dorothy Lancaster seemed ruffled.

"Why, Dot, you are not giving up your bedroom at all; it is mine she is to have—"

"It comes to the same thing, as I share mine with you," replied Dottie.

"You always said you would like it," remarked Evelyn, in an aggrieved tone.

She had grown to consider that, as an authoress, she had a claim to privacy, and she valued it greatly; while little Dottie always declared she could never have too much of Evelyn's society. Hence, in proposing the new arrangement to Mrs. West, she had left Dottie's feelings rather out of the question, and her cousin, who was not disposed to worship at the authoress's shrine, resented it.

No cloud of vexation, however, could long remain on Dorothy's brow, and harmony was quickly restored. On the summit of the Joch Pass they had a long rest, before pursuing their downward way.

The horse was found no better adapted to the steep descent than he had been to the steep ascent. Evelyn congratulated herself that she had no need of such aid, as she stepped gaily along the path, which winds down the moorland, with the vast snows of the Wendenstöcke on the left. Far, far away appeared the Bernese Alps, in faint yet imposing splendour. There seemed a world of Alpine air between. Evelyn recognised the well-known forms of majesty, and eagerly pointed them out to Miss Wentworth.

Soon a lovely blue lake became visible below, and then a little inn was seen on a stretch of pasture not far from the water's brink. This was the Engstlen Alp, which lies about a thousand feet below the summit of the pass, but is nevertheless at the lofty elevation of 6,000 feet, about the same height as the Grimsel Hospice. Surrounded by mountain tops, a white torrent streaming down a rock-face near, and the further vista breaking away into pine forests extending far, far down towards the valley—with the Schreckhörner and Wetterhörner hovering in dim Titanic majesty to close the prospect—it was a "picture for remembrance."

"Well, this is better than hunting after Mrs. Allingham West!" cried Dottie, dancing forward, with health and happiness sparkling in her eye. Miss Wentworth appeared dreadfully tired; she had been able during the last half-hour to remount her steed, but was very weary, nevertheless, and glad to enter the little wooden inn. The landlady gave the ladies a hospitable reception, and assigned them two rooms in the dépendance, which is some yards away, and larger than the original building. Tea followed, in a primitive salle-à-manger, and Evelyn then went forth alone to muse on a seat at the top of a little hill, whence she could enjoy the view in all its glory.

"She doesn't want me; she is composing poetry," said Dottie to Miss Wentworth, in tones of awe, as they sat at a little table outside the inn.

"I hope not," was the somewhat unexpected reply of the American lady.

"Why? Oh, Miss Wentworth, don't you like Evelyn's poems?"

"I don't think poetry is her forte," replied the American. "Very pretty, and so forth, but not original; she does not write herself, but only what she has heard other people say, or what she thinks she ought to feel. She has never grasped that precept of my countryman Emerson, 'Trust thyself; every heart vibrates to that iron string.'"

This was heresy, and Dottie had that very rare feminine virtue, dislike to unfavourable criticism of an absent friend.

"Oh, I am sorry you don't appreciate her!" she cried, with genuine distress. "I noticed you never said anything about 'Day-dreams,' and I was afraid you didn't like them. Everybody does at home, and Evelyn is quite a heroine, you know, among all our friends; they think it so splendid to have written a book."

"My dear little girl," said the lady, laying her curiously white soft wrinkled hand upon Dottie's arm, "I did not mean to find fault with your cousin's work behind her back. I shall tell her my opinion some day, when she knows me better. I think she is very clever and very charming; that is all the more reason why she should direct her powers in the right way, instead of getting spoiled and idle."

"Idle!" ejaculated Dottie.

"Well, well; you are a brave little champion, and we will not discuss Evelyn any more; there is much temptation in her way," rejoined Miss Wentworth, musingly.

This was very bewildering to Dot, who did not know anything about Emerson or iron strings, and who firmly believed that Evelyn was a genius of the first order, even if she were a little tiresome sometimes in running after authoresses.

Meanwhile the object of their conversation was absorbed in a happy dream. She was not, in spite of Dottie, trying to compose poetry; she found her lines and similes all too incongruous and halting to approach the glory spread out before her. And this was, as Miss Wentworth would have recognised, a step in the right direction—a step towards better work.

They were soon interested in watching the herdsman calling home the goats for the night. Standing on the pasture, he uttered a peculiar long-drawn cry, and immediately the hill-sides around became alive with leaping, running creatures, speeding from crag to crag, hastening down the slopes to their nightly rest.

Supper, with various guests in the little inn, followed; a pleasant meal, enlivened by chat and laughter. Many of the people were making a long stay in this fair, lofty pasture land, and spoke with enthusiasm of its invigorating air and the magnificent walks they could take over the surrounding heights.

Evelyn and Dottie wandered after nightfall near the sleeping waters of the lake, watching the summer lightning play upon the snow; then came rest and happy dreams, broken by a feeling of the strangeness of the place.

"Oh, how I wish we were going to stay here!" were Dottie's waking words; and were it not for the vision of Mrs. Allingham West, Evelyn would have echoed them. As soon as the cousins were dressed, they went across to the inn in the brilliant morning sunlight. Through the open kitchen door a pretty scene met their gaze. One of the inn servants, a buxom, handsome girl, whom Evelyn had admired on the previous evening, was sitting, with her back turned to the pot au feu, reading a letter, a smile of delight and coquetry mingled on her face. A lad was busily eating his breakfast, inattentive to aught else. He evidently had been bearer of the missive, as well as of a large round cheese that still adorned his porter's tray, unstrapped now from his shoulders.

"What a pretty picture!" whispered Evelyn. And she found her imagination evolving an explanation of the scene.

The boy had brought an epistle from the Alpine maiden's absent lover; the cheese was an offering of affection, made by that lover's own hands. She felt an intense interest in watching the face of the pretty Marie as she spelt out the letter. Whether the latter part of the conjecture was true, history saith not; but the former part was accurate enough, as Evelyn learned a little to her cost.

As Miss Wentworth's horse did not excel in climbing, she started half an hour in advance of the others. The girls had paid their bill, and were ready to depart, when Marie, with a very red face, rushed out, extending a letter to Dottie, and uttering many excuses—excuses that Evelyn could translate a little more accurately than the Swiss maiden thought.

The note, dated the previous day, had come up from Engelberg, which the boy had quitted before dawn. It was from Mrs. Lancaster, containing rather startling news.

"Directly you had gone," ran the note, "there came a letter from Algy, saying he should be in from Lucerne to-day, and sure enough he came in after lunch, looking very well, with some German friends; but he seemed dreadfully put out to find you gone, dear fellow, and nothing would suit him but he must come on to the Engstlen Alp himself. I told him you meant to return, but he urges me to write and tell you to stay till he comes, so I must put off seeing you again till the day after to-morrow. We have had another surprise, for Mrs. Allingham West has come, and brought a note from Evelyn; she has taken Evelyn's room, which I consider a little forward on her part."

"Oh, dear!" cried Evelyn; "it is too bad of Algy. I did so long to get back to Mrs. West; and now we must stay here. And Miss Wentworth is quite out of reach. She will wonder what has become of us."

"She will find it out when she gets to Engelberg, and at any rate we can't help it," replied Dottie; "only I wish we had not had all the trouble of getting ready, and paying everything up. I should just like to know why we had not the note before Miss Wentworth started."

The fact was that Marie's lover, employed at the dairy farm of Herrenrütli near Engelberg, was the messenger's brother, and had sent a letter of his own in addition to that of Mrs. Lancaster; Marie had been so absorbed in the one that she had omitted to deliver the other.

It was after all not much of a hardship to linger in that lovely mountain pasture, among the grand old pines and cedars, and by the margin of the lake. And not many hours elapsed before a young man, clad in grey, alpenstock in hand, and wearing an exceedingly joyous expression of countenance, was seen marching from the pass. Dottie flew into his arms.

"Oh, Algy! I am so awfully glad to see you again."

Evelyn followed sedately, and gave a kindly greeting to her cousin. He was four or five years older than his sister, slightly built, and below the average height; with fair hair and moustache, pleasant blue eyes, and a mouth and chin that to the critical observer would have betrayed a lack of firmness of character. But he was a prepossessing lad, and it said something in his favour that he had been partially, instead of completely, spoiled by the adoring fondness of his mother and sister, in whose eyes he could do no wrong. When he failed to take his degree at college, when he ran into debt, it was only "poor dear Algy's misfortune," and when these false steps were retrieved, wholly or in part, he was a hero of heroes to these devoted women. Now he had been enjoying six months' freedom on the Continent before "settling down."

"What a charming place! How extremely fit you all look! Cousin Evelyn, the mountains agree with you." And Evelyn, in her plain braided summer serge, white blouse, and shady hat, was certainly a very attractive feature of the Engstlen Alp.

"I vote we stay here and don't go back to Engelberg," continued the young fellow, establishing himself between the two. "After all, that's down in a hole. What magnificent air! I say, I'm going up the Titlis; who'll come with me? I came up here on purpose, because I knew the Mater would be in a terrible fright if I did it from Engelberg. Cousin Evelyn, you speak German; let's come and collar a guide."

"But if you have been six months at Leipsic and all sorts of places, don't you speak German too?" laughed Evelyn.

"Not I; it's too much of a grind to learn such a language as that." And the three were soon engaged in interviewing a tall, muscular Swiss, with a broad smile, who towered above Algy like a giant, and, as Dottie suggested, could carry him in case of need.

Evelyn and Dottie declined to attempt the Titlis, Dottie objecting firmly to start at two a m. They spent the rest of the day in rambling and sitting about, chatting so merrily that Evelyn almost forgot Mrs. Allingham West. She offered to draw out a list of phrases in German that might prove useful to her cousin—"I do not wish to be left in this crevasse while you go back to Engelberg for assistance." "How many thousand feet shall I fall if I slip down here?" and so forth; but Algy assured her that the Titlis was a perfectly safe mountain. "a lady's mountain," he added, hoping, perhaps, to induce them to come. It was, however, without envy that the girls heard him creep away at two a m., and watched from their window the lantern disappearing into the shadows of the pass.

BIRD LIFE IN JULY.

By A NATURALIST.

"When all the birds are faint with the hot sun,
And hide in cooling trees."

THE sun in all its power floods the wide commons with light and heat. The furze and its golden wealth of flowers, is the home of the furze-chat; a bright little fellow he is with his coal black head, orange breast, and patches of black and white about him. "Chec, chec, chec!" he cries, as he daintily perches on the golden blossoms, diving down and up again with his continual "Chec, chec!"

On the branches of a scrub oak sit two birds that look very like small hawks. They are shrikes, beautiful creatures too, in their warm grey and bluish-white plumage, which is broken here and there with black. Their dark eyes are ever on the watch for prey, principally insects, which are plentiful and active in these sultry hot days of July, when other creatures are inactive and quiet. They do not object to larger prey, however—small birds and other things. Down they pounce, again and again, for they have their young to provide for. These two we note are the heads of families; the mothers are with their little ones somewhere near; we can hear them "Chack!" Turning round some stunted cover, moving as quietly as we can, we come unexpectedly on the young perchers. What a hubbub ensues! With a scream and a dash both mothers dart round us in fine style, crying and chattering their loudest. Hearing the din, the father shrikes come bouncing over the bushes; altogether there is quite a commotion, quite unnecessary on their part, for no one has the least intention of interfering with them or any member of their family. The red-backed shrike is a bold as well as a handsome bird, and he does not fear to let you know it, if he considers you to be an intruder on his domain.

High up in the blue sky, some distance away, a bird hangs, to all appearance motionless. Now he dips down, rises again without any apparent effort, wheels round with his tail spread out, and then shoots nearer to us. As the light falls fair on him he shows himself. It is the kestrel, or as the rustic folks call him, "the windfanner"; a name well bestowed, for he does fan continually over the hillocks and anthills. During the hot weather, lizards run in all directions, or bask in the sun—pretty, harmless, brown lizards. The windfanner feeds on them when he gets the chance, as well as on mice. Like all other creatures, he varies his diet. Birds, mice, lizards, insects, and sometimes worms it consists of. His eye is dark and beautiful, his plumage red and grey; a true falcon as to race and habits, but as a pet one of the gentlest of his family.

As we wander on we come to one edge of the common; between this and the wooded hills are meadows well timbered, the hedgerows round show out fresh and green; there are the wild rose and the honeysuckle, the vetch and the briony, the bramble and the woodbine. Farms nestle here and there amongst the trees. As we look on the picture the song of the woodlark is heard. This sweet little singer loves the meadows which border on woods; you will find him close to the timbered hedgerows and the little rill that holds trout, although if you looked at it you would think it could scarcely keep the small minnows alive. The skylark can be heard and seen anywhere, but the woodlark is a bird of the woodland coverts and meadows. His music, though beautiful, has a plaintiveness about it, to my ears. To hear it to perfection one should walk out at eventide, when the sun has gone down, leaving great streaks of crimson and purple in the west. All is wrapped in a soft purple haze and shadow, and the busy life that moved about in the sunlight is at rest. The occasional tinkle of a bell on the neck of some cow or sheep, as it lazily moves from its position, is the only sound you will hear. The perfume from the wild flowers is all around you, go where you will.

"The gentle breezes are upon the wing,
Bearing rich odours from the clover's hive,
From woodbines, roses, and sweet-breathed hay,
And many a bloom of blossoming beans and peas."

But for the chur of the fern-owl silence is now over all. As you approach that large oak with twisted limbs at the edge of the cover, close to the meadowlands, a bird rises in the air from one of the twigs; straightly he mounts at first, then his flight becomes spiral for a time, then he will hover and float about, singing in rich plaintive notes. The night is warm, if you can call it night, for it is comparatively speaking light, a soft gentle twilight. Listen to him as he rises, ringing round and round, higher yet! And now he is poised you hear his voice though he is out of sight. Soon you know from the sounds that he has turned earthward again, and the evening hymn of the modest little woodlark will be hushed as he touches the ground.

MY WORK BASKET.

FIG. 1.—CROCHET LACE FOR TRIMMING COUNTERPANES, TOILET COVERS, ETC.

WHITE or coloured crochet cotton is used, according to the article for which it is intended to trim.

This pattern is worked on the back thread of the stitch.

Make a chain of 41 stitches; turn back.

1st Row—Work 6 long stitches, beginning on the sixth chain stitch. * 5 chain, miss 5; 1 long in the sixth chain; repeat from * 4 times.

2nd Row—5 chain; 1 single crochet in centre of space made by five chain; 1 long on long stitch, * 3 chain; 1 single crochet into next space; 1 long on next long; repeat from * 3 times. 6 long on six long of last row; 2 chain, miss 2, 1 long into the third chain stitch.

3rd Row—the same as first row; but at the end make 11 chain; turn.

4th Row.—1 long in the eighth stitch of 11 chain; 3 chain; 1 long in the last long of former row.

Work now according to the illustration, increasing every other row, as explained in the 4th row, until the 9th row, the end of which only make 5 chain instead of 11; 1 long stitch on former row. After this, decrease every other row until the scallop is completed.

The picot edge is formed of 4 chain: 1 double in space, 2 picots in the first space, 1 double in second space, 2 picots in third, 1 double in fourth space, 3 picots in fifth space, 1 double in sixth space, 1 double in seventh space, 3 picots in eighth space, 1 double in ninth space, 1 double in tenth space, 3 picots in eleventh space, 1 double in twelfth space, 3 picots in thirteenth space, which is the centre of scallop.

FIG. 2.—CROCHET INSERTION.

The insertion to match the above is worked exactly in same manner, and is commenced with 60 chain stitches.

FIG. 3.—CROCHET EDGING WITH VANDYKE BRAID.

The foundation is made with 3 chain stitches. 1 double in point of braid.

2nd Row—1 long, 1 chain, miss 1, 1 long; repeat.

The upper points are worked as follows:—

1 single crochet on first point; 5 chain; 1 single crochet in same point; 3 chain; 4 long on next point.

These stitches are joined by 3 picots made of 4 chain; 3 chain; repeat.

FIG. 2.

FIG. 4.—ELEGANT FOOT MUFF, FOR CARRIAGE OR INDOOR USE.

Materials required: Dark coloured leather; cloth to match; a lighter or contrasting shade of plush; fine old gold coloured silk cord, and sewing silk to match; wadding; quilted silk or rabbit skin for lining; and band of racoon or other light coloured fur for top edge.

The muff is composed of three parts—the bottom, band, and upper part. The bottom and band are made of leather, and the upper part of cloth.

Having cut the pattern the size required, the quantity of material necessary can be easily determined. The plush must be the same size as the cloth on which it will be appliquéd.

The design is drawn on tracing paper.

Place the plush smoothly on the cloth, and lightly but firmly tack on the design. Commence the work by tracing the whole of the pattern with fine white cotton. Then carefully tear away the paper, and work over the cotton with old gold coloured silk, in button-hole stitches, so as to allow the cotton to be drawn out. This done, the appliqué is cut round neatly, leaving the foundation of cloth clearly visible. The gold cord is then sewn, just far enough from the design to show a mere thread line of the cloth. The large spots between the detached designs round the edge of the cloth are made with the old gold silk cord closely twisted round and round until sufficiently large, care being taken to keep them a good shape.

The embroidery finished, the making up commences by stitching the leather band to the bottom, which is done on the inside. The band is joined behind. The cloth part is then attached to the upper edge of the band, close to the embroidery.

The lining should be made separately.

If quilted silk or satin is preferred to fur, it must be of some dark contrasting colour to the outside, or of the same shade and colour as the cloth.

The racoon, or any other band of the trimming, should be at least five inches wide, and slightly wadded.

FIG. 5.—CHILD'S CROCHET BOOT.

Our pattern is in white yarn, but many workers prefer the Berlin wool.

The boot is worked in four separate pieces—the sole, two sides, and the piece that laps over and forms the trimming. Each piece is worked backwards and forwards in double crochet stitches.

Begin one of the side pieces by making 20 chain stitches; turn back.

1st Row—leave 2 chain stitches; work 18 double crochet. 2nd Row—6 chain; miss 2; work 22 double crochet. 3rd Row—2 chain; begin in the second crochet stitch of last row, and work to the end of the row in double crochet. 4th Row—6 chain; begin in third chain stitch of last row, work 24 double crochet, missing the last stitch but one in former row. 5th Row—2 chain; begin on second double, work 23 stitches. 6th Row—27 chain; begin on the third, work 47 stitches, missing last but one in former row. 7th Row—2 chain; begin on second, work 46. 8th Row—2 chain; work the 2 first and 2 last together, which will leave 44 stitches. 9th Row—2 chain; miss the first double crochet and last but one, making 42 stitches. 10th Row—2 chain; the same as last row, making 40 stitches. 11th Row—2 chain; miss the first; make 39 stitches. 12th Row—2 chain; first and last stitch missed, making 37 stitches. 13th Row—2 chain; miss first; make 36 stitches. 14th Row—2 chain; miss first and last but one; make 34. 15th to 20th Rows—34 double crochet stitches. 21st Row—2 chain; 35 stitches; two worked in last stitch. 22nd Row—2 chain; 35 stitches. 23rd Row—2 chain; 36 stitches; 2 in the last. 24th Row—2 chain; 36 stitches. 25th Row—2 chain; 37 stitches; 2 into last stitch. 26th Row—2 chain; 39 stitches; 2 into first, 2 into last. 27th and 28th Rows—2 chain; 39 stitches. 29th Row—2 chain; 40 stitches; 2 into the last. 30th Row—2 chain; 40 stitches. 31st Row—2 chain; 32 double crochet; 1 single; draw the wool through and cut off, leaving 6 stitches. 32nd Row—turn the work; leave 13 stitches; work 1 single crochet; 20 double crochet. 33rd Row—2 chain; 16 double; 1 single; pull the wool through and cut off. 34th Row—turn the work; leave the first 6 stitches; work 1 single; 11 double crochet. 35th Row—2 chain; 7 double; 1 single; fasten off. Now one side piece is completed; and when the second is finished, sew both together up the back, and the front part up to the ankle.

The sole is begun at the heel by casting on 6 chain stitches; miss 2; work 3 double crochet into the third, 1 into each of the next two, and 3 into the last, making in all 8 stitches. 2nd Row—2 chain; 10 double, 2 into the first and last. 3rd Row—2 chain; 12 double crochet; 2 into the first and last. 4th Row—2 chain; 14 double; 2 in first and last. 5th Row—2 chain; 15 double; 2 into the last. 6th Row—2 chain; 16 double; 2 into the last. 7th Row—2 chain; 17 double; 2 into the last. 8th to 15th Rows—2 chain; 17 double. 16th Row—2 chain; 19 double; 2 into first and last. 17th to 21st Rows—2 chain; 19 double. 22nd Row—2 chain; miss first double; work 18. 23rd Row—2 chain; miss first and last but one; work 16. 24th Row—2 chain; miss first and last but one; work 14. 25th Row—miss the 2 first and the 2 last but one; work 10. 26th Row—2 chain; miss first and last but one; work 8. 27th Row—miss 2 first and 2 last but one; work 4 stitches. The sole is now ready to sew to the sides.

The flap is made with 20 chain; miss the last and work the remaining 18 stitches in double. 2nd Row—2 chain; 20 double crochet; 3 into the last stitch. 3rd Row—2 chain; 22 double crochet; 3 into last stitch. 4th Row—2 chain; 24 double; 3 into the last stitch.

The flap is made with 20 chain; miss the last and work the remaining 18 stitches in double. 2nd Row—2 chain; 20 double crochet; 3 into the last stitch. 3rd Row—2 chain; 22 double crochet; 3 into last stitch. 4th Row—2 chain; 24 double; 3 into the last stitch.

The flap is made with 20 chain; miss the last and work the remaining 18 stitches in double. 2nd Row—2 chain; 20 double crochet; 3 into the last stitch. 3rd Row—2 chain; 22 double crochet; 3 into last stitch. 4th Row—2 chain; 24 double; 3 into the last stitch.

5th Row—2 chain; 3 double into the first double of last row, which makes a row of 26 stitches. 6th and 7th Rows—2 chain; 26 double crochet. 8th Row—2 chain; 25 double; miss the last but one. 9th Row—2 chain; miss the first; work 24 double crochet. 10th Row—2 chain; 21 double crochet; leave 4 stitches. 11th Row—4 chain; begin to work into the third chain stitch, 24 double crochet, leaving one stitch at end. 12th Row—2 chain; 25 double; 2 into the last stitch. 13th Row—2 chain; 3 double crochet into the first stitch; in all 27 stitches. 14th Row—2 chain; 29 double crochet; 2 into the first and last. 15th Row—2 chain, 31 double crochet; 2 into first and last. 16th and 17th Rows—2 chain; 31 double crochet. 18th Row—2 chain; 29 double crochet; miss last but two, and leave the last. 19th Row—2 chain; miss the first double crochet; work 2 into the last stitch; in all 29 stitches. 20th Row—2 chain; 26 double crochet; fasten off, leaving three stitches.

The straight or even edge is sewed to the side piece, and is finished off with a narrow edging, which is also carried round the top.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

THE QUEEN'S COURT—A DEVEY OF FAIR LADIES AND A GROUP OF NOBLE GENTLEMEN—"YOUNG LYCIDAS."

HE Queen joined the King at Merton, one of the oldest and stateliest of the colleges, and there she held her receptions.

As a matter alike of duty and inclination, Dame Tabitha carried Kitty Dacre to be presented to the Queen; for the old lady, while she was very simple in her personal habits, was equally rigid in maintaining the privileges and obligations of her rank. In the same manner, though with the sorrowful wisdom of experience, and the blunt sincerity of her temper, she condemned much that she saw and heard—sometimes not altogether aware of the strength and candour of her condemnation, she made no question of what she owed her Sovereigns. Farther, she was convinced that if her duty and service were due to them in their prosperity, her homage was doubly due in their adversity.

Lady Ottery, her steward, and the next heir to Hayston, together with the King's Chamberlain, alone knew what liberal contributions she made to the royal purse without so much as seeking a crystal pledge in exchange. In freely offering her tribute and refusing to let her left hand know what her right hand did, she sacrificed not such luxuries as she had long dispensed with, for which she had no taste, but the cherished dreams of her declining years. Among these were her redeeming the greater part of her husband's estate for his heir, and her bestowing a portion on little Kitty Dacre, whose father was not likely to lay by a provision for her.

Sir Jasper Ottery's grand nephew must be content with a diminished inheritance; even Kitty must take her chance; all must go to the wall when Dame Tabitha's King and Queen wanted her savings.

No doubt if Henrietta Maria had known this she would have refrained from those expressive moves and gestures of diverted amazement which she made to her ladies and gentlemen behind Lady Ottery's back, at her stiff rectangular figure and antiquated full dress.

Kitty catching some of these signals, looked very grave, though her Majesty did not laugh at her; she smiled most sweetly on the blooming young girl in her white satin gown, with some of Lady Ottery's old lace falling from her elbows, and her own mother's little brilliant brooch, like a small cluster of fireflies, in her bosom. "She might have more to laugh at," reflected honest Kitty, indignantly; "nay, it is not queenly of her to make a jest of an old lady, her loyal subject, just because she is old, and old-fashioned. The Queen may be as royal, beautiful, and witty as she pleaseth, I know I do greatly prefer my dear old Lady Ottery, who I'll be bound never yet made a fool of the humblest visitor who sought her house to do her honour."

When Kitty had set out in her dainty array, she had been pitying her cousins at Islip Barnes, because the political opinions of the family shut them out of Oxford and its Court; she had been thinking, regretfully, how Alice would have enjoyed the gay scene, and how even quiet, staid Prissy would have brightened up at the brave sight. But now Kitty knew that all was not gold which glittered, and that there were thorns among the roses.

The Queen was flushed with victory and ready to lose her head over her triumph, which was not altogether to be wondered at, since she believed, poor soul! that she, wonderful little princess, had saved Charles and England.

Kitty felt the next moment that there ought to be allowance made for her Majesty, when the girl recalled how she had heard the cavaliers in the streets, as they passed the chairs which carried her and Lady Ottery to Merton, humming and trolling the last song in Henrietta Maria's honour:—

"When gallant Granville stoutly stood And stopt the gap up with his blood;

When Hopton led his Cornish band, And the sly 'Conqueror' durst not stand,

We knew the Queen was nigh at hand.

When great Newcastle so came forth,

As in nine days he scoured the North;

When Fairfax's vast, perfidious force Was shrunk to five invisible horse,

When none but Lady Fairfax* stayed to fight,

We knew the Queen was come in sight."

As if such songs were not enough, a silver medal had been struck at "the Oxford mint," which represented the King and Queen seated side by side in chairs of state. It was as if they were joint King and Queen regnant, and not merely that she was Queen consort. The sun was seen over his chair, the crescent moon and stars over hers. The dragon python, a symbol of rebellion, lay dead at their feet; an inscription on the reverse side said, "July 13th, the King and Queen of Great Britain and Ireland auspiciously met in the Vale of Keinton, and rebellion fled to the West. Omen of victory and peace. Oxford, 1643."

But Henrietta Maria was by nature neither insolent nor malicious. The devoted attachment of her personal attendants from first to last through her chequered career attest the truth of the praises which they gave to her original frankness and kindness; she was simply ambitious, self-confident, thoughtless, and fond of amusement in every form.

Close behind Henrietta Maria stood Lucy, Lady Carlisle, the Queen's great friend. From her high birth as a North-umbrian Percy, and because her husband, Lord Carlisle, and her cousin, Lord Holland, had been sent to France to conduct the treaty for the Queen's hand, when her marriage was arranged with King Charles, Lady Carlisle was early appointed to a post in the Queen's household. Even then she had been nearly eight years married, and was at least as many years her mistress's senior.

* By birth a Vere, and known to be on the Royalist side in politics.

At this date she was a little over forty, et the fame and power of her beauty were still as renowned as ever. The English poets of the day vied in singing her charms, even as they sang the Queen's.

Lady Carlisle is said to have been "soft, quiet, and innocent looking, with dove-like eyes and a sweet smile." If the description is correct, never was appearance more deceptive. She is believed to have been a woman of remarkable ability, but she showed it chiefly in weaving the most complicated webs of deceit and stratagem, which were apt to stand for wisdom and enterprise in those days. If the Queen was the King's evil genius, Lucy Lady Carlisle was the Queen's. She was the successful plotter and deceiver which poor Henrietta Maria vainly sought to be in politics, and could not, because she was after all too good for such a cold-blooded, heartless, scheming part. Her impulsiveness continually betrayed her and broke her down.

Lady Carlisle had become a proficient in the art which she had begun to practise in her early girlhood. The person to be hoodwinked and left in the lurch on that occasion was her father, the fierce old Duke of Northumberland. It was in the course of the fifteen years that he lay in the Tower, under the charge of being concerned in the Gunpowder Plot in the reign of King James. On the plea of visiting her father, the youthful Lady Lucy took the opportunity of making the acquaintance of the wicked Countess of Somerset, who was also in the Tower, accused of murder. At her suggestion, it is said, Lady Lucy, in direct violation of her father's prohibition, eloped with Hay, Earl of Carlisle.

He was a handsome, specious man, who had been an archer in the Scotch Guard in France, was presented by the French Ambassador to King James, became one of his high favourites, and received from him the earldom of Carlisle. Hay got other gifts to enable him to maintain the earldom, so that on his return to France to treat for Henrietta Maria's hand, in the name of his master and his master's son, Lord Carlisle wore a suit the value of which was estimated at forty thousand pounds.

The lady, who began life by being a false daughter, ended it by being a false wife, a false friend, and a false servant to her royal mistress. Lucy, Lady Carlisle's name, remains a very byword of treachery. Henrietta Maria, whose confidence Lady Carlisle grossly abused more than once in their relations, was too quick-witted not to be aware of the deceit of which she had been the victim; but, as if in involuntary admiration of the superior powers of dissimulation and intrigue shown by her friend, the Queen repeatedly condoned these offences against good faith, and continued to the end on terms of close intimacy with this very dangerous lady of her bedchamber. There was nothing lasting in the occasional quarrels between the two, for they did quarrel at times. In spite of her "dove-like eyes," Lady Carlisle, no less than her mistress, had a high spirit, and a passionate temper.

Another curious commentary on her superficial sweetness is the praise which one of her infatuated admirers professed to give her for her "noble scorn" of those beneath her in rank. Her character is probably not incorrectly summed up in the sentence, "My Lady Carlisle will be respected and observed by her superiors, feared by those who will make themselves her equals, and will not suffer herself to be beloved but of those who are her servants."

A dame of this description was certain to look over the heads of such obscure people as Lady Ottery and Kitty. Indeed, the old woman did not desire the Court lady's notice either for herself or her goddaughter. On the contrary, Kitty was in terror lest the stately mature beauty, who could be vivacious and agreeable when it suited her, should be aware of the snort of dissatisfaction and the deep-voiced murmur, "Little worth, intriguing madam," with which Lady Ottery turned away from her.

No more did Kitty's guardian approve of another of Henrietta Maria's ladies, a prominent figure in Oxford at this season. Lady Isabella Thynne was one of the daughters of Lord Holland. Lady Isabella's faults were more those of moral weakness, extravagant caprice, and morbid perversity than of high-handed unrighteousness. Dorothy Osborne, of Chicksands, was warmly attached to Lady Isabella's sister, Lady Diana, who was as good as she was fair, and Dorothy has a word of excuse for "poor Lady Isabella, who looks and speaks, and sings so prettily," and is married to "a beast." But Lady Isabella's whim at Oxford of dressing herself in what she imagined resembled the vesture of an angel, and having a lute played before her as she walked, to represent angelic music, was far from recommending her to Lady Ottery. She saw nothing angelic about Lady Isabella, the whole absurd mummery savoured of the profane to the old lady. She had even more objection to Lady Isabella's languishing graces than to Lady Carlisle's haughty airs. A third thorn in the aged widow's flesh was the young widow, Lady D'Aubigny, whose mourning for her slain husband had been soon ended, and who showed every inclination to be consoled. Lady Ottery compared her wrathfully to the young widows described in one of St. Paul's Epistles, and mentally recommended her to marry again as soon as she could manage it.

If Lady Ottery did not like the ladies in Henrietta Maria's suite, dislike was far too mild a word for her feelings towards most of the gentlemen. She clutched Kitty's arm, and dragged the girl away with an evident detestation of the circle, which might have afforded the French-bred Queen and her coterie still further food for jests and laughter. Her godmother would not have Kitty remain exposed to the bold stare of Prince Rupert, with his hawk nose and his tangled hair, the sneering scrutiny of Jermyn, the insolent gaze of Goring.

But see, here was the King coming, and behind the sad-faced man with the peaked beard, who was himself as manly and temperate as any true man in his dominions, Lady Ottery's heart rejoiced to see a group of as fine English gentlemen as ever breathed. Here were Falkland, with his low stature and lofty standard of right and wrong, and the King's Scotch cousin, the Duke of Richmond, with the rare peculiarity in that company of modest diffidence setting off his noble qualities. The Marquis of Hertford was not far off. He had married secretly in his romantic, ambitious youth, another cousin of the King's, the unfortunate "Lady Arbel." He had lain some time in the Tower for the offence, and been condemned to live abroad afterwards. He was an accomplished gentleman and a worthy man, fond of the country, neither caring for nor receiving Court favour, but, like Falkland, coming to his King's side in his adversity.

There was Lord Southampton, who was equally guiltless of either seeking or getting Court promotion, who came, nevertheless, to stay with the King at Oxford. He was like Falkland in another way, for he too was a passionate lover of peace, and perhaps for that very reason, in those days, "a melancholy man." When he succeeded to his title in early life by the nearly simultaneous deaths of his father and elder brother, he was unable to conceal his great grief when he was addressed as "My lord." And now as a man it was only with much reluctance that he accepted the post of Member of the Council and Groom of the Bed-chamber.

Yonder stood Lord Leicester, Sir Philip Sydney's nephew. He must have been in a measure consoled for having been asked to forego his appointment as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, since none was fonder of books and study than Leicester, and few could beat him in his own branch of mathematics. He was married to a sister of Lady Carlisle's, who was as faithful as Lady Carlisle was faithless, to whom he was so loving and devoted a husband that their mutual affection made them be called "a noble Darby and Joan."

Talking with Lord Leicester was "the handsome Earl of Bristol," whose portrait in his looped hat and feather is still a model of manly beauty. Even after he was a grandfather he was as handsome as Lord Holland was reckoned in his prime, while Bristol was as straightforward and steadfast as Holland was time-serving and fickle. Lord Bristol had been ambassador in Spain when Charles, then Prince of Wales, paid his incognito visit to Madrid. The Prince conceived a strong prejudice against the ambassador, doubtless because of the violent enmity existing between him and the royal favourite, the Duke of Buckingham, which Charles refused to forgive or forget even after the Duke's death. But on the field of Edgehill the master and servant met again, and Lord Bristol, burying every grudge, rode back with Charles to Oxford. Clarendon, who tells so much and tells it so well, describes Lord Bristol as a loquacious, passionate man, spoilt by superciliousness, but wise and true withal.

WORK.

C. M. P.—There are several systems of dressmaking now taught, all of which are advertised in the daily papers. The 10th October, 1861, was a Wednesday. OUR BESSIE.—Do not trust to any specious advertisements. They are generally traps for the foolish. Your only way to earn, so far as we can see, is to do what you can in your present position—make butter, attend to the poultry and the garden, and get whatever needlework you can to help you still further.

DORIS E. WYE.—The pattern you send is very pretty, and would be a serviceable gown for the spring.

MIXCHA.—A plain silk, mixed with moiré, would be the best. You could also use the grey watered silk, with a plain grey woollen of a darker shade. With a bonnet to match, it would be a very pretty costume for your best. The dress must be mixed—silk and woollen. The woollen might be made up as a bodice, with revers and sleeves of the silk, and the silk used for wide panels on the skirt.

AGNES OLDFIELD.—We have pleasure in recommending your charitable society to the notice of our readers, especially as your work is one that can be carried on at home in odd minutes of leisure. We refer to the St. Clement's, Nott'g Hill, Knitting Club, the articles of clothing made by the members being given to emigrants, and a working lads' club. Members requested to devote a couple of hours' work weekly, and to subscribe 1s. per annum. As it is a charity, no prizes for superior work are given, and no fines are exacted. Address the hon. sec., Miss A. Oldfield, 30, Ladbroke Gardens, Notting Hill, W.

IGNORAMA.—The reports of the Society of Lady Dressmakers are discouraging, business-like as its plan and arrangements are. Much promise is, on the other hand, to be found in the Dressmaking and Needlework Club at 97, Buckingham Palace Road. There is also a dressmaking department in the Technical Training School, 1a, Victoria Square, London, S.W., for the practical instruction of ladies. Classes are also held in the London Institute for the Advancement of Plain Needlework, to teach ladies how to cut out all garments on the true tailor principle.

COOKERY.

E. CARLIE.—There is a school of cookery in your own town of Hull, of which the hon. sec. is Mrs. Sissons, 84, Beverley Road. There is also one at 97, Albion Street, Leeds; the general hon. sec. is Miss Robinson, 33, Lord Mayor's Walk, York. Diplomas are granted in these schools to efficient candidates trained as teachers. You must inquire about the terms, rules, etc., for yourself direct.

L. L. E.—The quince cannot be eaten raw, but is excellent cut up with apples for steaming with sugar, or baking in apple tarts. The Portuguese variety, more especially, is to be recommended for preserving as marmalade; and of the seeds the once popular Bandoline fixateur was composed. To make marmalade of quinces, boil them in water till soft, and rub them through a sieve. Then boil the pulp with half its weight of sugar until reduced to a consistence that will become solid when cold.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ROSA and PEARL inquire how they can get rid of some of their superfluous lovers, as they will not take a snub nor the cold shoulder. We must inquire how you made their acquaintance? Was it with your mother's sanction? If they become intrusive, place their dismissal in her hands, and do not lower yourself by such vulgar means as "snubbing." 2. The recipe for making pancakes with snow has been quite recently given, and as we shall not have this ingredient (in all probability) till next winter, our young friends will have time to find the recipe.

EMA.—Stamps are manufactured by the Government and are sold by them. They form a part of the revenue of the Post Office.

E. H. LEICESTER.—"I live for those who love me" is from a poem by Guthrie.

A LATE HIGH SCHOOL GIRL.—Second-hand copies of Lemprière's "Classical Dictionary" can often be found at moderate prices.

CATHARINE C. C.—The name Katharine is Greek. Catharina is a Latin version. It dates from the eighth century only, and was brought to England by the Crusaders. Miss Yonge says that the cause of the various ways of spelling it appears to be that the more ancient English made no use of the letter "K," which only came in with printing and the types imported from Germany. "Katharine" spelt with a "K" and two a's is the original and right way of writing it.

KATR MOSS must read the many articles of "Medicus," and try to follow his advice in regard to health and diet. We could not give advice on the subject. You must be guided by your parents, and by your own good common sense. You are quite well able to judge how far any man is likely to be a good, kind husband.

DOROTHY.—We do not quite understand your letter. Do you mean that you have fallen in love with a man who has not paid his addresses to you, and whom you hardly know?

WILD DAISY.—Either pipeclay or dry flour is the best for cleaning all kinds of hair-brushes. Rub into the brushes, then rub them together till clean. Lay a newspaper on the table, or use a wash-hand basin, and do not take more than two tablespoonfuls of either flour or pipeclay.

Y. W. C. A.—We can only suggest that you should gather some ideas from the headings and topics treated in the "G. O. P."

FAITH.—A doctor's recommendation would be very valuable in getting a situation as attendant on an invalid lady; but you should have a knowledge of nursing. We could not say what the wages would be; it would depend on the case. There is no harm in writing to your clergyman for advice.

ADA L. M.—If subject to rheumatism, should be careful to choose as dry a place as possible, and a gravelly soil, not clay, to live upon. Many cases of rheumatism are benefited by sea air.

FLORENCE E. R.—The lines are on a most interesting subject, but they are in no sense "poetry."

JET.—We have explained this question many times. "Marriages of foreigners in England with English girls" may or may not be legal in the husband's country. In France he must have permission of his parents before marriage. In Belgium we believe there is a new law protecting such marriages; but you should not marry without seeking the advice of a lawyer.

I. DE B. B. (Douglas, Isle of Man).—We have succeeded in finding the refrain of your verse in "Hymns of Consecration and Faith," by the Rev. J. Mountain, page 219, No. 388, "The Great Physician." The rest of the poem, however, seems different, though the subject is the same. The author is said to be S. J. Vail.

A CANADIAN GIRL's note is creditable in every way to her.

GARTH DENTON and C. G.—The "Travels of Two Girls in Norway" will be found in the "G. O. P.," vol. vi. The account of Dr. Gordon Stables' journeyings in the "Wanderer" were written for the Leisure Hour and will be found in 1887, we believe.

A HOUSEKEEPER.—To avoid disappointment you will do well to send the curtains to a dyer and cleaner's.

AN INQUIRER.—We think that the subway between Praed Street and Paddington Station was opened last year.

IRIS.—We are sure that writing the verses gave you pleasure, and they are full of good feeling and love of nature.

SONG—SUMMER DAYS.

By JOHN HUIE.

CLEAR waters warble all day long,
By silver birch and purple
heather;
Weird fragments of an old world song,
Through golden days of summer weather.

One hour the gurgling waters
weep,
Then gently ring with happy laughter;
My idly musing moods they keep
To weave in songs that follow after.

Fast by the brink the bracken dips, Till fronds reflected meet their double;
And fair flowers touch with tender lips
The dews of shining bell and bubble.

Sweet incense of the heather bloom
From the long reddening slopes expires;
And golden glory of the broom
Girdles the hill with altar fires.

The linnet in his bush anigh,
Sings, and his notes like pearls are falling;
And far up in the sunlit sky
The lark from heaven to earth is calling.

And far around the sounding seas
Fill with a psalm the boundless air,
And pleasing notes in every breeze,
And voices telling earth is fair.

O days of peace—O days of rest!
Where busy Nature, still and strong,
Works without toil, and bears her best, Unmarred by man, and crowned with song.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER VIII.

RAIN and storm! In the morning, when Evelyn and Dottie rose from sleep, the Engstlen Alp was in the clouds. No vision of the Bernese Alps was to be discerned; the thunder crashed among the mountains, and the girls could scarcely rush across to breakfast without getting drenched.

"Poor, dear Algy!" was Dottie's wail; and a piteous object was seen about eight o'clock returning across the pasture. Dripping with wet as though he had just emerged from a river, his ice-axe hanging useless in his hand, the guide towering behind him, he was a visible embodiment of the vanity of human hopes.

"Titlis! no, indeed," he replied to Dottie's eager questionings. "We got on the snow, and then, as we couldn't see a yard before us, and the lightning and thunder kept it up between them, I thought it was time to come back. I'm going to bed; bring up my breakfast, Dot, there's a good girl."

It was only too evident to Evelyn's impatient longings that another day at the Engstlen Alp was before her, and that intercourse with Mrs. Allingham West was still in abeyance. Algy had perforce to remain until his clothes were dried, although a young man who was staying at the inn lent him a complete suit, much too large for him. Released from the durance vile of his bedroom, he pervaded the little salle-à-manger in this attire, chattering to anyone who would listen, and giving an amusing description of his adventures of the night or early morning. He sketched a lively picture of himself crawling along steep snow-fields enveloped in gloom, and of the theatrical style in which his guide, when all further attempts were evidently hopeless, took off his hat and made a low bow to the mountain, saying, "Adieu, Titlis!" No contretemps could long affect Algy's easy good humour.

Evelyn spent the morning in listening and talking to him, but by the time the afternoon had come she was thoroughly tired of it, and felt inclined to enjoy a little quiet. Flitting through the rain to her room in the dépendance, and laden with pen, ink, and paper, she proceeded to carry out an impulse that had been strong within her since the morning, when she had seen Marie's radiant face. She had in imagination woven a little story of the Swiss betrothed pair; the one down at Herrenrütli, in the lovely vale of Engelberg, the other aloft on the breezy Alp; and she proceeded now to evolve

"Come down, O maid, from yonder mountain height;
What pleasure lives in height (the shepherd sang),
In height and cold, the splendour of the hills?"

The exquisite lines of Tennyson in the "Princess" served her as motto and inspiration. She made a liberal use of local colouring, for the beauty of the scene had impressed itself deeply upon her, and she felt a new delight in describing, minutely and faithfully, what lay around her, bathed in the sunshine of yesterday.

Evelyn had already acquired the art, which is an essential for the would-be author, of writing her own language correctly and fluently.

She also had a talent for describing what she had seen, in virtue of which she was esteemed by her friends as a capital letter-writer. If she had known it, she was doing better work in this fragment of a story than in the artificial poetry she had placed before the public: for one was true, the other was false. "Trust thyself," as the American seer has it, is a precept of unfailing wisdom for the writer. Sketch what you see, say what you feel, and be no secondhand reporter of current phrases.

At supper Algy was loud in complaints of having been robbed all the afternoon of his cousin's society, and when he drew from her the admission that she had been "busy writing," his usually serene temper seemed to receive a shock.

"Oh, Evelyn, can't you stop that while we're up here?" he ejaculated. "Surely one book of poems is enough for one summer! I don't want to have to murder more than one reviewer."

"Reviewer! What do you mean?"

"Well, of course, I shall feel it my bounden duty to seek out and destroy the fellow who wrote those paragraphs in the Critic," replied Algy, playfully. But by the sudden flush that coloured Evelyn's cheek he saw he had made a mistake.

"Has there been any review of my book?" she demanded.

"Oh, didn't you know? Why, of course, it is attracting immense attention," replied Algy, with bravado.

"Don't tease me! Tell me directly, there is a good boy. Now, Algernon, I insist upon knowing," and Evelyn turned upon her cousin with determination.

Thus adjured, the unlucky Algy was obliged to acknowledge that there had been a short criticism in one of the leading weekly reviews. He had taken for granted that Evelyn had seen it, forgetting that the paper would only reach the reading-room of the Abendglüh hotel on the morning she quitted the valley.

"What does the review say?" But on this point Algy was adamant, and he declined to reveal what he had read, only darkly repeating his threat of murdering the reviewer.

There was not much rest for poor Evelyn now until she found herself again at Engelberg. From Algy's nonsense it was evident enough that the review was unfavourable, and though the authoress's vanity immediately began to suggest the motives which would prompt an uncomplimentary notice, and to dwell on all the flattering things which had been said per contra, she could not help feeling extremely uneasy. Kind little Dottie said all she could to comfort her, and scolded Algy well in private for letting out anything about it.

"Come now, I like that!" cried the discomfited youth. "If Evelyn publishes, she must expect the things to be read, and criticised too. If she doesn't like it, she needn't publish, and I wish to goodness she wouldn't. I don't like the whole business—it's bad form for a girl like Evelyn to come out before the public. You and mother oughtn't to have allowed it."

"Allowed it! Why, Algy, Evelyn will do just as she likes; you know that well enough; besides, she is of age. And I think the poems are lovely."

"I can't make any sense out of them," replied her brother.

"That shows they are good; some of the best poetry now can't be understood at all," replied Dottie, with a wise air.

"Like the rhymes in 'Through the Looking-glass,'" retorted her brother.

"'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe,
All mimsy were the borogoves,
And the mome raths outgrabe."

Only there is a kind of key to that, and, so far as I can see, there is no key at all to some of the 'Day-dreams.'"

"It is too bad of you to compare Evelyn's poems to that rubbish," cried Dottie. "But I will stand up for her. Everyone now—Miss Wentworth too—is trying to run her down, and at home they all think so much of her. Poor Evelyn!"

"Nobody can admire Evelyn more than I do. I think she's one of the finest girls out," replied Algy, warmly; "that's partly why I don't like all this nonsense. Why can't she be content to let it alone?"

"Tell me, was the review really very severe?" asked Dottie, with bated breath.

Algy's answer was expressive. He brought his clenched fist down on his knee, with three words—

"A regular crusher!"

The next day was cloudy and uncertain, but the three young people were off in the course of the morning, leaving the beautiful Engstlen Alp with the hope of revisiting it some time for a lengthened stay. Their climb up the Joch was very uneventful, their descent to the Trübsee equally so; but when they came to the brink of the Pfaffenwand, a strange phenomenon met them. They looked over into a sea of mist. Nothing was to be seen save the steep path descending a little way and then vanishing. It seemed really rather venturesome to step over the edge. As they were lingering, lo! the mist parted, and behold! far, far below, fields of living green were cleft by a hurrying river, and pine forests climbed into cloudland, while the convent bell sounded forth its mystic clangour. Anon all was veiled below, and the upper reaches of the hills became visible. From the Horbisthal, a glen running up a little way from the main valley, arose a perfect tumult of vapours, seething and ascending from the rocky basin like steam from a witch's cauldron; then they wreathed themselves round the Engelberg. It was fitting now that the metaphor should change, for a sudden gleam of sunlight struck aslant upon all this wild confusion of mist, and illumined the lower slopes of the hills; then away from the Mount of Angels sailed

"the train,
Whose skirts the glowing mountain thirsted to detain."

Algy gazed on the scene with real pleasure, although his exclamation of "Awfully jolly!" seemed scarcely adequate to the occasion. Evelyn drank it all in with delight as she descended. What artist could give an idea of this, save Turner? she thought. What prose writer, save Ruskin, depict it in language? And it began to occur to the girl that perhaps the attempt to transfer to paper wonders such as these might be a task worth her ambition.

Dottie had good-naturedly intended to seize upon the Critic, in defiance of the notice requesting visitors not to carry away periodicals out of the public rooms. But Evelyn was beforehand with her, and darted in quest of it the moment she entered the hotel. The room was untenanted, and she could scan the review with none to witness her discomfiture.

Yes, there it was; not, be it understood, engrossing a whole article to itself, but embodied in a couple of paragraphs in one of the general reviews that sum up the merits of current lighter literature on the last pages of the Critic.

"In 'Day-dreams,' a small and daintily-bound volume, published by Messrs. Dalrymple and Co., we have one more illustration of the vanity of young authors fed by the mistaken flattery of friends. The poems are evidently the juvenile attempts of some aspirant after literary fame who has not yet mastered the elements of her craft."

"Her, indeed! How did the wretch know I was a woman?" thought Evelyn. Her blazing eyes seemed as though they would scorch the paper; but a horrible fascination made her read on.

"Nothing better can be said for the majority of these verses than that they are a feeble attempt to imitate 'In Memoriam.'"

"The imitation goes no further than occasional identity of metre, and a lavish employment of adjectives, as the following specimen will show—

'When autumn winds blow chill and drear,

And dropping leaves are whirled away,
And crimson glows the parting day,
Full sadly wanes the waning year.'

"One poem alone, 'The Lark,' affords some indication that the author might in time do better work. We advise her, if her aspirations expressed in these three verses are sincere, to write no more poetry; or, if she must write it, to let it go no further than her waste paper basket. She has a far mistaken her vocation, and the publication of her pretty volume is a step which, in riper years, she may blush to recollect."

PART V. MUSCLE.

IN speaking of nerves, in my last article, I hinted at the important termination of white or medullated nerves in muscle. I think, then, that in this article the subject of muscle will not come inaptly for consideration. The term "muscle" carries with it pre-eminently the idea of definite movement, and when we consider how great a part this tissue plays, not only in our daily life, but in the appearance of our external conformation, it will, I think, be a matter of no small interest to see its minute composition. Look at the statues in our parks and exhibitions: the excellence of all these depends in a great measure on the proper treatment and portraying of muscles; on this depends the classic beauty of an Achilles or Hercules. Without the aid of our muscles we cannot move a jot; without the aid of that muscular organ, the stomach, we could not digest; without the presence in our chests of a little muscular pump, the heart, we could not live.

But this is not the first time that I have put the idea of movement before you. Do you remember amœba, an old and never-failing friend, who serves to elucidate so many knotty points? Amœba could move, but the movements of amœbæ are indefinite, not like those of muscle; the movements of amœbæ are those of a disorderly mob, the movements of muscle those of a trained battalion of soldiers.

Now all muscle is not alike in structure; it varies according to the function it has to perform; and in looking at our specimens under the microscope, we shall have several characteristics to note. Having prefaced our acquaintance with this little family group of tissues by some remarks about them, let us now be introduced to them. First, let us see that member of the group which goes to form the athletic limbs of a Hercules or other mythic hero. This member is called "striped,"

"striated," or "voluntary" muscular tissue. Very good specimens of this can be obtained at a microscope shop, and these specimens are often prepared from crabs, the muscle from the "claws" being treated in a stain called "eosine," which dyes it pink. The specimen is then mounted in the usual way in glycerine. Fig. 1 represents a specimen of striated muscle fibre, and now you will see why it is called striated or striped; the tissue reminds you somewhat of your brother's football jerseys in its striation.

(A) Showing dark and light bands.

(B) The same enlarged, showing the thin lines of sarcolemma in the white band.

You will find it necessary to use your high power objective-glass for these muscle specimens, as they are very fine in structure. Looking then with your high power at the specimen of striated muscle, what do you see? You see a tissue made up of alternate bands of light and dark colours. Stay, you have only looked at it casually; look carefully, move the tube of the microscope up and down. Now what do you see? A still finer dark line traversing the middle of each light band. Would you like to know the measurements of the large light and dark bands? They measure about 1-17000th of an inch each. And now let us learn something about the meaning of what we see.

Each muscle fibre is encased, like we saw in the case of nerve fibres, in a sheath called, in this instance, the "Sarcolemma." This is a somewhat strong and elastic membrane—stronger indeed than the muscle fibre which it contains, as is proved by the fact that we can often break the fibre across, as in Fig. 2, without breaking the sheath.

FIG. 2.—MUSCLE OF STRIPED VARIETY RUPTURED AND SHOWING THE SARCOLEMA INTACT.

I have told you that you require a high power to see the minute structure of muscle, and so difficult is its examination that scientific men are by no means agreed as to its structure.

For our purpose it will suffice to take a very simple view of the matter. Let us begin at the edge of the specimen. There is the sarcolemma; well, now this membrane ends in prolongations which traverse the whole substance of the fibre, and which appear as those fine dark lines which one might so easily overlook. Now between the side walls of the sarcolemma and a prolongation above and below live the little muscle elements, or sarcous elements, as they have been termed, and the aggregation of these elements in a straight line gives the broad dark line, and the white line is formed by the fluid in which each little element lives.

These then are the chief characteristic points in the structure of striated or so-called voluntary muscular fibres. They are called voluntary, because unlike other muscles they are under the control of the will, and in walking or sewing you exercise such muscles. The stripes undergo remarkable variations during the exercise of a muscle or "contraction," as it is called; the dark bands become light and the light bands dark, and the variations in muscle fibres during contraction have been watched under the microscope in the water-beetle's muscles.

But now we have another member of the muscle family to meet with, and this is called the "involuntary," "unstriped," or "plain" muscular tissue. This, as its name implies, varies widely from the last kind we looked at; it is not under the control of the will, it is not striped like the other, and in fact it is simpler in construction.

Look at Fig. 3; it represents plain muscular tissue. You see that these fibres are simply elongated cells; there is the cell-wall, a defined outline, the cell-substance, and situated in the centre of the cell-substance a more or less elongated nucleus, there is no cross-stripping, and the nucleus is very distinct. There is no definite sarcolemma, though the various fibres are fixed together by means of a gelatinous medium. These muscles do not enter into the formation of the limbs as far as their naked-eye form is concerned; they are found in the stomach and lower part of the gullet, and also in the air-passages through which we breathe. These fibres also enter into the structure of our blood-vessels. They are very important, these muscles, and many of them are under the control of the sympathetic system of nerves which we spoke of in our last discussion. This then finishes the description of the first member of the involuntary group.

I said in the beginning of this article that were it not for the presence in our chests of a muscular organ known as the heart we could not live. Now this organ is made of a kind of muscle which is found nowhere else in the whole body. Look at Fig. 4; this is a specimen of mammalian heart-muscle which has been stained in logwood and mounted in Canada balsam; and now a few hints as to the preparation of the specimen for yourself. You can easily get your cook or butcher to give you a very small piece of a sheep's heart; a piece about as big as a small pin's head will answer very well; place this on a slide, and now with two small needles separate it a little, that is, "tease it out," to use a workshop phrase, in a little normal salt solution, the formula for which I gave in a recent article. Now drain off your salt solution on to some blotting-paper, now drop a little solution of hæmatoxylin or logwood, as it is often called, into the preparation; let this remain in a few moments, and then drain off the superfluous dye as you did the salt solution; the specimen will now be stained blue. Now to mount the specimen, you have the choice of two methods—you can either mount in glycerine or in Canada balsam; the first method is the easier, as a little diluted glycerine is simply dropped on the slide, and a cover-slip applied; the second method is a more complicated but better one in many ways. To mount in Canada balsam it is necessary first of all to get rid of all water, and this is done by running over the specimen some absolute alcohol, which has a very great affinity for water. When this has been done thoroughly, and the specimen is almost dry, it must be "cleared" with oil of cloves; this is allowed to run over the specimen for a few seconds, and then is drained off like the previous fluids; a drop of Canada balsam is now dropped on the specimen, and the whole covered as quickly as possible with a cover-slip.

And now having prepared our specimen, let us look into it. What do we see? A tissue differing markedly from either of those which we have yet studied. We see a number of fibres which are striped, and yet are involuntary; they have distinct nuclei, and more than all, these fibres branch and communicate with one another; they are a sort of hybrid between the voluntary and involuntary muscle fibres which we have studied, and still have a peculiar characteristic possessed by neither of the others—that is, branching. The stripes, though distinct, are less strongly marked than those of striped voluntary muscular tissue, and the fibres are not so large in diameter as those of ordinary muscles; the cells, instead of being of the so-called "fusiform" shape of ordinary involuntary muscle fibres, are somewhat square in outline. The nucleus is large and pale, and somewhat oval in shape, and there is no trace of a sarcolemma. Of such tissue then is this little muscle-pump, which has so long been associated by poets as the seat of all emotions, made.

And to those of my girl-readers who have learned anything of physiology (and I do not doubt but that many of the older girls have), the beauty of adaptation which we have seen in all our specimens is still pre-eminent in these little fibres.

The voluntary impulses act best in the striped muscles; they expand with sudden alacrity; the unstriped muscle retains a profound impression from its stimulating nerve, and the heart-muscle is most admirably adapted in its structure for the accomplishment throughout our lives of its incessant beating, never to stop until the immortal spirit leaves us.

And all the while you see that all these wonderful structures are merely the modifications of simple cells; we are but highly modified amoeba, living by volition, and being made of cells; and everywhere it is evident that where there is a change of structure it is to ensure the equal distribution of balance, to the harmoniously working community of the great whole.

LOVE VERSUS MONEY.

By L. SHARP, Author of "Nan's Story," "May's Dream," etc.

CHAPTER III.

LEEN, are you sure that no flowers have come for me?" asked Leslie, doubtfully. "Just run down again and see if there are none on the hall table."

But the maid returned with the same answer that she had given before. "There ain't nothing come, miss; shall I get you some from the greenhouse? Though to be sure, Miss Leslie," with an admiring glance at her lovely mistress, "you don't need flowers nor anything to set you off more. Shall I run and get some now?"

"No, never mind," with a sigh; "I dare say it will look as well without. You can go now, Ellen; I am going to wait here till the carriage comes," taking up a book as if with the intention of reading it. But when the maid had left, Leslie laid it down again, and, shading her face with her hand, gazed dreamily into the glowing fire. "I wonder if he forgot," she murmured, wistfully; "yet he seemed so eager for me to have them."

A secret unrest possessed her; a secret trouble lurked within her eyes. Every day lately had seemed to grow more disturbing, if more precious. Was all her happiness to be ended now because of her uncle's caprice? What would Dr. Owen think of them if he was to be suddenly ignored? "Oh, dear! why can't all the world be happy in their own way?"

A fluttering, dolorous little sigh came as an accompaniment to the words, and then the soliloquy was broken by the entrance of Miss Cameron.

"Come away, Leslie," said the latter, "the carriage is waiting for us. How well that pale sea-green dress suits you, child!" glancing rapidly over the slight figure; "your golden hair and brown eyes will do some mischief to-night, I am thinking."

On their way downstairs they were overtaken by Ethel Seymour, looking very handsome after her elaborate toilet in a creamy dress of cashmere; and in the hall by Sir Philip and the Captain.

"You are placed under my care by Mr. Barton's wish for this evening, Miss Leslie," said Sir Philip, holding out his arm to the young girl, and putting up his glass for a survey of her. "Pon my word—aw—it will be a pleasant duty."

"You are very kind to allow such a burden to be laid on you," replied Leslie, with a flash of her eyes, which left him in doubt as to whether she was in jest or earnest.

"You could never be that to me, Leslie," he whispered tenderly, as he led her to the carriage. "I wish you would let me have the care of you always!" pressing her arm to his side.

"Whv. what an idea!" she exclaimed evasively; "I might manage to exist for one evening under your protection, but I always prefer to be under my own, don't you know?"

He glanced angrily at the sparkling face, so full of innocent unconsciousness. She had quietly withdrawn her hand from his clasp even before she had answered him.

"You are very cruel," with an angry twirl at the long moustache. "Pon my word, Miss Leslie, you treat me vevy badly."

Leslie shrugged her shoulders carelessly, and Sir Philip, now that the other pair had joined them, relapsed into sulky silence.

The expected guests had arrived at Mrs. Wilson's pretty house, and the music had begun when Dr. Owen entered the drawing-room. He looked round eagerly, after shaking hands with his hostess, until he saw Leslie. She was standing beside a tall, rather plain-looking young man, who seemed disinclined to let anyone approach her. She had not on his flowers!

He was dismayed, perplexed, downhearted. Could it be that she intended him to take the hint that their absence conveyed? He went forward quietly, but to his astonishment she did not seem in the least bit glad to see him.

"I hope I have not been unfortunate enough to have missed the new song which you promised that I should hear to-night, Miss Barton?" he asked, casting a reproachful glance at her. "I could not manage to get away sooner. Am I too late after all?"

"No, not for the song you speak of," stammered the girl, hastily, with an embarrassment she tried in vain to conceal. "I am going to sing presently."

"You will allow me to lead you to the piano, and turn over for you?" he said, a little anxiously, concerned at her evident coolness.

"Yes."

But her eyes never met his, and there was still the tell-tale colour in her cheeks; and the doctor's brow was overcast as he made a stiff little bow in walking away.

Northbrook looked after him, smiling.

"You are very good to your recreant swains, Miss Barton; you allow them to sing their wings now and then instead of extinguishing them at once. Do you call that merciful?"

Leslie drew her slight figure to its fullest height, answering haughtily—

"By what right, Captain Northbrook, do you question my proceedings? Kindly remember that I am not Ethel Seymour!" And with this parting thrust Leslie moved to the side of her hostess, and began to speak rapidly to her.

The girl's heart was sore within her. First Sir Philip, and then Captain Northbrook, had been sneering at her for her partisanship of the young physician; and what with that, her uncle's disapproval, and the forgotten flowers, she was quite unlike herself.

When Dr. Owen approached to offer her his arm across the room, he was more puzzled than ever. What had become of the frank, simple, charming girl of the last few months? It was an altogether different person who met him now, with a reserve which put him back into the region of mere acquaintanceship.

Leslie seated herself at the piano, Dr. Owen stationing himself beside her. As the melting tones of the girl's clear voice rose and fell, as the wild beauty of the music and the words of the refrain rang through the room, an expression of yearning passed over the young man's face. When the song and murmur of applause had died away, he quietly placed her hand upon his arm, and withdrew her suddenly to one of the adjoining recesses.

"Miss Leslie," he began, abruptly, "what have I done to offend you? Why have you not kept your promise to me of wearing my flowers?"

"Because I never received any flowers, Dr.

Owen," replied the girl, toying nervously with her fan, but trying to speak carelessly.

"But I sent them. Who could have kept them from you? But never mind that now. I want to speak to you, Miss Leslie. I wonder if you have any idea what you are to me?"

Leslie started, and glanced up for a moment with her lovely innocent eyes into his face.

"I think—I think—that—"

"What do you think, Leslie?" he questioned, softly, trying in vain to make her meet his impassioned gaze. "Is it that you know—?"

"Pardon my intrusion," said a sneering voice behind them, "but Mrs. Wilson says that you are sent for, doctor, and I have come to recall our fair singer to charm us again," and Sir Philip Seymour extended his arm with a smile of malicious triumph.

The hot blood rushed wildly into the young girl's face, while Dr. Owen drew back.

"I shall see you again!" and with a lingering pressure of the hand, Leslie was left alone with Sir Philip.

"Let us go to the drawing-room then," she cried, impatiently.

"All in good time, my little friend," calmly replied her companion; "but I have something to say to you first. Do you know that your uncle has given you to me? Will you ratify his consent and be my wife?"

"I could never give my hand without my heart, Sir Philip, and you know, you must know, that I do not care for you. Besides," in a lower tone, "the man I marry must help, not hinder me, in my efforts and struggles after a better life, and you do not approve of any of my hopes or plans."

"Will nothing that I can say make you change your mind?" with a look that boded ill for a refusal.

"Nothing," gently. "You do not really love me, Sir Philip, so it does not matter."

"Ah! I see. That presumptuous doctor has been before me! But do not think that he will be successful. You will never be allowed to throw yourself away on Dr. Owen, Leslie. It's all very well your flirting with him, but remember, foolish girl, that he would never seek you were it not for your reputed wealth." Sir Philip spoke quickly enough now. His voice was eager with suppressed rage, and with despair at the thought of the fifty thousand, which seemed likely to escape him. "For your own sake, do not throw away the chance of becoming the Lady of Hazeldean."

He saw with malicious glee that his words had stricken the warmth and colour from the pliant face.

An indignant reply trembled on the girl's quivering lips, but she was too proud to give it utterance.

"You have had your answer," with a cold dignity, ignoring his other remarks; "perhaps you would be kind enough to leave me now!"

With a face as black as night, Sir Philip strode from the room. His defeat was shown too plainly to his sister and friends for them to ask any questions; and the drive home was taken in comparative silence.

Mr. Barton's feelings may be imagined when Sir Philip disclosed the result of his interview with Leslie. "Send her to me!" he thundered, as the young man left the room.

"So, Miss Barton! And you dare to set my express wishes at defiance?" he began, on her appearance, with a harsh voice that grated on the girl's excited feelings. "No words, please!" as she was beginning to speak; "I merely wish you to understand my intentions. I give you one month—mind, I mean what I say—one month in which to come to a better conclusion. Should you decide then to accept Sir Philip Seymour you shall stand with me as before: should you refuse—you shall be turned from the door without a farthing. Now go. No, I shall not hear one word you have to say until the month is up. Tell Miss Cameron to speak to me!"

With a heightened colour Leslie walked proudly from the presence of the irate old man.

Miss Cameron had barely received her instructions when the butler announced Dr. Owen.

The latter was first to speak.

"I am here in answer to your note, Mr. Barton," he began, pleasantly, "but before we begin, may I beg of you to listen to me for a few minutes first?"

"Say on," laconically, keeping cool with a tremendous struggle.

"It is only that, like many another, I love your niece," said the doctor, with one of his sunny smiles, "and I would be so pleased if you would give me your consent. I think I may say that I have a fair chance of winning her; and I need not tell you how earnestly I shall do my utmost to make her happy."

"I am a man of few words, Dr. Owen," Mr. Barton replied, slowly, "and I shall not mince what I have to say. It will be very unfortunate for you if you carry out your intentions of winning my niece."

Dr. Owen returned his keen, set look.

"Why so?" he inquired, as cool as he.

"Because you are not a suitable person to become her husband!"

"I do not understand you."

"You have played upon the fancy of an inexperienced girl who has seen little of the world, for the sake of her money. I feel justified in refusing my consent."

Dr. Owen paled slightly.

"I am no fortune-hunter, Mr. Barton," he said, coldly; "give me your niece without a penny, and I shall consider myself the most fortunate of men. It is not her money that I want, but herself."

"It is hardly necessary to say, sir, that I am at liberty to doubt that statement," sneered Mr. Barton. Then, with a sudden change of tone, "Give up this foolish idea, Dr. Owen, and I will befriend you. I will make you rich!" watching his face eagerly; "I will help you to increase your fortune."

The doctor's lips curled.

"You plead well—for your own interests," he said, bitterly.

Mr. Barton coloured at the thrust.

"I think of your interest as well as my own. Don't make me your enemy, Dr. Owen! Don't return my hospitality with such black ingratitude as this!"

"I neither ask nor wish for help, Mr. Barton." He was hot with rage. "I shall leave it to your niece to choose between me and wealth. I am not rich, but I have a little money of my own, and my practice is growing steadily. I can give her every necessary, and, above all, an honest, faithful love."

"You intend then to prosecute your suit?" harshly.

"Certainly."

"May I ask if you have spoken yet to Miss Barton?"

"Not definitely; but I think she understands."

"Dr. Owen, I am an old man, and Leslie is all I have; if she goes to you, she forsakes utterly and for ever her adopted home. Will you grant me a request?"

"What is it?" mistrustfully.

"That for one month—it is not long to wait—you neither speak nor write to my niece? Surely you can oblige me so far," impatiently; "after that I wash my hands of her."

Dr. Owen faced him steadily. "I am sorry, Mr. Barton, that you will not give me your consent; but," he paused, "you are an old man, as you say, and have been kind to Leslie. For one month I promise to accede to your conditions."

He rose, with a haughty movement of his head, ignoring Mr. Barton's hand, and took his departure.

What an interminable month it seemed to the young physician; and how fearfully hard to refrain from speaking!

Christmas had passed with its festive duties, and January was already on the wane.

Poor little Leslie! Patience and passion were having a hard time of it in the proud silence of her heart. She had to act her part of hostess, and smile serenely as if quite content; she had to bear her uncle's ill-humour, and Sir Philip's hated attentions; and to feel that every moment of the day she was watched and guarded like a prisoner.

What were they afraid of? she thought, scornfully. That she would beg for the friendship that was now a thing of the past? They did not know her if they thought that.

No wonder that anxiety and unrest were making the young face pathetic. Not a day passed but she met Dr. Owen, and yet she had never exchanged a word with him since Mrs. Wilson's evening. Only a hurried bow was all that passed between them now. Every day she had expected some explanation of what he had begun to say that evening, which seemed so long ago; but no word, no line came to lessen her impatience; no hope but the lingering pressure of his hand, the look in his eyes with which he had said, "I shall see you again."

"What makes you so quiet and white, Leslie?" asked Miss Cameron, kindly, as they sat together one morning.

"I am thinking that to-morrow will be my last day here," replied Leslie, in a low, dreamy tone.

"Nonsense, child! You do not mean to throw away your splendid fortune and Sir Philip Seymour for a mere struggling doctor!" exclaimed Miss Cameron, unguardedly.

"Minnie!" Leslie's eyes flashed ominously, "do not couple my name with anyone, if you please. I am going to the hospital to-morrow as a nurse there," with a proud little curtsy. "Miss Jacobs, the matron, has promised to take me for a year's trial, and I am going to tell uncle my decision now." And without listening to Miss Cameron's expostulations, Leslie walked straight into the library.

"Uncle, the month is up to-day, and I have come to tell you that nothing, nothing would ever induce me to be Sir Philip Seymour's wife. As you are going to disown me for this refusal, I only wish to say, before leaving Fern Tower, that I thank you from my heart for your goodness to me the last four years, and that I am very, very sorry to have to leave you in anger with me."

"A nice return you make me for the goodness you speak of! I like deeds, not words, miss; and as you've made your bed, so you shall lie on it. Not one penny of my money shall you ever see; no, not if you were to go down upon your knees and beg for it; there!" And the old man glared at her as he thundered out the words.

"Good-bye, then, uncle," replied the girl, sadly. "I care nothing for your money, only you will not believe me."

With a heavy heart Leslie began to pack her things. She was half through with her work when the maid Ellen came in.

"If you please, miss," she said, with wide-opened eyes, "Dr. Owen is in the drawing-room, and wants to see you."

Leslie sprang to her feet, passing her hand across her throbbing brow, then slowly turned her steps towards the drawing-room.

The young man walked quickly forwards.

"Leslie!" he cried, with unspeakable longing in his voice, "Leslie! I promised your uncle not to speak until a month had passed; it is over now," with a sigh of relief, "and I have come to see if I can gain my heart's desire. You did care for me a little, did you not?" gazing anxiously at the white, still face, and taking her hands in his.

"Did care for you?" Leslie echoed under her breath, with a strange little laugh. "Ask me, rather, if I do care for you, and I will answer yes!"

* * * * *

In less than a month the old-fashioned house, with the vines creeping over the front, had gained a mistress; and Leslie's life blossomed with the happiness of a future that seemed to be overflowing with its golden promise.

Neither Doctor nor Mrs. Owen were much astonished when, a few weeks later, a grand and fashionable marriage took place in London, and Mr. Barton led Miss Cameron to the altar.

"It is not a case of 'Love versus Money' there, Leslie, is it?" said the doctor, laughingly, as he read out the announcement at breakfast. "But I think, my dear one, that we have the best of the bargain. A happy love is the greatest blessing we can know in this troublous life of ours, and I would not exchange it for the wealth of a Cræsus."

And Leslie quite agreed with him.

[THE END.]

THE CULTURE OF SILK IN IRELAND AND AMERICA.

By DORA DE BLAQUIERE.

HERE is no more interesting story in all the annals of women's labours for women than that of the organisation which was formed in 1880, in the City of Philadelphia, U.S.A. It was inaugurated by a noble band of devoted women, who adopted for it the name of the Woman's Silk Culture Association of America, and declared, in their constitution, that their object was "to establish industrial schools, for instruction in the art of silk culture and in the art of preparing silk for manufacturing uses. Also for the establishment of auxiliary associations for such instruction throughout the United States." These duties were at once entered upon with a membership of 150 persons, of whom 100 were ladies, and a revenue for the enterprise of $1,627 (not quite £400), nearly all of which was efficiently expended within the first year. To all these ladies the practical knowledge of silk culture was unknown; but they were all swayed by one purpose, i.e., to help their own sex scattered over their country; to carry on an interesting, instructive, and moral, as well as a remunerative industry, easily made accessible to every household, to the thousands of small householders of the country, to whom the labour channels of cities and the liberal patronage of the rich never flow. Thus the poor of the country were the objects of this generous effort to introduce into a vast country the cottage culture of silk, as an auxiliary to slender incomes, and as a light and pleasant occupation for unemployed women and children. For in the beginning there was no thought of business profit to the association, only unselfish consideration and enlightened designs. After four years of work the association made an appeal to the National Government at Washington for its fostering care on behalf of the silk industry in the United States, with the result that in 1885 the "Agricultural Bureau" at Washington authorised the association to demonstrate the practicability of home-reeling, and to enlarge the other departments of their work, being aided by the Government in doing so with monthly appropriations for the covering of the expenses incurred. This was required to be under the direction of the department. Later on an appeal was made for a direct appropriation to the association, instead of leaving it in a dependent position, which was likely to hamper progress. This appeal was granted, and the American Government made a grant of 5,000 dollars, which has since been repeated yearly, and has now passed into a law.

This action of the United States Government enabled the Association of Women to ply their efforts to the furthering of the silk industry with redoubled strength and vigour, for they are not now dependent on private aid, nor compelled to make constant calls on the public for support. In the year 1885 the association started the first reeling station in America, by opening rooms with steam power and all requisite appliances in Arch Street, Philadelphia. Here a line of shafting was introduced, with arrangements for six reels, three American reels being placed there early in June. Shortly after this date the first market was opened for the sale of reeled silk, and also for "waste," by a liberal offer from two or three firms of silk manufacturers. In 1888 a bill was introduced into Congress, asking for an appropriation of 150,000 dollars to aid and foster the silk industry in America. This seems to set the seal of success on the efforts that have been made by women, and shows that they have not been exerted in vain. There are at this date three stations of silk culture, independently of what the National Bureau at Washington is doing; and theirs is no mean work, having introduced the "Serrell reeling" system, and a Bureau of Information as well, for the distribution of seed and the purchase of cocoons. The Bureau of Agriculture at Washington set up a plant of the new "Serrell automatic reels" imported from France by the Ladies' Association for them in the year 1886. So it will be seen what really has been, in a period of about eight years, the work of a few energetic and devoted women in America, i.e., the introduction of the culture of silk, the instruction of the people, the acquirement of a good American reel, the instruction of American girls in reeling, the testing of the French steam reel—now in use in all the foreign filatures—and finally, the placing of the first flags of American-grown silk in the Senate Chamber and in the House of Representatives. There was an exhibition of American-grown silk and cocoons at the American Exhibition in London in 1887, which was well worth attention. The association has received several silver medals from various exhibitions, and fifteen certificates and diplomas from different States in the Union.

The question of the reel is one of enormous importance, and the association seems to have come to the conclusion that the small American hand-reel—when adjusted for steam power—is better than any of those at present in use on the Continent. They have carefully and patiently tested the Berthaud French steam-reel, as well as others, before coming to this conclusion. In the reeling department in Philadelphia they have American girls at work under the instruction of an Italian, and they have six reels running, the filature turning off twenty-four skeins of raw silk daily. In the future, when the cocoons are improved, it is hoped that they will succeed in throwing out from good products at least one pound daily in this reeling department, and thus must be answered the oft-repeated questions, "Will it pay? and can the reeling be performed so as to compete with foreign labour?" In the report of the association for 1888 they seem to consider these questions answered in the affirmative, and if answered for America it must be the same thing for both England and Ireland, where an exactly corresponding expense for labour is incurred. In 1888 the report says, "This superior reel of American make was invented by one of Philadelphia's skilled mechanics, assisted by one of America's scientific scholars, and is superior to all other reels, having a capacity double that of any other one in existence. The president of the association, who is now travelling in Europe, reports that she has seen none to equal it, and it must be remembered in dealing with the question that the silk reel bears the same relation to silk culture as the cotton gin does to cotton culture; it is the very first process in preparing the silk for the loom. . . . It has been said by many that silk culture was not possible in this country, because American girls could not be trained to the delicate art of reeling. This has been thoroughly refuted by trials, as quite a number have already been taught in its school to be expert reelers, and are now employed at good wages in the rooms of the association, where six steam reels are in operation."

Some of the States of the Union, especially Kansas, have offered a bounty of 50 cents (2s.) for the best quality of cocoons, and a descending scale for those not so good. Kansas has also established a silk station, and advertises to pay the highest market price for premium crops; and it also pays cash for all cocoons sent to the station, according to their value when tested, the price paid being in all cases strictly foreign market value.

In Mexico the raising of silk has been commenced. The Consul-General of the U.S.A. reports in 1887 that within five years more silk will be manufactured in Mexico than can be consumed by her own people. The factory started has machinery imported from France, and is in the hands of competent men. The silk worm cultivators in the vicinity of the factory will, it is expected, be able to supply all the demands.

In thirty-two of the States 6,673 mulberry trees and cuttings have been distributed, and in the Southern States it will be possible to raise two crops in the year. The best quality of silk has hitherto been mixed by Ohio, and the American Association says it is a question for the people themselves to decide whether New York shall become the silk mart of the world, as she is already of foreign raw silk. In America there are at present 385 silk factories and 30,000 employees, and 20,000,000 dollars of raw material of foreign production is used. The imports of waste silk, pierced cocoons, at the ports of New York and San Francisco are valued at £185,838, and of raw silk at £4,425,378. The Americans have paid great attention to the improvement of machinery for throwing and manufacturing silk, and with so much success that some English firms are rehabilitating their mills with machinery from Connecticut, and discarding their more old-fashioned and cumbrous methods.

No wonder that these patriotic American women in Philadelphia see that in the face of an immense consumption like this it would be worse than a sin to allow the silk industry to be practically in the hands of foreigners, when the native American, especially women and children, could earn the money as well. The foreign fields of silk culture fall far behind in furnishing the increased demand, especially that of the American market, which is a comparatively new one. The tariff on manufactured silk goods has resulted in the establishment of several hundred silk mills of the most superior class, which consume an immense amount of material.

King James, who endeavoured to found and foster the silk industry in England, also did his very best for it in the then American colonies of England; years after so far had it advanced that a Court robe was made for the queen from silk raised in Pennsylvania, while the king wore garments made from silk grown in Virginia. The report of the association also gives us the copy of a letter from Washington, dated Philadelphia, July 29th, 1794, to Mrs. Anderson, of Gloucester County, Virginia, thanking her for a piece of silk of her own manufacture, grown in Virginia, which "the father of his country" promises to wear "as an evidence of what our climate, aided by industry, is capable of yielding, although it is an established maxim of mine not to accept a present from anyone." In the same way the Silk Association of the day has presented Mrs. Garfield with a dress pattern of black silk, which was purely American, from the worms who spun the cocoons, to the weaving, the pattern being a particularly fine design.

Have I interested you, my dear readers, in this story of women's efforts, patience, and victory? And do you long already to do something of the sort, and strive to found an industry in England, as well as Ireland, which shall in the course of years bring increased means of livelihood to women and children? Remember that the business man and the capitalist cannot try social experiments, and the banker has no room in his ledgers for motives of sympathy and beneficence. Therefore this new property, this new opening for labour and profit, must be created by women and girls, and they must begin without the idea of payment, only with the firm conviction that there is an ultimate success for them if they will begin to study the habits of the silkworm and to find a plot of ground where a few mulberry trees can take root and prosper. One benefit seems to be more clear than another, and that is, the small capital needed to set up the silk grower. An acre or two of land of ordinary fertility and a few pounds for the purchase of mulberry trees and plants will enable anyone who is anxious to become a silk grower to lay the foundation for a plantation on an extensive scale. The way in which the mulberry may be multiplied by means of cuttings and layers is wonderful. It is said that they may be quadrupled every year. The white mulberry, or Morus alba, is that generally cultivated as the best species for the use of the silkworm; but in China, Spain, and Persia they are said to prefer the Morus nigra, or black mulberry, of which we have so many trees in this country. The Morus alba has been known to attain the age of 400 years; it has leaves earlier in the year than any other species, and is more rapid in growth than the black mulberry, while it contains more of the glutinous substance, like caoutchouc, which gives tenacity to the silk produced by the worms fed on its leaves. One acre of mulberries should feed from 80,000 to 100,000 worms, or from 300 to 500 lbs. of cocoons; but much depends on care, climate and soil. Hillsides, land sloping towards the east, south-east or south; and protected on the north and north-west by plantations or buildings, consisting of a dry, sandy loam, are the conditions suitable for the mulberry; a cold, damp, or heavy soil will not answer.

The Americans advise that hedges of mulberry should be planted round the grounds of farms, as in this case children could reach up and gather the leaves.

The temperature needed for raising silkworms is not less than 75° Fahrenheit. Where that cannot be obtained special means for raising the thermometer up to that degree are needful, and one of the foundations of the art of rearing silkworms is to know the various degrees of heat in which the silkworms should live. It is not heat apparently that affects them, but sudden changes from one degree of temperature to another. It is necessary that the growth of the worms should follow that of the mulberry leaves in such a manner that at the fourth age the leaves should have attained their full growth. If the first ages of the worms be prolonged, the leaf will grow and harden and become unfit for their use.

The last subject to be touched upon is in reference to the eggs of the silkworm (or "grain," as it is properly called). The various epidemics in Europe have rendered it needful to look to Eastern countries for it, and Japan alone supplies Europe and the United States with great quantities of eggs, no less than six million dollars' worth being exported from Yokohama to San Francisco alone. They perform the long voyage in the winter, and are purchased in Japan in September, having been laid in August. Great pains are taken to shelter them from heat, but they can stand any amount of cold, and in travelling they can be kept on ice without damage; but they must also be kept dry, and a cold, dry cellar is the best place for them in winter. They may be kept in linen bags, hung up to the ceiling in a cool place, or else in tin boxes with perforations in the sides. The eggs are sold by weight, their value being about 25s. per ounce; each ounce may contain 40,000 eggs; and so you may guess from this how much you will require when you begin your work as an "educator" of silkworms; and you can also make calculations about the leaves you are likely to have with which to feed them. An ounce of eggs will produce about 100 to 120 lbs. of cocoons.

A PLEA FOR CONVALESCENT HOMES.

BY HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

IN unhomelike City houses,
 With a hot and throbbing brow,
 Many a weary girl is struggling
 Through a convalescence slow;
 While o'er cool and verdant mosses
 Other maidens careless stray,
 Where across the dancing rivers
 Dart the dragon-flies at play.

Days go by with leaden footsteps
 In the narrow, noisy room,
 Where no ray of God's sweet sunlight
 Breaks the close, unlovely gloom;
 Yet the merry merle and mavis
 Make the woods resound with song,
 And the dusty bee rejoices
 That the summer day is long!

Only jarring City noises
 Fall upon the tired ear;
 There is not a leaf or blossom
 Wistful eyes to bless and cheer;
 Yet the summer's breeze is playing
 O'er the glowing, purple moor,
 And the tiny waves are kissing
 With soft lips the shining shore.

Ah! ye gay and gentle maidens—
 Ye, to whom God giveth all,
 Let a share of your abundance
 On less happy sisters fall.
 Hark! a still, small voice is saying,
 "Are My gifts not full and free?"
 What ye give to these my sisters,
 Ye have given unto Me."

OLD-FASHIONED GARDENS.

THE notion of putting down a few ideas on gardens and gardening occurred to me while staying with a most enthusiastic grower of flowers in Norfolk this year. The wealth of bloom that met my gaze every time I looked out of a window, or for that matter looked round the rooms—for my friend was not one of those growers who are afraid to pluck a flower—might have awakened enthusiasm for gardens and gardening in the breasts of the most indifferent; and as my friend kindly put at my disposal his own experience as a grower of flowers for many years, I determined to make the present attempt to say something practical, to help those readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER who are interested in the subject of gardening. Not that I shall attempt to write a sort of professional treatise on this inexhaustible theme (even if I were capable of doing so, which I am not), for if the Editor consented to print it (which I doubt), the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER would, I am thinking, not give me their attention for long. I have my own ideas about what a garden should be, as I daresay have many other people. The subject of gardens has occupied my mind on and off for the last few years, but it is only recently that I have attempted to fix my thoughts on paper. One of my methods of study ever since I took up art has been to draw from plant form, and this has led me into a good many gardens at various times; and while seated, as I have often been, drawing some flower that has attracted my attention by its beauty or quaintness of form, I have had ample opportunities in the pauses of my work to note any striking effect of grouping, contrasts of colour, or the way one plant will throw up and bring into prominence another one growing in front of it. Nay, these very effects are often what I have gone into gardens to seek, as well as for plants whose forms, flowers, foliage and growth are beautiful; and I shall in these articles dwell as much on the æsthetic—i.e., beautiful side of gardening—as on the practical aspect of the question. Depend upon it, the management of the flowers in a garden is every whit as important as the successful growing of plants, for unless great care be exercised in the placing of your flowers, much of their beauty will be lost.

Gardening is not a matter of chance, as some people may imagine. Gardening is an art, the art of decorating a confined area—for a garden, no matter how large, is relatively a small plot of ground—with plants of varied forms, colours, and growths. If we decorate a room, we seek for pleasing tints and happy combinations, so that the eye shall appear satisfied with a feeling of completeness. And we should do the same in a garden; and, let me tell you, a very difficult task it is to put all your various plants in appropriately, so that each is seen to its best advantage, and made the most of. But, say you, perhaps, the flowers in the field have no landscape gardener to fit them into their places, and yet who can deny their beauty? I would answer to such an one a garden is not nature, but an artificial product, just as much as a picture is. In a garden you have in a comparatively small space flowers that are distributed over a wide area, and which in their wild state are never found blooming together. And as you bring these widely different plants together, it is your duty to do the best by them. The hand which collects must also direct. And then, again, some flowers are so much more interesting to grow than others, and so much more beautiful when grown; and when there is such endless variety as there is now, seeing that novelties from all corners of the earth are continually being collected and brought to England, it behoves us to make a judicious selection.

I hope my readers don't imagine that by novelties I refer to hothouse or stove plants—plants that require a constant artificial atmosphere to keep them alive. Let me emphatically state that my gardening is open-air gardening, and the plants I grow are hardy ones, and quite capable of taking care of themselves.

There is a talk now about herbaceous borders, and many people are going in entirely for hardy herbaceous plants. This is a most excellent move, and one quite in the right direction. Gardening a few years ago had resolved itself into having a few beds of geraniums and roses, two very good things in their way, but by no means the only flowers worth cultivating. Indeed, geraniums don't come under the head of hardy plants, and it is a question whether they are worth growing, unless you have plenty of glass for them in the winter, for, as you know, frost is death to them.

There seems to be some misconception as to what is meant by hardy herbaceous plants, and as it is a term often employed I had better give a definition of it. Herbaceous plants are those whose stems die down annually, such as the chrysanthemum and hollyhock, but unless disease attack the root, the plant springs into life again the following year, often increasing by the plant throwing out fresh shoots. It is therefore possible to have plants—annuals that die after flowering, and require to be replanted; biennials—plants that die the second year; and perennials—plants that live year after year under favourable conditions. There are some plants which come, strictly speaking, under the head of hardy plants, which by florists are separately classified. These plants are tuberous, as the dahlia, and bulbous, as the daffodils and lilies.

THE GARDENER.

Old-fashioned gardens were generally rich in hardy herbaceous plants and annuals; and very brilliant and even gorgeous is the effect of an old garden, with its hollyhocks, and white lilies, and bergamot, and Aaron's rods, and giant pyrethrums, and lychnis, and it is a great pity that these grand old flowers, that came up year after year, often with little care and trouble on our part, should have been allowed to fall into neglect for the sake of newer and what would be considered more fashionable plants. The greatest charm of a garden is variety and profusion of bloom, and diversity of growth and arrangement, and this is far from being realised by beds of geraniums and coloured leaf plants, arranged with a geometrical precision. I like a garden where the eye is continually meeting with some new beauty, a garden where one is constantly getting fresh peeps at flowers, and not one that is exhausted by a bird's-eye view. I like order and precision and neatness in a garden, but not too much formality, at least not formality of detail, though I think a certain formality of the principal lines in a garden, such as the walks, hedges, and main divisions, is desirable; as these are analogous to a picture frame, which to my thinking is always better the straighter and plainer it be, so as to throw into relief the richness and variety of the painting.

Good hardy herbaceous plants have their distinct uses in a garden. They are always something to start with when you begin your gardening for the spring: Only those who garden are aware of the quantity of plants a small space of ground will absorb, and it is a great relief to think, as one surveys a long border, that there are one's white lilies, phloxes, pyrethrums, delphiniums, geums, and other perennials, and that all one has to do is to fill out the intervals with annuals and a few bedding plants, such as geraniums and lobelias. Perennials come up year after year, and, once planted, all they require is manuring in the winter or spring, and just forking round the roots. It is a good plan when you cut down the dead stalks, or when they die down in the autumn and winter, to cover your plants with some good stable manure. This protects the roots from very severe frosts, and the plants are nourished by the rain washing the manure into the earth. It is always well, too, to place sticks or labels wherever you have any roots or bulbs. This is a most necessary precaution, as when the plant has died quite down, in forking over the bed one is very apt to inadvertently disturb the roots, or even fork into them, and perhaps ruin a choice clump. Bulbs frequently suffer from these accidents, and it is very probable that the reason so many bulbs get lost every year is, that they get disturbed and bruised, and eventually rot in the ground. It is even a good plan to mark down on paper the position of your plants, so that in sowing your annuals, or planting out your dwarf plants, due regard can be paid to what is already in the ground. When once a plant has got well established and appears to thrive in the particular spot in the garden, it is most important it should not be disturbed. Many of the lilies, irises, and hemerocallis grow into grand clumps and throw up dozens of spikes if the bulbs are not damaged. Therefore, be most careful when forking over the ground in the spring not to damage or disturb these corner stones of your garden.

In going into a strange garden, I always take in the general effect before studying the details of the gardening, for that is what, after all, is most pleasing in a garden. If the eye rests upon gorgeous masses of colour, great wealth of foliage and beauty of form, one's eye is satisfied, and it little matters what the plants are that produce this grand mise en scène. The general effect is what all gardeners should aim at, instead of, as they too often do, wasting all their time in bringing a few flowers into bloom of some particular plant they have made their hobby. Make some one particular flower your especial study if you like, but don't do this to the exclusion of all else. A good gardener I consider one of the most generous of beings, for in gratifying himself (or herself), he gives pleasure, may be to thousands. Seeing it is so easy to be generous, no gardener should be selfish, and sacrifice the general effect of his garden for the sake of some particular plant. What matters it how common (if any flower is common in this sense) the plants that produce this wealth of effect be, so long as the general effect is one of splendour?

What a relief it is to the eye as one is driving along a country road or through a village, to have it cheered by a sight of brilliant coloured flowers! and I always lament that there are now comparatively so few real cottage gardens. Now and then you come across some country labourer who is a gardening enthusiast, and who has the strip of ground in front of his cottage gay with many an old-fashioned flower, with here and there perchance a rarer plant, that the gardener at the great house has given him. And let me tell you some very choice hardy plants are to be found in these cottage gardens, and I know my Norfolk friend is always on the look out as he drives through the country for some new acquisition for his own garden. Some of the flowers that our great great grandmothers grew still linger on in these cottage gardens, and you cannot do better than try to effect an exchange of some of your newer plants for cuttings or seeds of these old-fashioned flowers. Two or three generations ago our country folk were much more diligent gardeners than they are now. The wives of the farmers were often great flower-growers. These were the days before professional gardeners became so plentiful, and it was looked upon as one of the duties of the female members of the house to see after and tend to the garden. And they naturally, having so much of the work to do themselves, grew plants which gave the best results with the smallest amount of labour, and hence it was that hardy annuals and perennials formed by far the larger portion of the plants grown.

And your old-fashioned gardeners were not content to have a brilliant display for just two or three months in the year, with scarcely a flower to brighten up the garden all the rest of the time. There was hardly a month in the whole twelve that had not some plant blooming; and I hold it to be the duty of all gardeners to try and have a succession of flowers the whole year round, and not a brilliant show for a brief space, like a display of fireworks succeeded by utter darkness, all the more gloomy by contrast to what has been. Of course, except in very favoured situations, it is difficult to have many flowers in mid-winter, but as we shall see later on there is something to be had in flower even then.

I have occasionally—the rarity of the event makes it the more prominent—seen the small patch of ground in front of an old lady's cottage that for wealth of colour and variety of plants would put to shame some gardens near by, where a gardener is always kept at work. And what matters it to me whether the flowers in this cottage ground are old-fashioned, as though that were in itself derogatory, so long as the garden presents rich harmonies and subtle contrasts to the eye? While you are trying to grow some out-of-the-way novelty (as you call it), you are missing the opportunity of making your garden a perfect blaze of flowers. Colour is what I look for in a garden; given that and I am all but satisfied. I care not how it be produced, but I must have colour. Flowers have a wonderful way of harmonising themselves, and what in a picture would be intolerable, is in a garden, perhaps, just as gorgeous. Of course you can greatly help the effect by placing together flowers that harmonise or agreeably contrast with each other. It is one of your duties, as I have said somewhere else, to do the best for your flowers; but still you needn't be frightened at getting too much colour in your garden. If that time should ever come it will be a sure proof that you have obtained the secret of blooming plants, and this is, when all else is said, the grand secret of all gardening. Among old-fashioned flowers may be enumerated the following:—

Butter polyanthus flowers soon after Christmas; primroses and oxlips, double yellow, mauve and crimson, and the old polyanthus "hose in nose" of all colours. Double wallflowers when in bloom make as handsome a bed of flowers as anything a garden can show. While staying this spring in a little country village on the Thames, I was struck with the beautiful rich appearance of a bed of wallflowers (double and single), from pale yellow to deep purple. The great variety of colour in the wallflower is one of its most striking features. Wallflowers are generally raised from seed, but can also be propagated from cuttings.

Dianthus or male pinks are very showy in beds and borders, and as it is a hardy perennial gives little trouble when once established. It flowers from March till late autumn, and is more brilliant at certain times than at others. Raised easily from cuttings in almost any soil, provided cuttings are particularly shaded from the sun. They are very much given to "sporting," that is, sending off varieties different to the parent plant, and some of these sports are very beautiful, and can be perpetuated from cuttings taken from the "sport." Dianthus striatus multiflorus (French) is the best variety.

The biennial Chinese pinks sown broadcast are deserving of attention.

Delphinium belladonna, a lovely sky blue, is the most beautiful of the delphiniums. It can be perpetuated by division or from seed. After throwing up magnificent spikes of flowers in May and June, it can be cut down, and will in the autumn throw up a sheet of short spikes of blooms, a very welcome addition to the garden beauties at this time of the year. It can be planted either in the autumn or spring. There are many varieties of colour, from pale mauve to deep purplish blue, and if planted against a dark background of yew, are most striking in the corners of a garden.

Phlox decussata is the late flowering herbaceous one, and is a valuable autumn plant. It is better to take cuttings from early shoots, as when the root throws up many shoots you can take the surplus ones for striking, as it is never necessary to leave more than three or four stems to a plant.

Phlox suffruticosa is an earlier flowering variety, with a dwarfer habit than the former.

The dwarf white Campanula (C. grandis alba) and persicifolia alba, single and double, and cerulea, single and double, are some of the choicest of the campanulas.

Of the Columbines, Aquilegia chrysantha, with its canary coloured flowers and glaucous, green foliage, is one of the most striking.

A. chrysantha hybrida, with red and yellow flowers; and also a striking one is cerulea grandulosa, with its striking blue and white flowers. These are all hardy perennials.

Lychnis chalcidonica, single and double, is a striking plant growing from three to four feet high, having dense compact foliage, covered with heads of scarlet or crimson flowers.

The sweet-scented bergamot (Monarda didyma) is an old-fashioned hardy perennial, and one distinctly worth growing, if it were for the scent of its foliage alone. It grows about three feet high, and flowers in distinct whorls of a brilliant scarlet colour.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XII.

DURING the Queen's stay in Oxford, the city of learning underwent yet another transformation; it was no longer merely a fortified town, the centre of the war; it reflected for a brief season all the splendour and gaiety of a Court. The numerous Royalist families within its walls took advantage of the emergency which had brought them there, to brush up their best manners and shake out their most presentable clothes, in order to ruffle it, while their wearers might, in the finest company. They were glad to let the younger members of the families especially enjoy the lively change, with all its accompanying advantages, from such quiet halls and retired manor-houses as those in which the sons and daughters of squires were bred. If there were hardships involved in the removal from the roomy family mansions and fair gardens and parks, to be cooped up in Oxford lodgings over tradesmen's shops, there were many compensations in the abundance of gay company, with the crowning grace lent to it by the King and Queen's presence.

Kitty fretted at her separation from her father, at the absence of all news of her brother, and believed truly that she would have preferred her quiet home at Oriel, with the peace and leisure secured in the small family by the simple, thrifty house-keeping of Mrs. Judy, to the crush and bustle at Lady Ottery's, under the present circumstances. But she not only did her best to help her godmother and lessen the difficulties all round, she could not help being carried along with the tide and moved with sympathy. She experienced her share of the keen pleasure of youth in the brilliant stir and the seemingly constant joyous excitement. She knew from her own history that all was not what it looked at the first glance, that there were stings in these earthly joys which nothing save a foretaste of higher happiness and a peace that the world could neither give nor take away would deprive of their poignancy. Kitty was wise for her years, and she had been tried, for had not her Jackie gone forth from his family denounced by his father, and for the time dead to her? Was she not separated indefinitely from her oldest, kindest friends? But she was neither cynic, nor stoic, nor cloistered nun.

Could these be the staid old streets of her native Oxford, in which the most notable passengers were wont to be black gowned professors and scholars? They were now thronged all day, and all night for that matter, with the most exquisite, the most motley company. The nooks and corners resounded with bugles calling soldiers to arms, with the clatter of cavalry and the tramp of foot regiments. Nobles and squires in military buff coats, dames and damsels, each with her attendant, dressed for conquest in every rainbow hue of silk or velvet, with all the accessories of sweeping trains, fluttering feathers, and glittering jewels, formed the strange wayfarers. They stopped continually to greet each other, and awoke the academic echoes with light talk and airy laughter, even when they had not lutes played before them to make sweet sensuous music as they walked.

It was like seeing a play to sit in one of Dame Tabitha's windows nowadays, and watch all that was going on below. There were veritable plays acted also, as if the crowd of occupations and engagements was not enough without them. Real players were brought down from London to help the amateurs to give Shakespeare in one or other of the halls, and as the players strutted about in their quaintly gorgeous dresses, and mingled with the grave and reverend flectors who still held their ground, a fantastic, dreamlike effect was lent to the scene.

"The King dined and supped in public and walked in state in Christ Church Meadows, Merton Gardens, and the Grove of Trinity, which the wits called 'Daphne.'

"A Parliament sat from day to day; service was sung daily in all the chapels; books, both of learning and poetry, were printed in the city; and the distinctions which the colleges had to offer were conferred with pomp on the royal followers, as almost the only rewards the King had to bestow."

Every day the long tables in the common rooms, in place of being surrounded by students, were encompassed by ladies and gentlemen of the rank to command such privileges. The velvet turf of the smoothly shorn bowling greens, which were the pride of the various college gardens, was perpetually studded with animated groups, replacing the old dignified players.

Christ Church Meadows and the Grove of Trinity were the favourite resorts of the brilliant public. The paths by the rivers had their throngs of idle saunterers bandying the gallant compliments in which the ingenious Court poets and wits of the period delighted. Behind all, casting a lurid light on everything, lending it the desperate fascination of a dainty morsel snatched from a wild beast's jaws, like that ghastly vision of the mutilation of Master William Prynne which had haunted little Kitty Dacre in her first realisation of a play before royalty, was the prevailing sense of the danger, strife, and bloodshed outside these charmed walls, with the too probable tragic ending of the drama. In the eloquent words of the author just quoted, many of the actors in this wonderful historical drama "fell fighting on some hardly contested grassy slope, and were buried on the spot, or in the next village churchyard, in the dress in which they played Philastes, or the Court garb in which they had wooed their mistress, or the doctor's gown in which they preached before the King or read Greek in the schools." *

In June Hampden had fallen, in July the Queen had come to Oxford, and in September Charles marched to take the town of Gloucester; but when the Parliamentary garrison were reduced to their last barrel of gunpowder, Essex arrived with his army to their relief. The King was forced to raise the siege, the two armies meeting and fighting an inconclusive battle near Newbury. The battle was inconclusive of victory on either side, but where it raged hottest, Lord Falkland, who had sought the post of danger, charging at the head of his troops, was struck by a musket ball, and fell dead from his horse. He had shown such recklessness of courage, approaching to foolhardiness, that Lord Clarendon felt bound to remonstrate with him, receiving for answer the half-jesting speech that Falkland's office (that of Secretary of War) could not take away the privilege of his age (thirty-four years), and that a Secretary of War must be present at the secret of war. In spite of the jest on his lips, he left the impression that he was a broken-hearted man, unable to see any extrication from the terrible strait in which his love of freedom and justice on the one hand, and his love of the King on the other, had placed him. The conviction was forced upon him that his Royal master and friend would "neither be served nor saved" by the best which men could offer him. Thus he whose yearning for peace was fond and deep died fighting in the thick of the battle.

When the news reached Oxford there was great mourning, and it was said with reason that the King had lost his best friend. Kitty cried bitterly; she thought of Jack, and asked herself whether it would be his turn next. She recalled her father's happy visit to Great Tew, and how he had extolled its young master; he was so noble, so good, so gifted, so gracious. She remembered how proud she had been when she was presented to him at his request the day he met her with her father. And now it was all over here—his high and generous aspirations, his wistful loyalty to his King, his just, gentle rule over his dependents, his brotherly regard for scholars, his tender family affections, his devotion to his Church, his reverence for his God. He was but thirty-four, and he died fighting—he who so loved peace—in the flower and glory of his manhood. In Great Tew to-day there was nothing save lamentation, mourning, and woe, where his widowed wife, fatherless children, and bereft household wept and bemoaned him who would never more return to make their hearts glad. All over here, Kitty—but what of there, where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest, where the King in His beauty says "Well done" to his good and faithful servant?

Nothing but lamentation, mourning, and woe in Great Tew? That cannot be, when the woman he honoured with his love reminds his children what a man their father was, how he has been spared many a sickening care and torturing pang, and has gone forth early to receive his reward, and to meet and welcome them when they were permitted to repair to the heavenly habitations.

As it was on Hampden's death, Falkland's was felt as a great national loss. He had belonged, in a sense, to both of the contending parties, and had been regarded by all the finer spirits on either side with the highest respect and the most cordial esteem.

Kitty got a letter from Prissy Walton, the first she had received since the announcement that her cousin had plighted her troth to Colonel Windebank.

"I cannot refrain from writing on this great misfortune to all," were Prissy's words. "I think my uncle would not find fault if he did but know how sorely Anthony feeleth it. Colonel Windebank is not more cast down and disconsolate, though he hath served, and hoped to have the honour of serving again, under my Lord Falkland. He was a man whose like we shall ne'er see again, Anthony says; and we go about singing his praises, and abusing this unnatural war, which hath already cost us so dear. But that is not right neither, for it is bound to have its purpose in God's great economy, and mayhap such a man as Falkland had not lived and shone out so clear, like a guiding star among his fellows, save in troublous times.

"'Lycidas is dead—dead ere his prime;

Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer.'

Dear heart, I cannot tell at this present whether I ever read to thee Master John Milton's poem of 'Lycidas.' I know that my uncle Dacre doth not approve of his polemical writings, and holds him in despite because of them. But, sure, no scholar or man of taste but would delight in 'Lycidas,' and none who did have faith in immortality but would be ravished by its glorious end. I am advised by sister Alice that though I have read more than once to you in happier days Colonel Windebank's favourite sonnet, 'To a Virtuous Young Lady,' beginning you remember—

'Lady, that in the prime of earliest youth

Wisely hast shunned the broad way and the green,'

she doth not recall that I ever made you acquaint with 'Lycidas.' I will adventure the copying out of its close from a fair copy I possess of the whole poem. I cannot think so ill of my dear uncle as to conceive he will take any exception to it. I have only to add that the dear friend Master Milton bewaileth did not fall in battle, but was, as I understand, accidentally drowned in the passage between Chester and Ireland.

'Weep no more, woeful shepherds, weep no more,

For Lycidas, your sorrow, is not dead, Sunk though he be beneath the wat'ry floor,

So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed, And yet anon repairs his drooping head,

And tricks his beams, and with new spangled ore

Flames in the forehead of the morning sky;

So Lycidas sank low, but mounted high,

Through the dear might of Him that walked the waves;

Where, other groves and other streams along,

With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves,

And hears the unexpressive nuptial song

In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love,

There entertain him all the saints above

In solemn troops and sweet societies, That sing, and singing, in their glory move

And wipe the tears for ever from his eyes.

Now, Lycidas, the shepherds weep no more;

Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore

In thy large recompense, and shalt be good

To all that wander in that perilous flood.' "

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A. O. M.—The quotation which you make—

"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever;

Its loveliness increases; it will never

is from Endymion, by John Keats (1795 to 1821).

HEARTSEASE.—Your idea of forming an Invalids' Mutual Help Society is a good one. But you give no address, and thus no one can communicate with you as to your rules and any assistance they could render in your undertaking. Of course, we could not publish the long list you have sent to us. You might, perhaps, procure old volumes of the "G.O.P." from the Society for the Dissemination of Pure Literature, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

MISERABLE BESSIE.—From all you tell us we can only feel assured that you are one of God's children, and that the "wicked thoughts" which grieve you so much, and which you strive to banish and pray against, are only suggestions of the Evil One, designed to make you miserable. When they come take up the Bible and read a little, or a hymn book, and sing a hymn if you can. There are many very suitable to your case. So long as you pray and strive against these thoughts the Blessed Redeemer will not hold you responsible for them. But you must rely on His strength in your weakness and temptations, and remember that while we are so faulty in ourselves we are accounted "complete in Him."

MOOLOOMOLOO (Is she a chimpanzee?) will not find "Cleanliness is next to godliness" in the Bible.

John Wesley quotes the phrase or proverbial saying in his sermon, No. xcii., on the subject of dress; but it is probably taken from a statement of Bacon's, who says "Cleanliness of body was ever esteemed to proceed from a due reverence of God." (See his "Advancement of Learning.") This statement is in harmony with the laws of Moses, and is confirmed under the Christian dispensation; see Hebrews x. 22.

LOVER OF FAIR PLAY.—We sympathise with you and your daughter in her failure to obtain a prize at the competitions, to which you refer with natural motherly regret. But "fair play" must be extended to hundreds of other competitors, and only a few of the super-excellent amongst scores of good compositions can ever be awarded a prize. Your "not believing that any were given," that you "advise your daughter never to try for any more competitions, nor take in the 'G.O.P.' any more," are statements little to your credit as the adviser and trainer of your daughter. We regret that we are unable to return you the stamped envelope, which you say we ought to do, as you give no address.

DOSSIE.—Elocution classes are held at the Birkbeck Institution, Crystal Palace School of Art, and Miss Forsyth's Technical School.

R. A. D.—We thank you for so warm an expression of approval of our paper, evidenced in the verses you send us.

SHELT.—Marriage is so completely a personal question that advice must be given and taken with the utmost caution. You are, however, twenty-eight, and should have some experience to guide you as to what qualities would make you happy in your married life. Does the man who now addresses you possess them? You must look at the subject in this light, and you will soon arrive at a conclusion. Charlotte Brontë (Mrs. Nicholls) died May, 1855. Her father survived her about six years, dying in 1861, at the advanced age of eighty-four years.

BROOK, MAUD STONE, FANNY.—We will answer all three letters. The 10th March, 1872, was a Sunday. We should think that your mother needs better and more experienced advice as to diet, etc., and perhaps some foreign baths. At Dresden there is a school called the Pädagogischer Verein, in Johannes Strasse.

DAME CARRUTHERS.—George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the friend of Charles II., died April, 1688, and with him became extinct the ancient family of Villiers. The modern Dukes of Buckingham, which title has just become extinct again in the male line, are Grenvilles.

IBEX's poem shows some imaginative power, and is creditable to her in many ways. But we cannot say whether she will turn out a "poet-laureate" or not, judging from it.

MONKEY must put "s" apostrophe after the word James. The first question we do not understand.

Jessica.—Certainly, being a girl, our competitions are open to you. What you named is no impediment. We are sorry to hear of your troubles of the nerves; they are only too common.

D. D. L.—You can only become a good reader aloud by practice and great attention to what you are reading, so as to give point and emphasis in the proper places. We do not think you would require lessons in the art.

A TROUBLED HEART.—Your letter has shocked us. How came you to "engage yourself" (at least in intention, for it is not valid) to a man without your parents' consent? And what sort of a man is this "cousin" who dares to tempt a minor out of her parents' house, and knowingly against their permission? He must be a scamp, and no less so an ignoramus, not to be aware that the act is illegal, and he would have to pay the penalties which the law would enforce. Your marriage as a minor under such circumstances would not be legal. If your mother did "marry at eighteen" it does not follow that it was against her parents' consent. We regret that we can give you no comfort, as in "engaging" yourself against your parents' will you broke the fourth commandment; "and the way of transgressors is hard!" Submit yourself to them, and you will be on "the way of righteousness," always found to be "paths of peace."

E. W. N.—You are confounding two things. The soul passes away from the body at death to the place appointed for it; but the resurrection of the body, in a changed and glorified condition (for the children of God) does not take place till "the last day." Then will come the reunion of soul and body; "and we shall be changed." Do not feel distressed nor anxious: trust your Heavenly Master.

ETHEL.—Send us your address, and let us know what price you set on these second-hand volumes of the "G.O.P.," and perhaps we can meet your wishes in the disposal of them. (Vols. for 1831, 1832, 1833, and 1835.)

MRS. CRUK.—We are again indebted to you for the information you give on interesting trees and plants. We quote for the benefit of the readers of our answer respecting the Eastern mustard tree. "The Syrian 'cabbage tree'—the seeds of which were so small they appeared like dust, though found on examination to be round and perfect in form, the most remarkable fact connected with this seed being that, having been sown a few weeks, they spring up into trees some six feet or more in height, with branches in which birds might roost." The cabbage tree grows in Palestine by the waysides; the branches are large, and they bear pretty bunches of yellow flowers. Our correspondent inquires whether this tree with the wonderfully minute seed might not be the tree to which our Lord referred, and which was called (by our translators) the "mustard" tree.

MARY B.—There is no difficulty in disposing of cards and pictures of all kinds in a benevolent way. An appeal has been made on behalf of some Indian Military Hospital, and rolls or parcels of these (repaid) might be addressed to "The Brigade Surgeon, Station Hospital, Rawalpindi, Punjab, India." The sick soldiers would receive them gratefully, as they would divert their minds in making screens, fans, scrap-books, etc., during the weary hours of pain and enforced idleness. Illustrated papers would also prove a boon to them.

GEORGE and BESSIE.—For the pamphlet giving particulars respecting the Snowdrop Bands Society, write to Mrs. A. T. Watson, Southwold, Tipton Crescent, Sheffield. We are not aware that any subscription is essential for membership.

A BEAUTIFUL OLD LADY.

IN August, 1886, there passed away an old French lady whom we have called beautiful, for there is the beauty of old age as well as the beauty of youth. Everyone in Versailles, and many people in Paris, knew the venerable Madame André Walther, who when eighty years old, and her hair silvered with age, had still a countenance beaming with intelligence and goodness, and seemed to bear her cheerfulness and buoyancy of spirit to the end. But it was the beauty of her disposition and character that made her most loved and best known, and many of our young readers may like to hear something about one who will be long remembered in her own country, although her name may be known to few in England.

Madame André Walther was born on the 14th of June, 1807. She was the daughter of Count Walther, General of Division in the French Army, and Commandant of the Great Napoleon's Imperial Guard. She was god-daughter of the Emperor and of the Empress Josephine, after whom she was partly named. Her full designation in the baptismal register was Henriette Joséphine Napoléone Frédérique Walther. At the age of eighteen she was married to M. J. André, Receiver-General of Revenue at Tours, a man of good reputation and of great wealth. Rich, beautiful, and highly accomplished, Madame André was universally admired; and in society she had the prospect of a career as brilliant as any woman of the world could desire. But all this worldly pleasure and splendour did not satisfy her heart. Her own sound sense and good feeling made her feel sad amidst the amusements of "Vanity Fair." Her wealth and position seemed to require her presence in public assemblies, although she had no pleasure in the frivolous gaieties of the fashionable world.

While in this frame of mind she made the acquaintance of a well-known and much-respected Christian minister, Pastor L. Meyer. At the very first interview she felt that she had found a wise and kind counsellor, and it proved the turning-point of her life. What were her spiritual movements and experiences are not recorded, but the result was soon evident. She sought and found peace and joy in religion. She gave her heart entirely to God, and resolved to consecrate her life to helping the cause of her Redeemer. All the time not required for the duties of her home and her family she devoted to works of piety and beneficence. She did this without retiring from her position in society, and without taking upon herself any of the vows and rules of religious life as others of similar devotedness have often done. She lived in the world, yet was not of the world. And all who came in contact with her—Catholics and Protestants, even sceptics and unbelievers—recognised the influence of her beneficence, which in her was the influence of the Spirit of God.

We are not giving her biography, but only wish to refer to one part of her later life, when her name was widely known and honoured. In her widowhood she lived in a charming residence, Les Ombrages, not far from the magnificent palace and gardens of Versailles. At the time when the Communists had possession of Paris, and the French Government had its headquarters at Versailles, that old "Court suburb" presented a scene of busy and anxious excitement. The whole countryside was disturbed by the events of war, and for a time was overcast with the gloom of trouble and anxiety. But in the darkest time there was one spot on which the light of heaven seemed always to shine, and where the peace of heaven appeared always to abide. This was Madame André Walther's home, Les Ombrages. It was like a rural "city of refuge," or one of those sanctuaries during the Middle Ages which were respected by the most turbulent spirits, even during times of revolution and war. To this refuge the municipality of Versailles, the prefects of police, the railway station-masters, the generals and staff of the army—all were in the habit of directing the homeless and the helpless.

Every spare room in the château, the green-houses and tool sheds in the garden, the stables and outhouses, every place that afforded shelter, was crowded with bands of fugitives and the houseless poor, till one day a miserable outcast was heard to say "There is no more room!"

The most remarkable fact of that Versailles time has yet to be mentioned. There are many who have hearts as kind as Madame André, but who have not the means that were at her command for deeds of charity. The singular feature in her position at that time was, that while every part of the place was crowded with the poor recipients of her hospitality, each night she received in her salon statesmen, ambassadors, cabinet ministers, deputies, generals, and notables of all degrees, civil and military. Outwardly the scene resembled the salons of Parisian dames of high degree, where rank and fashion, art and literature and talent, are brought together mainly for display and ostentation. There was a loftier tone pervading the assemblies at Les Ombrages. No one who was present will ever forget the impression on the evening when Paris was in flames, and the sky was lurid with the light from the burning of the Tuileries and other public buildings. Madame André had a son at the front with the army that night, yet the mother appeared to her guests as calm and dignified as ever, and thrilled the audience by intoning, with her clear musical voice, a prayer and hymn to the Almighty, to save the poor people whose crimes had justly exposed them to Divine judgments. On leaving the house to return to Versailles one of the visitors said to his companion, "She is the youngest of us all."

Though old in years she was young in heart, because she renewed her youth at the source of eternal life. Till her death she manifested an ever-ripening beauty of character and fruitfulness in good deeds. No wonder that the following tribute was paid to her memory in the obituary notice in one of the leading Catholic journals: "This soul was influenced by two powerful passions—faith and goodness. Her faith was truly Christian, above all sects and all controversies. Her goodness was bright and sunny, and shone everywhere and on all alike. Stern as regards sin, she was pitiful towards the sinner, and no one better knew how to comfort the mourner, and to cheer the broken-hearted, as well as to relieve the indigent. This goodness was not the result of mere feminine sensibility. Her mind was of lofty, masculine tone. The most tragic events, the calamities of war, the horrors of revolution, did not disturb her calm and resolute courage."

This was a remarkable testimony, but the truth of it was felt by all who knew Madame André. Her friend, M. Reveillaud, the editor of the Signal, the leading Protestant journal, who took up his residence at Versailles to be near her, could not have expressed the truth about her more forcibly. In her courage and dignity, and in the air of command in her manner, one could see the daughter of the old chief of the Imperial Guard. But this air of authority was tempered by gentleness and goodness, the fruit of Christian humility.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK MAKES ENTREES.

DINNERS are so much later in many houses than they were formerly, that a somewhat lighter meal than was customarily served is found more beneficial. The housekeeper must therefore give more attention to entrées or made dishes. I know many persons who dine late would prefer a chicken soufflé, followed by a well-cooked cutlet, or some other little dish, to a joint, but for these little dinners great variety is required, as people tire sooner of any particular dish or sauce than they do of quite plain dishes. Amongst the recipes for cooking beef, mutton, poultry, game, etc., there are many dishes that are suitable to serve as entrées.

Cutlets are so useful as additions to dinners that I have selected a good many recipes for their preparation. Some people are unaware what nice ones may be cut from an underdone leg of roast or boiled mutton. Slices should be cut of even thickness, then shaped to look like short neck chops (the trimmings make a mince or rissoles). They are cooked in any way wished, but are best egged and crumbed and served with a good sauce or purée. In a small family, where hashes are not liked, this is a good way of using up some of the cold meat.

Côtelettes de Mouton Grillées (broiled mutton cutlets).—Take a piece of the best end of neck of mutton, chine it, and take off the tops of the ribs, remove the skin, divide into cutlets, trim some of the fat off, and leave a small piece of the top of each bone bare. Beat them with a steak beater or rolling-pin, but do not make them too flat; sprinkle a little salt on each, dip them in oil or oiled butter, then in bread-crumbs, and broil for eight or ten minutes over a clear fire, turning them as they cook. When done, slip a cutlet frill on the bone of each, and serve with any kind of sauce or garniture that is preferred. Cutlets simply broiled without the bread-crumbs are served on purées of chestnuts, potatoes, haricot beans, or any other vegetables or à la jardinière, that is to say with mixed vegetables stewed with butter and gravy. Some cooks brush cutlets over with glaze before serving to improve their appearance.

Côtelettes de Mouton Sautées.—Cut and trim the cutlets as above, warm some butter in a stewpan, arrange the cutlets in it, and cook them seven or eight minutes over a clear fire, turning them as they cook. When they feel firm pour four tablespoonfuls of good gravy over them, reduce this to a glaze, drain the cutlets, put frills on them and serve, or they are merely cooked in the butter, then frilled and served.

Cutlets à la Soubise.—Prepare as above, serve them in a circle with a neatly-shaped piece of fried bread between each, pour into the middle a white purée of onions.

Côtelettes à la Financière.—Cook as above, but with financière ragout (see article on Forcemeats, etc.) in the middle.

Côtelettes aux Laitues (with lettuces).—Same cooking as above, but in the place of the fried bread put small lettuces, stewed in gravy, between the cutlets (one for each), and sauce espagnole in the centre.

Côtelettes à la Chicorée (with endive).—Like cutlets à la soubise, but a purée of endive instead of onions in the middle. Purée with cream is generally used for this.

Côtelettes à la Bretonne.—Trim some cutlets, season them with pepper and salt, dip in beaten up egg, and crumb them; fry for ten or twelve minutes in butter, turning them. Prepare some onions separately thus: Chop them very finely, then cook in a little gravy; when they are done stir in the yolks of two eggs, to which a tablespoonful of cream has been added. When the cutlets are a nice colour drain them, and arrange in a circle on a dish with the minced onion in the centre.

Côtelettes à la Provençale.—Prepare a well seasoned and sufficiently thick mince of onions, as for "à la bretonne," and let it get cold. Trim eight mutton cutlets, season, and dip them in butter; broil them on one side; put them on a dish, and cover the cooked side with a layer of the minced onion, sprinkle fine breadcrumbs over them, and brush over lightly with oiled butter; make some butter hot in a stewpan or baking tin, and place the cutlets in, uncooked side down; finish cooking them over a quick fire or in a hot oven, let the upper surface brown; if cooked in a stewpan, brown with a salamander. Send to table with a tureen of good brown gravy.

Cutlets à l'Estragon (tarragon).—Prepare seven or eight cutlets, season, dip in oil, and broil over a clear fire. Meanwhile put a cupful of good clear gravy in a stewpan with a small bunch of tarragon, cover the stewpan, simmer a minute or two, then take out the tarragon, put in a good pinch of finely chopped fresh tarragon leaves, arrange the cutlets on a very hot dish, pour the sauce over, and serve.

Côtelettes d'Agneau à la Purée de Champignons (lamb cutlets with mushrooms).—Trim a dozen lamb cutlets in the same way as mutton, cook them in a stewpan with butter, turning as they cook. When done drain the butter from them, and add two or three tablespoonfuls of good glaze (melted); let the moisture evaporate, so that the cutlets may be glazed. Make a flat topped ring of mashed potatoes, stand the cutlets up in a circle on it, slip a frill on the top of the bone of each, put a purée of mushrooms in the middle of the potato ring, and arrange mushroom heads cooked in butter round the outside. In France veal cutlets are cut from the neck the same as mutton cutlets (the veal is generally much smaller than ours), not from the fillet as with us.

Côtelettes de Veau Grillées (veal cutlets).—Put the cutlets in a marinade of hot butter, chopped parsley, scallion, mushrooms, shalot, pepper, and salt. Turn and leave them ten minutes in this, sprinkle with breadcrumbs, and put them on a gridiron over a gentle fire. When done put the remainder of the marinade over them, and serve alone, or with gravy with a little lemon juice in it.

Côtelettes à la Lyonnaise.—Lard the cutlets with bacon, gherkins, and fillets of anchovies, put them for an hour and a half in a marinade of oil, chopped shalots, parsley, sweet herbs, pepper, and salt, then wrap them in thin slices of bacon fat, and cook them in a stewpan in the marinade. Put a lump of butter in a small saucepan with some chopped shalots, parsley, and a little flour; stir for a minute or two. Skim the marinade in which the cutlets were cooked, and add it to the butter and flour with two or three tablespoonfuls of brown gravy. Stir, boil for a minute, finish with a little lemon juice or a few drops of vinegar, pour over the cutlets, and serve.

Côtelettes au Vert Prê.—Take some veal cutlets, shape and trim them nicely; put some butter in a stewpan with a small bunch of herbs and parsley; put in the cutlets and cook them over a brisk fire; when they are hot shake a little potato or ordinary flour over them, moisten with a little light white wine or water; add salt, nutmeg, and pepper, cover the stewpan and finish cooking over a slow fire; when done take out the cutlets, stir the sauce a minute or two. Take a handful of fresh chervil, while the cutlets are cooking, blanch it, and chop it finely; throw this into the sauce to make it green (do not cook it); add a little lemon juice or a few drops of vinegar, and serve at once over the cutlets.

Côtelettes de Veau Piquées.—Trim half-a-dozen cutlets, lard them on one side with fine pieces of bacon; put them in a stewpan, of which the bottom is covered with finely-chopped carrots and onions; sprinkle with salt, and pour a little oiled butter over them; add a small quantity of broth; let it reduce to glaze; add the same quantity of broth again, and a second time reduce to glaze, then moisten with more broth (but not to cover the cutlets), and let them finish cooking over a gentle fire, basting often as they cook with their gravy. When done they should be a good brown; strain and skim the gravy, and serve it with the cutlets. A purée of sorrel, endive, or potatoes, or tomato sauce is served at the same time.

Côtelettes de Veau, Braisées à la Périgieuse.—Cut the cutlets half as thick again as usual, lard them with square-cut strips of raw truffles, cover the bottom of a flat stewpan with bacon and chopped vegetables; place the cutlets on these side by side, moisten with broth until they are partly immersed, put over the fire, reduce the gravy to half the quantity, cover the cutlets with buttered paper, draw the stewpan a little to the side of the fire, let them simmer until they are done, adding a few spoonfuls of broth now and then as needed; when done drain them. Have ready on a dish a ring of forcemeat that has been poached; in the centre of this put a piece of bread that has been cut into shape (an oval block to stand a little higher than the forcemeat does, if nothing more ornamental can be attempted) and fried a nice light brown; garnish this with small cooked truffles, and arrange the cutlets round on the forcemeat. Chop and put the trimmings of the truffles in a stewpan, with the strained and skimmed gravy from the cutlets; add a little thick brown gravy, put some of this (after giving it a few minutes' boiling) round the forcemeat; send the rest to table in a sauce tureen.

Pork Cutlets are prepared like mutton, either cooked plain or with breadcrumbs, served with sauce. Robert or poivrade cutlets of all kinds are beaten before being cooked, and their appearance depends much on the neat and uniform way in which they are trimmed.

Ris de Veau à la Parisienne (calf's sweetbread à la Parisienne).—Put four sweetbreads in warm water, and boil them from fifteen to twenty minutes; dip them in cold water, drain, and let them get cold with a plate on the top; then trim and wipe them. Lard two of the sweetbreads with fine pieces of bacon; cut some truffles as if for larding, point one end of each piece, put the pieces of truffle, point down, into the other sweetbreads as if they were nails, so as to make some sort of pattern, say one nail in the middle and a circle round; then put them all in a stewpan on vegetables (to braise), sprinkle a very little salt in, add good broth, enough to three parts cover them, and place a buttered paper over the top; let the gravy reduce one-third; then finish cooking with hot embers on the saucepan lid, so as to brown the tops of the sweetbreads. Meanwhile take a flat-topped border mould, butter it, and ornament the inside with pieces of truffles, then fill it with veal forcemeat, and poach in the bain marie or a stewpan. When the sweetbreads are ready, turn the border on to a dish, put a block of fried bread to stand rather higher than the border in the middle of the dish; fill in the space between that and the forcemeat with chopped mushrooms and truffles that have been cooked in the braise or in butter; arrange the four sweetbreads on the border, supporting the four ends on the block of fried bread; put a small truffle and two or three mushroom heads at each corner between the sweetbreads; skim and strain the gravy, which should be brown and of a good consistency, put a little of it in the dish round the forcemeat, and send the remainder to table in a tureen. Put a truffle and a blanched cock's-comb on a short ornamental skewer, and stick it straight up in the bread in the centre of the dish.

Ris de Veau à la Financière.—Prepare as above, but lard all the sweetbreads with bacon only; braise them in the same way, glaze and serve with a financière garniture. (See article on Forcemeats, &c.)

Ris à la Marengo (sweetbreads à la Marengo).—Boil the sweetbreads for ten minutes, throw them in cold water, then drain and cut in slices; cook them in olive oil, with salt, pepper, and nutmeg; leave at the side of the stove for about twenty minutes, put a little oiled butter over them, add mushrooms, truffles, chopped parsley, a little good sauce espagnole, and a tablespoonful of tomato sauce; serve very hot. For this and other dishes, when the sweetbreads are cut up for the sake of economy, lambs' breads are often substituted for calves'.

Croquettes de Ris de Veau.—Take remains of cooked sweetbreads, cut them in small dice, add half their weight of lean ham or of tongue, and the same of mushrooms; cut up like the sweetbreads; stir in some hot, well-reduced thick béchamel sauce; let the mixture get cold, then form into croquettes, egg and crumb them, and cook in boiling fat.

Vol-au-Vents are made with pâte feuilletée, and are filled after they are baked, just before being sent to table. A ragout à la financière; sweetbreads and mushrooms with espagnole sauce; fricassée of chicken cut in small pieces and without bones, with mushrooms, truffles, or poached quenelles of godiveau, are all used for vol-au-vents; also cod that has been boiled is broken into flakes, warmed in a little good béchamel sauce, with a small piece of butter and a little nutmeg. This makes a very nice dish; it is served as a "vol-au-vent de morue à la crème."

Tournedos Sauce Piquante.—Cut six or seven thin slices from a fillet of beef, beat them slightly, trim them into oval shapes; season with pepper and salt, sprinkle a little boiled vinegar over them; leave three or four hours, then drain and wipe. Put a little butter and a tablespoonful of olive oil in a stewpan; put in the slices of beef, cook them over a quick fire, turning as they cook; when done (without being dried) drain, and serve with piquante sauce over them.

Soufflé de Foie de Veau (soufflé of calf's liver).—Cut the third of a calf's liver in slices; put some chopped bacon in a stewpan over the fire for a few minutes, then put in the liver; cook it quickly, season with pepper and salt, add the trimmings from some truffles and a pinch of thyme; when done let it get cold, then pound in a mortar. Take about one-fifth the quantity of bread panade that there is liver, and pound it with a lump of butter; when mixed add the pounded liver little by little; rub the whole through a sieve, mix with it four or five tablespoonfuls of well-seasoned gravy, and add six yolks of eggs, one at a time, then stir in the well-beaten whites of four eggs; put at once in a buttered soufflé dish, bake twenty-five minutes in a moderate oven, and serve immediately.

Soufflé de Volaille (chicken soufflé).—Take the meat of roast or boiled fowl (hot or cold) without skin, bones, or sinews, chop, and pound it with a little béchamel sauce, but not enough to make the purée thin; season if necessary; add the yolks of five eggs, beat the five whites to a stiff froth, stir them lightly into the mixture; put into a buttered soufflé dish, bake in a moderate oven for twenty-five or thirty minutes, and serve directly it is done.

Langue Rotie (roast tongue).—Take an ox or calf's tongue (unsalted), boil it gently in rather fat stock until half done, then skin; lard, and wrap it in sheep's or lamb's caul; roast before a good fire; when done serve with thick brown gravy or with sauce piquante.

Calf's Heart Eroiled.—Cleanse and wipe the heart, broil it over a quick fire, turning it without sticking a fork in it. Have ready some butter into which pepper, salt, and chopped parsley have been worked; when the heart is done put the butter in it, squeeze the juice of a lemon over the outside, and serve.

Cervelle de Veau au Beurre Noir (calf's brains with black butter).—Skin and remove the large fibres, then soak the brains in cold or tepid water, to get all the blood from them; when clean throw them into a saucepan of boiling water, with a little salt and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar; leave them for five minutes, then take them out and put for ten minutes in cold water, then back into the saucepan with the vinegar and water; add a bunch of herbs, parsley, a large onion cut in slices, and a small lump of butter; boil for half an hour, drain, and serve with fried parsley and "beurre noir" over them.

Cervelles de Veau à la Poulette.—Skin, blanch, and scald the brains as above. Put a lump of butter in a stewpan, stir in a little flour and a cup of water, add salt, pepper, and some small onions; when the onions are tender put the brains in and let them boil twenty-five to thirty minutes, then add a thickening of yolks of eggs; do not boil again; finish with a few drops of vinegar or lemon juice, and serve.

Pieds d'Agneau à la Poulette (lambs' feet).—Put a piece of beef dripping in a stewpan with half a glass of water; when the fat has melted add a spoonful of flour, some hot water, two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, salt, onions, sweet herbs, parsley, and a carrot; put the feet in, let them cook for five or six hours, until the bones are loose, remove the large bones and drain the feet. Melt a lump of butter in a stewpan, and add two finely-chopped shalots and a tablespoonful of flour; stir a minute to cook, but do not let it colour, add a little of the broth (skimmed and strained) in which the feet were boiled, and a little water and some fried parsley; boil a few minutes, put in the feet, simmer five minutes, thicken with two or three yolks of eggs, according to quantity; finish with a few drops of vinegar or a little lemon juice.

COLD ENTREES.

Chaufroix of game are favourite cold entrées. They are prepared by dipping fillets of cold roast partridge, pheasant, or whatever game is to be used, in a sauce made with two parts "sauce brune" and one part melted aspic jelly, allowing the sauce to set on the fillets, and then arranging them on a dish with chopped jelly, truffles, etc. The arrangement is the difficulty; the fillets should all be stood up and fixed with jelly. Quails and some small birds are boned before they are cooked, then dipped in chaufroix sauce and arranged with jelly, etc. It is much easier for an inexperienced person to make a pretty dish with small birds.

Pain de Lièvre.—Take the meat of the legs and shoulders of an uncooked hare, and the same weight of bacon, chop and pound together; then add half their weight of bread panade, season with salt and spice, rub the whole through a sieve. Scald a quarter of a pound of bacon fat, cut it in dice, and add it; stir in the yolks of three eggs. Butter a plain mould or tin; put the meat in it, cover the top with bacon, and steam it in a little water for from three-quarters of an hour to an hour, according to size; turn it on to a dish, and glaze it with a brush; serve with jelly round. This "pain" is also very good served hot with a rich gravy.

Pain de Lièvre à la Gelée.—Chop and pound some hare that has been cooked, add half its weight of poultry livers, also cooked and pounded, season, rub through a sieve. Put in a stewpan with a third its volume of aspic jelly and strong brown sauce warmed together; stir over the fire a few minutes. Let it get nearly cold, then work in a quarter of a pound of butter in small pieces; stir till the butter is quite melted, then put in a mould with a hollow centre and stand on ice; when set, dip the mould in warm water, turn the "pain" out, fill the centre with chopped aspic, and decorate the base with cut jelly, etc.

Pain de Foie de Veau à la Gelée.—Cut two pounds of calf's liver in very thin slices, cook it in a stewpan with some chopped bacon, add salt, spice, and sweet herbs; when it is cooked add a small spoonful of lemon juice, leave a few seconds, then take from the fire; let the liver get cold, pound and pass it through a sieve, put it in a basin, work it with a spoon, adding gradually one-third of a pint of good "sauce brune," then half-a-pint or rather more of good strong jelly, melted, but not warm; stand the basin on ice until the jelly begins to set, then stir into it four tablespoonfuls of cooked pickled tongue, and the same quantity of cooked truffles, both cut in dice. Put all into a plain mould with hollow centre, and stand in ice; when it is set dip the mould quickly in hot water, dry it, and turn the "pain" on to a dish, go over it lightly with a brush with some jelly that is half set, and decorate it with rounds and crescents of truffles, which the jelly will cause to adhere to the sides. Round the base put neatly-cut pieces of jelly.

Pain de Volaille à l'Estragon.—Stand a plain mould in ice, put a little liquid aspic jelly into it, and move it so that the whole of the inside is incrustated with a layer of jelly. Put half a pound of cold chicken that has been pounded and passed through a sieve into a basin, moisten with a tablespoonful of oil and a quarter of a pint of cold velouté sauce; mix, add half a pint of aspic jelly (liquid, but not warm), stand on ice and stir; as soon as it begins to set, remove it, stir in two tablespoonfuls of tarragon vinegar and some pickled gherkins; cut in small square pieces, put the whole into the mould previously coated with jelly; put it on ice for an hour, dip quickly in hot water and turn out; decorate to fancy with chopped jelly, etc.

Aspic de Volaille (aspic of fowl).—Put a little aspic in a mould, stand it in ice, and turn it about until the inside is coated with jelly, then make a design on it with hard-boiled eggs, bits of truffle, tongue, small leaves of tarragon, chervil or parsley; set this with jelly; when firm arrange small pieces of the white meat of cold fowl, bits of cooked truffle and of tongue, in the mould; add some jelly, then let it set, then more fowl, jelly, etc., in layers, until the mould is full. Turn out after dipping the mould in hot water and serve with chopped jelly round.

Aspic Jelly is made with calves' feet, veal and ham, etc., but the following answers very well as a less expensive preparation: Two pounds of stock veal, six ounces of lean ham, one onion, one carrot, a bunch of parsley, sweet herbs, a bayleaf, piece of lemon peel, a few whole white peppercorns, very little salt, and three quarts of water, well boiled and skimmed as it boils, stewed down to about three pints, then strained through a sieve; when quite cold the fat and sediment must be removed, and one ounce, or more or less (depending on the consistency it is already), of gelatine that has been soaked some hours with water must be added; it is then cleared in the usual way with whites of eggs or raw meat, and a little tarragon vinegar is added. Aspic is needed much firmer for some purposes than others, and a good deal more gelatine must be used in summer than in winter, unless the dishes are kept in ice until they are served.

Salade de Poulet à l'Ancienne (chicken salad).—Take a cold fowl, remove the skin and bones, and cut the meat in small pieces; season with pepper, salt, and a little oil and vinegar; sprinkle with a pinch of chopped tarragon leaves. Prepare a mayonnaise with the yolks of three eggs, and rather more than one-third of a pint of oil, mix with it a few spoonfuls of good savoury or aspic jelly, cold, but liquid; place a pyramid-shaped plain mould in ice, fill it with layers of chicken and of mayonnaise, with here and there capers, cut gherkins, and stoned olives. When set, turn it out; if necessary smooth the outside with the blade of a knife, decorate it with fillets of anchovies, capers, and cut gherkins; put the heart of a small cabbage lettuce on the top with stoned olives round; put small hearts of lettuces round the bottom, then stand quarters of hard-boiled eggs that have been first dipped in half-set jelly close together all round to finish it; stand the dish on ice a little while, and serve.

Ice may be dispensed with in making most dishes, if time is allowed for the jelly to set before it is wanted; but this salad cannot be made without it.

"Pain" (as they are called) and "aspics" are often made in small dariole moulds, and look very well if tastefully arranged; they are pretty for luncheon or supper dishes. All cold entrées are suitable for supper tables.

ETHELWYND A.

By IDA J. LEMON.

CHAPTER I.

MISS HILDRED was grown up. Our mode of life had changed as she grew older, our occupations had varied with her years. There had been a time when we were her inseparable companions, and our life then had not been all joy; then came the period of feasts, which was just before she went to school and began to learn French, feasts which she cooked, distributed to us on little china plates and consumed herself, though once she had placed a seductive fragment of cake and treacle on Charles' mouth, and let it remain there throughout the meal for a pretence that he was eating it. It spoilt his looks, and he bears the mark of that meal to this day. Then she used to give us lessons, making us change places in class, as she did when she first went to school; and later on her favourite game had been to make us pay visits to one another. Then she left us alone for a while, and we lay undisturbed in the cupboard like ordinary toys instead of dolls, feeling very much neglected, knowing that she had become too old to play with us, and cared much more for her violin and her books and her friends.

But at last, one day, when her hair had been done up some time and she had become accustomed to long dresses, she opened the cupboard door, and, sitting on the floor, pulled us out one by one.

"I promised to send some things to the children's hospital," said she, "and it will be a good opportunity for turning out this cupboard. What a lot of rubbish there is in here!" And she picked out of the débris some pieces of the old china tea set, which we had had make-believe parties with, a ball, dusty but unharmed, several children's books, and a German butcher's shop, with a leg of mutton still hanging to the only hook left over the door. The butcher himself was found with the chopper in his hand, but in a headless state (as if, in despair at the depression in trade, he had committed suicide by execution), in a box of dominoes, which, together with a battered money-box, where I remember she used to keep her farthings, and which had been wrenched open one day when she was particularly impecunious, was firmly established on the top of us.

Then she pulled me out and surveyed me with recognition, and ended by putting her red lips for a moment on my crumpled hair.

"Dear old Ethelwynda," she said, "what good times we have had together! You're a little bit crushed, my dear, but you look as young as ever. Why, I believe I love you still, you sweet creature. I'll keep you." And pulling my dress straight, and smoothing my hair with her fingers—they were much softer than they used to be—she laid me in her lap, and leaning forward pulled Charles and Gwen out of the cupboard too, laughing.

"I really think," she said, "I will keep you all. You will be dull without each other after being together so long. Oh, Charles, how funny you are! Why, there is that dirty mark still on your face! And oh! you have only one eye, poor thing! Ah, Gwen, you are in the best condition of them all; but then I had you later, I think."

She laid us on one side while she arranged the other things, and then having rung the bell for the rubbish to be cleared away, she took us all three up in her arms and placed us on a table.

"There!" she said, "amuse yourselves as best you may. You always used to do what I did, so I suppose now I am grown up you must be grown up too. I expect you will be going to dances, and flirting, and doing all the things other people do. Don't get into mischief; and, Charles, don't trifle with the ladies' affections. You don't look dangerous with that gap in your face, but still, who knows? You're the only man they have."

So saying, she left us, and went singing down the stairs.

Charles and I were older than Gwen, who had come off the top of a Christmas tree at a party, and was pretty, and well-dressed, and conceited. I was rather jealous of Gwen when she first came, I acknowledge, because Miss Hildred had had me since she was seven, and I had always had the first place in her heart. Indeed, I am not sure but that I was spoiled by her affection, for we had slept together, which had made my hair very untidy, and she had given me so many kisses that a good deal of my paint had worn off; and once, too, when she was having her bath, unable to bear me out of her sight, she had asked nurse to put me on the edge, and I had fallen into the water. I am not china, but wax, consequently bathing does not agree with me. I have never recovered my colour, and I don't think the contour of my face has been so good since.

Charles and I are very old friends. He is a man doll, and was handsome in his youth. He is so still to me, although he has lost one eye from a fall off a high chair in the nursery. It is a great pity, but after all looks are not so important for a man as for a woman; and Charles has intellect, and is a deep and original thinker. Since his retirement to the cupboard he has had more opportunities for reflection, and many of his ideas, which were once crude, have matured and developed.

No one could live with him without benefiting by his society, and we had been friends so long that I think, as friends do, we had grown somewhat like one another in mind. He always impressed on me the foolishness of fretting and worrying over things (as Gwen, who was rather discontented, was inclined to do), bidding me consider the transitoriness of life and the possibility of change. I found his philosophy both useful and necessary, when I felt the weight of the money-box upon me, and I often repeated to myself his words—

"It is best to hope that things will come right until one is quite sure they won't, and then to make up one's mind it is right they should go wrong."

He confided most of his ideas to me, for Gwen did not care for wisdom, and was not at all sympathetic. She often made fun of him, and I had to scold her because she gave herself airs; but Charles was invariably lenient with her.

I didn't like Miss Hildred's remark as she left us. I thought it flippant, and was afraid it might put ideas into Gwen's head which she was better without.

"Well," she said, "so life has brought a change at last. I was sick to death of vegetating in that musty cupboard. I want to see the world, not to pass my days in a place where there's not a soul to speak to or to appreciate me."

"I appreciate you," said Charles, gently.

"Oh, you," she answered, and the accent was contemptuous. I thought he sighed.

"I should like," she went on, "to have a life like Hildred. There's no doubt she enjoys herself. I expect she'll have lovers at her feet, like the princesses in the fairy tales she used to read us. But I am much more like a princess than she is, because her hair is only brown, and mine is golden, and my dress is white and has golden stars on it, even if it is a little crumpled."

"What sort of a lover do you want?" asked Charles.

I should not have humoured her nonsense, conceited child!

"Oh, someone very tall and handsome, wax, I think, and well-dressed, and with both eyes," and she laughed. "I think," she added, "that Hildred might have bought some new dolls and put up here, unless she expects us to drag on all our days like this."

"Oh, you're just as happy as you are," said I. "I don't believe much attention would be good for you. It would turn your head."

"And what would it matter if it did? It could easily be turned back again. It is not fixed like some people's, who have to turn their whole body to see what's behind them."

This was a hit at me, of course. She was always so proud of having a head that would turn; but I think it spoils her looks, because there is a mark all round her china neck, although it is artfully covered with white ribbon.

Charles said nothing. I could never ascertain whether he admired her or not. I think if he had snubbed her it would have been better for her. But at any rate, of one thing I was certain—Miss Hildred was far too old to have any more dolls for playthings, so that I did not think Gwen's wish at all likely to be gratified.

CHAPTER II.

FEW weeks later Miss Hildred came up into our room. We had nothing to mark the time by, but, as far as I can judge, it must have been about nine o'clock at night. With astonishment I gazed upon her, for I had never seen her or any one look so beautiful. She wore a shimmering white dress, which made Gwen's crumpled garment, of which she was so proud, look positively grey, and on her breast were such lovely flowers that I could not help wishing I were able to smell. She had come in to fetch something, I suppose, for she carried a light, which she placed on our table while she went across the room. When she came back for the candle she caught sight of me.

"Why, Ethelwynda, my dear," she said, "I do believe you are staring at me. Of course you have never seen me in evening dress before. I hope you think I look nice. I'll take you into my confidence as I used to do, and tell you that I specially want to look nice to-night for reasons you can't understand, because you are only a doll."

Ah, how much people think they know! How could she tell I did not understand? We see more than people think, we dolls, although we do not talk much about it. But it has always been my opinion that the wiser people are the less they talk. Charles, for instance, who is very silent, knows more than any doll I ever knew, and I had a good deal of experience at the Burlington Arcade, where I used to live. The male population among dolls is smaller than the female, but there was a fair proportion of men there of various races, tastes, and occupations. There were niggers, soldiers, sailors, Japanese dolls, pages, and musicians, one of whom I specially remember. He was always beating a drum, and although they said he was clever at his profession, all his charm was lost on me because he was for ever showing off. There was a barrister in a wig, who talked a great deal, and there were several monkeys on sticks, whom I always considered so much like men that I generally ranked them together in my mind. I used to talk to them (the men, not the monkeys), and they all seemed more or less superficial, and in none of them have I found the depth of intellect observable in Charles, although I did consider those who talked least wisest among the others.

"You dear, silly old thing," Miss Hildred went on, "I used to tell you all my secrets once upon a time, and I think I shall have to tell you one now, because I must tell somebody, and you are not likely to repeat it to anyone else as most confidantes do. I believe—I am not certain—but I believe, Ethelwynda, that I am in love; and I believe, too, but of course I am not certain of that, somebody is in love with me." And then she grew very red, and looked so sweet in the dim light, with a look in her face that I have never seen even in the prettiest doll, that I could quite believe the last part of her speech.

"I suppose," she continued softly, touching her flowers with trembling fingers, "that when you are always thinking of somebody, and are never happy unless he is with you, and almost too happy then; when you can't help feeling jealous of everyone else who talks to him; and—and—when you are altogether foolish and unreasonable, and happy and wretched, and everything at once—oh, Ethelwynda, that must mean that you are in love! And I don't know whether I like it or not, but that is my state; and, oh, dear! I wish I were certain." And then she took up the candlestick, and went out of the room very slowly, leaving me to the darkness and my thoughts.

I have never forgotten that night. I never shall forget it, for it was the turning point of my life. I was very much interested in what Miss Hildred said, and I could not help thinking of her words, for in spite of her I did understand fully, and then in a flash I realised why it was I understood so clearly, almost as if I were in her place; it was because I too, although I had not awakened to the fact until to-night—I, too, loved, and loved Charles!

Was he not always in my thoughts? Were not my happiest times passed in his society? Was I not jealous of Gwen because she had been nearer to him in the cupboard than I? Yes, I loved him. I tried to realise what life would be without him, but the mere idea was insufferable. This gradual development of love was so different from mere infatuation, had so grown into my wax, and had penetrated so deep into my sawdust, that, unsuspected as it had been till this awakening, it was indeed my life.

And Charles, with what feeling did he regard me? Did he, too, love without recognising the fact? He liked and esteemed me, I knew; he respected my intellectual capability; he was in the habit of consulting me on a great many metaphysical questions he was trying to solve in the cupboard. But he had never spoken words of love. His very friendship, I was bound to confess, was too frank and unembarrassed for me to think his feelings deeper than they seemed. But might he not think the same of me? Yet I believe I was a little nervous and self-conscious in his presence sometimes.

I passed the night torn by anxious doubts; it seemed that he did not feel towards me otherwise than to a friend. Was I content to go on thus? I hardly knew. Friendship is a very poor substitute for love, and is as unlike it as a rag doll is unlike a wax one; yet when we cannot have wax skins we must be content to have rag to cover our stuffing. Anyhow, it is no good tearing off the rag because it is not wax, and thus leaving oneself cold and hideous. This is of course only a figure of speech, as I personally am wax, even if somewhat soiled and battered.

As the first streaks of daylight stole into the room I had made up my mind to wait till time should dispel my doubts, and meanwhile to go on as before; to be bright and sympathetic to him always, and to hope that some day, at any rate, he would love me, if he did not now.

Above all, I must keep my secret from Gwen. I turned and looked at him as he lay on the table, in the early dawn. He was not one of those dolls who close their eyes when they sleep, and the gap which disclosed the black emptiness of his head was painfully distinct. His countenance was no longer comely, but smeared and furrowed and dented; his clothes showed the marks of time and hard wear, and the dust of the cupboard clung to him still; but I thought not of his outward form—I loved him, that was enough.

CHAPTER III.

THE days went on, with nothing much to mark them. Miss Hildred came in the day after the dance. She looked pale, I thought, but perhaps she was tired; she did not stay long or say anything, at which I was disappointed, as I felt the need of her society; neither did I hear her singing about the house as much as usual, or if she began a song she would stop in the middle sometimes. I am afraid, too, she was rather cross.

As for me, I envied her the power of moving about. It was so hard to have to be still, to have no way of venting one's feelings, to have Gwen's eyes upon one always, and to seem just the same to Charles.

Besides, he too seemed changed, or was it only my fancy? His philosophic calmness appeared to have deserted him, and he was rather irritable occasionally. I think Gwen worried him sometimes. She alone seemed her old self, only that the spirit of mischief had taken strong possession of her. She teased Charles more than ever, laughed at him, at me, at everything; talked incessantly, and was always wishing to get away, to go into society, to see life and the world.

At last one morning Hildred came in to do some work. She shut the door to, and then went over to the window and began to sew; for a few minutes we heard nothing but the sound of the needle in the calico, and I wondered to see her so industrious, as she never used to sit long at her work. But presently her ardour ceased, she dropped the work in her lap and sat still thinking, and at last she rose, let the work fall unheeded on the floor, and began walking up and down the room, her hands clasped.

"I can't stand it," she burst forth; "it's making me ill. If only I knew! I did think so till the other night, and then—to stay away when he knew I was going, till so late that I hadn't a dance to give him, and then amuse himself all the time with that odious Carrie. Oh, it's contemptible to care for anyone when you haven't been asked to! Well, he doesn't know, that's one comfort. I pretended not to see his hand when he tried to say good-bye, and bowed as coldly as possible. I wish I hadn't worn his flowers; I don't believe I do care for him really. I don't see why I should. He's nothing so wonderful—oh, Charlie!" And then she fell on her knees by the table, and began to cry.

I was very sorry for her. It was so evident that she was going through the same doubts as I myself; and his name was Charles too! The table was shaken by her sobs, and even Gwen seemed awed.

When Miss Hildred got up, she was pale and tear-stained, but she seemed calmer, and she sat down and finished her work as if nothing had happened. When she had left the room Charles said to me in a low voice—

"Ethelwynda, I have something to say to you." Then he paused.

"Yes?" said I, encouragingly.

"Ethelwynda, I have hesitated to speak, but the sight of Miss Hildred's grief this morning urges me to do so."

Could he at last be going to make me happy?

"You remember," he went on, "the night she came in here, when she was going to a dance? I was not asleep, and I heard all she said. Did you?"

"Yes," I answered, "and it kept me awake all night."

"And me too—for it gave me so much to think of. We are nearly as old as Miss Hildred, older in comparison, because dolls grow old so much sooner than human beings. So if she has fallen in love already, it is not so strange that I should have, only I had not thought about it in that light. She put the idea into my head."

I came as near trembling as I ever did in my life when I heard Charles say these words.

"I fear," he said presently, seeing I did not speak, "that I am not the sort of doll to inspire love easily. My person is not attractive any longer, the plush is worn off my clothes."

"Ah," I interrupted, "looks are not everything."

"No," he answered, but not very cheerfully, I thought; "but I think with your sex they count for a great deal."

"But not to those who know you well," I ventured to remark.

"Don't you think so?" he said eagerly. "You ought to know."

My sawdust beat violently.

"Do you think," he said softly, as if he did not wish Gwen to hear (she was, however, turned away from us), "do you think she would agree with you?"

"She?"

"Yes, Gwen. She does not think so much of intellect as you do, dear Ethelwynda, and—"

"Gwen," I repeated, unable to say more, unwilling to realise the meaning of his words. How suddenly our sorrows come upon us, and yet how calmly we take them, outwardly, when our very life seems to have stopped! Mine had at that moment, yet to my old friend I seemed unchanged. Or was he too full of his own affairs to notice me?

"I felt I must tell you," he said, "because we have always been such friends, yet even you seemed surprised at my presumption in loving her. I know I am not worthy of her, with her beautiful china face and hands, and her aristocratic notions; for if you remember she sat at the top of the tree they had one Christmas for Miss Hildred. But perhaps if I am patient she may get to care for me in time; at least I have no rival. And it may be, in spite of her seeming coldness, she does care a little now; it seemed when I heard Miss Hildred that at any rate it is my duty to let her know how I feel, in case—"

"It might be as well," I said, speaking so calmly that I was surprised at myself.

It is very hard, when you love anyone, to be made his confidante on the subject of his love for another, especially when you are not only unprepared, but actually hopeful on your own account; and I could not help feeling the injustice of it all. I was always so kind to him; Gwen treated him so badly. I could understand and sympathise with him; Gwen could not. I loved him; did Gwen?

I draw a veil over my feelings that memorable day.

CHAPTER IV.

It is not a pleasant thing at any time to overhear an offer of marriage made to another, but it is certainly worse when made by the one you love.

Owing to our peculiar situation I could not withdraw when Charles made his offer to Gwen; although I tried not to listen, I could not help knowing how she received it. I heard her laugh.

"What!" she said. "Would you take advantage of my inexperience to force me into a marriage I should be sure to regret? I haven't seen many men, but I know they are not all like you. I came from Oxford Street, and I was not one of those who just lie in a box wrapped in paper. At least, I only did that for a very little while, and then I was grandly dressed and put in the window for Christmas-time. There were a bride and bridegroom quite close to me; he was very handsome—too good for her, I thought, with such pretty blue eyes, and a sweet smile, and brown horsehair curls. That is the sort of man I should like to marry."

She rattled on gaily, shrilly, excitedly, quite regardless of the effect she must have on him. What a way to have received his proposal! How heartless she must be!

"I know I am not like that," said Charles, meekly, "and I know you have a right to look higher, but I can't help loving you. Don't you think you could get to care for me in time?"

"I like you well enough," she said, "and I'm sure you are very clever, and all that, but oh no, I can't marry you."

What a strange world it is! It seems to get into all the muddles it possibly can, and never misses an opportunity of doing the wrong thing. If only Charles had fallen in love with me, everything would have been so simple.

I glanced at Charles when the silence told me he had accepted her verdict and ceased to plead.

Not even his emotion could mar the natural serenity of his expression, but I thought his attitude very pathetic. He was lying flat on his back, with his sweet smeared face turned up to the ceiling, and his arms stretched limply by his side; his legs were somewhat apart. Very listless he looked, as if he found life not worth living.

Gwen wore her usual somewhat haughty expression. She was still lying sideways, her fair hair floating round her face, her arms and neck bare, for she always wore evening dress. I could not help owning she was pretty.

The time after that passed very miserably. Charles was not unnaturally depressed; my relations to him were somewhat strained.

Gwen, though she had refused his proposal flippantly, seemed subdued afterwards. One feels fonder of a man when one has just refused him, even if one does not love him. Conversation was difficult, and we lay side by side, a dreary trio.

The weather, too, was wretched, the rain constantly pattering on the window-pane. It kept Miss Hildred in, I suppose, for she came into our room a good deal, and she would sit watching the rain for hours together, heedless of the book in her hand, not a bit like the bright, happy girl of so short a time back, but much more like me. Once she took me in her arms and said, "Oh, I wish I were a little girl again, and could play with you! Being grown up is so much harder."

I wanted to comfort her and tell her perhaps it would all come right, unless, of course, like Charles, the man she loved cared for someone else; but she could not understand my language, and dolls can't even put their arms round people's necks. They used to say I had great expression in my eyes, but though they were fixed upon her, I fear they did not convey any meaning to her.

There are some people you can't understand trouble coming to, although others seem born to sorrow. I always felt things would not go wrong for long with Hildred, and I was right.

There came a thundering knock at the door, and Hildred laid me down and ran to look over the banisters, as she used to do when she was a little girl and was doing her lessons. She came back in a minute very flushed, and stood with her hand on her heart, irresolute, looked at her own reflection for a moment in the cracked glass over the mantelpiece, and then went out of the room.

I did not see her any more that day. The next day was fine. It was intensely hot. It was rather inconsiderate, I thought, that no one came to pull down the blinds, for the sun shone full upon us. Charles and I are very susceptible to heat.

The suffering of the last few days had made us weak, and I began to hope that if this went on we might melt, if not in each other's arms, at least on the same table. It seemed to me that Charles was fading before my eyes, and I knew I looked ill, because Gwen, who is insensible to variations in heat or cold, told me I looked greasy, which I thought very unrefined, especially as she prided herself on being aristocratic. Though birth counts for something, all ladies do not live up to their birth.

It was significant that she did not make this remark to Charles, as she would have done once. I suppose she was a little ashamed of herself for the way she had treated him, and, perhaps, she was a little moved by his evident depression, for although she had been very cross lately, she had not been unkind to him.

When the servant dusted the room in the morning she had placed Charles and me very close together. Our hands touched, and it occurred to me that perhaps they would be joined. My sawdust thrilled; but ah! his face was turned towards Gwen.

Suddenly Hildred came in. She was singing, and was evidently happier in her mind, but I thought she looked excited.

"Why, you are melting!" she said, and she separated us. For the first time in my life I was angry with her, as that yielding hand—a good hand in its way, though its fingers were not well defined—was moved from mine. She went across the room, and drawing down the blind left it in semi-darkness. Then she sat down to the old piano in the corner and began to play something very soft and dreamy. She only played for a few minutes, then she stopped, and sat, as she so often did now, with her hands in her lap doing nothing.

In the room reigned perfect stillness.

Suddenly I heard the same knock as yesterday; soon a step was heard outside. Hildred started, rose, then sat down again. There was a tap at the door, and a gentleman entered.

"Hildred!" he said, and went straight across the room and took both her hands in his without another word.

"How did you know where I was?" she asked, and her voice sounded quite different from usual.

"They told me I should find you here, and I could not wait. You were kind to me yesterday. Hildred, you know what I have come to ask you."

The rest of their conversation was in so low a voice that I could not hear it, but they seemed to have a great deal to say to one another, and to need to be very close to say it.

One remark of Hildred's I did hear.

"I did doubt it once," she said, "and I was very unhappy. It was after the last dance I met you at, and I thought —"

"I remember," he interrupted, "you were so cold to me that I thought after all I was mistaken. I couldn't help being late; one of our men had been taken ill, and I had to go and see him, poor fellow; he wanted to say 'good bye' to me. I didn't feel much like a dance after it, but I knew you would be there."

"Oh, I am so sorry," she said, tremulously, "but you were with Carrie so much that—"

"That you thought I cared more for her. Oh, Hildred! She knows the wife of this man, and I was telling her about it, because I thought she would go and see her the next day. She is very kind-hearted, if she is a little fast, poor girl, and then it seemed easier to stay with her than to worry about other partners."

"Don't say any more," said Hildred. "I am so stupid and jealous, and I don't deserve that you should love me. But being a girl is so different from being a man; we never know till we know, and we can't ask like you can."

I thought this was incoherent, but he seemed to understand her; and as they sat together talking in a low voice, they looked so very happy that I could not help thinking perhaps all was not so wrong in the world as it seemed.

At last they rose and came across the room together, holding each other's hands. As they passed the table she drew him towards us.

"These were my dolls," she said.

He regarded us with more interest than gentlemen usually bestow on dolls; the dim light hid some of our defects, but it could not hide the vacancy of Charles' eye.

The gentleman said—

"That's a handsome fellow!" and laughed. "What's his name?"

"His name," said Hildred, laughing too, "is Charles, and I used to be very fond of him."

"Prophetic," said he; "I don't think he will prove a very formidable rival."

"And this" (she took me up) "is Ethelwynda; she was the joy of my childhood. Poor Ethelwynda, she was pretty once." And she kissed me.

The gentleman took me from her, and kissed me too in the same place. Such a thing had never happened before; he was evidently above his sex in his appreciation of us.

Then he replaced me on the table, but not just where I was before, and in doing so knocked Gwen with his elbow, and she fell with a crash to the ground.

"Oh, what have I done?" said he.

"You clumsy man," Hildred answered, but not angrily, "you have knocked down Gwen."

"Oh, I beg Gwen's pardon, I am sure." He picked her up and laid her on the table by Charles. "I hope she is not injured."

"Oh, it doesn't matter if she is! Come." They went away together.

CHAPTER V.

"How heartless," Charles burst forth, with more anger than he had ever shown in his life. "Once Hildred would have wept over any harm that befell Gwen, but she has outgrown her love for us. Is there no woman who is constant? Is it only we who love always?"

Then he turned to Gwen, and his voice changed.

"Are you hurt?" he asked, tenderly.

To my surprise she gave no sign of being in pain, but smiled and looked straight in front of her. Was she aware that her nose was chipped?

Charles observed it. "Oh that it had been I," he said; "it would have made very little difference to me; but Gwen! Oh, if only I could have saved her!"

"Gwen," I said, feeling so sorry for her that I could not be jealous or angry any more, "can we do anything for you?"

Her answer amazed me.

"I have refused the Prince of Wales," she said. "I should so hate ever to be queen."

Charles and I looked at one another. What could she mean?

"I saw him go past the window in the procession; he looked at me, and the bride said he was looking at her, she was always so conceited." She evidently was thinking herself back in Oxford Street.

"I said I was very sorry to decline the honour, and he seemed very much distressed. I wonder if he has got over it. He fell off his horse, I think. I heard a great noise. But perhaps I fell. I can't remember."

Was she delirious?

"He kissed me," she went on presently; and now she evidently thought she was Hildred. "He is very handsome. His name is Charles. Will you make my wedding dress?"

"But you are not going to be married," I said.

"Oh, but I am," she answered. "Am I not?" And she looked at Charles.

He groaned, and said sharply—

"Ethelwynda, look!"

"What is it?" I asked. "What does it mean?"

"It means," he gasped, "that she is mad. Look!"

It was too true. We discovered that she was indeed injured beyond repair. So great had been the shock of her fall that she was, as we now saw, hopelessly cracked.

Charles was calm first; he looked sad, but there was a strange sweetness about him.

"Are you going to marry me?" he asked. "I am Charles."

"Why, of course," she answered, brightly. "Who else could it be?"

"Even so," he said, gravely but triumphantly. "You are always Gwen to me, and you shall be my Gwen, none the less that you have come to me in misfortune."

"I hope the Prince won't mind," said Gwen. "You are so much more handsome. I shall wear pearls."

It was a strange ending to it all. Gwen can never get well; but she is happy and more contented than she ever was in her sane days.

Charles is tenderness itself to her, and she is very fond of him; he humours her in all her whims and hallucinations. And perhaps he is not the only philosopher who has married a fool. To me he turns for friendship and companionship still, and all embarrassment is at an end between us, for he has never guessed my secret. If I think he has thrown himself away, it is useless to say so.

And I gain comfort from the fact, that as the summer progresses I seem to be slowly, but surely, fading away.

PRIVATE VIEW AT THE NEW GALLERY.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER

HATS AND BONNETS.

THE weather in May was not very good for the advancement of spring and summer fashions, and never have I seen them quite so dilatory in appearing. Many of the things we wore last year we retain, with trifling alterations. The small mantles, like habit skirts, trimmed with lace, jet, coloured beads, and passementerie, are just as much used this year as last; in fact, they seem too useful to be laid aside, and they add not a little to the richness of the dress. They also mark that stage of the spring when it is too cold to divest oneself of all covering supplying some slight additional warmth. Most of those that I have seen worn this year were, I am sure, not new, but of last year's purchase, yet seemed as good as new—a fact which showed how wise it is to have a good mantle from a reliable shop when you make up your mind to an expenditure of money, and then you may expect it to last two, or even three years, and neither show wear and tear, nor look too old-fashioned and antediluvian.

I should imagine from what I hear that this will be a great year for lace in every shape of out-of-door mantle. Large cloaks of lace, unlined, are amongst the novelties, and long lace scarves will be worn, as well as long coloured scarves with flowery patterns on them, put on as our great grandmothers wore them, i.e., round the shoulders and arms, and hanging down in fringed ends in front. The lace pelisse or polonaise is a very pretty novelty; it is gathered at the neck and caught in round the waist. The trimmings are of watered ribbon, in bands, bows, and ends. There is no more pretty trimming for lace than watered ribbon or silk. It lights up the dull surface, and makes it look brighter and more charming.

At one of the private views a lady wore one of these long cloaks of clear Chantilly lace, which had "angel sleeves," and was of a very deep, yoke-like shape, in black moiré, on the shoulders, the back being caught in at the waist. Another method of making these cloaks is to have a shoulder-piece of black passementerie, which forms a pointed yoke. Some of the most stylish cloaks are made of light wool and silk, and have capes to them, and some of the prettiest new mantles are only capes with long scarf ends of lace, which are very full and are drawn in at the waist by ribbons. Others are of the small Zouave jacket kind, ending in front with lace and ribbon, while others are rolled back in front, just in the same way that jackets are worn at present, with the collars and revers all in one, the back being pointed, and all of it trimmed with lace. Nothing but Chantilly and its imitation is seen; all other laces seem to have completely disappeared.

In the new colours of the year we find a hue called "Empire," which is a kind of pink blotting-paper colour, which will be as much used in cottons as in woollens, and seems very bright and cheery, without being too vivid and glaring for wear in the street; it will be most becoming to dark people. The new grey-blues and grey-greens are very charming, and the latter, still called by its old name of réséda, or mignonette colour, is very pretty in silk. The former is, perhaps, prettiest in wool. There is one new blue called "turquoise morte," which is greenish, and like a discoloured specimen of that stone; and as to the greens, they are the predominant keynote, and their name are legion, ranging from the delicate yellow-green of the first leaf which peeps out in the spring, to the hue of the cypress and the ivy. The admixture of green and black is just as popular as ever; and flowers seem to have entirely cast out feathers as the trimmings of our head-dresses of all kinds. Our old friend terra-cotta is back again, in an infinite variety of shades, from deep reddish amber-yellow to the yellow-red hue of the beech leaf when it falls from the tree. It is a deservedly popular colour, especially with young people. In many of the new dresses we find a great mixture of colours, such as pale blue and green, pale salmon colour and blue, terra-cotta and yellowish pink, lemon-colour and violet, mignonette green and heliotrope, coral pink and grey-greens. Black and white are used with all colours, including the newly married hues of terra-cotta and black moiré, which is so much liked.

I have before mentioned the change in bonnets, which, from their previous altitude, have now fallen to the level and size of very small plates, or even of scallop shells, made of tulle and lace; the crowns often consisting of flowers, or even the bonnet itself. Black bonnets, with coloured flowers, are as much worn as anything, the strings matching the flowers, and not being of black like the bonnet. Short black lace strings are likewise beginning to appear again. Rosettes of "baby ribbon" and groups of looping form a very popular bonnet trimming, and look light and pretty in lace and tulle. It is much used as threadings in and out of the lace of both bonnets and hats, the ends of the ribbon, where it meets, being tied in bows and ends. The pointed and large round lace collars of former days are being used as hat trimmings. They are put round the crown and lie flat on the brim. Sailor hats and pork-pie straws are both worn, in straw as well as in lace and tulle; and most of these decorations are placed either on the top of the crown, at the back, or quite low on the brim. We have rarely had so good a season for those who are obliged to make up their bonnets and hats at home; for the bows are sold ready made, and everything is done so easy that a little taste only is needed, with a very small amount of manual skill, to make things look as well as if people had been to a professional milliner's for their headgear. Strings are often entirely dispensed with, and, if used, are tied so as to hang down in long streamers on the hair. The flowers most used just now for bonnets and hats are white and mauve lilac, laburnum, white and pink may, daffodils, and mignonette. The method of making the long bows can be easily studied in the shop windows, and a bonnet-shape of net, lace, or straw, and a selection of bows, will give us something to wear with every dress.

The two flowers most used for bonnets which are all of flowers, are the violet, dark and light, and the forget-me-not. Both of these are small flowers, and both are used with few if any leaves. No trimming is used with the wide Alsatian bows, except an aigrette standing up or perhaps a small spray of flowers placed exactly in front.

Bordered robes are decidedly quite the rage; whether of embroidery on cotton or woollen, or of appliqué on the latter, they require careful making up to be pretty. They are generally made with a complete false underskirt, on the edge of which some moiré, striped silk, or chiorée trimming may be placed.

I have endeavoured to illustrate all the bonnets and hats which I have named, and even though some of them may be a little extreme in character, they have all been sketched from those actually in wear. The long cloak in lace with "angel sleeves" (at the extreme left of the picture) is very well shown, and so is the new mantle with straight sleeves, in the centre. The next figure to the right wears one of the long jabots of white muslin and lace which have taken the place of the large bow.

In the sketch of "Hat and Bonnets," a bonnet trimmed with "baby ribbon" will be found, the rosettes being under and over the brim. This figure also wears one of the new cape mantelettes, which are very elegant in their effect.

Skirts open down the front are still to be seen, but they are softened off by being laid in folds at each side, or by having fan pleats at the extreme edge, which lie on each other, overlapping. Sashes seem as much used as ever, both at the sides and back. At the sides they are slung from the belt and tied half way down the skirt. The length of skirt is a little longer when not needed for walking purposes. This is not an improvement, nor is it any more graceful in appearance. Indian pongee and Tussore are likely to be used a great deal this year for dresses, parasols, and also for the crushed hats, which are so much seen. These hats are very pretty. They are lined with the same sort of silk in a contrasting hue, and at the edge there is a finely-pleated frill inserted between the edges. Pongee is used for the linings of cloaks in pretty light colours, the old peach blossom being a favourite, but appearing under several new names. This is the case with many of our new hues; they are only old friends with new names.

I have mentioned the almost total disappearance of the dress improver from our midst, and some people have quite dispensed with it. The majority, however, do without the mattress, and have one steel only, which is ten inches long, put in eight inches below the waist, and a pair of strings tie in the back of the skirt about eight inches below the steel.

The tailor-made gowns do not seem so much worn in London as they were, but will probably be found again in the country and at the seaside. Coat sleeves, wide at the top and gathered into the armholes, without standing up much, are the new sleeves used for them, while for other gowns one sees several kinds of sleeves moderately full, and either in folds between the shoulder and the elbow, or else gathered, puffed, banded, or lying in folds, with the ends of the latter turned upwards. This last is the newest and prettiest style.

Stockings, spotted, striped, and embroidered, may be all worn by those who like them; and shoes strapped across seem to be the kind in vogue for very best. The toes of summer shoes seem invariably made of patent leather, and they are either laced or buttoned, as the owner pleases.

We have had so many applications for gentlemen's pyjama suits, for sleeping in, which seem to have now taken the place of the old-fashioned night gown, that we have decided to select it as our month's pattern, as it is so easily made at home, very comfortable in wear, and possesses many advantages, we are told, over the old night shirt. The paper pattern is in two parts, jacket and trousers. The jacket has three pieces, the trousers two; the amount required for our pattern, which is an ordinary size, is about six yards; but it will probably cut into less, if the material be yard-wide, and the cutter out lay all the pieces out on the material before beginning to cut, when she can see how to fit them in to the best advantage. This is really one of the secrets of good management in cutting-out. The material may be of striped Oxford shirting, printed cotton, cottonette, twilled cotton, galatea, or indeed of any other material the intending wearer may think comfortable and useful. They are generally coloured, in preference to white; and striped seem preferred to all-over patterns of any kind.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, including the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American bodice instead of stays ("emancipation"), Corday skirt with pleats, jacket-bodice with waistcoat, princess dress with full back, bodice with revers for braiding, "Little Lord Fauntleroy" bodice with folds in front, the "Empire" dress (consisting of a bodice and a skirt, which may be had separately at 1s. each), gentleman's pyjama. No paper patterns supplied but those named in this list.

AMONG THE WILD FLOWERS.

By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

PART II.
SUMMER FLOWERS.

HAD I searched all England over I do not think I should have found a spot more suitable for study and meditation. I had lingered and lazed too long in the New Forest, its weird beauty, gloom, and grandeur had cast a spell over me, which I found it hard to break. But editorial letters came at last, and work had to be done, so the horses' heads were turned off the main road, and in due time the Wanderer was safely bivouacked in a meadow not far from the sea. I do not mean to tell anyone the name of this village. It is mine by rights of discovery. Gipsies know it; one postman, who never does seem half awake, knows it; the swallows know it; it is the first village they visit in early spring; sea birds, wild ducks, and snipes know it, and find many a tit-bit among the sedges and the rushes that border a half salt lake near by; the south wind knows it well, and fiercely must it howl and blow in winter, for the trees, the hawthorns, oaks, and elms have all turned their backs to it, as if by common consent, and not even the gentle zephyrs of June can woo them round again; and song birds know it, the twittering martin, the reed warblers, and shore larks. I think they hardly ever ceased to sing; as early as two in the morning the birds would be patterning on the caravan roof, and singing in at me through the open skylights. By day there was no ruder sound to break the stillness than those bird-voices or the wind sighing through the ventilator, or out in the meadow itself the hum of insects and intermittent drone of workmen bees, as they passed from flower to flower. Then away over yonder, with half-a-mile of hayfields between, was the restless sea, and on the far horizon the cliffs of Wight, that regularly every evening at sunset took part in a marvellous transformation scene, while the swallows were holding their vesper revel, and bats in caves and under bridges were stretching their limbs and preparing to fly.

There is no hotel in the village near me, there is an inn. There is no doctor, for I do not think the people ever die. The buildings are quaint and curious, and stand anyhow, end on to the street, back to the street, or face to the street, and possess quite as much architectural grandeur and beauty as the houses boys and girls draw on slates at school. But quiet reigns everywhere. Children sometimes come and hang from my meadow gate for an hour at a time, and an older one may whistle; otherwise they look like a select assortment of juvenile Rip Van Winkles. My favourite walk is down through the meadows yonder, where the new mown hay lies in perfumed swaths, by a little footway which leads to the marsh and the lake. I wish I had space to describe a few of the splendid and curious grasses that grow here. But among them, and all over the marsh, are my flowers. When I want to cull them, I have to leap from hillock to hillock; were I to get between I might sink and never more be seen.

But there in abundance grow those taking, wee, blue-eyed fairies, the forget-me-nots—Myosotis palustris. They are not so compact as our garden kinds, but charmingly pretty. The legend says a knight in armour was gathering a bouquet of myosotis for his lady-love, who waited by the stream, and saw him borne away. He just had time to throw the flowers on shore and say "Forget me not," before the current floated him off, and hence the name. I do not believe a stream carried him away at all. He must have been in just such a marsh as this, and got between the hillocks and engulfed in the mud.

Town children frequently mistake the brooklime (Veronica beccabunga) for the myosotis. Country children do not; but it is well to get a blossom of each, and put them side by side in your collection, and one also of the water-speedwell—Veronica anagallis.

If you are walking almost anywhere in the country lanes or roads in summer, you cannot help noticing the beautiful flashes of ultramarine-blue that are spread out here and there. This is caused by the luxuriantly-growing germander speedwell (Veronica chamaedrys). A very fragile and insignificant wee floweret it is, not bigger round than the pimpernel, but we could not want that gush of beauty by the waysides for anything. The common pimpernel (Anagallis arvensis) you cannot mistake, owing to its wee, salmon-red flowers, and its somewhat lonely disposition. You will frequently find it growing among wheat or oats. Do not call it a weed, pray. Take it up tenderly and press it gently between the leaves of your stock book. Some song or another, that is running through my head, speaks of "the blue-eyed pimpernel." Well, it is sometimes blue; but rarely. I do not know why some flowers do change at times from blue to red, and vice versa—some little floral idiosyncrasy. There is also a bog pimpernel; and this is a perennial, the other being an annual.

Not in the marsh here itself, but near by it, grows the pretty pink or lavender-coloured flower called thrift. It bears transplanting well, and I have seen it used even in the interior of the country as edging for the flower garden. It is the Armeria maritima of botanists. It has long, linear leaves and single globe-shaped flowers, not unlike a half-blown double lilac primula.

And not far off from these banks of thrift I find the yellow-horned poppy (Glaucium luteum), called so from the glaucous or greenish-blue colour of its leaves. It is a very conspicuous and pretty poppy, and so is easily known. It is an annual, and must not be confounded with the perennial yellow poppy of Wales, sometimes called the mountain poppy.

And here is the beautiful sea-lavender, the Statice limonium. At a little distance its bluish purple flowers look to have the same arrangement as our garden heliotrope. The leaves are thick, glossy, dark-green, and lanceolate. This flower is perennial, and will grow well in gardens.

Growing not far from the borders of my marvellous marsh, I find splendid blooms of the gigantic yellow iris, or water-flag, Iris pseudocorus. Perhaps it has no business so near the sea, but here it is. This plant is called "Segg" in some places, and in Scotland Jacob's Sword, the leaves resembling a sword-bayonet. In shape it is altogether like our garden blue flag. With such flowers as these one may easily imagine I found no difficulty in making the Wanderer quite gay, the crimson flowers of tall ragged robins or red campions looking very beautiful among the green and beside the yellow.

A very large number of beautiful flowers are to be found on our seashore, and they differ to some considerable extent with each locality. But I have never yet seen anything like a really good collection of the wild flowers of the British islands. If they were well put up, well preserved, each with its botanical and provincial name, with probably a line or two of verse attached to each, and a photograph of the neighbourhood where found, it would be a collection of rare value indeed. Such collections could only be made by forming a wild flower club, whose members in different parts of the kingdom could assist each other.

I have noticed during my wanderings that the love of flowers seems to be quite a passion among many of the poorer cottagers who live by the wayside in England, and I have passed through some very humble hamlets, the windows of each hut or hovel in which vied with its neighbour in the beauty of its floral display. Perhaps these cots hardly possessed even the tiniest of gardens. That did not damp the ardour of the inmates, however—they had flowers, flowers everywhere: inside the windows on shelves; outside in boxes; crowding the tops of rustic porches; trailing over walls and roofs, and stuck into every crevice or corner.

There are certain flowers that grow so largely in fields in summer as to lend quite a charming feature to the landscape, especially when viewed at a distance, and either in open valleys or braelands. In painting tracts of cultivated land, nature, or art and nature combined, dash the colours on with a broad and unsparing hand indeed.

Take, for instance, the common charlock, the Sinapis arvensis, that grows among the corn in May and June, or rather graciously permits the corn to grow side by side with it. It is not an invited guest, the farmer does not like it if the artist does; but what a gleam of yellow it throws over the fields! Later on the corn marigold tinges acres and acres of ground with a richer, deeper golden hue. And bare fields of grass farther north are completely overgrown with the tall, shrubby yellow tansy. It grows up to the very udders of the wading cows, who are fain to put their tongues round its hard stem to find a fresh pluck of green.

So much for yellow. The dark rosy clover gives a charming cast to some fields; so does the white clover; and how the cows do luxuriate on this last, till their sides glitter, their eyes stand out, and their very ears grow shorter with fat! But as they eat it they breathe hard on it, to scare away the busy bees of commerce. Clover, both red and white, form also one of the many-coloured carpets that bedeck the sward by old-fashioned roadsides. And people who do not travel as I do, can form no conception of the amount of sward that flanks our highways and byways. In olden times this waste land was useful to afford grazing for the immense herds of cattle that used to be driven slowly from north to south. Now the cattle journey by train, and not even the poor man is allowed to make use of the herbal wealth that is spread about in such abundance.

Fields of flax or blue linum are not often seen now; but I have seen them in Yorkshire. The spring green of this plant is of an indescribably tender tint, and the blue of the cup-like flower is inimitable.

But even flax must yield the palm of beauty to scarlet poppies among the corn, or to the crimson glory of a field of blooming sainfoin.

Perhaps colour lends a greater charm to English landscape in June, than contour or lines. On a clear day we passed through a lovely country some leagues south of Salisbury Plain, and it was a pleasure to note the various—and ever-varying with the light—shades of green on the trees. The oaks could be told a long way off by their bright yellow-green tints, contrasting finely with the darker hues of the glorious elms. Ash trees, wherever seen, were well worth looking at, in colour a tender spring-green. The tints of the willows or waving pollards seemed to have a dash of blue in their composition. The lindens or limes again were more akin to ash trees in colour, but in foliage more, far more silken and fragile, though they would harden as the summer advanced. When a cloud shadow fell upon an elm tree wood, the sycamores in it grew dark as ink. And towards night those elms were gloomy blots, and the Scotch pine trees black, solemn, and weird.

There were tall hedges at each side of the roads, as a rule starred over with the huge white flowers of the elder. You could have told that elder was growing there, even had you kept your eyes shut, owing to the luscious perfume that hung so heavily in the air.

At times the trees closed quite over the road, so as almost to impede my progress; the branches would go rattling and rustling along the roof, and leaves fall into the saloon through the skylights. Every now and then in this sylvan wilderness a cottage would appear, always with a garden, containing roses, rhododendrons, ivies, hollies, and brown-legged children. These pretty cottages popped up in the woodlands when least expected, in a way that was charmingly accidental.

We passed a wondrous hedgerow. It was half a mile long and about twenty feet in height, and quite a study in bronze, green, and gold, all the effects of the sunlight, for the foliage was only that of blackthorn and dwarf oak.

Next we rolled past a park, and I suppose there was a mansion house somewhere hidden in the wood; but the park was a picture in itself: it had clouds of lordly elms in it, and clumps of copper beeches, and knots of weeping ashes, and tall, light-green, feathery acacias hung with drooping white flowers; and then, on rising knolls, there were groups of brown-stemmed pine trees. Don't you think you see it, reader? and isn't it nice to be a gipsy? But there were banks of rhododendrons in this park, and patches of golden furze as well, and here and there a patch of water rippling in the sunshine, where Chi-chi ducks were swimming.

By-and-by we came up out of all this grandeur of woodland, and the half-bare rolling plains of Salisbury hove in sight. Fields of all shades of colour in view now—the dark blue-green of oats, the silvery sheen of waving barley, the harsher hues of wheat, golden yellow of wild mustard, and splendid crimson of corn poppies.

Three especial wayside favourites of mine are the blue geranium, the mallow, and rest-harrow. Both the former last very well in bouquets, and even bloom in water, while the latter, when in perfection, is an extremely beautiful plant.

The blue geranium is the meadow cranes'-bill—a stupid name, my own is best—the Geranium pratense of botanists, in leaf and flower and all it looks every inch a geranium, but a deep and indescribable blue. The foliage changes to orange and crimson in autumn. I never could make out what determined this flower's choice of situation. Botanists who write books tell us it loves moisture and shade, but gipsies know a deal more than soi-disant botanists, and I have found the blue geranium on the sunniest, barrenest of hillocks, by the side of the road as well as crouching among nettles and hiding near woods. I met it in Hampshire and Dorset, in Yorkshire and Northumberland, and even in Scotland; met it when least expected, and we always pulled up to kiss and cull it.

The mallows, like the poor, we always have with us. This is that tallish pink or mauve geranium-looking flower you see growing by every wayside and on waste land. There is the common mallow, Malva sylvestris, and the pretty and brighter musk mallow, or Malva moschata, the leaves and petals of which are different. You ought to get specimens of both and compare them. One glance would be enough, and you could never forget the characteristic differences.

Rest-harrow, Ononis arvensis, is a shrubby plant, trailing or semi-erect, very thorny, or with only rudimentary prickles, which grows on banks and bare patches by the roadsides, both in Scotland and England. I have met with it among the Grampian mountains, but it was somewhere in the Midland counties that I saw it in perfection, in Bedfordshire I believe. Well, it looked there just like pink furze. You would know it from that description.

The flowers are a rosy pink, and not unlike in tint and shape to those of the sainfoin. Both the furze and the rest-harrow belong to the same natural family, the Leguminosæ, but it is only when the rest-harrow is at its best that the resemblance is well marked.

In the next part I shall have some very beautiful flowers to speak about—flowers of hedgerows, fields, and river banks, among them wild roses and thistles.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

CHAPTER XIII.

LADY OTTERY'S FRIENDS (LADY ELEANOR DAVYS, LADY PEMBROKE, AND LADY DERBY).

HE world and the war went on, though Hampden and Falkland lay in their narrow graves. In connection with the latter, indeed, Kitty felt, with the sharp intolerance of youth, as if the friends among his party who had professed to pay him great homage awarded scant consideration to his memory when he was gone. It did not appear as if the Court and the noble company at Oxford abated much of their striving and pushing for place, their wrangling over their conflicting claims to promotion, their feasting and merry-making, their marrying and giving in marriage, during the ensuing winter, because of what had happened so late as on that September day on the field of Newbury. But Kitty might have been content. Falkland's name was written on many a doubting, distracted heart, labouring to keep its doubts and distractions to itself and to maintain a brave show of good cheer. His memory will be green so long as England itself survives.

War, like poverty, carries in its train strange company. It was a reproach brought against Dame Tabitha that in the exigencies of the situation she stuffed her lodging, not simply with all her fine acquaintances among the visitors, but with "the halt, the lame, and the blind," in the shape of the queerest, most piteous waifs and strays hanging on to the skirts of their better endowed brethren. A little knowledge of the needs of her neighbours sufficed. The poor parson come up to plead for his unpaid tithes, without the value of which his family would starve in their distant parsonage; the spendthrift player, who had not a penny left to pay for his bed; the young volunteer-soldier, who had arrived to offer his sword to his King, but had not calculated on the shortness of his purse, which was like to deprive him of rations till he should be drafted into a regiment; the old mother or aunt or maiden sister, who had found her way to Oxford to see the last of the hero of home. He was already cumbered enough without the additional responsibility of looking after and providing for an unprotected female, in a good many senses more helpless, in spite of her more primitive habits, than she is to-day. None came amiss to Lady Ottery.

But Dame Tabitha had at least three famous guests whom Kitty could never forget. One day a lady was shown in—a tall woman with the long head and face, the chin straight and prominent, and the slight set simper which is not infrequently the indication of incurable self-complacency and conceit. Her eyes were, however, the most remarkable feature in her face. They were large, light eyes, restless, and with a curious glitter. She was dressed in the ordinary style adopted by a gentlewoman past her first youth. Indeed, she was so much in the fashion that she wore dangling at her side a huge bunch of seals, like so many hazel-nuts. For the last fancy of fine ladies was to make and wear collections of seals of every variety of stone, cut in every variety of device—the more grotesque the better.

The visitor did not trouble herself to go through the usual forms of greeting. She advanced a few paces into Lady Ottery's parlour, then stood still, and announced, in an oracular, self-important voice, as if her movements were of the utmost consequence to the whole world—

"I am come to see the fulfilment of my prophecy."

"Thou hadst better sit to see it, an it be the same thing to thee, Lady Eleanor, since thou must have come some distance," said Lady Ottery, quietly rising, taking the stranger by the hand, and leading her to a seat, into which she dropped as if exhausted with the burden of her powers.

As Lady Ottery returned to her own chair, she made the comment, with a dangerous approach to audibility, "As mad as a March hare by this time." Partially aware of the indiscretion, she cleared her throat and hastened to inquire, "How doth my old friend, Sir John? Is he with you, or do the toils of the law hold him fast in his lodging, as they were wont to do in the law courts?"

"Sir John is an unbeliever," said his wife, with startling candour and decision. "He sinneth against the clearest light; he remaineth blind and deaf to the most undeniable proofs."

"Nay, I hope that thou wilt not furnish him with the test whereby to try thy truth, that thou didst vouchsafe to thy first husband," Lady Ottery remarked, half to herself.

Lady Eleanor Davys, the wife of the Attorney-General Davys, was neither daunted nor affronted.

"Yea, I did predict the death of my first husband three days before it happened, and he as hale and well at the time as you are at this moment," proclaimed the formidable woman, with evident pride in this testimony to her gift. "And I foretold the birth, christening, and death on the same day of the Queen's first-born. I told her, likewise, that she should have another son, with fifteen more years of grandeur and happiness for her own portion. Behold, the years of the vision are accomplished."

"Art not sorry that it should be so, Lady Eleanor?" demanded Lady Ottery, with some indignation. "Methinks, if I prophesied evil to my sovereign and friends, I'd as lief be forsworn as witness my words of ill-omen come to pass."

"What have I to do with sorrow?" retorted Lady Eleanor, a little wildly. "My prophecies are not of my making. I have a commission to make known what is sealed. The letters of my name can be transposed until they read, 'Reveal, O, Daniel.' See, I have the keys to all mysteries in these my seals." She held up one bearing an impression of the three Hebrew youths walking in the midst of the fire uninjured; another showing the den of lions into which the bound prophet was cast; and a third displaying the rising sun; then dropped the whole three, and sent the rattling bunch swaying to and fro. "It was not for nought that I was a scholar from my youth up, or read Holy Scripture in the original tongue."

"Over-study," protested Lady Ottery, shaking her head, "over-study is a bad thing; better thou hadst attended to the napery closet and the stillroom, though thou hadst been twice over Earl Castlehaven's daughter."

"So say the common herd," answered Lady Eleanor, loftily. "Methought thou wast a little above them, but in that I erred and was deceived. No one can say I have not been faithful to my high office. I was had up before the Star Chamber for my deliverances, because, forsooth, they offended the proud stomachs of my lords! I was bidden prophesy smooth things, but I would not. The King flouted me, and told Sir John to make me hold my tongue. Marry, let him make his Queen hold her tongue; for her light words are foolishness, and my weighty sentences are wisdom. My husband, with his mind poisoned by my enemies, flung a whole bundle of my papers into the fire; but I was even with him. I writ them all over again, and stowed them beyond his reach," nodding her head in triumph, with a gleam of cunning in her glittering eyes. "I am here to challenge the bold disputants of my words, whether they have in aught failed. Lady Ottery, I see there a young maid," glancing at Kitty as she spoke; "belike she would care to know her future fate."

"No, no," cried Dame Tabitha, hastily, "thou shalt not meddle with Kitty's fortune; she is a wise little girl, content to wait God's pleasure. Tell my fortune as long as you will, but let the child a be."

"Thou art no better than Sir John," said Lady Eleanor, disdainfully, and stalked out of the room without further greeting, as she had entered it.

Then Lady Ottery told Kitty that Lady Eleanor had always been so—at least since the days when she studied Hebrew and Greek, and gave herself up to musings which were to high for her. There was no accounting for the tastes of men, since she had found two husbands—one of them the present Sir John Davys, as wise a gentleman as was in England.

"I have not heard neither that she had any great fortune," Lady Ottery broke off to say reflectively.

It was thought that a cure might have been wrought on the morbid speculations and diseased vanity of the lady, when a gentleman of the Star Chamber took the pains to prove to her that the transposition of her name into the words, "Reveal, O, Daniel," on which she founded her claim to prophesy, was an act which could be done in more ways than one, and might be made to bear quite different significations. For instance, the letters composing "Dame Eleanor Davys, or Davis," could be pulled down and built up again into the sentence, "Never so mad a lady."

But it was useless to try to beat Lady Eleanor with her own weapons, especially when silly people pandered to her weakness, and were in the habit of consulting her as an oracle. Yes, it was sad, but poor Lady Eleanor's vagaries were a dispensation of Providence, though they were fed, no doubt, by human credulity and folly. It was still sadder that the sorrows of the times were wrecking the sound wits of many poor women.

Kitty knew Lady Ottery was referring to Lady Fairfax for one. She was growing distracted between the associations and predilections of her birth and early rearing, and the obligations involved in her husband's prominent position in the Parliament army. Kitty also remembered the words long afterwards, when she heard their substance applied to a daughter of the Lord Protector Cromwell, who was said to sicken body and mind of the national troubles.

Lady Ottery had dug intimation of the arrival of the next two visitors. The first of the two was the wife of the Chancellor of the University, Lord Pembroke. Nothing on earth would induce her to abate one jot of her pretensions. Even in signing a letter she wrote herself, "Anne Dorset Pembroke Montgomery," in assertion of her right to these titles, the first from her first husband, the second and third from Lord Pembroke. She was a large, imperious-looking woman, the daughter of Elizabeth's sea-captain, Lord Clifford, and the granddaughter of the peasant Earl of Clifford. His love of astronomy, which caused him to build a tower, in order the better to scan the stars, dated from the time when he was brought up as a shepherd among shepherds, with no knowledge of any noble pedigree. His own ignorance was part of his scared mother's design to hide him from the next heir to the titles and estates, after his father had been slain in one of the battles of the Wars of the Roses. But Countess Anne Dorset Pembroke Montgomery had inherited little either of the reckless chivalry of her father or the wise modesty and simple dignity of her grandfather; she was a domineering woman of some strength of character and considerable ability, but still greater arrogance. Her velvet robe was the most sumptuous that could be worn, her feathers the tallest. If she could have borne a crown of gold on her high head without any discourtesy to the Queen, she would have done it. She did not cast her eyes on any member of the present company save Lady Ottery. Even her hostess the visitor only took in with a sweeping glance and the tail of her eye.

Lady Pembroke could speak at any time, for a room full of company, on any subject under the sun. The magnitude of a topic no more awed her than the pettiness of another subject fretted her. The time-honoured learning of the city of Oxford did not silence her. Lady Pembroke's tongue went like the clack of a mill, in a deliberate, ponderous, over-bearing and unintermittent clack, in keeping with the birth, rank, and great fortunes of its owner. Although the most profoundly read or the wittiest, as well as the gravest and most reverent of Oxford's doctors, had been present, she would not have hesitated to give an ample specimen of the breadth of her discourse, which was said to range "from slea silk to predestination."

Kitty sat not so much crushed under it as kicking against it in Lady Ottery's parlour. A very wonderful and a very wearisome woman was the great Lady Dorset Pembroke Montgomery. Kitty was angered at the degree to which the visitor talked down and silenced Lady Ottery in her own house. The girl consoled herself by thinking that, for her part, she would a thousand times rather have had one of her dear Lady Ottery's blunt, jerked out sentences than all my Lady Pembroke's well-balanced, wire-drawn periods. And after all the wayward and ridiculous beauty, Lady Isabella Thynne, was not more unequally mated than was this imposing bel esprit, Lady Pembroke. Lady Ottery had said there was no accounting for men's tastes; she might in fairness have added there was no accounting for women's either. Everybody in Oxford knew that though my Lord Pembroke was one of the greatest noblemen in England—which to be sure was the reason that had not only qualified him for the chancellorship of the University, it had also won him his wealthy intellectual wife—his brutality and violence were matched by his rudeness and illiterateness. He could only speak of hunting and hawking and of his stables, which would have afforded accommodation for the stud of a prince. There was one thing which his lady, who feared nobody, need not apprehend from her hectoring, swearing lord, and that was rivalry in her conversational feats.

When Kitty, in her youthful zeal, ventured to remonstrate with Lady Ottery on allowing Lady Pembroke to engross the conversation, without as much as edging in a word to show that she, Lady Ottery, knew as well, and a good deal better, than the speaker with regard to some of the matters on which she was enunciating information and laying down the law, all the answer she, Kitty, got was, "My dear, it pleaseth her to hear herself talk, and it doth us no harm to listen. Nay, rather, it giveth us time to rest a little and consider. Besides, she is a woman of parts, and her dissertations are generally well enough worth hearing. She is also a mighty great lady, who is condescending to us in noticing such humble folk as we are by comparison. Fie! Kitty, do I see thee gecking your head and bridling your neck? Where is your breeding, madam, if you cannot pay honour where honour is due?"

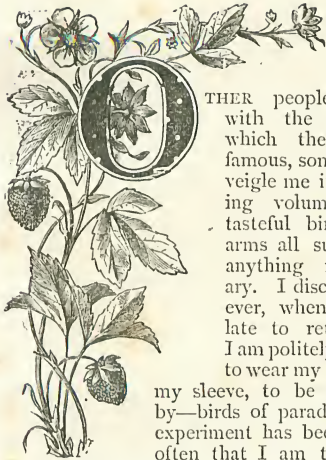

Kitty's experience of Lady Ottery's old acquaintances, or, perhaps, as Lady Pembroke would have said, patronesses, was not such as rendered the girl enchanted at the prospect of encountering a third specimen. This was especially the case when Lady Ottery, who in spite of duly recommending Kitty to pay honour where honour was due, had taken the earlier company easily enough, was absolutely fluttered by the anticipation of the third arrival.

"Little Kitty, this is a grande dame; you'll never see such another. The Queen herself would come with less natural state than this lady doth bear about with her in her simplicity. Great! I trow she is great. Her father was a duke of the bluest blood in France, her mother was a princess. Her cousin hath just been wedded to our little Princess Mary. Her husband is like a king in the north, where the people cry, 'God save the King and the Earl of Derby.' In good truth he is King in the Isle of Man, of which he is the lawful sovereign. I came to know her when I was at the Hague with Sir Jasper, and she was one of the Prince Stadtholder's family. I did chance to render her a little service once, and such as she forgets not a service, and loses not sight of an old friend, great or small; whether he or she hath grown rich or hath lost a fortune, it is all one to a grande dame, who can only confer distinction and not receive it. Kitty Dacre, your woman Pettit is right, you are in luck to have sat in the same room, and that not a palace presence chamber, with two such great ladies as my Lady Pembroke and my Lady Derby, of whom the last hath the true ring of earthly greatness. I say not that the other giveth forth a false sound, or is not entitled, alike from her rank and her parts, in Oxford above all, where my Lord is chancellor, to be received with duty and honour."

MY CONFESSION.

BY A CANDID BACHELOR (OF ARTS).

OTHER people's sisters, with the craft for which their sex is famous, sometimes inveigle me into opening volumes whose tasteful binding disarms all suspicion of anything revolutionary. I discover, however, when it is too late to retreat, that I am politely requested to wear my heart upon my sleeve, to be pecked at by—birds of paradise. This experiment has been tried so often that I am thinking of saving time and trouble by getting my confessions printed, and pasting a sheet in any inquisitive book to which I may be invited to contribute. Being anxious for the diffusion of high-class literature among the masses, I append a copy for the sake of its wider circulation among the readers of this journal.

Your favourite virtue.—Virtue, the art publisher.

The vice you most detest.—Advice.

Your chief characteristic.—Meek impudence.

Your idea of happiness.—Doing what I like.

Your idea of misery.—Doing what I don't like.

If not yourself, who would you be?—My brother.

Where would you like to live?—In a Pullman Car.

Your present state of mind.—Utter vacuity.

Your favourite colour and flower.—Reckitt's blue. Cauliflower.

Your favourite painter.—Zeuxis.

Your favourite composer.—Mrs. Winslow.

Your favourite names.—Sal, Sophonisba, Aristarchus, Mike.

Your favourite heroes in real life.—The Man in the Iron Mask and O'Donovan Rossa.

Your favourite heroines in real life.—Queen Anne (deceased) and Jessie Brown.

Your favourite heroes in fiction.—Uriah Heep, Bill Sikes, and the Conservative working man (if the owner of the book is a Liberal).

Your favourite heroines in fiction.—The Muses, Topsy, Lucy Gray, Mrs. Gamp (including Mrs. Harris).

Your favourite food and drink.—Tripe. Liquorice water.

The characters in history that you most dislike.—Æneas and George Washington.

The time of year you like best.—Dinner-time.

The greatest living statesman.—Myself.

The reforms you would advocate.—The reformation of the female sex.

The wrongs you would redress.—Those of third-class passengers.

The scenery you admire most.—Poole's Diorama.

Your favourite recreation.—Ballooning.

Your chief ambition.—To answer these questions truthfully.

Your definition of love.—Lunacy.

The place of women in society.—At the tea-urn.

Your favourite study.—Chinese music.

Your favourite books.—Confession books.

Your ideas on matrimony.—Matrimony has nothing to do with ideas.

Your favourite bird and beast.—Vampire, bat and rhinoceros.

Your opinion of the girl of the period.—I have no opinion of her at all.

Your opinion of the young man of the period.—Not worse than the young man of other periods.

The age at which a man should marry.—Dotage.

Is a lady justified in concealing her age?—If she can.

The opera you most admire.—Ciceronis opera.

Your favourite musical instrument.—Paper and comb, if played with expression.

Your favourite novelist.—Any leading historian.

The coloured eyes and hair that you most admire.—Pink.

Do you believe in love at first sight?—I have no faith in second sight.

Were you ever in love? if so, how often?—The heart knoweth its own bitterness.

Your favourite quotation.—“When you ask for it, see that you get it.”

Your favourite proverb.—Never do to-day what you can put off till to-morrow.

Your age last birthday.—Too old to be caught.

I shall now have the comforting thought that whenever my work is done, I shall have left behind me ample and varied materials for the biography of the season.

VARIETIES.

DO YOUR DUTY.—“Let all people,” says Plato, “whether successful or unsuccessful, whether they triumph or not, let them do their duty and rest satisfied.”

THE EXACT TRUTH.

A party of English visitors was being shown round a famous Scotch abbey, and one who gave himself the air of being the wit of the company, said to the guide, “Now, old fellow, we don't want any cock-and-bull stories about this place; tell us what you are sure is true—the exact truth, you know.”

“Ay, sir,” quietly replied the guide, and walked on in silence.

He led the party through the abbey, and then turning at the gate said, “Ye've seen the auld abbey.”

“Yes,” said the Englishman, “but can't you tell us by whom it was built, or anything about it?”

“The exact truth,” returned the Scot, “is—that's the auld abbey. I canna swear to ony mair aboot it,” and he left them.

WILLING TO RISK IT.

“Do you know, young man,” said the old gentleman, looking keenly at him, “that in asking for my daughter you ask me to part with something that is most dear to me?”

“Yes,” said the business-like youth, “and I expect she will be rather dear to me too; but it will take her a long time to run through £5,000 in Consols, and nearly as much in gas and water.”

A GREAT BENEFIT.—The greatest benefit that comes to a man from a woman's society is that he has to think of somebody to whom he is bound to be constantly attentive and respectful.

FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD.

Travelling in a second-class carriage between Hamburg and Berlin, Saphir, the Jewish humorist, had a little misunderstanding with a lady, the only occupant of the compartment besides himself, in reference to the opening of a window.

“You don't appear to know the difference, Mein Herr, between the second and third class,” said the lady, cuttingly.

“Oh, madame!” said Saphir, “I am an old railway traveller; I know all the class distinctions. In the first-class the passengers behave rudely to the guards, in the third the guards behave rudely to the passengers, in the second” (with a bow to his fellow-traveller) “the passengers behave rudely to each other.”

A GOOD INVESTMENT.—If a girl empties her purse into her head, no one can take it away from her. An investment in knowledge always pays the best interest.

YOU CAN BE MINE IF YOU LIKE.

“Will you be mine, darling?” he asked, after a year's courting.

“No; it can never be,” was her reply.

“Then why have you let me hope so long?” he said, as he went towards the door.

“Because I intend never to belong to any man. You can be mine if you like.”

He saw the difference, and stopped.

A few years afterwards he saw the difference still more clearly.

MORE LIGHT.

A wise man having a window one yard high and one yard wide, and requiring more light, enlarged his window to twice its former size, yet the window was still only one yard high and one yard wide. How was this done?

This is a catch question in geometry. The window was diamond-shaped at first, and afterwards made square.

ENGAGED.—No woman who loves rightly, and means rightly, insists upon keeping an engagement secret.

THE MATRIMONIAL YOKE.—For men of higher intellectual avocation, for poets, philosophers, and for all those in general who devote themselves to science and art, celibacy is preferable to the married life, because the conjugal yoke prevents them from creating great works.—Schopenhauer.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

ENQUIRER AFTER TRUTH.—We have pleasure in drawing attention to the course of lectures to be given at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, on "Human Nature and Non-Christian Systems," by the Rev. C. L. Engström, rector of St. Mildred and St. Margaret-Moses, E.C., secretary and lecturer of the Christian Evidence Society. Every Sunday from May 5th to July 7th (omitting May 19th and June 23rd), at 3.30 p.m. A list of the subjects of these, the "Boyle Lectures," to be had on application at the office of the society, 13, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

ART.

A WOULD-BE ROSA BONEUR.—The exhibitions of the Royal Institute of Painters in Oil Colours are held in the galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, in Piccadilly. They are open to the works of all artists, subject to selection, and members are elected by the Committee. The exhibitions are annual, and commence in November or December. Address the secretary, Royal Institute of Painters in Oil Colours, Piccadilly, W. AUDREY will have to take what is offered her for her painted cards. The specimen sent us is neither very saleable nor pretty.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GRATEFUL FLORENCE.—The nails are appendages of the skin, and belong to the same cutaneous system. They are therefore affected by almost every condition which influences the skin. A disordered, nervous, and digestive system, for example, affects the nails. From your account, we should suppose something of the kind was the matter. In treating them, avoid the use of the penknife, and press back the flesh at the root of the nails with the damp towel, when washing the hands. You had better also take a doctor's advice about your diet, etc.

QUEEN ESTHER.—Palpitation of the heart may arise from indigestion. You had better consult a doctor, and read the articles by "Medicus" in the "G.O.P." on health subjects.

A LOVER OF SPARKS.—The only way of getting well is to try to improve the general health, and consult a doctor upon your diet and medicine.

ANXIOUS TO LEARN.—"Hosanna" means "save now"—Matt. xxi. 9—is used either as a form of blessing or an ascription of praise. Thus, when "Hosanna" was shouted, as in the passage just cited, it was as if the people had cried in joyful exclamations on every side, "Lord, preserve this son of David; heap favours and blessings on Him, and through Him on us." The same exclamation is supposed to have been used in the procession at the Feast of Tabernacles.

HEATHER BELL will find Green's "Smaller History of the English People" a very interesting one. The second wife of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, was the Countess of Essex, which displeased Queen Elizabeth very much. Elizabeth had previously proposed him as a husband for Mary Queen of Scots. He is supposed to have aspired to Elizabeth's own hand.

F. B. must, we think, postpone her action and all such decisions on religious matters until she be older, and submit at present to her father's wishes.

PARASOLS may be re-covered at home if you wish. You must first take off the old covering, examining and studying it carefully so as to know how to put the new cover on; then unpick one or two of the gores, and use as patterns to cut the new silk by. The stitches must be small and strong, and the whole of the work very evenly performed.

ALLIE.—The initials for embroidering on handkerchiefs are usually placed with the tops towards the centre of the handkerchief. The 21st July, 1862, was a Monday.

EIFFEL TOWER.—Soda makes the hair light in colour, but it makes it brittle, and also ruins its glossy beauty and growth.

LILIAN IVY.—We know of no way but to wash the frames with hot soda and water. The 12th of June, 1876, was a Monday.

C.E.—The phrase "place aux dames" does not apply until school-time be over, and the daughter of the house be promoted to having her name on her mother's card, having been introduced into that circle of society to which her parents' position may entitle her to belong. The earliest limit of age should be eighteen. But there is no hard-and-fast rule as regards precedence in being served at dinner, or the occupation of a back seat in a carriage. Advanced age, or the condition of health, should be considered, and any gentlemanly feeling on the father's part might have to be lovingly overruled by wife and daughter. A well-bred man would invariably insist on being helped last, and before his sons only (if residing at home), and would take a seat with the back to the horses, so long as a grown woman, albeit it were a daughter, could thereby be provided with a better place.

PRAIRIE.—You should communicate with your own family, and endeavour also to see the friends through whom you went out. It might be well to invite them to pay a day's visit, or to go to see them, and to consult them as to whether you should endeavour to make a change to recruit your health before too far broken-down to earn your own livelihood as you did before. Your parents should be your guides in so difficult a position; and your friends (before-named) might assist you in following their advice. You might go away on a visit, and perhaps permanently.

A LITTLE SCOTCH LASSIE has a great love of nature, which is, of itself, nearly enough to make her a poet, and so her attempts are worthy of notice. But she needs study and time, and also perseverance in writing, to find out how much talent she may have. Dr. Angus' "Handbook of the English Tongue," which is published by the Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row, E.C. (price 5s.), will be a help to her in her study of language, and the true nature and rules of composition in poetry and prose.

VIOLET seems to be very young and foolish. She drinks vinegar, and writes love poems, and does not seem to have grasped the purpose of her life here, which is to serve and love God and her brother, and come short in none of her daily home duties. To take much vinegar means to destroy her digestion and deteriorate the blood, and she will cease to be a worthy object of love if she fall into ill-health through her own folly.

IN SUMMER TIME.

DAISIES nod and blue-bells ring,
Streamlets laugh and song birds sing,
To the clover bee-lips cling.

Cornfields wave their locks of gold,
Poppies burn and wings unfold,
Earth stars twinkle on the mould.

Butterflies—live blossoms, blown
From that Eden once our own—
Make of every flower a throne.

And a royal purple dyes
Yonder heather-hill, that lies Fitting footstool for the skies.

And the gorse is all ablaze,
Lighting up the moorland ways,
And the days are golden days.

E'en the myriad mooded sea
(Earth-bound, yet than earth more free)
Wears a look of constancy.

And your love, that in the spring
Was a shy, uncertain thing,
Like a bud just blossoming,

With the summer's growth has grown,
Till our two lives, lived as one,
Make a summer of their own.

PHEASANTS.

By BARONNE H. DE BOERIO.

I WONDER if any of "Our Girls" keep pheasants. Of course numbers go in for poultry. Indeed, I can hardly imagine any girl who lives in the country and has plenty of room not doing so. What a source of amusement and interest, but also what a source of anxiety in the spring-time, when hens that ought to sit won't sit, or calmly desert their nests after a week or so, and utterly ruin a valuable covée.

"Theo" has written some very interesting and useful chapters on poultry-keeping during the last few months, chapters which I have read with a great deal of interest as a poultry-keeper, and from which I have taken some valuable hints.

Now I propose to tell "Our Girls" all I know about pheasants, and as I have kept them some years, with very good results, I daresay my experience will be of use to some one or other.

There are thirty-one different sorts of pheasants, all handsome, gay-plumaged birds, each more splendid than his neighbour, so that it is difficult to say which is the most beautiful.

Those most known are the common wood pheasant, the Silver, the Gold, Lady Amherst, Swinhoé, Cabot, Elliot, Vénére. Most people imagine that to keep pheasants successfully one must have a large parquet with plenty of grass, low-lying bushes, etc. This is quite an erroneous idea, though I do not deny that if possible it is preferable, as more approaching to their natural state. All created things must be happier and healthier under the conditions of their natural state, from man downwards, ça va sans dire; but it is within our power, by order and great cleanliness, to render the captives' life on the whole happy enough. Those born in captivity know not what they have lost, so make the best of what they have, and, as far as my experience goes, thrive well.

I have not a very large garden, so my pheasants have less space than I should like to give them.

My aviary is 48 ft. long, 6 ft. wide, and 6 ft. high. It is divided into four compartments; each compartment has a little wooden house for shelter, just large enough for a cock and two hens. Of these shelters, however, they take no advantage, remaining outside in all weathers.

Gravel and sand are laid down thickly, and well raked every morning. Sometimes I plant old pear trees in the centre to serve as perches; but they are not very necessary, as pheasants do not seem to care about perching themselves, at least, mine do not, and if the birds are at all wild, the pear trees break the tail feathers as they fly up suddenly.

I feed mine morning and evening on buckwheat. In the spring and summer I give them green food of all sorts—cabbage leaves, grass, salad, groundsel, etc., at middle day. This is very necessary. Also worms and snails, as I happen to find them in the garden, and occasionally a little sopped bread for a treat.

On this fare my pheasants thrive splendidly, their plumage is glossy and healthy, and they themselves always appear cheerful and contented. During seven years not one has died from disease; though last year a friend's ferret got to the birds and killed twelve in one night. My feelings towards that friend and his ferret were not of the warmest, or rather, I should say, they were too warm for some time after. Four were replaced at once, but the rest, though promised, came not, and old Father Time will be a year older next month since the accident. I also lost a cock golden pheasant last year. He was rather wild, and someone coming round the corner upon him suddenly, he flew upwards swiftly, struck his head in a vulnerable part against the woodwork of the aviary, and fell down dead. I mourned him sincerely, but as there was nothing else to be done I ate him, and very tender and delicious he was too.

I do not know how much buckwheat costs in England, but here in Brittany it is 12 francs the 100 kilos, or about 10s. the 200 pounds. This quantity ought to last fifteen pheasants from three months to three months and a half. I give my birds only just enough buckwheat for their breakfast and dinner, as whatever is left over is eaten by the sparrows, who hop in through the wire netting by dozens, and eat as much, if not more, than the pheasants. Of course this is easily avoided by using the very smallest netting; but mine is unfortunately just large enough to admit these little thieves, and they fly in and out so nimbly it is impossible to catch them. And now I will tell you about the management of the young pheasants. To anyone used to bringing up chickens it is quite the easiest thing in the world, and not at all the delicate operation some people make it out.

In the first place you must put hens to sit on your pheasant eggs. Very few pheasants are good sitters or mothers; they are quite the exception. Though the common pheasant seems to get on well in her native state, in captivity it is far safer to put the eggs under a hen, a smallish hen with small feet, and quiet in her movements, as most of the pheasants' eggs are smaller and more breakable than fowls', and the little ones are half the size of chickens when born, and easily killed by an awkward and large-footed mother. The tamer and quieter the mother, the more likely are you to bring up your brood without any accidents of this kind. Bantams and Silkies are the best fowls for bringing up pheasants.

The eggs take about twenty-one days to hatch. They should be put under the hen as fresh as possible, though I have known eggs a month old before the hen began to sit hatch out all right. One of my golden pheasants laid thirty-five eggs straight off on end, so that had she been left to sit herself her first eggs would have been over the month.

Every day I look to my nests and take away the eggs; this is most necessary with the silver pheasant, as both cocks and hens are often inveterate egg-eaters; this is the bane of the race; with some it is so confirmed a vice that unless you are present when the egg is laid, it is almost impossible to get an unbroken egg at all, and you are obliged to give up all hopes of breeding.

The young pheasants require much the same treatment as chickens; they require no food for the first twenty-four hours; after that time you must give them ants' eggs, picking out the eggs, placing them on a board, and pointing them out to the young pheasants with the point of a small stick; this is, of course, the mother's work, and sometimes she does it so well there is no need to occupy yourself with the matter, but it is most necessary that the young should eat plenty during these first days. The water, place as for chickens.

After fifteen days mix a little millet-seed with the ants' eggs, gradually increasing the seed and reducing the quantity of eggs. After a month you may give them buckwheat, and if it is more convenient, leave off the ants' eggs.

Young pheasants require otherwise precisely the same treatment as chickens. A nice dry run, with plenty of grit and grass to scratch in, well exposed to the morning sun, if hatched as late as June, as the midday sun burns too much. I forgot to say, when talking of their first food, that lettuce and a little onion chopped very, very small must be given regularly after the second day, and continued for a fortnight or so.

Damp or wet is fatal to young pheasants as to chickens, and very great care must be taken in this respect.

I have now only four sorts of pheasants: Swinhoé, the golden and silver pheasant, and the faisan des bois à collier. I have not the slightest idea of the English name, so I give the French. It is in every respect like the common pheasant, save for a white collar and green horns lying back horizontally. Each cock has two hens, so I am not so badly off after all, despite my friend and the ferret. Another smaller aviary is waiting to be filled; in it I shall put Lady Amhersts and Venérés, two magnificent kinds of pheasants.

And now about the price. Here, in France, I buy my birds through the Journal de l'Acclimatation, a very useful paper in much the same style as the Exchange and Mart. The birds being offered by ladies and gentlemen who, like myself, go in for breeding for pleasure, are very much cheaper than those offered by professionals.

Swinhoés are generally 35f. to 40f. a couple, Venérés ditto, at one year old. Golden and silver faisans des bois à collier 15f., 20f., and 25f. a couple, according to their age, though I have bought bargains which turned out very well 10f. the couple. Lady Amherst, de Cabot, and Elliot are from 25f. to 35f. Of course the cheapest way to get up your stock of pheasants is to buy eggs in March and April, and put them under a hen. The eggs vary from 8f. to 22f. the dozen, according to the sort. In order to be sure of selling mine, when I have any over, I sell them a few francs under the usual price, and they are sure to be snapped up at once. I can assure "Our Girls" that though pheasants demand a little outlay at first, they will, if properly cared for, fully repay the trouble, not only paying their own expenses, but bringing in a nice little sum to their owner. This with systematic care—mind, not much care one day and oblivion the next; but this, we hope, is not the likely sort of thing any of "Our Girls" would do.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHEN the great lady came, Kitty found to her surprise that she was comparatively a young woman, not older than the Queen, only a few years over thirty. But in these anxious times, when boys and girls shot up into men and women, because of the exigencies of the situation, their seniors soon passed from the noon of life into the lengthening shadows which herald the decline of day. The air and habit of command likewise tended to lend a majestic, mature air to persons hardly past the flower of their age.

Charlotte de la Tremoille or Stanley was not very tall, though she carried her figure so well that none missed the absent inches which would have given her the advantage of statelier height; she had a striking, rather than a beautiful face, a strong nose, a straight, firm, but not thin lipped mouth, a chin already with a slight tendency to double itself, and notably arched black brows. She had the bright dark eyes of her father's country, while there was a trace of her mother's Dutch descent in the lingering red and white of a complexion which in its bloom Rubens might have painted. She was dressed in a plain, dark cloth travelling hood and mantle. As Lady Ottery would have said, she was beyond dress: it could neither add to nor take from her dignity, though on occasions, to grace a family event or a public ceremonial, she wore the costly stuffs and jewels of a princess, which simply became her.

She entered the lodging in the High Street with as much quietness and grace as if she had never dwelt in palaces. She spoke in the same unaffected, unobtrusive manner, calling Lady Ottery, with evident sincerity, her friend—her old friend —begging her blessing, and inquiring with interest after her welfare, before she proceeded to tell about herself.

But with all Lady Derby's quietness, it would have been a bold man or woman who would have either interrupted or contradicted her. Kitty felt as if a disapproving look from these bright dark eyes, which scanned everything and seemed to pierce one through and through, would be sufficient to turn an offender into stone. She did not refuse to let her eyes rest on Kitty as Lady Pembroke had done; Lady Derby even smiled on the girl. "A young kinswoman of thine, Lady Ottery?" she took the trouble to inquire. "Not a granddaughter? Surely thou hadst neither chick nor child when I had the good fortune to come across thee."

"A goddaughter, an your ladyship please; the child of a friend, a learned and worthy doctor of the University. Her mother, who was likewise my friend, died soon after her birth, and she hath had to be beholden to me for such womanly training and countenance as I could give her."

"She could not be in better hands, my friend," commented the Countess, gently; "say you not so, my young lady?" And she turned again to Kitty.

The girl, whose whole impatient youthful nature had risen in rebellion against the oppressive supremacy of Lady Pembroke, rose as by an impulse she could not restrain, walked across the room, curtsied down to the ground, and kissed the white hand which was held out to her by one to whom the act of receiving homage was as natural as it was to sleep or to breathe. Lady Derby had royal tact, too, and something of the exquisite grace and kindliness which made so many of the faults of her countrywoman, Henrietta Maria, be forgotten by those who came into personal contact with her Majesty. In other respects the women were very unlike.

Lady Derby turned aside to Lady Ottery, and said, with an expressive little nod, while Kitty was still within hearing—

"I like the child; I believe she is as good as she is charming. I would that I had her as a companion and friend for my daughters. If she had been in Lancashire" (she pronounced the word "Lenquishire," though she spoke English much better than the Queen spoke it), "and if my son Strange had not been as old as she, I could have wished her, for her own sake, as well as for his, to have been one of the twenty young ladies—daughters of knights and squires—who carried his train at his christening. Ah! I shall always say that was the prettiest sight I have seen since I came to your England; you will forgive a wife and mother for saying so."

Withal Lady Derby was a born and therefore a perfect courtier. She had come from Chester, where the Earl had a house, to make her relationship with the husband of the little English Princess an excuse for craving an audience in order to plead the cause of her lord, which ought not to have needed any pleading. Lord Derby was a nobleman of the highest personal qualities, who from the moment that the Parliament resorted to violent resistance to the Royal mandate, exerted his great power in the North of England on Charles' side. But James Stanley's family pride did not recommend itself to the King, and his austere virtue, though it might have been more acceptable to his master, was equally in disrepute with many of the King's servants. In return for Lord Derby's exertions on behalf of the Crown, he received marked and repeated slights. At this very moment the troops which he had raised in Lancashire were put under another commander, while he had the Royal orders to repair to his domain of Man and defend it against any possibility of attack. The command sounded what it was, a polite excuse for getting and keeping the Earl out of the way.

But not a word of any grievance passed the Countess's discreet lips. The King was the King whatever he did. He was also included in the alliance between the great Orange, de la Tremoille, and Tour d'Auvergne families. In the same manner the lady talked with the greatest complacency, and without a single word of censure, of the Queen and her Court; of those endless diversions of hers—balls, plays, and so forth, indulged in at such a season—which were beginning to provoke sharp criticism even among the friends of the Royalist cause; of the tribe of plotters, Jesuits and Papists, she kept about her. It might have been supposed that all these offences would have appeared especially heinous to the daughter of a great Huguenot leader, who had suffered severely for his religion. But she was a grande dame, with all a grande dame's weakness, no less than her strength, to the core, even as she was a high-minded, heroic-souled woman. She spoke of someone who had offended her without a trace of unseemly reviling, but with a cold implacability which appalled Kitty. Lady Derby talked a little to Lady Ottery of how she, the Countess, should settle her sons and daughters in life for their profit and happiness, above all, for the honour of their family; as if these high-born young men and women could not by any possible chance be supposed to have a voice in the matter. She went as she came, in the serenity of an absolute security as to her position, and of the utter absence of self-consciousness.

Within the year there flew all over England the wonderful tale of how the Countess of Derby, in the absence of the Earl, her husband, was holding out his house of Latham against a Parliamentary army. Latham was a great mass of building, standing on a Lancashire flat. The building had nine ordinary towers, and a tenth, the Eagle's Tower, higher than all, in the middle. The gatehouse was also defended with strong towers, and there was a moat nine yards wide and two deep, protected by strong palisades. While as yet only watched by the Parliamentary general and his men, the Lady of Latham had contrived to store the place by night with food, ammunition, and soldiers, herself singling out every sentinel for his post, and appointing a siege captain.

Latham, she answered that she much wondered Sir Thomas should ask her to give up her husband's house without offence on his part, and begged to consult him.

Sir Thomas declined the delay involved in communicating with a gentleman in the Island of Man, and invited her to meet him and his generals at New Park, another house of Lord Derby's in the neighbourhood. She answered she did not forget either the honour of her lord or her own birth, and conceived it more knightly that he, Sir Thomas, should wait on her than she on him.

She consented to receive a deputation of his colonels, when she let them see plainly from where she sat at the end of her long hall, with her two young daughters by her side, that the house had been really converted into a fortress bristling with men and guns.

When the siege began* Lady Derby and her two noble girls—Lady Mary and Lady Catherine Stanley—saw to everything, distributed food and powder, attended to the wounded, and often visited the ramparts. It was only after bullets had fallen two or three times into the countess's bedroom that she consented unwillingly to change it. A shell burst in the dining-room when the family were at dinner, breaking glass and scattering furniture; but the children were so well trained that, to their mother's satisfaction, they did not move, and scarcely changed colour.

She had service celebrated by the chaplain four times every day in the chapel, and with her women punctually attended each service. Yet, alas! alas! when an exchange of prisoners could not be effected with the Parliamentary army, she consented to the massacre of those at Latham House.

The Earl of Derby, away in Man, hearing the news of the siege and not knowing how it was going with his lady, sent a letter to Sir Thomas Fairfax asking him to permit the Countess and her children to quit Latham House, "if it seems good to my wife," the letter ended.

Sir Thomas forwarded the letter to Lady Derby, and her silence signified that it did not seem good to her to leave Latham.

Sir Thomas withdrew from the siege, and Colonel Rigby, who took his place, commanded the lady rudely to surrender. She sent him back his letter torn in two, telling him he should neither have her person, goods, nor house. Sooner than fall into his hands her goods and house might burn, and she and her children perish in the flames.

To the horror even of the rough soldiers, a mortarpiece, charged with grenades, was brought against Latham, but it was captured and destroyed in a sortie of the garrison.

In the meantime the dame's provisions were running short, though for that matter she would have echoed the defiance of little Robert Blake, when he kept Taunton for the Parliament, and replied to the scoff that he would be starved out presently, "Will eat my boots first."

* Life of the Countess of Derby.

What was still harder to bear, Lady Derby was apprised of Royalist defeats on every side, while she could not know that the Earl of Derby had written to her kinsman, Prince Rupert, offering his troopers three thousand pounds to raise the siege of Latham and relieve the Earl's brave wife.

Communication with the world without had grown so difficult that after a poor woman, who had been employed to carry out letters and papers, had submitted to have her hands burned to the bone sooner than betray the secrets of her employers, the garrison were reduced to availing themselves of the services of a dog, which went to and fro with a slip of paper hidden in its collar. But one day in swimming the moat the animal was shot in sheer wantonness by one of the besieging soldiers.

After all it was Lord Derby himself who had the supreme triumph of raising the siege, and delivering his wife and children. He was able to reach the coast of Lancashire in time to join forces with Rupert, and lead the attack on the town of Bolton, where the Parliamentary General lay, routing the enemy, and of course freeing Latham and its mistress. Prince Rupert sent his cousin twenty-two flags taken from the Parliamentary soldiers, and she hung them with pride round her chapel. But she had to seek refuge with her family in Man, and six months afterwards, Latham, without its lord and lady, surrendered.

Kitty Dacre was full of girlish enthusiasm when she heard of the defence of Latham. She admired her heroine almost as much as she honoured Lady Ottery's hero, gallant, God-fearing old Sir Jacob Astley, whose famous prayer at the head of his column before the battle of Edgehill was known to his contemporaries, and has been handed down to later generations: "Lord, thou knowest how busy I must be this day; if I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me. March on, boys."

EVENINGS AT THE OBSERVATORY.

By SIR ROBERT S. BALL, F.R.S., Astronomer Royal for Ireland.

AM attempting in these papers to give a conception of the varied nature of the objects which the skies offer to our contemplation. We have looked at a body of the most solid description, evidently cold and hard, in the moon. We then saw that Saturn was entirely destitute of those rigid features which gave the moon its beauty. The charms of Saturn lie in quite another direction. Then we passed from these sun-illuminated bodies to a group of suns themselves in the glorious star cluster. Now we look to an entirely different class of objects, compared with which even the vast clouds of Saturn must be considered as dense and opaque.

The telescope, ever an ally in the study of the heavens, is in this part of the science absolutely indispensable. In other branches of astronomy we can learn something without its aid. Indeed, many great astronomical discoveries were made long before the telescope was invented. But ere this memorable event in the history of science, it was impossible for us to know anything of the existence of the nebulae. It is indeed true that there is one of these objects which can be just detected by the naked eye. It lies in the constellation of Andromeda, where, on a clear and dark night, a faint spot of light can just be discerned by a good eye. But a mere glimpse gives us really no adequate notion of the true character of the object. It might only, so far as the naked eye discloses its nature, be a cluster of stars like that we have already discerned in Perseus, or like the similar group that, under the name of the Beehive, is comparatively familiar in the constellation of Cancer. With the single exception of the nebula in Andromeda, all the objects so called are entirely telescopic, yet how important a constituent the nebulae form in the contents of the heavens will be shown by a look at some of the lists of these objects. There are now several thousands of the nebulae known, and their positions in the sky, as well as the details of their appearances, are fully set forth in the catalogues.

It will therefore be proper that during our evenings at the observatory more opportunity should be taken to examine these mysterious nebulae. An exceptionally fine night should be chosen for this purpose. The sky should be clear and bright and the moon should be absent. Indeed, when the moon is present the light it scatters over the sky is sufficient entirely to extinguish the faint nebulae, and greatly to impair the lustre and the beauty of the brighter ones. A good test of the suitability of a night for such purposes is found in the visibility of the milky way. If it be seen clearly spanning the sky, then the night will usually be favourable for such observations. From the same considerations we may infer that it will not do to choose nights in the middle of summer. Then the twilight glow over the sky in our northern latitudes has a similar effect to the moonbeams, in so far as it greatly detracts from the telescopic effectiveness of the nebulae. In fact, these objects are most of them so faint that the caution I have already given as to the liability to disappointment must be especially remembered. Many of them can only be made out by careful watching, and for the fainter ones an eye specially trained to such work is required. It is for nebulae that the leviathan reflectors have been chiefly constructed. The great mirrors are specially adapted to grasp all the feeble rays of light that these objects diffuse, and concentrate them so as to produce an image bright enough to admit of being observed.

The most glorious constellation of stars in the firmament is undoubtedly that of Orion. This splendid group is seen in the south during the winter months, and towards the close of January it is situated in a very convenient position for observing early in the evening. The group is specially characterised by the number of unusually bright stars which it includes, and the three stars in the centre, forming the so-called Belt of Orion, is as well-known a celestial figure as the sky contains. Directly under the belt are three much smaller stars nearly in a line, which points directly upwards to the middle star of the belt. These three lower stars are usually known as the sword handle of Orion, this being the position which they occupied in the fanciful old sketches of the constellation. The three stars of the sword handle of Orion are plunged into the great nebula. This object cannot be seen by the unaided eye, though doubtless around the central star a little haziness is perceptible, and even the slightest telescopic aid will suffice to indicate that the central star of the sword handle is attended by a surrounding glow of light, which renders it quite unlike other stars. This can indeed be sufficiently shown with an ordinary opera glass, one glance through which will awaken in the beholder a keen desire to study the object under more favourable conditions. But to do justice to the object, telescopes of large power are desirable.

To realise fully the magnificence of the great nebula, the observer who is being introduced to the object for the first time should not, strange to say, direct the telescope at the nebula; the instrument should rather be pointed at the heavens, just a little to the west of the nebula. The clock driving the equatorial should not be started, and the observer should take his seat and look through the eyepiece before the nebula has entered the field. He will see, no doubt, a few stars on the deep black background, which gradually pass in procession across his field of view. This is merely the ordinary diurnal journey of the heavens, by which all the objects move slowly from east to west; I ought rather to say appear to move, for of course the motion on the heavens is only apparent, the fact being that it is the earth which is turning around.

After the observer's eye for a minute or so has become familiarised with the dark aspect of the heavens under ordinary circumstances, he will begin to perceive on the eastern side (it will appear in the telescope no doubt as on the western side) a faint dawn of light. Gradually there will steal across his field of view a sort of ghostlike luminosity that is in marked contrast to the darkness in the rest of the field; as the seconds move on, this object will disclose itself until the full splendour of the great nebula comes into view; then the entire field will be filled with the light, and then it will gradually advance and gradually pass away again to emphasise the contrast between the brilliance of the nebula and the darkness of the sky. Unless this method is adopted, the full interest of a telescopic view of the great nebula is not attained, for when the entire field is full of the glow the beginner will hardly recognise the nebula. He will be apt to think that the fainter part of the field he sees is the ordinary groundwork of the sky, and this illusion can only be dispelled by enabling him to witness the actual contrast in the way I have described. The central portions of the nebula are, however, so brilliant and so wonderfully marked with interesting detail, that even a small instrument will suffice to reveal much of its beauties. In the centre of the nebula is the star known to astronomers as Theta Orionis, the most prominent star of the sword handle. To the eye this looks like an ordinary star, but the telescope speedily dispels that notion. Theta Orionis is found to consist of four, or rather six, stars all so close together that the unaided eye fails to distinguish them separately. A structure so complex gives to this star quite a special, indeed a unique, interest, wholly apart from the marvellous nebula of which it is the focus. We must dwell a little on the peculiarities of this star. We are familiar with stars which are called double; there are indeed some ten thousand of objects so designated, known to astronomers and duly registered in catalogues. Some of these are no doubt merely casually doubles. It happens that two stars lie nearly in the same line of vision: they are thus found to be very close together in the heavens. Such objects are merely said to be optically double, and so far as their physical nature is concerned they are of comparatively little interest, though their practical utility in facilitating the discovery of the distance of the nearer of the pair ought not to be overlooked. It will, however, often happen that two stars are not merely apparently near each other on the sky, but are actually quite close together in comparison, that is, to the immense distance at which they are both separated from our system. This we know because we often see the stars actually revolving one around the other, not, it is true, with any very rapid motion, in the ordinary acceptance of the word. One of the stars may require many years to complete a revolution around the other, but the fact that such revolution has been noticed is sufficient in the cases where it occurs to prove the connection existing between these stars. We must also, of course, remember that these stars are suns of stupendous proportions and from a view of our own system, in which the great planets take many years to complete one of their mighty journeys around the central orb, it is not in the least to be wondered at that the periods of revolution of these double stars should demand not less intervals of time. Many of these double stars are objects of extreme telescopic beauty; sometimes they offer to our admiration a delightful contrast of colours; perhaps one will be topaz colour and the other bluish, or on rare occasions a pair of emerald gems will be seen with an invisible band of mutual connection. Sometimes triple stars are found, in which three stars are obviously in alliance; but multiple stars of greater complexity are comparatively rare; and so marvellous a spectacle as Theta Orionis, in which no fewer than six stars are obviously an allied group, is an absolutely unique phenomenon. It is not a little remarkable that we find the most exquisite multiple star which the sky can show, beautifully framed or set in the centre of the grandest of the nebulae. Of course it might conceivably happen that the apparent concourse of these objects was fortuitous. The actual phenomenon could be accounted for by the belief that the great nebula was either very much nearer or very much farther than the multiple star, and that they happened to lie in the same line of sight, and had no other connection. But to me it appears that this view is quite at variance with every reasonable probability, that the most wondrous multiple star should have happened to lie in line with the very centre of the most wondrous nebula, would indeed have been a coincidence, against the occurrence of which the probabilities were almost infinite. There can be no doubt that the multiple star and the great nebula are part of the same system, and that the star is, in truth, placed in the middle of the nebula, as it actually appears.

mysterious object. Here, indeed, the terrestrial analogies seem to render us but little assistance. While we were discoursing about the moon, we could appeal to the volcanoes, both active and extinct, on the globe, as offering some clues to the nature of the lunar moonbeams. So also when we were speaking of Saturn we were able to derive some assistance in our attempt to understand it by the analogy of the clouds we know so well, but no such resource is open when we study the nebula; we may look in vain for natural phenomena on this globe which shall render the needful assistance.

The word nebula means, of course, a little cloud, but the expression is apt to be a misleading one. In a sense no doubt they are little, inasmuch as the patch of the sky which a nebula covers would be small compared with one of our ordinary clouds. Indeed, a nebula which covered as large an apparent part of the sky as the size of the moon would be ranked as a large object of its class, while even the greatest of them is perhaps not more than ten or twelve times as great. Nor is the word cloud, as applied to nebula, an appropriate one. What we mean by a cloud is of course only a vast mass of watery vapour raised by the sun from the sea, and poised aloft until such time as it shall be again dispersed into invisible water, or until it shall descend to the earth as rain. Such clouds are of course within the limits of our atmosphere, and are rarely more than a few miles above the earth's surface. The light which renders clouds visible only comes from reflected sunbeams, and at night when the sun is absent, clouds of course become invisible, though the astronomer is often only too unpleasantly reminded of their presence by the opacity with which they shut out the stars from his view.

Utterly different in all respects are the nebulae. They are not masses of watery vapour. It may no doubt possibly be that water in some form is there, but it is not water which we see. We are looking at some gaseous material of a bluish hue. The light with which it glows is no reflected sunlight. The nebula is indeed indebted to no foreign source for that weird—I had almost said ghost-like—radiance which it gives forth. The light comes from the nebula itself. But how, it may well be asked, should a purely gaseous substance be able to radiate forth light? It is easy for us to comprehend how stars or suns or comparatively solid bodies can, in virtue of their tremendous temperature, glow with heat like red hot or white hot iron. It is true that flame is gas in an incandescent state, but in flame a vehement chemical union of oxygen with some other substance is in progress, and this is the source of the heat and the light that flame gives forth. We can, I think, not regard the great nebula in Orion as originating in anything resembling flame.

We can, however, in our physical laboratories arrange an experiment which seems to throw some light on the composition of the nebulae. Into a glass tube a small quantity of hydrogen gas is admitted, the air having been previously extracted. Then, by means of two wires, one at each end of the tube, an electric current is transmitted through the gas. Here there is no combustion; the gas is merely the vehicle by which the electricity flows from one pole to the other. In doing so the gas instantly begins to glow with an intense bluish light, and a very beautiful effect is produced, which can be renewed or terminated at will by simply making or breaking the electric current. It would seem as if the gas we see in the nebula were in a condition somewhat analogous to the gas in the tube. I do not mean that the passage of electricity through the nebula is the source of its luminosity. There is, indeed, no ground for such a supposition. It is the property of electricity when passing through a conductor to warm that conductor; thus we know that if a powerful current be transmitted through a wire of the most infusible of all metals, platinum, the wire will not only get warm, but it may become red hot, white hot, and even melt under the influence of the heat which is generated. In those beautiful incandescent electric lamps which are now happily coming into such extensive use a current of electricity flows through a filament of carbon, and kindles that exquisite incandescence which is maintained while the current flows. It would appear that so long as the electricity is flowing through the glass tube its action on the gas is to impart a very high temperature. It is in consequence of this temperature that the gas glows. Now we can offer a reasonable account of the luminosity of the great nebula in Orion. The particles of gaseous or vaporous material of which it is formed are of an extremely high temperature, sufficient to enable them to glow with the brilliancy which renders them visible.

It is now almost twenty years since a marvellous accession to our knowledge of such objects as the great nebula in Orion was made by Dr. Huggins. I have used our gas hydrogen as an illustration in describing the character of the nebula, but I have now to add that the presence of hydrogen is no mere fiction but a substantial verity. Truly we here open up one of the most marvellous chapters which science has to disclose. The chemist can analyse two different substances on the earth with his test tubes, and he can tell the elements of which they are composed. But in this old-fashioned chemistry it was at least reasonable for the chemist to demand a portion of the substance he was expected to analyse. Unless he were provided with a sample, how would it be possible for him to grind it up or submit it to the various operations of his laboratory? In these modern days the chemist can perform operations of which his predecessors never even dreamed. No doubt the old method is still used—nay, is indeed at this moment cultivated with greater skill and means than in any previous age—but side by side with the old method, and as an invaluable supplement thereto, the new method of chemical research, called spectrum analysis, has been created, and has already conducted to many profoundly interesting discoveries in the most varied branches of science.

In the application of the spectroscopic method it is not indispensably necessary that we actually have a fragment of the substance; all we require is a beam of light which that substance can be made to yield when heated to a sufficiently high temperature. No doubt this statement should receive some more precise qualifications, but for our present purpose it will indicate the nature of spectrum analysis with sufficient accuracy.

To begin with a simple case, the colour of a light will often afford an indication of its character. Thus the red light seen in displays of fireworks is due to the presence of the element strontium. The ghastly yellow hue produced by burning common salt with spirits of wine is equally characteristic of sodium. Rarely, however, in nature is a simple unmixed light presented to us, as it is no doubt in the two cases I have mentioned. Suppose that a number of distinct hues are blended into a single beam, we could hardly expect to recognise the combination they produce. We must have some method for disentangling the several ingredients so that they can be tested separately.

The spectroscope gives the means of effecting the required decomposition. A beam of light is passed through a wedge-shaped piece of glass called a prism, or more frequently through a whole series of prisms. If the light under examination be a sunbeam, then the prism unfolds a beautiful series of hues; the red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet forming all the colours of the rainbow. Thus we demonstrate the highly composite character of a sunbeam; but the light from the nebula in Orion, with which we are at present concerned, is of a much more simple character.

When a beam of the nebula light is transmitted through the prisms, it declares at once that the object from which that light has come is totally different from a star. Instead of the beautifully coloured band, decked in all the glowing hues of the rainbow, the nebular beam is seen to be composed simply of six or seven widely separated strips. It is of intense interest to test the character of the light in these strips. Fortunately this can be done in a way that is completely satisfactory. We can produce artificial lights from known sources, and observe them through the spectro-scope simultaneously with the light of the nebula. There are in the composition of this globe some sixty or seventy different elementary substances, and speaking generally, each one of these substances can afford a perfectly characteristic spectrum. Thus the way of making the comparison with the nebula is to try with the different elements one after another, until one can be discovered which renders forth a light that is treated by the prism as is the light from the nebula. Pursuing this inquiry, Dr. Huggins found that when hydrogen gas was ignited to incandescence by the passage of electricity, it emitted light which, after passage through the prisms, came to coincidence with one of the lines in the spectrum of nebula; and the hydrogen character of two of the other lines has been since demonstrated. It was thus established that hydrogen is one of the constituents of the great nebula in Orion. Further confirmation of this important discovery was forthcoming when the photographs of the spectrum of the great nebula were subsequently obtained. On those photographs lines were present which are constituted by light of such a nature as to be wholly invisible to the eye, though perceptible on the photographic plate. It is of the greatest interest to discover that these invisible rays from the nebula are also indicative of the presence of hydrogen. Thus we obtain a beautiful confirmation of the fact that the nebula is partly composed of glowing hydrogen.

There are, however, some remaining lines, the character of which has not yet been ascertained.

It would be a little premature to assert that there must be some substance in the great nebula not at present known to us on the earth. This would be, no doubt, one interpretation of the facts. We must, however, admit the possibility of another explanation. It is frequently found that the lines yielded by an incandescent material vary to some extent when the physical conditions of temperature and of pressure are modified. It is, therefore, not impossible that the unknown lines in the spectrum of the great nebula may be due to some element known to us, but which has not yet been tested under the conditions which would make it yield the particular rays we are speaking of.

The composition of a nebula as disclosed to us by these researches is of much interest. Here we are looking at an object which seems to lie on the very surface of the visible universe—an object so remote that our attempts to fathom its distance are quite unsuccessful; yet in this inconceivably distant part of our system we find at least one ingredient which we know so well on the earth. Previous to actual trial no one would have expected, I think, to find the great nebula largely constituted from such a familiar element as hydrogen. This gas enters into the composition of water, and is thus an element of extreme abundance on the earth. That an element so well known to us here should also be abundant in these awfully distant regions of the universe is one of the most astonishing facts which modern science has revealed.

As the eye follows these ramifications of the great nebula, ever fading away in brightness until it dissolves in the blue of the sky; as we look at the multitudes of bright stars which spangle out to us from the depths of the great glowing gas; as we ponder on the marvellous outlines of a portion of the nebula, which a somewhat fanciful imagination has compared to the plan of a great city—we are tempted to ask what the true magnitude of this object must really be. Here, again, we have to confess that science is unable to satisfy this very legitimate curiosity. The only means of learning the true length and the breadth of a celestial object depends upon our first having discovered the distance from us at which the object is situated. Unhappily we are, as I have said, entirely ignorant of what this distance may be in the case of the great nebula in Orion. Our ordinary methods of conducting such an inquiry are hardly applicable to such an object at all, and its position so near the equator introduces fresh difficulties into the problem. We shall, however, certainly not err on the side of exaggeration if we assert that the great nebula must be many millions of times larger than that group of stars and planets all placed in their true position which we call the solar system.

Our evenings at the observatory have now been spent, we have looked at the most remarkable objects which the universe contains, and we have, let us hope, acquired a fresh appreciation of the sublimity of that scheme of creation in which our earth plays a small though very dignified part.

THE LAMP OF LIFE.—The comparison of human life to the burning and going out of a lamp was familiar with Latin authors, as we know by the term senes decrepiti. Plutarch explains the origin of this metaphor thus. The ancients never extinguished their lamps, but suffered them to go out of their own accord, that is, by the last crackle. Hence a lamp just about to expire was said decrepitare, to cease to crackle. Hence, metaphorically, persons on the verge of the grave were called decrepit men.

A PUZZLING QUESTION.

A man walks round a pole, on the top of which is a monkey. As the man moves, the monkey turns round on the top of the pole, so as still to keep face to face with the man. Query, who? the man has gone round the pole, has he or has he not gone round the monkey?

Most persons at first sight will be inclined to answer that the man has not gone round the monkey, since he has never been behind it. The correct reply, however, is that the man has gone round the monkey in going round the pole. That the monkey has turned once on its own axis has really nothing to do with the question.

THREE FRIENDS.—Three people are my friends: she that loves me, she that hates me, and she that is indifferent to me. Who loves me teaches me tenderness; who hates me teaches me caution; who is indifferent to me teaches me self-reliance.

IN GOOD COMPANY.

"It is better for you," says Thackeray, addressing young men, "to pass an evening once or twice a week in a lady's drawing-room, even though the conversation is slow, and you know the girl's song by heart, than in a club, tavern, or the pit of a theatre. All amusements of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious to their nature."

"All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions, and are stupid, or have gross tastes, and revolt against what is pure. Your club swaggers, who are sucking the butts of billiard-cues all night, call female society insipid. Poetry is uninspiring to a yokel; beauty has no charms for a blind man; music does not please a poor beast who does not know one tune from another; but as a true epicure is hardly ever tired of water and brown bread and butter, I protest I can sit for a whole night talking to a well-regulated, kindly woman about her girl Fanny, or her boy Frank, and like the evening's entertainment."

MISERLY BACHELORS.—Misers are generally bachelors. This circumstance, it has been remarked, "undoubtedly originates in a peculiar species of economy; for, possessing the faculty of retention in an eminent degree, they seem averse to the idea of even squandering away their affections."

PERSONAL PROPERTY. The best things in life cannot be borrowed; they must be all our own.

A REPLY BY TELEPHONE.

Brown (who has just had telephonic connection established between his office and house, and is very much pleased with it): "I tell you, Smith, this telephone business is a wonderful thing. I want you to dine with me this evening, and I will notify Mrs. Brown to expect you." (Speaking through telephone): "My friend Smith will dine with us this evening!" Now listen, and hear how distinctly her reply will come back."

Mrs. Brown's reply (coming back with startling distinctness): "Ask your friend Smith if he thinks we keep a hotel."

MUSICAL FAMILIES.—Great musicians almost invariably come of a musical family. It was so with Beethoven, Haydn, and Mozart. Still more striking is the case of the family which boasted John Sebastian Bach as the culminating illustration of its musical genius. Through eight generations it produced multitudes of musicians of high rank, of whom twenty-nine were reckoned eminent.

RED HAIR.

In Ireland locks of the most fiery hue have long been regarded as an attribute of beauty, even by the peasantry. "She's an illigant lady, good luck to her!" some ragged loiterer will say. "She's a mighty fine woman, entirely; only it's a pity that she has not red hair." An old Irish ditty has these lines:—
"Heigh for the apple, and ho for the pear,
But give me the pretty girl with the red hair."

A SUMMER EVENING.

By W. B. YEATS.

THE living woods forego their care,
 Their dread of autumn's mortal wing,
 And shake their birds upon the air,
 And like a silver trumpet ring.

The giddy bee's complacent croon,
 Where long grey grasses bow and bend,
 In all its honey-thickened tune
 Has no word of the sulphurous end.

The sunflowers weave a golden clime,
 As though their season had no date,
 Nod to the iron shoes of Time,
 And play with his immortal hate.

And, maiden, be thou mirthful too,
 Lay down the burden of thy race,
 For God is walking in the dew,
 An evening presence fills the place.

The hollow woodlands feel Him there,
 And dread no more foul autumn's wing,
 And shake their birds upon the air,
 And like a silver trumpet ring.

A CALIFORNIAN STORY.

CHAPTER I.

It was a Californian country house of the usual type—one storey high, built of wood, and sheltered back and front by verandahs covered with Nature's own beautiful drapery, sweet pea vines, and morning glories—the lovely climbing convolvulus of English gardens, looked on here as a pestiferous weed, and usually ruthlessly exterminated; while under the windows were wide shelves holding a dazzling display of scarlet geraniums, begonias, and pinks, although it was yet but the early part of April. The doors and windows were carefully shrouded with mosquito netting, in readiness for the objectionable intruder who might be expected to appear before long, and whose efforts to make life a burden during the long summer months appear to be quite superfluous to us mortals. Around the house were vineyards and fruit orchards, and beyond them stretched grain fields and hay meadows, at that season a plain of living emerald; further still the sheep were grazing on the rocky mountain slopes, while between the hills ran a foaming torrent, one of the most precious possessions imaginable, for it never dried up, and on its banks were to be found spring's fairest floral treasures, hidden in every nook and ravine, over which the feathery blossoms of the Judas-tree cast a rosy shadow.

The "location" itself was a large fruit ranch belonging to a wealthy Englishman, and its occupants were a young brother and sister of the same nationality, the former of whom had spent five years in the country, and having shown great aptitude for the post, had been appointed manager to the absentee owner, who was now living in Europe with his wife and family, but who paid a yearly visit or so to his American estate, to advise and help his young assistant, Charles Aytoun. Once inside the house, you soon forgot the very meagre style of its architecture, so deftly had all the deficiencies been concealed; evidently both the former and the present mistress of the house were women of cultivated tastes, and managed somehow or other to find time to indulge them a little—a very difficult matter in such places, where "help" is scarcely to be had for love or money. There was pretty matting all over the stained floor, the curtains were fancifully looped up with pale blue ribbons, and the little tables standing about were covered with all those trifles which are scarcely valued at home, but which to people "out West" are simply priceless, that is to say, if they have not sunk to the level of their surroundings. For it is a sad fact that in the majority of cases the incessant round of manual labour which generally falls to the lot of a colonist renders him (or her) almost careless of appearances after a few months' residence in the new country, and takes away too often whatever of refinement or culture they may have possessed in early days. The walls, instead of being papered as is usual, were left the natural colour of the wood, and thus made an excellent background for photographs of scenery and a few good water colour sketches of the wonders of the Yosemite valley; the corners and empty spaces were utilised for brackets and bookshelves, the whole presenting a very different aspect from the neighbouring ranches, where, as a rule, nothing but the bare necessities were to be found, not from lack of means, but want of taste.

As summer had not yet arrived, it was still possible to sit outside without being devoured by mosquitoes or flies; and on the back verandah at the shady side of the house two young ladies were reclining comfortably in rocking chairs, a little tea-table between them. The graceful foliage of a cluster of pepper trees hid the farm buildings, which stood behind the house, and the view which met their eyes was a very lovely one. Indeed, there is more than one of these remote places in California which may fitly be described as an earthly paradise during, perhaps, eight months in the year. One of the girls had the rosy cheeks of old England, the other the pale and faded look so common out here; the former, Lilian Aytoun, who was the mistress of the house, had only been a few months in California; while her cousin, Mrs. Selwyn, had been married already some years, and lived with her husband in Colorado. Their ages were respectively nineteen and twenty-six years. Both were pleasant to look upon, well-educated and accomplished, but their fate had called them to a far distant home, where such qualifications were far less valued than the ability to manage a dairy or cook a good dinner.

"If the folks at home could see us now," remarked Lilian, "they would hardly believe what an amount of work I have got through to-day. I do not think I look as if I were in the habit of getting up at five o'clock in the morning, and churning before breakfast. This is the first holiday I have had, Nelly, since I came out here, and yet I feel stronger than I did at home; though I can fancy that if I had to lead the same kind of life for years, as most women do, I should get very tired of it, and cease to care to have pretty things about me. Charley says the summer will try me a good deal though, as the heat is so great; that is why he sent for me in October, so that I might become acclimatised first."

"He was very wise. But do you mean to say you have no help at all?"

"Well, I was determined that the day of your arrival should be in some respects a leisure one, so Charley came home an hour earlier than usual yesterday, and made the bread for me. This morning we both got up extra early to get the dinner arrangements forward, and we decided to have nothing but porridge for breakfast, in order to have no washing up."

"I hope you do not intend to make a visitor of me; that would be rather absurd, considering I have gone through all this sort of thing myself. The first year we were married, Harry and I had to do everything for ourselves, and if he had not been so fortunate in selling his ranch in Arkansas, we should have been just as badly off now. The first use he made of his newly-acquired gains was to write home and ask whether a daughter of his father's gamekeeper would come out to us as our servant; she consented, attracted by the high wages, and has turned out a perfect treasure. I never do anything in the house now; she will not hear of it."

"But are you not afraid she will marry, as they all seem to do in this country, and leave you?"

"She married six months after her arrival; but to Harry's head man, an Englishman, a faithful creature, who makes our interests his own. Like myself, she has no children; if I had, of course I should have a busy life once more; but I often think, when I see the over-worked house-mothers around me, some of them from homes as good as mine was, how thankful I ought to be. Harry sometimes thinks we might have another of Sarah's relatives out, and train her for you; for I suppose in another year you will be able to afford a servant."

"I hope so, for if we had I could have a garden, and flowers would sell very well in Santa Monica, which is only twenty miles off, and is developing, they say, into a kind of small 'health resort.' Charley thinks, as I do, that it would be better if I had something to take me out of doors, and the profit I should make on them would pay nearly half the wages of a girl."

"That is an excellent idea; we must talk it over together before I leave, and see if I cannot help; in the meantime, I am going to take my share in the housework, for it will be a pleasant change to me; so will you tell me what is to be for supper?" (It should be explained that supper is the name given to a six o'clock tea, which is the last meal in all American country households, late dinner being rarely taken.) "I hope you have not adopted the hot one usual here."

"When we are alone we always have cold things, certainly, for we both prefer it, and Charley refuses to allow me to cook at all in the evening, unless for someone very particular indeed; but the neighbours here think me a very stingy housekeeper, and I know several people have remarked on this in an unfriendly way. I do not see any particular virtue in hot meat, but evidently they do."

"I know; but we made it a rule from the first, and anyone who comes to our house has to take what there is. In a country like this, where fruit abounds, it is far more wholesome to have plenty of that on the table than the eternal beefsteak. You have plenty of eggs and cream, I suppose?"

"Oh yes, and strawberries too, though we have not picked any for sale yet, but we have had them on the table for about a fortnight; also cherries. Then we have any amount of last year's canned apricots, peaches, and pears."

"Then I will go and set the table. No, I shall not allow you to leave your chair." And in a quarter of an hour the bright little lady returned, announcing that as all was ready she would like to go for a stroll, and soon the two girls were on the way to meet the master of the house, who was probably by this time on his way home. As they passed the fence which divided the home-field from the "corral" or farmyard, Lily drew her companion's attention to a large tarantula which was impaled upon a thorn. "That is the work of a butcher bird," she explained; "the cruel creatures constantly bring their prey here, and kill them in this unnatural fashion. I am told the object is to attract wild canaries and other small birds, of which they are especially fond; it is supposed that the grasshoppers and various insects which they bring to what they consider a likely place, are intended for bait for their feathered victims, and they lay in wait till they see an opportunity of seizing them by the neck, killing them instantly; the butcher himself is so pretty and tame, it is hard to believe him capable of such wickedness. The oriole, another dreadful mischief-maker and thief, is also very beautiful. His plumage is black and yellow, and the nest is hung from a tree like a basket; but he is poisoned whenever there is a chance of catching him. The number of creatures looked on justly as 'pests' here is almost incredible. Last year was a 'grasshopper year' in some parts of Southern California, and people have told me that they came like a cloud, moving steadily forward till not a vestige of green was found in their march, except the live oaks and the tar-weed. If you left a door or window open, in they came, and would get into drawers and cupboards, and bite holes in whatever they found at hand. A new neighbour of ours, a Mrs. Abbott, who owns a large vineyard about fifty miles away, told me all about it; the Indians had an ingenious way of 'trapping' them, she said. About twenty or thirty of them form a circle round a deep hole, each armed with a large brush made from the manzanita tree, and they sweep and sweep till the insects are driven into the hole, when they throw the brushes over them, setting them alight. As soon as the fire is burnt out, the grasshoppers are taken from this fiery grave, placed in large cone-shaped baskets, and swung on to the Indians' backs, ready to be taken to the camp for future use, for they eat them, and are always delighted when there is a 'grasshopper year'; I believe they are what we call in Europe locusts. But here is Charley at last, and he has someone with him. I think it is the son of the Mrs. Abbott I have just been speaking of."

TYPES OF VIRTUE;

OR,

IDEAL HEROINES OF ENGLISH WRITERS.

By JOHN FRANCIS BREWER.

LOYALTY: FLORA MACIVOR.

IN the strict sense of the word, loyalty is the quality or state of being devoted to the maintenance of the law; and the sovereign being theoretically the chief magistrate, loyalty is used to denote a faithful adherence to allegiance. The allegiance to the king is sworn to by the members of parliament, but the oath was considerably modified after the revolution of 1688, and has been still further modified in the present reign, so that in nature and extent it is now somewhat difficult to define.

In the year 1688 a portion of the English people called a Dutchman to the throne, thereby breaking their oath of allegiance to James II., who was still alive. James had left the country, had ruled tyrannically, and the revolution was effected without bloodshed; nevertheless a great number of the English people—perhaps the majority—regarded him as their lawful king. After William's death, Anne, the daughter of James, ruled. She died without leaving an heir, and the Elector of Hanover was invited by the Whig party to take possession of the throne. He responded to the call, and was proclaimed and crowned as George I. This was in the year 1714, and in the year following the adherents of the Stuarts, under the leadership of the son of James II., the Pretender, as he is called, rebelled, and were for a time successful in defeating the troops sent against them. The rebellion was, however, suppressed, and for thirty years no organised attempt was made to upset the Hanoverian dynasty. Meanwhile George I. had died, and his son had been crowned, and the majority of the English people had become reconciled to the reigning house. Intrigues to restore the Stuarts did not cease, however, as was shown in the year 1745, when Charles Edward, the grandson of James II., made a final effort to gain possession of the throne. This rebellion was also suppressed, and the era of civil war closed in this country.

I recall these events in order to remind my readers of the cause in which Flora MacIvor's enthusiasm, or, as I have called it, loyalty, was enlisted. Of course there are girls who will exclaim, "Flora MacIvor was disloyal, nay, treasonable, in abetting an insurrection against the crowned king, George II." Nor can I contradict them without fighting for a principle, the moral value of which is open to controversy. I use the word "loyalty," however, in the sense it is now often understood, as meaning constancy to a house that hereditarily should possess the throne.

With those who hold exalted notions of kingship, such as the opinion that the sovereign holds power, not by will of the people, but by Divine right, the actions of the king are only to be criticised when they run counter to the obligation we all owe to the Creator. It is presumed by those who hold this opinion that, in the majority of instances, when the king and his subjects disagree, the king is the best judge of what is good for his people, just as a father is a far better judge than his children of what is for their benefit. These theorists would give to the king the command of the executive, of course; would make him chief magistrate, in practice as well as in theory; would give him autocratic power, in short. In Mediæval England the power of the king was kept in check principally by the great nobles, but the terrible Wars of the Roses destroyed so many of these "hereditary legislators," that the king, of necessity, had to create peers, who, owing their advancement to him, became the mere creatures of his pleasure. Thus the Tudors possessed almost unlimited power, and claimed to rule by right Divine; and it was on account of their attempt to carry on the traditions of the Tudors that one Stuart king was beheaded, that another was obliged to fly the kingdom, and that the family was ousted from the throne.

There can be little doubt that an immense number of the English people did not relish the idea of having a Dutch king to rule over them; but William III. was an exceedingly able monarch, and his rival, James II., had made the absurd mistake of leaving the country and relying for help on the French king. After Anne's death the little Elector of Hanover, George I.—the least attractive of monarchs, foreign in sympathy, undignified, ungainly—could hardly gain enthusiasm for himself. Nor could George II. be exactly described as a fascinating man. The Chevalier and his son, on the contrary, possessed that magic charm of manner and those showy qualities which were such marked characteristics of the Stuart family. Thus, both those who had exalted notions of the kingly prerogative and those who were attracted by the Stuart personality, so to speak, were in enmity to the house of Hanover. But there were many others who sought only their own aggrandisement (in fairness, however, it must be stated that the "self-seekers" were at least as numerous on the other side), and it being a most corrupt age, many politicians of high standing "hedged"—to use a sporting phrase—that is to say, received pay from the Court of St. James', and secretly intrigued with the Court of St. Germaines.

In my last article I spoke of Sir Walter Scott as a great writer of fiction; but in addition to that, he may almost be said to be the historian of the Jacobite rebellion. Flora MacIvor is one of the heroines in "Waverley," a work which gives the reader a capital insight into the insurrection of 1745, headed by the young Pretender.

Edward Waverley, the hero of the story, is described as a young man of imaginative temperament, the nephew and heir of a rich baronet of Jacobite opinions, but whose "Jacobitism had been gradually decaying, like a fire which burns out for want of fuel." Owing to his father's wish, Waverley becomes a captain in a regiment of dragoons quartered in Scotland, and Sir Everard, though he regretted that his nephew should enter service under the Hanoverian dynasty, consoled himself "with logic something like Falstaff's, that when war was at hand, although it were shame to be on any side but one, it were worse shame to be idle than to be on the worst side, though blacker than usurpation could make it."

Waverley works at his profession in a half-hearted sort of way, and after awhile determines to pay a visit to the Baron Bradwardine, to whom his uncle had given him a letter of introduction. The Baron is one of Scott's best characters, and the daughter, Rose Bradwardine, is one of the heroines of the novel; a gentle, beautiful, and amiable girl, though she "had not precisely the sort of beauty or merit which captivates a romantic imagination in early youth. She was too frank, too confiding, too kind; amiable qualities, undoubtedly, but destructive of the marvellous, with which a youth of imagination delights to dress the empress of his affection."

Waverley does not love Rose at first, "the very intimacy of their intercourse prevented his feeling for her other sentiments than those of a brother for an amiable and accomplished sister; while the sentiments of poor Rose were gradually, and without her being conscious, assuming a shade of warmer affection."

The Baron is like Sir Everard, Jacobite in sympathy, but, unlike the Baronet, is situated in a country which was on the eve of showing its sympathy in a practical manner; and Waverley remains under his hospitable roof longer than it were politic in a servant of the reigning dynasty. When he had remained a guest for nearly six weeks a raid is made on the Baron's property by robbers from the neighbouring Highlands, and Rose confides to Waverley that her father was free from such robbers so long as he paid blackmail to Fergus MacIvor, the chieftain of a powerful Highland clan. Waverley is fired with an ambition to see the Highland chief, and an envoy arriving from the latter to conclude peace with the Baron, Waverley departs with the envoy to visit Fergus.

Just as the Baron Bradwardine and his daughter Rose, and their retainers and friends, give us so admirable a picture of the Lowland Scotch, so do Fergus MacIvor, his sister Flora, and the people of Glennaquoich, of the Highlanders; at the time of the rebellion of 1745.

"Flora MacIvor bore a most striking resemblance to her brother Fergus. . . . They had the same antique and regular correctness of profile; the same dark eyes, eyelashes, and eyebrows; the same clearness of complexion, excepting that Fergus's was embrowned by exercise, and Flora's possessed the utmost feminine delicacy. . . . But her loyalty, as it exceeded her brother's in fanaticism, excelled it also in purity." A good deal of ambition and of selfishness tinctured the political faith of Fergus. "In Flora's bosom, on the contrary, the zeal of loyalty burnt pure, and unmixed with any selfish feeling; she would have as soon made religion the mask of ambitious and interested views as have shrouded them under the opinions which she had been taught to think patriotism."

Flora was highly accomplished, and possessed of a knowledge of literature; she had also bestowed some part of her time "upon the music and poetical tradition of the Highlanders." Her manner was grave, "though she readily contributed her talents to the amusement of society." On Waverley being introduced to her, Fergus asks his sister to translate and recite some Highland verses, which Waverley had heard in the original Gaelic. This leads to a short discussion on Highland minstrelsy, and in the evening Waverley is led by one of Flora's attendants to a beautiful spot, there to await Flora, who is to sing a Highland air amid such wild and appropriate surroundings.

After awhile Flora and her attendant appear, like inhabitants of another region, propped as it were in mid air on the summit of a small pass. "The sun now stooping in the west, gave a rich and varied tinge to all the objects which surrounded Waverley, and seemed to add more than human brilliancy to the full expressive darkness of Flora's eye, exalted the richness and purity of her complexion, and enhanced the dignity and grace of her beautiful form. Edward thought he had never, even in his wildest dreams, imagined a figure of such exquisite and interesting loveliness."

About the same time that he finds himself in love with this romantic woman, he, owing to certain events which, though they form part and parcel of the plot, are outside our purpose, decides to throw in his lot with the Jacobites.

He has been persuaded to this by Fergus, but Flora bids him pause before taking so important a step. This surprises Waverley, and he asks of her whether she does not share her brother's ardour.

"Do I not?" answered Flora. "God knows that mine exceeds his, if that be possible. But I am not like him, rapt by the bustle of military preparation, and the infinite detail necessary to the present undertaking, beyond consideration of the grand principles of justice and truth, on which our enterprise is grounded; and these I am certain can only be furthered by measures in themselves true and just. To operate upon your present feelings, my dear Mr. Waverley, to induce you to an irretrievable step, of which you have not considered either the justice or the danger, is, in my poor judgment, neither the one nor the other."

She thinks that he has been drawn into the enterprise by pique, rather than led to take part in it by his own convictions. During this same interview Waverley suddenly declares his love, but his suit is not favourably received. "Permit me, then," she says, "to arrange my ideas upon so unexpected a topic, and in less than an hour I will be ready to give you such reasons for the resolution I shall express as may be satisfactory, at least, if not pleasing to you."

Shortly after this Waverley again seeks Flora.

"I dare hardly," she said, "tell you the situation of my feelings, they are so different from those usually ascribed to young women at my period of life; and I dare hardly touch upon what I conjecture to be the nature of yours, lest I should give offence where I would willingly administer consolation. For myself, from my infancy until this day, I have had but one wish—the restoration of my royal benefactors to their rightful throne. It is impossible to express to you the devotion of my feelings to this single subject, and I will frankly confess that it has so occupied my mind as to exclude every thought respecting what is called my own settlement in life."

All the principal characters in the book follow the army of Charles Edward as he descends into England, and Waverley sees, not only Flora, but Rose Bradwardine repeatedly. "Flora MacIvor called Rose her pupil, and was attentive to assist her in her studies, and to fashion both her taste and understanding. It might have been remarked by a very close observer, that in the presence of Waverley she was much more desirous to exhibit her friend's excellences than her own."

Waverley, when he discovers the utter uselessness of attempting to win Flora, gradually transfers his affection to Rose, and in the sequel marries her. This is very naturally and beautifully described, and is more satisfactory than if he were made to marry Flora.

By wonderfully good luck, Waverley escapes the penalty which so many gentlemen who took part in the unlucky rebellion had to pay. Fergus is taken prisoner and hanged; but to Flora the failure of Charles Edward must have caused the greatest sorrow. The gallant Fergus, whom we love notwithstanding his faults, thus speaks to Waverley, just before he is led out to execution—

"Poor Flora! She could have borne her own sentence of death; but not mine. You, Waverley, will soon know the happiness of mutual affection in the married state—long, long may Rose and you live to enjoy it—but you can never know the purity of feeling which combines two orphans like Flora and me, left alone as it were in the world, and being all in all to each other from our very infancy. But her strong sense of duty, and predominant feeling of loyalty, will give new nerve to her mind after the immediate and acute sensation of this parting has passed away. She will then think of Fergus as of the heroes of our race, upon whose deeds she loved to dwell."

We may deplore the waste of blood occasioned by these Jacobite rebellions, and the evils which must always arise from civil war; but the extraordinary, the self-denying spirit, and the splendid constancy to a fallen house which characterised so many of the adherents of the Stuarts, cannot but win our admiration.

We English are not a fickle race; a reverence for authority is one of our traits, and beyond question we are, amongst the nations of Europe, one of the most sincerely loyal.

ART NEEDLEWORK.

BY HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

FIG. 1.—MANTEL VALANCE WITH CURTAINS AND BANDS. TWO DESIGNS.

WE have lately heard or read somewhere that mantel valances are going out of fashion, but, judging from the number of those which have been displayed at all the latest exhibitions of art needlework and decorative work of all kinds, we venture to think this is a mistaken notion, founded probably on the changes in form which are always taking place. These changes do not always tend to prove the so often repeated charge of fickleness in public taste; rather are they the outcome of ever-increasing culture and love of true artistic decoration. Instead of the straight bands or borders of embroidery which have so long been used for the purpose, we now more often see draped valances, and the style of the needlework is not so much confined to "all over" patterns.

In Fig. 1 we give a sketch arranged so as to show two different styles of design adapted for the same mode of draping, so that either can be used for the whole. The material is rich brown plush. On the left side is a design of nasturtium, the flowers of which are of a variety of natural shades, from deep red to pale yellow. It is worked solidly in crewel, with a few stitches of silk here and there to indicate the lights. The band of the curtain has an adaptation of the same design.

On the right side of the valance the pattern is more Japanese in style. It would look very handsome on crimson plush, with the design worked in satin stitch in shades of terracotta red, and the whole outlined with Japanese gold thread. Plush drapes so beautifully that its own folds are sufficiently handsome for the centre of the valance and also for the curtains. The effect of the latter with bands of embroidery only is in better taste than if they were covered with needlework. The valance is trimmed with plush ball fringe, the appearance of which is very complete and pretty.

Velveteen or soft cloth can also be used if plush be more costly than is desired. Both valance and curtains must be lined, or they will not drape so well; the bands should also be finished with silk cord round them, or, if liked, with ball fringe at the lower edge, to match the trimming of the valance. Another way to drape the latter is to loop it up between twenty and thirty inches from both ends, thus making three festoons, in each of which a spray should be worked. A fireplace is always so much the centre of attraction—the heart of the room, so to speak—that we do not think the decoration of it will ever cease to be the first effort when we turn our thoughts to making our homes beautiful. It has often occurred to us that the heaviness of effect, which is so difficult to avoid in the arrangement of this most important part of a drawing-room, could be overcome if (in cases where it be architecturally practicable) a tiny hanging conservatory could be built outside the wall over the fireplace, having a single large pane of glass or a window let into the wall of the room. The over-mantel, which should have no back, can then be placed over this window, prettily draped with soft silk or muslin. The little conservatory thus made may be filled with hanging pots of ferns, which could easily be attended to by means of a ladder or steps, and showing through what appears to be the glass back of the over-mantel, they would make a very light and pretty natural decoration. The great drawbacks to this plan are that it could only be carried out on a detached drawing-room wall, and that it would necessitate the chimney being carried on one side. Doubtless some of our readers can improve on this suggestion (for the introduction of which, in an article on needlework, we make a humble apology).

Fig. 2 represents a design for a pair of bellows, which are covered with velveteen. The design is worked in crewel, in satin stitch, the flowers in shaded white, or pale pink, and the leaves in olive green; the veins of the leaves and flowers are of fine gold thread. This pattern would look very well embroidered in olive green satin, or in natural coloured silk. Bellows are amongst the oldest objects to which needlework and all manner of art decoration has been applied, examples of which we have seen in various quaint and charming shapes.

Fig. 3 is a sketch of one of the innumerable wall pockets made of fans, which are always so greatly in favour with amateur embroiderers, and is very simply made. It is a penny palm-leaf fan, the front of which is first covered with crimson plush. It may have a thin sheet of cotton wool inserted, by way of padding, under the plush. If liked, a spray of palm leaves is worked in outline with Japanese gold thread on a piece of terra-cotta coloured pongee or tussore silk, which is gathered across the fan with elastic. To form the pocket a silk cord can be sewn all round, and a handsome bow in two contrasting shades of ribbon attached to its handle. This wall pocket may be made in any colour or combination of colours, and any simple spray will do to embroider on it, or tiny powderings will do, if preferred. It might be varied by the fan being covered with silk, whilst the pocket is of plush. Another way would be to place the pocket diagonally across the fan, and have long ribbon loops attached to the handle on one side.

Fig. 4 is a decoration for a piano back, which could easily be managed at home if a light wooden frame the size of the piano be made, with a brass rod and rings for the curtain. The material is of wallflower red velveteen, on which a branch of magnolia is embroidered in natural colours with crewels, with a few stitches of silk. Care must be taken to introduce the russet and golden browns in the stems and backs of the leaves, which are the great characteristic of the magnolia. The flowers, too, need careful shading with grey and pale green, the buds at the ends of each branch having a good deal of pale green at the base. The panel must, we think, be worked in a frame, and when finished will want stiffening with embroidery paste before it is nailed into the wooden framework. A curtain of pale terra-cotta coloured pongee silk is then arranged on the unembroidered side, and a very artistic and effective piano back is the result. It would look equally well on brown velveteen, with a curtain of old gold. Any large branch of effective and graceful plants, such as honeysuckle, chrysanthemum, etc., would do to use for this purpose, or two or three stems of lilies, foxglove, or iris springing from the base of the panel at one side. The large flat surface of a piano back is one which naturally lends itself for purposes of decoration. The addition of a curtain breaking the expanse is a great improvement, and the embroidery being confined to one side only, it does not really cost more than a plainer style of ornament.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER IX.

HERE is Evelyn?" anxiously inquired Mrs. Lancaster. The large, brilliantly-lighted salle à manger of the Abendglüh was filled with a motley crowd, from which arose a Babel of tongues. The evening strife between Germans and English as to whether the windows should be shut or open had set in, and at the "English table" our compatriots were triumphing over their adversaries.

The Lancaster party was a large one, for Mrs. Lancaster, Miss Wentworth, Dottie, and Algy were reinforced by a stranger couple, with whom the young gentlemen seemed on the best of terms. The head waiter on hearing the name "Lichtenstein" had wished to place them elsewhere, but they apparently liked fresh air, and were thoroughly at home among the English.

The gentleman, with spectacled blue eyes, long hair, and a drooping, fair moustache, had something artistic about his appearance. His wife was evidently an Englishwoman. Her sweet face, with brown hair ruffling back from a smooth white brow, blue eyes, and an intelligent mouth, had a particularly bright expression. She was soon absorbed in conversation with Algy, laughing like a merry schoolgirl at his account of his adventures.

"But where is Evelyn?" again asked Mrs. Lancaster, piteously. "I haven't seen her yet, to speak to, since she came back."

"Oh, she will be here soon. Evelyn doesn't like to be hunted up, you know, mother," replied Dottie. But an anxious shade was on her brow that did not clear till Evelyn came in.

As she walked up the long dining-room the girl attracted the glances of many a pair of eyes in her direction. Her tall figure in its graceful white dress had a distinction about it, enhanced by the proud way in which she held her head. Her face was paler than usual, and her mouth was closely set.

"She looks like a tragedy muse," murmured Algy to his sister; but admiration was very visible in the boy's face.

"Why, my dear, we missed you. Wherever have you been? Have you enjoyed yourself? Don't you want your supper?"

A long catalogue of such questions fell from Mrs. Lancaster's lips as her niece took the vacant chair opposite. The good lady did not wait for an answer to any of them except the last.

"Don't you feel well? I fear you've overtired yourself; that's what you've done—with that York Pass."

"I am perfectly well, thank you, auntie, and I am not tired in the least. We have had a glorious time," replied Evelyn, trying to smile.

"And did not you drop a tear when you thought of your poor American chaperon?" quaintly inquired Miss Wentworth. "There was she, looking back and watching for the couple of truant girls that never came, all the long and weary way to Engelberg. A fine fright I was in before I reached home! But fortunately I met Mrs. Lancaster in the pine woods."

"We were very sorry, but we were quite helpless," replied Evelyn.

"Well, we've not made much progress with your gifted compatriot, Mrs. Allingham West," pursued the American, in a lower tone.

Evelyn started. The dreadful review had driven Mrs. West out of her thoughts for the time. And now, half the sweetness of the recollection was gone; for how could she claim even the lowest place in the same Temple of Art when her one effort, her darling book, was said to be so much waste paper by the horrible Critic?

"Why hasn't she my room? I forgot all about it?"

"Well, she had it the first two nights, till they gave her another; and now she has a parlour as well; and she doesn't come down to meals," explained Miss Wentworth. "But I'm surprised to hear you'd forgotten, for you seemed so anxious to get back to see her."

Evelyn felt just then as if she cared about nothing and nobody, except that unknown destroyer of her happiness, whom she would gladly have attacked face to face. All through the succession of courses at supper she kept on framing crushing speeches, of the direst satire, which she would delight to hurl at his head. She had quite made up her mind to write to the Critic.

"Look here, Evelyn, I'm awfully sorry you're so cut up," remarked Algy. The two were sitting in the verandah outside the hotel; the moon was silvering the lovely scene before them, and the voices and steps of visitors pacing up and down on the gravel only reached them as a confused murmur.

"How do you know I am 'cut up,' as you are pleased to express it?" demanded Evelyn.

"Any fool could see it. I'm awfully sorry, I am indeed, that I ever mentioned the thing; I'd have bitten my tongue out first; but I thought you knew—I thought it would be a joke."

"Your idea of a joke isn't mine, Algy. But you needn't vex yourself; I should have seen it, of course. I always read the Critic."

"I can find the fellow out when we get back to town, and knock him down, if that'll be any comfort to you?" suggested Algy.

Evelyn felt inly amused as she imagined the slight little form of her cousin engaged in single combat on her account.

"No, thank you; that wouldn't mend matters at all. I don't want to talk about it."

"But I wouldn't expose myself to that sort of thing, if I were you," persisted the young man. "You see, there are always a lot of rough fellows hanging about, ready to be down on anybody that writes poetry; and you are not fit to stand it."

Evelyn heaved a sudden, passionate sigh, as she thought of her brilliant dreams of a literary career. Not fit to stand it! Was this to be the end of all?

Dottie's was the more welcome style of consolation when she joined the pair a few minutes later.

"I wanted to hide the stupid old paper, but I couldn't. And, Evelyn dear, never mind. You remember there were crowds of people, Milton, and Keats, and Wordsworth, and ever so many more, attacked by reviewers, but the reviewers were all wrong, and the poets were all right. Don't be like Keats, who was killed by a review."

This was very delectable, and Evelyn, though she knew Dottie was no judge at all on the subject, drank in her flattery with thirsty eagerness. Algy hemmed and hawed. He knew better, and didn't quite approve of this style of comfort. He hated that Evelyn should be public property, and wanted this incident to act as a warning to drive her away from the paths of literature. He was sorry that she should suffer, but hoped it would act as a wholesome deterrent.

The conversation was interrupted by the sounds of music. Someone was playing the piano; not in the large salon, but in the music room, with its glass doors opening on the garden. And the tones that came forth upon the still night air were so exquisitely clear, delicate, and pure that it was evident a master was at the instrument.

"That is Lichtenstein!" cried Algy. "You ought to hear him play, Evelyn. He can play, and no mistake. He's a professor at the Leipsic Conservatoire."

The girls rose and stepped through the glass door into the room, where they found a crowd beginning to assemble. Herr Lichtenstein appeared to be improvising, and wandered on over the keys in "linked sweetness long drawn out." His head was thrown back, his hair drooped on his shoulders in true musician style, but no affectation characterised him; he was entirely absorbed in his beloved art. As the people streamed in from the hall of the hotel, curious to see and hear what new entertainment was in progress, he paused.

"Do go on, Lichtenstein. My cousin and sister are longing to hear you," urged Algy.

"I shall play with pleasure," responded the musician, "so long as people do not laugh and talk and walk about the room. If they are not still," and he shrugged his shoulders, "then, see you, the instrument cannot speak to them, and the labour is thrown away to make them understand."

Herr Lichtenstein accompanied this speech with such an expressive look round, that a hush fell upon the company. It was perfectly evident that the maestro intended to have silence, and the people arranged themselves expectantly in their seats. His wife, with her bright face, stood near the piano.

"Play that 'Mountain Reverie' of your own—do," urged Algy. And Herr Lichtenstein complied.

This was not, as Evelyn at first expected, an imitative composition, introducing cow-bells, the horn of the hunter, the jödel, and so forth. Herr Lichtenstein would have spurned anything of that sort with scorn ineffable. A blithe allegretto opening passage appeared to echo the joy of nature:

"And come, for love is of the valley, come!"

It seemed to cry. Then followed a soft and mysterious movement, an air with a running accompaniment in the left hand. The execution was perfect, and the air was exquisitely sweet, with a plaintive strain in it that harmonised well with Evelyn's mood. This was an echo of the joy that is half a pain; the solemn rapture of the wanderer as he stands alone in the presence of Nature, and feels the spell of the mighty mother on his soul. So at least the composer understood it, and though the cue might be lacking to many hearers, the same mood was produced in those who were musically organised as the mood of the worshipper at Nature's shrine.

There was a murmur of applause when Herr Lichtenstein had finished his Reverie, and rose from the piano. Evelyn was delighted with the performance; she had never heard such playing in her life before. This German artist seemed to woo forth all the charm that lay hidden in the pure, cold keys.

"Why do you call that a Mountain Reverie, Herr Lichtenstein?" inquired Miss Wentworth, who was always well to the front, and had edged herself through the crowd up to the professor. "I listened for the Ranz des Vaches, and the jödeling, and all that, but there was none of it. The music was very fine, but mightn't it mean anything else just as well?"

This was a fine opportunity for the professor, and he began at once.

"Madam, music is the language of emotion. I am not in my Reverie, which you are so good as to praise, trying to describe. That is, in my opinion, outside the province of music. I try to reproduce in that composition, by the help of sound, the moods that are appropriate to certain surroundings of nature. That is almost the same thing, say you? Not so. The one deals with the inner life, the other with the outer world. A 'soul atmosphere' is what I strive to create. I may fail—that understands itself—I do fail when there is not the ear to comprehend, the heart to feel; yet I strive all the same."

"And you succeed," murmured Evelyn, who had intensely enjoyed the Reverie. She thought Herr Lichtenstein must be something like the Abbé Liszt, and longed to hear him play again; but the rattling of billiard balls that had begun in the adjoining room brought a determined refusal from him to have any more music; nor would he let his wife take his place at the instrument.

"Music and billiards do not harmonise; it is sacrilege," he declared. Then he began to talk to his little group of friends about the organ in the monastery church.

"Mendelssohn played upon it," he informed them. "He visited this vale and loved it well. For his sake I love the place already, and I must see if the good monks will let me play upon the organ 'hallowed by the Master's touch.'"

Evelyn had enjoyed the evening after all, in spite of the crushing blow that three hours since had made her feel as if the brightness of life were over. So delightful is it to come in contact with those who can charm by art, or teach by language—so refreshing is the intercourse with stranger minds.

When she withdrew for the night she opened "Day-dreams," and sat with her candle looking out. The lights in the village were almost all extinguished, the mountains brooded over the sleeping valley. She read a page here and there. Was it fancy? or was there in reality something lacking of the old charm? Here was a poem on "Sunrise" that used to delight her. But the description of the mists fleeting away seemed tame and inappropriate. Here was another on "Music." Did it convey anything of the emotion she had lately felt? With a shock of disappointment Evelyn recognised that her own delight in her work had undergone a sensible diminution; her resolve to write to the Critic died away.

"That wretched review has put me out of tune for enjoyment to-night," she thought, as she closed the book. But there were other reasons; and Evelyn's new experiences were fast carrying on the work of education.

THREE WORTHIES OF BETTWS-Y-COED.

AMONG the places which Her Majesty will probably visit during her stay in North Wales this summer is Bettws-y-Coed, that "sheltered spot in the woods" (as its name implies) which was first made known to the world of artists and tourists by the pencil of David Cox, some half a century ago. Its church and churchyard, dedicated to St. Michael the Archangel, contain the dust of, at all events, three local worthies, whose names are well deserving of a wider fame.

As you cross the stile near the church porch, you see the last resting-place of Maurice Ap-Hugh, an ingenious blacksmith, who died, as the gravestone tells you, in 1735, at the age of sixty-six. He was indeed a cunning artificer; for by a process of his own, which he never would reveal, he was able to weld steel in such a manner that not a flaw could be detected after the closest inspection. Old women used to bring to him their broken darning needles, and he would give them back to their owners next day as sound as ever they had been. One summer day, the local story says, there arrived at the little inn at Bettws-y-Coed a gentleman who seemed to be greatly troubled and distressed. He had been climbing about the cliffs on the mountain side, had fallen into the mouth of Davy Jenkins' Cave, and had broken his trusty sword, which he valued as much almost as his life. The sword had been his companion in the wars under the great Duke of Marlborough, and had done duty at Blenheim. His name was Robert Wynn or Wynne, and it happened that he was a distant relation—a Welsh cousin, probably—of the Wynnes of Gwydir. The landlady of the inn told him that he need not make himself unhappy about his sword, for that there was in the village, and a small village it was then, a man who could join it together so that neither its master nor anyone else could detect the fracture. The old smith was called, and the sword was handed to him in two pieces. The gentleman followed him closely as he carried it to his workshop in the wood. "No spies, and no witnesses, if you please, sir," said the smith; "I always do my jobs apart from every mortal eye." The gentleman hesitated a moment, but thought it better to comply with the smith's request. In a few hours Maurice Ap-Hugh returned, with the sword welded perfectly, as he had promised. Unfortunately he died not many years after this; and, being a bachelor, and a man of few words and of no friends, and living the life of a recluse, he quitted this world without having imparted his secret to a single soul. The stone which marks his resting-place, and the inscription upon it, were placed there by Captain Wynne, the owner of the sword.

Another noted character of the neighbourhood was a bard and harpist, who flourished here in great fame about the dawn of the seventeenth century. His name was William Owen, and Pencraig, the place where he lived, is still in the hands of his family. He is said to have been outlawed, because he had incurred the displeasure of the king. The story goes that one day, when he was at Conway, playing on the triple harp, an instrument made by his own hands, in an assembly of the bards, a person entered the room and privately whispered that a writ of outlawry had been issued against the bard, and that, if he valued his freedom, he had better quit Conway at once. One of the bards present was a sailor, and his boat being moored near the harbour, he offered to take him off privately to Flanders, for which land he was about to make before daylight on the morrow. Owen had no time to send home any message to his wife and children, beyond the fact that he was forced to go abroad, and that he would return in the course of time, be it weeks, or months, or years, when the king's wrath had passed away. So saying, he locked up the harp, put the key in his pocket, and made his way on board.

Fifteen years passed away, but no news of William Owen's whereabouts came to Pencraig, and his wife, having given up all hope of seeing him again, had cast her eyes round the neighbourhood of Conway and Llanrwst for a second partner. On reflection she found no one better fit than a man who had been in the employ, and stood high in the confidence, of her former husband. The wedding day had been appointed and fixed, and indeed was just at hand. But on the very day before the widow and her second spouse were to be made one at the altar, there came late in the afternoon to an inn at Bettws an old man, of way-worn and tattered appearance, like the minstrel in the opening lines of Scott's "Marmion." He walked up the street, unknown and perhaps unnoticed, and asked who now lived at Pencraig. "A Mrs. Owen lives there," was the reply; "she is a widow; she lost her husband many years ago; he was supposed to have been killed in the French wars. His widow is to be married again to-morrow morning." These tidings, it may be supposed, smote his heart; but he quietly made his way to the door of Pencraig, where he knocked, and asked admittance for a poor bard, and a lodging for the night. The request was granted, and the supper being laid upon the table and finished, he asked permission, or was asked, to try his skill on the harp. "Unfortunately we have no harp here," was the reply, "but that of William Owen, and that is locked up; for when he left Conway he carried the key with him." He still expressed a wish to see the harp, and his request was at once granted. While no one was looking, he then quietly took the key out of his pocket, and began to tune the strings, and then struck on it a favourite air. With his very first touch the stranger convinced all who were present that William Owen had indeed returned to his own; and the wife, having looked closely into his face to see that there was no deception, recognised her long lost husband by a scar on his temple. The house was at once in commotion; tears and laughter and joy abounded; and the intended bridegroom of the morrow made his retreat from the scene, and was never heard of again in North Wales. It was the story of Ulysses and Penelope re-acted, without the intervention of the faithful dog or the shepherd or the intervention of any Homeric deity.

The last of the three "worthies" of whom I tell was Cadwallader-y-Clogwyn (Cadwallader of the Rock), a man whom perhaps I had better have styled an unworthy, for he was a notorious character in many ways. He lived on the rocky hill through which a tunnel is cut on the road leading to Pont-y-Pant and Festiniog, near the Beaver's Pool. He was a desperately wicked man, held in check by no consideration of shame, justice, law, or humanity, and he was a most formidable because a most unscrupulous enemy. There was nothing that he liked so much as to revenge himself on those who had offended him, no matter whether intentionally or not; and yet he would work out his wicked ends so cleverly and so secretly as never to come into the clutches of the law. Two neighbouring farms, both the property of a man to whom he owed a grudge, were fired the same night, and in one of the two farms the cowsheds were burnt while all the kine were fastened up within them.

It was indeed an awful scene, and one which local tradition hands down with perfect accuracy. But an end comes to everything at last; and one day it was clear to Cadwallader-y-Clogwyn that his end was very near. Whilst lying on his deathbed and wandering in his mind, he shouted aloud at intervals "Let loose the cows! They are burning! Let them loose! Ah! ah! I see before me the bottomless pit; I look down into its depths! I see they are filled to the brim with fire!"

Oh! save me! help me from falling! Oh! the kine, the kine!"

All his cries were vain. He died in great agony of body, but in still greater agonies of mind. A few ruins of the hut in which he lived and died yet remain on the bleak hill-side; but the old people in the neighbourhood never mention his name with a blessing, it may be supposed; and after dark no one, old or young, likes to follow that path which he used to tread, for fear that he or she should see Cadwallader's ghost.

EDUCATIONAL.

ONE OF YOUR GIRLS.—The "Swedish drill" is taught by Madame Bergman Osterberg, Hampstead Physical Training College, Broadhurst Gardens, N.W., close to the Finchley Road Station. Write to Madame Osterberg for information about classes, as there are others held, perhaps, in the neighbourhood you prefer.

AN INQUIRER.—The United Telephone Company employs a large staff of women, the conditions being akin to those of the Post Office and Telegraph appointments. They must be the daughters of professional men, or men not engaged in business. The salary begins at as low as 10s. weekly, and does not increase quickly. There is a lady superintendent, and there are many appliances.

FRAUD, A MEMBER OF THE HEXAGON, we think, must first have her parents' consent to enter a hospital, and be trained. Perhaps they might like the idea better if you looked forward to becoming ultimately a "Grey Sister" for Army nursing. London hospitals are rather full, and it would be, perhaps, better to try for an opening in the provinces. St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, W. (London), or the Royal Hants County Hospital, Winchester, might answer.

BRILLE.—You do not need any knowledge of art to help the blind by means of the "Braille writing." The cost of the whole of the needful appliances amounts to 5s. 6d., and Dr. Armitage, British and Foreign Blind Association, 30, Cambridge Square, Hyde Park, W., from whom they may be obtained, undertakes to correct the first exercises of those who wish to learn. It is a great charity towards the blind, to provide them with suitable reading; and the "Braille system" can be worked in this way. A lady makes a first copy of a book; then this copy can be copied again by the blind themselves, and so multiplied many times. But the first copy must be made in the "Braille writing" by those who see.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BUSY MRS. B.—The "Tauchnitz Edition" is solely for the Continent, and it is not permitted to bring the book to England nor sell it here.

KITTY'S poem on the daisy is pretty and well written. She will do well to persevere.

"JUST AS I AM."—Your letter is very neatly written, and you express yourself well. We are glad to hear that even in South America we have friends amongst the readers of the "G. O. P."

KATHLEEN could paint some heartsease with her text in memory of her brother. 2. She had better inquire at a photographer's as to how such positions are obtained; generally by advertisement, we believe.

MARGERY DAW.—We think that the Bible Guild in connection with the Christian Women's Education Union would be what you require. The hon. secretary is Mrs. C. H. Waller, 16, South Hill Park Gardens, Hampstead Heath, N. Your writing is not yet formed.

SNOWBIRD.—The verses have much merit, but no poems can be published that have not a certificate of age with them, as well as an assurance from parent or guardian that they are the unaided work of the writer.

ALPENROSE.—There are no merits in the verses, and the English is involved and difficult of comprehension.

J. E. W.—As you are very young, you may grow out of such pains. Your mother will know better what causes your pains in the head than we can. If residing in a very damp place or house, they may be either rheumatic or neuralgic, or else purely constitutional.

KATE KNOYLE.—Answer all invitations in the style in which they have been written, whether in the first or third person, with "compliments" or "kind regards." If the host's name be included with that of the hostess, address them both in your reply, but direct the envelope to the hostess. If there be only one man at your dinner or supper party, bid him take down the chief lady present; on no account reserve him for yourself, being the hostess.

SAILOR asks "What would be the best thing to stop stoutness, and full in the face?" A dentist would show you how to "stop" a tooth, but not to "stop" "full in the face." We strongly advise you to "stop short" in your pursuit of leanness, or you will destroy your health.

MANTEL.—We believe that what is called the "Bigamy Act," which provides for the punishment of bigamy, allows the marriage of a woman whose husband shall have been continually absent for seven years, and is not known to be living at the time. In the case just decided, which will be a precedent, no doubt, it seems that provided a wife can show that she has a reasonable ground for her belief that her husband is dead, she may marry again, even though the seven years have not elapsed since she was deserted by him. In a case like yours you had better take legal advice.

JOYCE.—Edna Lyall is an English authoress; you will find her "Story of a Slander" a wonderful lesson on the dangers of social life and of careless words.

BABIE should brush the straw well, and make a weak solution of gum arabic to wash over it; this will restore the colour and brightness. Yellows, terra cotta, reds, and greens would suit your complexion and stature.

MAUDE.—The lines are not poetry, but a poor attempt to rhyme very unoriginal prose.

NINETEEN.—Your handwriting seems careless and scribbly, though fairly legible. We do not profess to delineate character by the handwriting, so that if you wrote on that subject your letter would be destroyed.

EDITH.—It is not true that "domestic servants are looked down upon"; truly respectable ones who know their place and are not foolishly "above it" are always respected. It is the silly and ignorant class amongst them that kick against the wise dispensations of that Providence that ordained for them the circumstances of their birth, and gave them their special place in His church on earth; their special duties, trials of faith and contentment, and their distinctive pleasures. All are very evenly balanced. The cares and the restrictions of classes above them are quite as trying, in their own way, as those which domestic servants are called upon to bear. St. Paul had far more to bear, yet he said, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."

A LOVER OF FLOWERS.—The Virginia creeper would be the best and hardiest, if you do not like the ivy.

DAPHNE.—The dictionary definition of love is "an affection of the heart excited by that which delights or commands admiration."

J. E. S.—The little sonnet is very neatly turned and prettily written. We think you could do better; and we congratulate you on having escaped from any young person who could behave as related in regard to your note.

HILDA MAY.—Velvet and plush are not very suitable materials to put together, and either of them would be better with silk, satin, or cashmere.

POPPY.—We cannot say, as we have never tried it, but the instructions given on the bottle would be the best guide.

DORKING.—You can sometimes let your neighbours have the use of them and get something in return.

GERDEINAR and EDITH.—We cannot read your letter—the handwriting deserves to be put into a museum, so extraordinary is it, and so impossible for anyone to read. Have it copied in round hand, and get the copyist to give you a few lessons. No one has a right to inflict such horrors on either friends or enemies.

L. G.—The verses have but little merit, but have given you pleasure in the writing; so they have performed their office.

IVY.—Yes, the use of back and face boards simultaneously might be of use to you; but at the age of eighteen, and having ceased growing, as you say, your chance of improvement is not such as it would have been two or three years ago.

S. A. SWEETING might apply for "temporary relief" to the Governesses' Benevolent Institution, and state whole case to the secretary, Charles W. Klugh, Esq., 32, Sackville Street, London, W. There is also the Horbury House of Mercy at Wakefield, where you might obtain help or advice as to where you should apply for it.

SEVENTEEN, MINUS THE SWEETNESS (New Zealand).—We are very sorry we cannot help you with your quotation, but your own little poem deserves much praise and admiration. Unfortunately it is not certified by parent or guardian, nor is the age given by them. Go on, and do not be discouraged.

EFFIE (South Africa).—Money can be sent to England by postal order, but you must see that an English order is used, not a Colonial one.

ENID G.—The little story is a pretty and fanciful one, but is not suitable to our columns.

ONE AUSTRALIAN-BORN (Victoria).—Poems both good, and fairly well written. Prose not so good, but there is promise in all.

DOLLY VARDEN seems a vain little girl, and must try to be steady, and improve both mind and character, "for the night cometh," and we must all of us work "while it is called to-day."

NIL DESPERANDUM.—There is a small instrument usually combined with a fine file for pressing down the skin from the nails. But the simplest way of pushing it down, is to do so with the damp towel whenever you wash your hands. This ought to be enough, and after a little time and patience you would find it answer very well.

BUSY BEE.—The grand centre of the "Time and Talents" department in connection with the Y. W. C. A., which has lately been organised, is at 16A, Old Cavendish Street, W.; the hon. president is the Lady Victoria Buxton; there is a branch established at Putney. For the information of any who have not heard of the institution, we may observe that the idea is to promote the better employment of time and talent amongst girls of the upper classes, for the benefit of those in a sphere beneath them.

WYNIFRED.—Yes, there is a branch of the Guild of King's Daughters in England, just recently established. It has been started at Southport, and the address of the president is Mrs. Stephenson, The Vicarage, Birkdale, Southport.

M. U. L.—You must keep the mackintosh in the open air for a little time to take the smell away; not in the sun, of course.

MIRIAM MAY.—Judging from the length of your letter, you have too much time on your hands, and grow morbid and fanciful. Your handwriting is so bad that it is a cruelty to send forty pages of prose and poetry to any heavily-burdened editor to read. The first thing for you seems to be to practise your personal duties, teach yourself to write, and lay out a course of reading to strengthen your mind, and give yourself something useful to think about, and do not write any more letters till you know how to do so with pleasure to others.

A DALKEITH LASSIE will probably be more comfortable with shoes in the house than boots. 2. Wire brushes should be cleaned with flour or oatmeal well rubbed into them.

A SOJOURNER BY THE SEA appears to need good medical advice as to diet. She has allowed herself to get too low, and has probably overworked and underfed herself, and has taken no healthful exercise.

CHAPTER XV.

KITTY'S OWN FRIENDS (MRS. MARGARET LUCAS, OF COLCHESTER, AND MRS. ANN HARRISON, OF BALLS)—A FAREWELL SUPPER OVER A BAKER'S SHOP, AND A MARRIAGE IN HOPE IN WOLVERCOT CHURCH.

HERE were many girls of Kitty's age among the residents in Oxford in 1643. It was natural that she should form personal friendships, sanctioned by Lady Ottery, with members of this colony of strangers. Indeed, Dame Tabitha was particularly desirous that her god-daughter should show all the hospitality and kindness which every loyal inhabitant of Oxford was bound to display to the King's adherents; and she wished Kitty to get every advantage which could be derived from a variety of good company.

"I do not desire thee to grow up a recluse, child, which mayhap is to be feared in the daughter of a man buried in his books like thy father. The lawful commerce of society is one of the things that is ordained of God to make us understood of each other and helpful to each other. Moreover, it of all practices doth tend to rub down the angles of our characters and to make it easy for us to meet each other, so that we end by being accommodating and friendly, where conscience doth not forbid, instead of odd and churlish. Seek not to be odd and unnecessarily unlike thy neighbours, Kitty, unless thou also seekest to take the first step in the direction of Bedlam."

Thus Lady Ottery did not merely suffer Kitty to make friends; the old lady encouraged the girl to be frank and sympathetic towards cordial, unsophisticated young people like herself.

A girl who attracted Kitty with a curiously-blended attraction made up of surprise, provocation, admiration, and finally strong liking, was the latest-come maid-of-honour to the Queen.

This girl was so different from some of the worldly-wise, scantily scrupulous, bold, handsome coquettes who held a similar office, that she was like a Quakeress in a fashionable assembly, a softly gleaming pearl in a cluster of richly-coloured flashing rubies and emeralds. Her bashfulness was such that she was, as she said, counted a fool by her companions, but she would rather be held a fool than be "rude or wanton." She was Margaret Lucas, of Colchester, the daughter of an honest gentleman in Essex, whose house when he died became like a cloister to his widow. Lady Lucas never mentioned her husband's name without tears during the many years that she survived him, and rarely went abroad save to church. She had all the society she desired in the home where her numerous sons and daughters resided for the most part with her, even after they were married.

Margaret was the youngest, and had been so upheld and indulged by the others that she felt utterly lost trying to stand alone, and being out in the sharp-eyed, sharp-tongued world without brother or sister to speak for her and back her. She had come to Oxford, as she told herself, with the romantic aim of seeking to make up the proper number of the Queen's maids, which had been allowed to fall short in the country's troubles. When she found that Henrietta Maria, even when she graciously accepted the offer of service, yawned coldly over the uncongeniality of the offer and appeared to feel that it would be too fatiguing to live even for an hour at a time up to this prim puritanical girl's standard, Mrs. Margaret would fain have returned to the shelter of her much-loved home and people. But her mother decided that, having deliberately chosen, even begged to be suffered to lead a Court life, her daughter was bound to abide by her choice for a longer time than a few months.

Moreover, soon after Margaret Lucas arrived in Oxford, the news reached her of the sequestration of her eldest brother's and her mother's estates. The first advance which Kitty made towards an intimacy with Mrs. Margaret was in trying to comfort the poor lonely, laughed-at girl for the outrages which had been committed on what was so sacred as well as so dear to her.

"Yes, indeed, 'tis true, Mrs. Kitty," Mrs. Margaret sobbed in her comforter's ear. "The trait bands from the town broke into my brother Sir John's house, which is situated at the end of Colchester, and carried him and his wife, my sister Ann and my honoured mother, to the common jail. I have told you about my mother, Mrs. Dacre?"

"Yes, madam," answered Kitty, "and I have many a time and oft thought she must bear a resemblance to my Aunt Walton. Her spirits and health have been very uncertain ever since she was left a poor widow woman, so that she is hugely dependent on the care and kindness of her family and friends—unlike my Lady Ottery, who, whether wed or widowed, rich or poor, I wot hath always been rather more given to serve others than to be served herself." The girl ended with a certain proud inflection of her voice, which implied that in her youthful strength and spirit, and in the sound sense and dash of heroism which she shared, she regarded Lady Ottery's as the better way.

"Ah, but my mother is of a most majestic demeanour!" Mrs. Margaret hastened to explain, for it was one of her transparent weaknesses to hold that there was no other family on earth equal to the beloved household at Colchester, and to have a jealous anxiety that their pre-eminence in wisdom and virtue should be universally acknowledged. "Alack, madam, my honoured mother was so shook and breathless as the wretches hurried her along, that for very shame they had to let her sit down in a shop which formerly supplied our house with tin wares; but shame did not prevent a brutal countryman on horseback from striking at her hoar head with his sword in the street." Mrs. Margaret's youthful voice broke down in its wounded tenderness, and Kitty had to resume her office of comforter.

"It was very cruel and wicked, Mrs. Lucas; but cheer up, the ruffians did not dare to do her any real hurt, and I would not, if I were you, give them the gratification of knowing that they had vexed me."

This was all very well, but Margaret did not care that her tale of wrong suffering should be cut short.

"The would-be murderers maliciously destroyed all the deeds and papers in our paper room. Then they did deface our pleasant garden, and killed all the poor, innocent deer and cattle in the park. They did worse an you can imagine it. These rascally volunteers did sacrilegiously force their way into St. Giles' Church and made for our vault—the Lucases' vault. There with pistols, swords, and halberds the rabble wreaked their vengeance on the sainted dead, by transfixing their mouldering remains in their coffins."

"It was barbarous!" cried Kitty. "But they could not hurt the dead; and even the living were rescued from their clutches. Said you not Sir John, after he had been carried a prisoner to London, was soon let out on bail?"

"Because they could find naught against him," declared the faithful sister, triumphantly. "All the uproar was caused by a false report that he had two hundred men hid in the cellars, ready to sack Colchester, and that they had begun by killing nine of the townsmen."

Mrs. Margaret Lucas was a comely young creature, tall and fair, "well-featured and clear complexioned," with a shy dignity in addition to her beauty which became her well, in spite of the scorn and ridicule she excited in the world around her, from which she shrank. The perpetual levity of the courtiers, the gay passages at arms and endless idle flirtations in which the gentlemen and ladies engaged with abandon and persistency when they were not playing cards, or such games as the frivolous young Queen had brought from France with her, constituted to them the business of life. But the whole scene was regarded with serious, abashed eyes by a maiden like a vestal virgin, who, as she said, "did dread marriage, and shunned men's company."

It was by no means because the grapes were sour, or for the reason of her hard-favouredness, or because she had no womanly wit, or had passed her youth, and so looked enviously on the sports of her contemporaries; she was younger than most of them, and as fair as any in her pure, sweet maidenliness, even though it was a trifle self-conscious and complacent. According to Mrs. Margaret her four sisters and her three brothers were all as highly favoured in their persons and minds as she was. There was not so much as a bandy leg or an unsound tooth, a stutter or a "whorl" (mispronunciation of the letter r) among them. The women, three of whom were married, were all gently bred models of virtue and discretion. The men who had served in the wars in the Low Countries, were brave and "gallant to look upon." They fenced, wrestled, and shot for their diversion; but they considered hunting and hawking, especially singing and dancing, "which they never did," beneath their manliness.

Kitty Dacre, who had a shrewd wit for her years, and a considerable sense of humour, was sometimes wearied, sometimes amused, and on other occasions decidedly provoked, by the long list of the young Lucases' perfections.

This was particularly the case when some of the married sisters came to lodge in Oxford for the time, and she was eagerly introduced to sister Killigrew and sister Walters. For Kitty found, after the great expectations which had been aroused in her, that Lady Killigrew was but a dull woman, and Lady Walters just a shade simpering and silly.

Kitty had no opportunity of judging the brothers Lucas in what she was inclined to call to herself their ferocious manliness. But she was almost driven to welcome, as a relief from meditating on a company of paragons, a report which reached her and was afterwards amply confirmed. One of the brothers, poor Sir Charles Lucas, who was shot by the Parliamentary soldiers at Colchester, was a good soldier and doubtless a good man enough, yet he was reckoned by judges of human nature as "of narrow understanding," and so rough and proud in his manner that it was hard for his equals to endure his intolerance and arrogance. Kitty's kind heart and affectionate temper reproached her when she recognised how absolutely child-like in their sincerity were Mrs. Margaret's confidences. Kitty bethought herself what an eloquent defence she could make for her Jackie, whose name she durst not take into her mouth. She recalled, too, how she had wished that God had given her a sister, when this other girl grew garrulous, like a fond mother, over the lovable qualities of her sister Pye, the married sister nearest to her in age, and when Mrs. Margaret positively pined for her former companion's company.

There were more confidences imparted to Kitty, which, in her ignorant inferiority doubtless, she had less hesitation in smiling at. The young maid-of-honour told her new friend, in all seriousness, in one of their early girlish communications, how she, Mrs. Margaret, had been from childhood addicted to contemplation, to solitariness, and to melancholy, how she had been more given to writing with the pen than to working with the needle. In fact, she had been an author unknown to her family before she was twelve years of age. She did not require much entreaty to show Kitty some of her compositions in prose and verse, of which John Dacre might have made something, but his sister could only decide that the verses and paragraphs were always like Mrs. Margaret's self—dutiful and devout, the soul of high-mindedness and purity, at the same time overflowing with quaint conceits and involved paradoxes.

Another secret Mrs. Margaret told the loyal but not always sympathetic listener. For the lonely maid-of-honour when she could not get to her own family, had closely attached herself to Kitty, which was a high compliment, since Mrs. Margaret Lucas was reserved to the world at large, and hardly spoke in company.

This last secret concerned the delight she took in "fine dressing" and in fashions, especially those she invented. She lamented the restraint which was put on her by Court rules and by the circumstance that she, as the youngest maid-of-honour, had to conform in a general way to the style of dressing adopted by the other maids. As it was, she endeavoured to dress herself "in her best becoming," but her passion was for "singularity even in accoutrements and habits," a statement which startled Kitty, coming as it did so soon after Lady Ottery's warning against any oddity or eccentricity of behaviour. It made her think that the excellent Lucases, of Colchester, must have lived too much by themselves and for themselves, apart from their neighbours, over-indulging themselves (in all moral honesty and bodily temperance) in the perilous practice of complacently regarding the virtues of the race. Kitty by her own instincts came to the conclusion that Mrs. Margaret, with many rare and beautiful gifts, was ill-balanced mentally and ill-educated, chiefly from a lack of knowledge of the world as well as of books. Even in the latter she had missed the advantage of such an exact and thorough training as would have served at once to develop and control the faculties that were disposed to run riot, which would have been invaluable to a woman of Mrs. Margaret's brains.*

Kitty's second friend—Mrs. Ann Harrison, of Balls—was unlike Mrs. Margaret Lucas in everything save an honest and good heart. She was a high-spirited, pretty, motherless girl of nineteen, who had come with her sister on their father's summons, to be within reach of him and of the Court. "A fine experience of Court life," she called it, when, instead of their own country-house of Balls and its liberal table, they were lodged over a baker's shop, and reduced, when provisions got scarce, to "one meal of meat a day." But it required a great deal of hardship and suffering to starve vivacity out of Mrs. Ann. She was what she herself called afterwards, "a hoyting girl," though not precisely a country hoyden, since she had spent every winter in London till she was fifteen, and had been carefully taught, not only in reading, writing and ciphering, and in every kind of fine work, but in singing and dancing, and in playing the lute and the virginals. She could also read and speak French with an ease and correctness which put Mrs. Kitty Dacre and her interminable French romances to shame. Mrs. Ann had all the well-bred familiarity with society, the savoir faire of company, the common sense and humorous sense which Mrs. Margaret Lucas lacked; Mrs. Ann could not be kept from laughing immoderately at Mrs. Margaret's innocent pretensions, and seeking to draw them out at their author's expense.

Indeed, Ann Harrison was so full of fun, and inclined to turn everything into jest when Kitty first knew her, that she was rather too much for the girl—two years her junior certainly, but brought up in the shade at Oriel, and rendered prematurely staid and subdued by family dissensions and severances. Kitty might have drawn back from this Ann, and never known her any better, had not circumstances contributed to soften the newcomer.

While she was mocking at this social incongruity, and railing at that girl's foolish sentimentality and turning up her merry little nose at royalty itself—under a cloud, Mrs. Ann met her fate in these strangely-crowded academic streets, college halls, and scholars' walks, with the great war thundering at the gates. Speedily in the course of their acquaintance Kitty learned to look out, with an arch accusation in her own blue eyes, for her gay young gossip, blushing vividly and hanging her head a little as she was discovered with her sister bearing her company—the pair constantly attended by a distant kinsman of the family. He was a tall man, easily distinguished by his high nose, long, curling brown hair, and a habit of walking about Oxford with a book in his hand. In reality he was a sober-minded, accomplished scholar, as solid in his parts as his young cousin, Mrs. Ann Harrison, was brilliant in hers. He had need to be, for he was nearly twenty years her senior, and held the responsible office of Secretary of War to the Prince of Wales. But in spite of the discrepancy in age, the grave duties of his office, and the difference in the temper of the two, young Ann loved Dick Fanshawe so dearly, and was so proud of him and of his love for her, that the love and pride softened and sweetened indescribably whatever was a little hard and tart in her. He, on his side, in all his cares of State, heavy troubles and manifold anxieties, never failed to prefer her society to that of every other person in the world, and was never so happy as when he could snatch an hour to ride or walk or sit with her.

The final touch which quieted rather than quenched Mrs. Ann's originally somewhat overpowering liveliness, was the violent death of her young brother William, killed by a fall from the horse which was shot under him, in a skirmish with Essex's troops just outside the city walls. His body was brought into Oxford, and he was buried in the Chapel of Exeter College, with which the Harrisons of Balls had some family connections.

What a solemn episode young Will Harrison's funeral was in the middle of the bustle and gaiety of wedding preparations under difficulties! for Mrs. Ann and Mr. Dick were to be married at once, come what might of it. Kitty cried heartily at the sad funeral, not because it was that of a prince in Israel, like Hampden or Falkland; not because she knew the poor lad well, or had many cherished associations connected with him—she had not seen him above once or twice, or done more than exchange a few half formal, half friendly greetings with him. She was sorry because he was young like herself, young like another poor lad fighting with, not against, Essex; she seemed to see in Will Harrison's father's haggard face and his sisters' quivering lips all that was lamentable in the promise of a life thus nipped in the bud.

If Mrs. Margaret Lucas had got these details communicated to her—alas! it was a common enough occurrence for the news that there had been a brush with the enemy, in which a young fellow of birth and breeding had perished, to be told in every company—she might have written a mystic ode in memory of poor young Will, who, though he was a keen sportsman and a dashing soldier, had never been given either to reading or writing odes. As for Kitty, she only wept her eyes dim that day.

But life moved with swift strides in those months. When such great events were happening every moment, there was little time to mourn, any more than to rejoice. Mrs. Ann was to be married, and there could be no deferring of the ceremony. The bride invited Kitty Dacre both to the supper in the lodging over the baker's shop, which celebrated the putting up of the banns and the wedding itself, which for greater quiet was to take place in a country church two miles off, but still within the district commanded by the Royalists. The spirits of the heroine of the occasion rose under strong pressure, and so far recovered their natural buoyance that she was able to make sundry witty speeches, and to take her share of chequered amusement out of the situation. She told Kitty seriously that she thought people would soon have to live in tents, as the buildings in Oxford would not contain a tithe of the fine company seeking their shelter, even though gentle-folks lodged over bakers' shops, and young couples of distinction hired two rooms in which to quarter themselves and their marriage finery. She announced that the bridegroom had a pledge from her father of ten thousand pounds for her portion, and Dick Fanshawe's promised salary was in proportion to the dignity of his office and his undeniable qualifications for it, notwithstanding it was well known that he was not in favour with the Queen's majesty; no, nor with Lord Goring, nor Lords Jermyn and Digby, the speaker said in parenthesis, holding her head high with a happy smile on her lips. But in spite of all the grand things which were coming to them, the "venture-some" couple's capital in hand was just twenty pounds in all, and it was laid out in pens, ink, and paper, her future lord's stock in trade.*

In the middle of the brave banter which she was seeking to keep up, in order to cheer her father and all the party, Mrs. Ann suddenly gave way, and precipitately quitted the room with Kitty.

"Oh, Mrs. Kitty!" she sobbed, flinging her arms round her companion's neck, "think not I have forgotten our boy lying cold and still in Exeter Chapel. I would give all I have in the world to know my brother Will standing by my side to-morrow."

It could not be, unless that, in the mysteries of the spirit world which mortals are not permitted to penetrate, he was suffered to look down at that troth-plighting in Wolvercot Church, when the fate of two of those friends in whose fortunes he was so nearly concerned while he dwelt on earth, was sealed with the Church's blessing.

Kitty thought of Will Harrison during the pretty wedding, even more than those closely connected with him could think, for they were all occupied for the moment, and Mrs. Ann was full of her great happiness. But a disengaged looker-on like Kitty Dacre could spare time and thought for that pensive shade, even when other spectators were plucking at her sleeve and bidding her remark the large, massive-faced handsome man who was standing by, for that was the great lawyer, Sir Edward Hyde, who had so much to say in the King's business. Sir Edward had been present at Mrs. Ann's christening, and he was now one of the witnesses gracing her marriage, when Dick Fanshawe wedded her with her dead mother's wedding-ring, according to that mother's last request.

Outside Oxford it was a sweet spring day, on which the kindly influences of the season and wholesome country work were going on briskly. Nature rejoiced in spite of armed camps, the ashes of burnt-out watch-fires, torn gaps in hedge-rows, where cavalry had forced themselves through, and last year's grain trampled down and rotting in some of the fields.

Who that saw the handsome couple issuing from the porch of Wolvercot Church could have foreseen, even though the gazer had known well the stuff of which bride and bridegroom were made, and the times in which they lived, other days in the far future? There was one at sea, on board a ship, bound for Malaga, and threatened by a Turkish galley, when Mrs. Ann disguised herself in the dress of a cabin boy in order to stay by her husband's side, and have a chance of sharing his dismal captivity. There were other days in London, when she was found at her post near the prison doors by four o'clock in the raw mornings, whether in sun or in rain, clinging to the hope of exchanging a word with the lover of her youth and the father of her children.

LITERATURE FOR THE BLIND.

By ANNE BEALE.

THANKS to persevering Christian effort, the gates of literature are now opened tolerably wide to the blind. Hitherto comparatively few could obtain the books printed in raised types for their benefit, because they were naturally located in large cities, and only within the reach of certain members. But now a circulating library has been started at 114, Belsize Road, London, N.W., the books of which are at the service of anyone who pays the small subscription of one penny per week. These volumes are printed in the different types thus far discovered for finger reading, Moon, Braille, and Lucas; so that any blind person instructed in either of these methods may avail themselves of them. The most numerous are in Braille type, because kind and interested friends prick new works in that species of lettering, or reprint the old, worn out by constant friction. Miss Arnold, the librarian, is herself blind, and to her efforts her fellow-sufferers are mainly indebted for the foundation of the library, now containing about seventeen hundred volumes.

It is curious to see the two good-sized rooms on the ground-floor filled with large books, the contents of which are almost as much sealed to the sighted as those in the ordinary type are to the blind. Once a week these somewhat cumbersome volumes are despatched to subscribers all over the United Kingdom, or are fetched from the library by the blind themselves, for "whoever runs may read."

Many generous-hearted people, blessed with means, pay for those who are not so blessed, and thus flowers from the fields of literature reach individuals who would otherwise be unregarded by their perfume. We earnestly hope no weeds may mingle with the blossoms, no tares find place among the wheat. In these days when the post brings to our fog-bound isle flowers from the sunny south, it is well to know that it also conveys mental blossoms to numbers who see only through vivid imaginations.

Strangely interesting letters reach Miss Arnold from subscribers who benefit by the library, and are grateful for it. But the sorrow expressed by those who are unable to continue their subscriptions for lack of money is very touching. They are put on the free list when funds permit; but funds are not always forthcoming in times like these, when everybody is appealing for something. But there is no unnecessary expenditure here, since not only our blind secretary, but all the sighted ladies who help her, work gratuitously. If persons desiring full information would write to them for it they would obtain it, also gratuitously, though they are not above receiving donations for the furtherance of their work. And they are very glad of volunteer helpers, who are capable of the pricking process. This, though easily learnt superficially, requires much care and practice to be done to perfection. But when so done, what pleasure does not the production of a new volume give to the reader, whose keen sense of touch conveys the contents to the mind! Doubtless there are amongst our girls some who, by "patient continuance," might perfect themselves in an art which would give them the privilege of adding a work to our library. Miss Arnold would send them the "Braille" primer for sixpence. An extract from a letter written by a blind subscriber, by means of a type-writer, will show how such efforts are appreciated:—

"I wonder if the ladies who write these books ever have any idea of how much pleasure their labours afford, if they remember that every tedious hour they spend bears fruit a hundredfold in the shape of pleasure to a hundred readers, or if they ever realise that they are gradually opening up to us the great world of literature, with all its pleasures of thought and fancy, with its boundless stores of wisdom, knowledge, and instruction!"

We wonder, in our turn, what the writer of the above will say of a new magazine, just brought out in Braille type by ladies! These friends of the blind have long been engaged in pricking books for them, and came to the conclusion that they would greatly rejoice in a high-class periodical, such as delighteth the souls of the sighted. Accordingly, having surmounted immense obstacles, and displayed unwearied energy and perseverance, these young ladies published in March last a serial entitled "Santa Lucia," which is to appear monthly. They undertake to send it, post free, to any part of the United Kingdom. The price is two shillings per month, and it consists of forty-four pages, imperial 4to. It is both edited and published by its originators, Miss Mariabella Eliot Hodgkin and Miss Elizabeth Howard Hodgkin, at Childwall, Richmond-on-Thames. They "respectfully solicit subscriptions for copies for the use of those whose means do not enable them to subscribe on their own account." As a guarantee for the nature of its contents, they have obtained permission from many of the best authors and publishers of the day to reprint works written or published by them; and thus periodical as well as general literature is opened to the blind. The subscribers to our library are already clamouring for the magazine; and the one copy for which Miss Arnold subscribed is altogether insufficient to satisfy them. But to multiply copies is to multiply expense, and rigid economists are compelled to consider the £ s. d. Money! money! nothing can be done without it; not even the printing and binding the huge books in Braille which good ladies prick; and besides, it is no joke to keep the library afloat. Still, we will hope that all subscribers may be blessed, in turn, with a perusal of "Santa Lucia," and that the magazine may be so successful as to be within reach of all those for whom it is intended.

The "Braille" type has been chosen as the most modern and useful; but great expense and inconceivable labour are incurred in stereotyping works in this method. We talk and hear much of philanthropists, and must place amongst them those ladies who have undertaken to become printers, publishers, stereotypers, and editors, for the benefit of a class to which, happily, they do not belong. Some idea may be conceived of the laborious nature of their undertaking by a glance at the books in the Library for the Blind. The Holy Bible in "Braille" is in forty large volumes; in "Moon" sixty-two, and in "Lucas" thirty-eight. These are stereotyped, and have been presented to the library, we believe, by Bible societies. A single play of Shakespeare requires two large volumes, and even a short story, such as Hesba Stretton's "Alone in London," swells into two also. The expense of sending such books weekly by post may be imagined, and in like manner the labour and outlay required to forward "Santa Lucia" to subscribers at home and abroad. Many kind friends pay the carriage from and to the library for poor members; but the only mode of aiding the magazine seems to be by subscribing for those who cannot afford the money themselves, as previously stated.

This subject of Literature for the Blind brings to the front a suggestion of Miss Arnold's, made the other day, concerning their employment as bookbinders. She thinks they would be capable of learning this trade, and since, in the Normal College for the Blind and elsewhere, they are taught to forget their loss of sight, and to work, walk, and amuse themselves just as if they had seven senses instead of four, there is no reason why they should not try their "prentice hands" on binding books.

Yet one word more concerning these "senses" of which we are so liable to be deprived. Sir Lyon Playfair said the other day at the annual meeting of the Normal College at Grosvenor House, that he was much interested in a little girl of eight, who possessed but one of the five senses originally given by God to man. She could neither see, speak, hear, nor taste; she could only feel! And through this one sense she was being educated—this one sense of touch. He thought he had almost given her a sense. He was holding her hand during a musical performance, and he insensibly beat time upon it; she felt the time, and in some inscrutable way responded to it, as if she were acquiring a new sensation. This is, indeed, mysterious, for the soul of the child must be attuned to a melody she cannot hear. In some such manner are the souls of God's children attuned to heavenly melodies, and by faith in the unseen are able to join the celestial choirs in singing—"Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen."

The first system of the musical score is written for voice and piano. The voice part is on a single staff with a treble clef and a key signature of one sharp (F#). The lyrics are "nought to plead, In earth be - neath or heav'n a - bove, But just my own ex -". The piano accompaniment consists of two staves, treble and bass, with a key signature of one sharp. The music features a variety of note values including eighth and sixteenth notes, as well as rests.

SONNET.

If Nature, Truth, and God should seem less dear,
 Because thou hast become so dear to me,
 Then should my heart misgive me, lest there be Unworthiness in Love; and I should fear
 My spirit had become less quick to hear
 The Voice that speaks through all things far and near:
 By mountain, valley, river, lake and sea.

But 'tis not so. Each high and holy thing—
 The pure delights of Nature and the calm
 Still voice of Duty to my spirit bring
 A deeper joy; as when an evening psalm
 Breathes benediction o'er some peaceful hearth,
 While Love—the gentlest nurse in all the earth—
 Soothes every heart wound with her healing balm.

A CALIFORNIAN STORY.

CHAPTER II.

Two young men were riding down the mountain in close conversation: one fair and curly-haired, unmistakably an Englishman, and the brother of Lilian Aytoun, so closely did he resemble her; the other a dark and handsome young American, who made no attempt to conceal a start of pleased surprise when he observed the girls sauntering along the valley a few feet below them. It was a lovely evening, as all who know anything of the climate of southern California in the month of April will imagine, and in keeping with the beauty of the surroundings. The ground was covered with the early blooms of spring: flame-coloured escholtzias, yellow wood violets, white azaleas, scarlet delphiniums, blue nemophilas—a long list, far too long to write down here, of what at home are some of our choicest garden flowers, growing here in wild profusion; and overhead the wild grape-vine, the purple Judas-tree, the dark green arbutus, the graceful madrone, the feathery pepper tree—treasures innumerable, which strike the new-comer with bewilderment, so various are they and so luxuriant in their growth.

"You have a friend staying with you, have you not, Aytoun?" said the young American to his friend, as the ladies came into full view. "Miss Aytoun's companion is a stranger to me, I think."

"Yes, a cousin from Colorado; her husband had to come to California for the summer on business, and has left his wife with us till it gets too hot for her here. Then I think she will go to Santa Barbara, or one of the sea-side places, and I shall try to send my sister with her, for I am afraid the summer may be rather a trial to a girl fresh from England. I have not mentioned my plan to her, though, yet, for I know she will object, as she thinks it too lonely for me, but I shall settle it with Mrs. Selwyn, and then it will be too late for her to refuse."

"Our mountain ranch is beautifully cool in summer, and I know my mother would be only too pleased if your sister would come up to her for the great heat; she means to send the invitation, I know; she goes up the middle of May, and remains till the end of September."

"It is very good of her to think of Lily, but I fancy she will want to be with her cousin, if possible; indeed, the Selwyns would be offended if we proposed to send her anywhere but with them. Don't think me ungrateful, however; your mother has been the best neighbour to me a man could possibly have."

By this time the two parties had met, and greetings were exchanged. The evening was so beautiful, all were glad to linger on their walk, but before sunset they gathered round their unpretending little table, and enjoyed to the utmost the simple meal and pleasant talk which accompanied it. Afterwards the rocking-chairs under the verandah were occupied, the gentlemen being permitted to smoke; each appropriated a lady, but at first the conversation was general.

"Summer has really begun, I fear, Lily, and we must put up a tent for the cooking-stove very soon, so that you may have your kitchen out of doors," remarked her brother; "the house will soon be hot enough without artificial warmth."

"That will be nice if I can have it under the shade of one of the live oaks. And I suppose you will be wanting to sleep in the open air before long, Charley?" said she; "it sounds a very nice idea, but somehow I know I should be always thinking of the insects which are certain to be crawling about. There are enough in the daytime; and then what about the rattlesnakes?"

"You must look round well and cautiously before you seek your couch, and dislodge any intruders."

Lily gave a slight shudder, and her cousin remarked that she advised her always to sleep indoors, as, though the fresh air was very delightful at night, there were a great many drawbacks for a lady in such circumstances, until she had had some experience of camping out.

"I am hoping that both you young ladies will come and camp out up at our place," said Mr. Abbott. "I was just telling your brother, Miss Aytoun, that my mother goes up to the mountains in a fortnight's time, and there, where it is so much cooler than here, I really think you would enjoy it; the insect life is far less numerous, and we will take care that your tent shall be made snakeproof."

"I should like to do so very much," said Mrs. Selwyn. "I believe your mother and I will turn out to be old acquaintances, for I believe I have met her in Denver."

"It is highly probable, therefore I hope I may take home a message to the effect that both you and your cousin will come up to us on the first of May, and you, Aytoun, could ride over very well every night, if you had anything to do over at your prune orchards and muscat vines. They are only ten miles from us; and you do go over every two months or so, do you not?"

"Yes, I should have had to go there shortly, in any case, and I never like leaving my sister at night, so if you are sure the arrangement will meet your mother's views, we shall be very glad."

"How do you manage when you are away, Charley? Who comes to stay with Lily?" asked Mrs. Selwyn.

"I have only been up to Hope Ranch once since she came, and the only creature we could get to sleep in the house was an Indian woman who lives the other side of the river. She is the wife of one of our men, and a good sort of body; but poor Lily was dreadfully afraid of her when she appeared, were you not, little one?" he asked playfully.

"THE VOICE THAT SPEAKS THROUGH ALL THINGS FAR AND NEAR."

"I was indeed, and, of course, we could not exchange a word; but Charley has taught me to use a revolver," she added, turning to her cousin. "If anyone had told me a year ago that I should have slept at all under such circumstances, I should not have entertained the idea for a moment."

A moonlight stroll was now proposed by one of the party and agreed to by all, and as the narrowness of the path obliged them to divide, Charley and Mrs. Selwyn fell behind.

"I like your friend," she remarked, when the others were out of hearing. "It strikes me that he too likes somebody. Don't be shocked," she added, hastily, as a somewhat pained expression passed over the features of her companion; "it seems to me that it must be obvious to everybody."

"Of course I understand you, and I am not shocked, only I half hoped it was only my fancy. Perhaps it is selfish of me, but I do not want to lose the dear little sister directly I have got her. If you have noticed it, I fear there must be something on his side, anyway; his mother, too, is always inviting her over; she never goes, and so Mrs. Abbott or Frank keep coming over here on every possible excuse. Of course he only pays his visits when I am likely to be at home, and she nearly always walks off and leaves us together; she has never shown the least sign of liking for him."

"Well, no; I should not suppose she would at present. Is he as nice as he seems?"

"He is a thoroughly good fellow, a real friend to me; and I can trust him, I know. But I do not want him to marry my sister."

"Why?"

"I scarcely know, but I shall be sorry if he asks for her and wins her."

"He can, I suppose, give her a good home, and would be kind and nice to her?"

"Oh yes, all that."

"Well, then, your objections are utterly unreasonable, and if my surmises are true, and anything does happen, you must simply find a wife for yourself."

"That is all very well. I like the American girls very much, but my wife must be an Englishwoman, and how am I to find her out here? I have not spoken to an English girl, except Lily, for two years."

"You must get leave of absence, and go home for six months."

"Impossible! And even if I could, how could I bring a girl out here, and condemn her to this isolated life for at least ten years to come? I can give her food, clothing, a house, beautiful scenery, a fine climate, and that is all. I have a good salary, of course, but if I am ever to go home again, I must save the half every year, and she must turn herself into a general servant, as poor Lily does. No, I have seen the experiment tried many times, and unless the means are large enough to enable a man to take his wife away to civilised life for some months every year, and give her that almost unattainable luxury, a good servant, I think it always results in failure. She becomes a mere household drudge, and all enjoyment dies out of her life. Where the means are even less than mine, it is of course worse. We should not have such a house and so many comforts if we were ranching on our own account. Three rooms and a kitchen, and bare necessities in the way of furniture, is all we could command."

"Yes, all you say is true enough. If Harry had not been fortunate, I should have developed into one of these household drudges myself, I suppose, indeed, if I had not been lucky enough to meet with Sarah, I should have had to struggle along with a dirty and impertinent help, or do the work myself. It seems to me that all over the world the lack of good service is being felt now, and yet the position of a servant out here is very good. I only wish ladies in England, who are not well educated enough to teach, would come out and undertake household work here. We give Sarah £70 a year."

"I have often thought that English people who would really work conscientiously, and not be above the services required of them, might find a good field here—young ladies, I mean. But then such a thing would have to be properly organised, and homes provided for them on their arrival, until they could be suited; this would need co-operation on both sides of the Atlantic, and the Americans show no desire to do this. They would be willing enough to engage a lady with good recommendations if she were brought to their very doors, but will take no trouble or responsibility in the matter. But if you know any Englishwoman who has a turn for philanthropy, who would come out here and establish such a home, I believe she might do good in disposing of some of those superfluous women we hear of in England, and who are really badly wanted here."

"It is such a serious matter, I do not like to suggest it to any of my friends at home, yet I see as clearly as you do what a benefit it might be, if the right person undertook the management. But if she happened to be the wrong one, it would be disastrous."

"Yes, that is true, and in the meantime we must be content to do the work ourselves; but next year I really think I shall be able to keep a servant, if Lily remains with me, so if your estimable Sarah has any relative about thirty or so, whose suitability for the post she will guarantee, we should very much like to have the refusal of her, should she desire to come. Of course she must be made to understand that the work will be twice as heavy as it would be at home. She must be willing to relinquish the idea of holidays entirely, be content to live a very isolated life, and be able to do—or willing to learn—the work of a farm servant, a cook and a maid-of-all-work. In this case we could offer her £50 the first year, and a rise each succeeding one. A married couple would be best, and if we cannot meet with an Englishwoman, we shall have to go on as we are, except that we could then afford to have an Indian woman two days a week instead of one; the American helps are far too independent to suit us."

"You do not think of having an Indian woman altogether then, if you cannot get an English help?"

"No; they are insufferable in the house. Lily would like to have one Mondays and Tuesdays, to do all the washing, ironing, and scrubbing. We can only manage it for one day weekly this year; but here we are at the cannery."

THE MICROSCOPE AND OURSELVES.

PART VI.

In my last chat with you I told you how that many structures in ourselves were made up of a so-called muscle-tissue; among other structures I mentioned the heart. Now the heart is a living muscular pump, whose duty is to force on the nutritive fluid of the body—the blood—through a series of tubes known as blood-vessels. I propose now to give you some insight into the structure of these blood-vessels, reserving the adaptation by structure to function for some future occasion. It will, however, be necessary for you to know the names of the various kinds of blood-vessels before we proceed to our investigation of their minute structure. Starting from the heart, then, the first set of tubes through which the blood must pass are called arteries; they branch like a tree into smaller and smaller branches as their area of distribution becomes larger. The smallest arteries are called arterioles; these arterioles lead to a perfect network of thin, little tubes, which are called capillaries, and these terminate in larger vessels, called "venules"; these running together form larger vessels, called "veins," and by these veins the fluid is conducted back. I shall now describe roughly the structure of these various tubes, and show you how they differ from one another. You will notice that there is nothing new in structure in these tubes; you will have seen all their constituent elements before in other structures that I have spoken about; the only novelty is their arrangement.

First, then, let us look at one of those blood-vessels which carry blood away from the heart to the rest of the body, I mean arteries. Of course you know they are tubes, and you know that if we take a slice off a tube, the slice will be a ring of greater or less thickness. When, therefore, we wish to see what an artery is made up of, we take an artery and imbed it in some material, and then cut it transversely to its longitudinal axis, in the same way that a confectioner cuts up a Swiss roll. When we have done this, we stain one section in some stain, such as logwood or carmine, and mount it in the usual manner on a microscope slide. Now let us look at our section first with the low power; we notice that we have a more or less circular structure to examine; I mean, that our section looks like a ring.

This ring is seen under the low power to consist roughly of three parts; the innermost part is the thinnest, then come two layers whose relative thickness varies. These are the so-called "coats" of the artery. They are technically termed as follows: The innermost coat is called the "tunica intima"; the middle coat is called the "tunica media"; and the external coat the "tunica adventitia." Now let us, with the high power, proceed to a more complete examination of these tunics, and let us commence with the innermost coat—the tunica intima.

The tunica intima is made up of elementary structures, all of which you have examined in previous specimens. Do you remember our talk about "epithelium"? and do you remember "tesselated" or "pavement" epithelium?

Well, the innermost element of the tunica intima is a single layer of such cells, the cells are somewhat irregular in shape, and have oval nuclei, in which are small nucleoli. Of course to see this layer well we would have to cut the artery longitudinally, and look at it from inside, as it were. Fig. 1 represents this element of the tunica intima isolated and treated with a substance known as nitrate of silver or lunar caustic, which shows very well the lines of junction between the various cells, and also brings out the nuclei and nucleoli in very bold relief.

Next to this delicate lining of epithelial cells comes a layer of tissue, with which you are also already familiar, I mean "white fibrous" tissue. In this case, however, a few amoeba-like cells are living in the white fibrous tissue, and the substance is now called "connective tissue." Now comes a layer of a tissue which you know of—"yellow elastic" tissue, this forms the greater part of the tunica intima, or inner coat, and consists for the most part of layers of yellow elastic fibres, such as I have already described in "yellow elastic cartilage," and also elastic tissue of a membranous character, such as that shown in Fig. 4; this last form is known as the "fenestrated membrane of Henle," from the Latin for a window, and it is called after the anatomist who described it. It is said to be fenestrated on account of all those little holes or "windows" which you notice in it.

This, then, completes the examination of the internal coat of an artery, and we see that it is made up of three elements. They are, starting from within, outwards, a thin epithelial layer, then a white fibrous connective-tissue layer, and lastly an elastic layer.

Now let us go further afield in our specimen, and proceed to examine the next outer coat, or tunica media. The constitution of this coat will depend in a great degree on the size of the artery of which we have chosen to take a section. It is par excellence the muscular coat of the artery, and you remember that, in speaking of muscle, I described two main varieties,

FIG. 2.—TRANSVERSE SECTION OF ARTERY.

(a) Tunica intima. (b) Tunica media.
(c) Tunica adventitia.

"striped" or voluntary, "unstriped" or involuntary. Now the muscle-tissue of our artery is of the latter description. The muscle-tissue is arranged in bundles disposed circularly round the artery; the thickness of the artery wall depends in a great measure on this coat, and in some of the smaller arteries, whose walls are very thick, there are many layers of this muscle-tissue; here also one often finds elastic membranes of the same character as those found in the tunica intima.

The muscle cells (Fig. 2, b) range from 1-300 to 4-200 of an inch in length; the nuclei are very distinct, and somewhat oat-shaped, being occasionally curved. I have said that elastic membranes occur in this coat. Well, elastic fibres are found as well, and sometimes white fibres, but as a rule in the small arteries with thick walls the muscle-tissue is fairly free from any other tissue, whereas the larger arteries have most of the elastic and white fibrous element in the structure of their middle coat.

The other coat remains for examination, and that is the external coat or "tunica adventitia." This consists almost entirely of that tissue which is pre-eminently strong and protective, one which best withstands injury—I mean white fibrous tissue; this is arranged round the arteries in a closely packed manner, and traversing the bundles of white fibrous tissue, and running the long way of the artery are bundles of yellow elastic tissue, often so numerous in the larger arteries as to have been described as a separate layer. This tunica adventitia has in its substance the "blood-vessels of the blood-vessel" (Lat. "vasa vasorum"), i.e., minute arteries which carry blood to nourish the artery to which they run.

This, then, is a rough description of the various coats which go to form an artery.

FIG. 3.—ELASTIC FIBRES FROM ARTERY.

But how about the other members of this set of tubes? How about the veins? They present many analogies in structure to arteries; but they also present many differences. Veins have very much thinner coats than arteries; the tube in this case is collapsible, and is not so rigid as an artery, but still they are very strong, and it has been stated by some observers that a vein is, as a rule, stronger than an artery of the same calibre. Let us take a section similar to that which we took of the artery as regards cutting, staining, and mounting, and let us examine it in the same methodical manner as we did the artery. By this means we shall more easily comprehend, and more fully appreciate, the little likenesses and differences of structure between the two vessels. We will first, then, examine the internal coat, it is very much like that of an artery, but is less brittle, and is separated more easily. Like the tunica intima of our artery, it consists of a thin layer of tessellated epithelial cells, and then of a fibrous-tissue layer, above which are super-imposed various layers of elastic tissue; the only difference in the minute structure of this tunica in veins from the corresponding one in arteries is, that the fenestrated elastic membrane, mentioned as being of frequent occurrence in arteries, is rare in veins. So much for the inner coat. Now let us move the specimen under the microscope, as we did in the case of our artery, until we come to the next coat, called as in the artery the tunica media. Here we see a marked difference in several respects from what we noticed in the artery; the coat itself, to begin with, is very much thinner than what we saw in the artery, and here we observe at once two elements in sharp outline which we did not see in the tunica media of the artery—yellow elastic fibres and white fibrous-tissue. The elastic part of the coat consists of strong yellow fibres, which form a network, the general direction of which is longitudinal. Next to a layer of this sort comes a layer of muscular fibres like those of the artery, arranged in a circular manner, but intermingled with a considerable amount of white fibrous tissue, and also containing a few fine elastic fibres.

These layers alternate then for a various number of times, according to the size of the vein—the medium-sized veins containing the most of the muscular element, and the large veins having more fibrous tissue in their middle coats. Now let us look at the external coat; it is unlike that of the artery, thicker than the middle coat, which it covers and protects. It is made up of thick white fibrous tissue, and also some elastic fibres arranged in the same longitudinal direction as those in the tunica media of the skin. Sometimes, in the larger veins, muscle is found in the external coat, similar to that found in the middle coat.

The tunica adventitia of a vein, like that of an artery, carries its own nutrient vessels, and as in the artery, so in the vein, these vessels are technically termed the "vasa vasorum" ("vessels of vessels"). Many veins are, unlike arteries, provided with valves, but as this is of no special microscopical interest, and is greatly concerned in the function of those veins, I shall not deal with it here. We now see the main differences between the arteries and veins, as regards their very minute structure, but we must take into consideration the structure of those tiny tubes which the fluid has to pass through on its way from an artery to a vein, and these form a perfect labyrinth or network of little tubes. What are they made of? Have you ever seen at a scientific conversazione the circulation of blood in a frog's foot? If you have, you will have seen these little tubes or "capillaries," as they are called; they consist of a simple tube of epithelium (Fig. 5), a thin epithelium, somewhat curved, and joining with its fellows at its edges.

The specimen indicated in Fig. 5 has been prepared in a particular way, to show the individual cells and their nuclei. The part has been dipped in lunar caustic or nitrate of silver solution, and exposed to the sunlight for a short time, after which the specimen is stained in hæmatoxylin, and thus the nuclei are brought out in bold relief. You see, then, that the capillaries are merely a repetition of the tunica intima of the artery or vein without the two additional coats.

These are the three great constituents of the blood circulating system—the arteries, veins and capillaries; each set has its special functions to perform, and each is specially adapted for the performance of that function. You will, after knowing as much as you now do know about the structure of these tubes, easily appreciate and realise the reason for their variations of structure, and see the wants that those variations are intended to meet.

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

By SOPHIA F. A. CAULFEILD.

PART IV.

THE Laurel (Laurus nobilis) or "Daphne," known in this country as the "Sweet Bay," is the next flower-bearing shrub that claims consideration. It is improperly called "Bay," which is the name of the fruit alone; derived from baie, the French for fruit. The species (of which there are many) known by its large and beautifully lustrous leaves, has usurped the name of "Laurel," as the chief representative of the genus, and is erroneously supposed to be that from which our more favoured poets derive their title, "Laureate."

The flowers of the Laurus nobilis are of a yellowish-white colour, small in size, and growing in clusters on their axils; and the fruit or berry is of a purple colour. It was a favourite decoration of the Greeks and Romans, for their temples, palaces, and statues, employed at their feasts and in their devotions, and was conferred as a mark of distinction on their kings and warriors, their distinguished scholars, poets, and the victors at their public games. fold. It has had a reputation of being propitious, to the human race, averting the evil influences of sorcery, and dangers attending storms with lightning. The tyrant Tiberius was a coward as regards the latter; and, like a timid child, would creep under his bed and cover his head with laurel leaves to ensure his safety. His pusillanimity may be explained by Shakespeare; for "Conscience does make cowards of us all."

The withering of the laurel was considered a bad omen, a reference to which tradition is to be found in Hamlet—

"The King is dead! The bay-trees are withered."

In early ages this tree was credited with disinfectant properties, such as are ascribed to the Eucalyptus. An example of this belief is to be met with in the removal of the Emperor Claudius, during a severe outbreak of the pestilence, to Laurentium, the capital of Latinum, by recommendation of his physicians, on account of the large number of laurels growing in the neighbourhood, after which the city was named.

Another historical flower is the Leek (Allium parvum), which, though of ill flavour as such, must hold a very distinguished position, as being the national emblem of our Ancient British brethren of Wales.

The origin of wearing it on St. David's Day, March 1st (that of their patron saint, Archbishop of Carleon, A.D. 544) appears to be rather a vexed question. According to Shakespeare it dates from the battle of Cressy, the site of which is twelve miles from Abbeville, where Edward III. and the "Black Prince" gained such a splendid victory. "Fluellen," addressing Henry V., reminds him that "The Welshmen did goot service in a garden where leeks did grow; wearing leeks in their Monmouth caps, which, your majesty knows, to this hour is an honourable badge of the service, and I do pelieve your Majesty takes no scorn to wear leek upon St. Tavy's Day." Indeed, the King need not to have scorned it, for he owed his life, when, at the battle of Agincourt, he engaged in personal conflict with the French knight, the Duc d'Alençon. The latter had vowed to kill or take the King a prisoner, and eighteen other knights pledged themselves to do the same. But three gallant Welshmen, David Gam (his squire) and two others, not only rescued the King when the French knight clove the crown in two which encircled his helmet, but killed the duke and all the eighteen knights that had conspired against him. And there, as the three noble Welshmen lay bleeding to death at their sovereign's feet, he did all that was left in his power to do for them, and made them "Knights Banneret" on the "field of their fame." Doubtless the green and white emblem of their nationality was to be seen on their headgear, though the old Cymric colours must then have worn a very unnatural hue.

Other historians affirm that the wearing of the Leek was in commemoration of a great victory of theirs over the Saxons, and that they put them into their hats by order of St. David, thereby called "Bœotian fêtes," and in honour of Apollo, were designated "Daphnephoriæ."

The superstitions connected with the laurel in modern, as well as ancient times, are mani-

Readers of the Holy Scriptures will recognise in this vegetable one of those to which the ancient Israelites looked back with hungry longing and regret, though enjoyed in the land of their cruel bondage, so degenerate and demoralised had they become. According to Pliny, the Romans had an equal esteem for them, Nero having brought them into notice by his use of them taken with oil, to clear his voice for singing, a fancy that gave him the sobriquet of Porrophagus, or "the Leek-eater."

Some affirm, and amongst them Dr. Owen Pugh, that the origin of the adoption of the leek as an emblem of the Ancient British race is to be found in the custom of their meeting at the Cymmortha, or association for mutual assistance in the ploughing of their land. On such occasions the farmers each contributed his leeks to help out their general repast. Again, another tradition solves the question by reference to the extreme abstinence of their patron saint, who fed on the leeks he gathered in the fields. So to commemorate his holiness and extreme self-denial, the Welsh have worn a leek in their hats as his emblem on each successive anniversary of his special day. This is a legend related by Drayton, and, I believe, it sums up the whole list; and I leave my Welsh readers to select from amongst them the story that bears the strongest internal or historical evidence of truth.

When our blessed Lord counselled His hearers to "consider the lilies of the field," He did not refer to the English "lilies of the valley," nor were those so named in the Canticles of the same species. Of the wild lilies of Palestine, Sir J. E. Smith, the famous botanist, speaks much. He says that "the fields of the Levant are overrun with Amaryllis lutea, whose golden liliaceous flowers, blossoming in autumn, afforded one of the most brilliant and gorgeous objects in nature." To this flower the statement that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these," was (says this writer) "peculiarly appropriate." The species of lily named at verse 13, chapter v. of the Canticles is supposed to have been that of Persia, in the flower-cup of which a fluid somewhat like myrrh is contained; the lily named in chap. ii., ver. i

(Ibid), was, it is supposed, a species growing wild, much under cover of leaves and hidden from view. According to R.
Folkard, the lily of Palestine was the Lilium chalcidonicum of some fifty species. The white, or "poet's lily," L. candidum; the orange, L. bulbiferum; the "Turk's cap,"
L. Martagon; the "Tiger
Lily," Tigrinum; and the L. superbum and L. canadense are the best known, and have been the longest under cultivation.

An order of knighthood was instituted by Ferdinand of Aragon, A.D. 1403, known as the "Order of the Lily," the collar being composed of these flowers and in combination with gryphons. The fact of the lily being an emblem of the Blessed Virgin was the origin of this order, but why associated with gryphons does not, I think, appear.

What are commonly called "Lent lilies" are Daffodils, or otherwise Narcissus, an emblematic flower of Lent and Eastertide, once, in the long past, called "Affodilly," a corruption of Asphodelus. I have already named these and the Fleur-de-Luce or de-Lys, of heraldic history, and shall thus pass over the subject, only including in this beautiful family of flowers the majestic Ethiopic species of Arum (Calla Ethiopica). The Hebrew name
"Susannah" signifies "a lily," and became the special emblem of purity and chastity.
It is associated, as I said, with representations of the Blessed Virgin and many of the ancient saints as well as angels in the paintings of the old masters. The white lily was the badge of the Ghibellines, and the red of the Guelfs.

Following naturally in succession is the Lotus or water-lily, that grows in the inundated lands of Egypt (Lin. Nymphaea lotus).
Amongst the Greeks and Romans this flower is associated with their mythological histories; and in Hindu theology it is regarded as specially sacred. In the representations of their various deities the latter are often to be seen seated on a flower of the lotus. It was adopted as typical of Upper, and the papyrus of Lower Egypt. In the British Museum there are several statues holding sceptres of this flower, and also a mummy, with the arms crossed, holding one in each hand.
The Persians regard it with similar reverence, and so do the Hindu, Tibetan, Chinese, Japanese, and most of the Oriental races. The Persians represent the sun as crowned with it, and it is the special symbol of Buddha; his followers also associating it with the sun, being surmounted by a trident (typical of the sun). The Scābhavikas inscribed their temples with the words Aum
(Jehovah) Mani (the Jewel) Padmi
(Lotus), Hoong (Amen). "This sentence," says Richard Folkard, "forms the Alpha and Omega of Lama worship, and is unceasingly repeated by the devotees of Tibet and the slopes of the Himalayas." He goes on to say that "for the easy multiplication of this prayer, the 'praying wheel' was invented," than which a more impious travesty of homage to the Divine Creator was never conceived. It virtually declares, "I offer an act of worship without giving myself the smallest trouble; neither using my brain, nor sacrificing my breath in words. I have no sin to confess;

no pardon nor grace to crave; no gratitude to express, no desire for closer communion with my God. A long course of years, replete with ever-accumulating proofs of Divine forbearance and love, finds me just as I was, when I began to grind the machine, and to present four words neither expressive of prayer nor praise. I am saved all trouble, and that is enough for my Maker and for me!"

David declined to offer to God "that which had cost him nothing." If your offering cost you no thought, self-denial, fatigue, time, nor money, it is worthless. Excuse the digression.

There are three species of the Lotus (Nymphæa) cultivated in Egypt. One has fragrant white blossoms, bearing edible fruit and resembling our white water-lily. The streams near Damietta are full of it, the flowers rising two feet above the water. Then there is the blue Lotus; but the sacred "rose-lily of the Nile," so called by Herodotus, is a larger flower than either of the foregoing, and its blossoms are of a brilliant red colour. Its roots, seeds, and stalks are all good for food, as well as its fruit, which is formed of many valves, and consists of a cluster of almond-flavoured nuts, each valve containing a nut.
The somewhat obscure passage, "Cast thy bread upon the waters," is elucidated by the fact that the seeds of the Nelumbo are made into bread, and sown, by enclosing each in a ball of clay, and throwing it into the water.
The Nymphaea lutea and Nymphaea odorata
(the latter very beautiful, and of exquisite perfume) are natives also of North America; likewise the Nymphaea gigantea, the flowers of which very frequently measure twelve inches across, and afford an edible fruit. But for size and beauty no other species can compare with that of British Guiana and in La Plata, discovered by M. d'Orbigny in the river Berbice, the leaves stretching out twelve feet in diameter, and the blossoms fifteen inches across. The Zizyphus Lotus is a thorny middle-sized tree, and must not be confounded with the sacred Pythagorean bean of Egypt, or lotus lily.

CHAPTER X.

MRS. ALLINGHAM WEST, whose name was darkly whispered about the hotel as lending a glory to the spot, "kept herself to herself," as Mrs. Lancaster expressed it in homely phrase. Her renown was such that she would have been the mark for every glance and every tongue among the hundred and fifty guests had she gone in and out freely among them; so she remained for the most part a mysterious presence in her balconied rooms in the dépendance. Those who were fortunate enough to see her go or return from an excursion were not slow to proclaim the fact, and it invested them for the time being with a kind of borrowed lustre. However, she was not forgetful of Evelyn's courtesy, and on the day after her return from the Engstlen Alp a little note was brought by a waiter, requesting the pleasure of Miss Hope's company to tea that afternoon in Mrs. West's private sitting-room.

Evelyn's heart beat high with excitement at this communication, and she re-wrote her acceptance three times. Miss Wentworth was immediately very curious and interested. She was much disappointed that she also was not included in the invitation, and seemed at first inclined to accompany Evelyn unasked.

"I could say that, as an Amuh-ican interested in literature, I had just called in to express the homage of my countrymen to the gifted authoress. I need not stay to tea, of course, unless she asked me after that."

"I'm sure it wouldn't do at all," declared Evelyn, in mortal alarm.

"But when I return to my country it would be worth saying I had had an interview with anyone so renowned," pleaded the American.

"Go instead of me, Miss Wentworth, if you like," said Evelyn, sternly. But this, of course, was out of the question, and the elder lady was compelled to resign her half-formed project.

Evelyn was ready in her fresh white embroidered cambric gown long before the hour of four, and took many tremulous excursions between the clock in the hall of the hotel and her distant bedroom, fearful of being too early, yet afraid of being too late. Her own watch was not regarded as sufficiently trustworthy or au fait in Swiss time to direct her movements. At last, with a beating heart, she tapped at the celebrated authoress's door.

Evelyn could never quite recollect her entrance; she had a confused vision of a pale, dark-haired lady of distinguished mien, in a tea-gown of lace and silk, where some subtle shade of silver-grey melted into black, rising from a sofa to greet her, and murmuring a civil word or two. When she was seated with the teacup in her trembling hand she could take in the details of her surroundings. It was evident Mrs. West had made herself at home here, for signs of her presence were everywhere, from the latest English reviews lying on the table, to the wealth of fern and ivy that adorned wall and bracket. Photographs, that Evelyn could see at a glance were of distinguished men and women, stood about here and there, there were books in a bookcase on the wall, and many lying on table and cabinet. There was, in one sense, a litter in the room, but it was an artistic litter, giving it a pleasant and a homelike familiarity.

"I wished to thank you for your kindness the other day," observed Mrs. West. "I had thoughtlessly omitted to write to Engelberg beforehand, and as the hotel was crowded, I found your offer of great service. My maid and I used your rooms in your absence for two nights. I hope it caused you no inconvenience."

"Oh, no," cried Evelyn. "I was only too glad to be of any use to you. But I am sure anybody in the hotel would have felt honoured to do the same."

Mrs. Allingham West was thoroughly used to adulation and homage. She had leapt at one bound into the front rank of modern novelists, though for years she had been doing good and comparatively unnoticed work. But she happened to hit a theme that was much in the popular mind at the time. After a phase of contemptuous incredulity and lack of interest in all psychical phenomena, the intelligent thought of the age was beginning to turn with interest to various aspects of human consciousness, and various strange facts, that might suggest the retort to the sceptic.—"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Mrs. West's book, a romance in which the natural and supernatural, so called, were weirdly mingled, achieved, therefore, a sudden and complete success.

"I am afraid you overrate the popularity of my work," she said, smiling for the first time. "I have no such claims on gratitude as you seem to suppose. But I am glad you like my book. I hope you enjoyed your stay at the Engstlen Alp?"

This determined turning away of the conversation from literary topics was a great discomfiture to Evelyn. She did not want to talk about the Engstlen Alp. The golden moments of her visit were fleeting past; for she instinctively felt that Mrs. West was not likely, having once paid the debt of civility, to rush into any continued intimacy. How much time is lost, in this hurried life of ours, by a lack of knowledge as to one another's cherished subjects! It takes so long to find out that which our brother or sister really is, and meanwhile the opportunities for intercourse are going by, and the chances for interchange of sympathy, information, help, are slipping from our grasp for ever. But Evelyn could not force the conversation into any channel her hostess did not indicate, and so she replied that she did like the Engstlen Alp very much; and in answer to further inquiries, she duly notified that it was her first visit to Engelberg; that she thought it one of the loveliest places she had ever seen; that she had explored the church; had been to the Tätschbach-fall, but not yet to the Arnitobel, and so forth. While this civil interchange of questions and answers was going on—to poor Evelyn, like husks to one who asked for bread—a slight movement of Mrs. Allingham West on the sofa where she sat displayed the title of a paper lying beside her, that had been put down on the girl's entrance. Alas! it was the Critic.

In her state of nervous agitation, Evelyn could not help a sudden flush and start, with such a look of dismay, that Mrs. Allingham West broke short off in her civil nothings, and gazed at her with astonishment.

"Are you not well? Perhaps the room is too warm for you?"

"It is nothing of that sort, thank you," gasped Evelyn, trying to recover her self-control. Mrs. West felt she had a very puzzling guest, and casting about for some fresh topic of conversation, she took up the Critic.

"Do you often see this? I was glancing at it when you came in. There is a very severe, though rather an amusing, short review at the end, of some young author's poems—Would you like a glass of water?" For Evelyn had turned first scarlet, then very pale. Hurriedly there flashed through her brain the thought that she must fly; she put down her teacup, and half rose from her seat; then sat down again.

"Have I distressed you? Perhaps you know the author?" inquired Mrs. West, quite at a loss to account for this excessive display of agitation, and inwardly resolving not to invite unknown young ladies to tea any more. It was fortunate for Evelyn that, suddenly making up her mind concealment was hopeless, she murmured, in a faint voice, "I am the author." Her face crimsoned again, and all at once she burst into tears.

There was something piteous in it after all—the heroine-worship that had led the girl to regard introduction to her idol as one of the greatest boons life could offer, the hope of kindred intercourse, and the pride with which she dreamt of saying, "I, too, am an author." And now Mrs. West had been smiling at the cruel words that condemned her efforts! Bitter were the tears that fell; bitter were the sufferings of wounded vanity in poor Evelyn's breast.

The authoress was very much astonished, but grasped the situation with her habitual keenness. She quickly sought a glass of water, and holding it to her guest's lips, said in a brisk, decided voice, "There, there! do not cry. Dry your tears and tell me all about it."

Tears were very rare with Evelyn, and these were quickly dried, but they had brought relief. She could not choose but comply with her hostess's invitation, which sounded, indeed, very like a command; and she was soon, though with faltering lips, in the midst of her story, how her father used to write in the Fortnightly; how he died when she was very young; how she, too, loved writing, and had written poetry ever since she was eight years old; how everyone said her later poems were good enough to publish, except her uncle and the publisher, Mr. Wrexham; how the book was published and all her friends praised it; and now this cruel review (which Evelyn spoke of with the bitterest resentment) made fun of her attempts.

"But, my dear Miss Hope, if you publish, you must be prepared for criticism. Look at me! What would become of me, do you suppose, if I cried my eyes out over every unfavourable review?"

"Ah, but you are different," sighed Evelyn, truly enough. "They all praise you."

"Now they do, but they did not at first. And I can assure you I learned some very helpful truths from my reviewers, though they were not always very palatable. Did you publish, may I ask, at your own expense?"

"Yes," replied Evelyn.

"Ah, that is never very wise. If a book is worth anything, you can generally find some publisher who will at least share the risk. But you wanted to see yourself in print. Was not that so?"

Evelyn could not but own it.

"And you would not take the advice of those who had experience and judgment—your uncle, and Mr. Wrexham, whom I know very well?"

Evelyn was silent.

"You see, Miss Hope, this is part of the price you have to pay for your enjoyment," resumed Mrs. West. "Everyone is free to print what he writes; but everyone is not free to command praise and flattery from the public."

"Do you think I ought not to have done it?" faltered Evelyn.

"I cannot tell until I read the poems themselves, but, I think you are decidedly young to publish poetry; and these reviews are written by a friend of mine, who is usually very discriminating in his judgment."

"A friend of yours! Oh, please tell me his name?" entreated Evelyn.

"No, certainly not; it would not be fair, for he writes anonymously. After all, there is a redeeming touch in this notice. Do you not see that he praises one poem?"

"Very faint praise," said poor Evelyn, bitterly.

"Still, it should encourage you. And if you are not afraid to hear my candid opinion, lend me this little volume of yours."

"I think I shall burn every copy," declared Evelyn, with vehemence.

"No, don't do that. Make this book a stepping-stone to better things. The writer's art is not to be lightly entered on or flung petulantly aside," declared Mrs. Allingham West, and as she spoke her dark eyes glowed. "It is worth your pains; if, indeed, you intend to publish, not for the sake of gratifying vanity, but in the hope of doing work worth the doing. Life is short, at the best, and Art is long; but happy are those who in their brief career can do something, however little, to lift the thoughts of their fellow-men."

She spoke musingly, and Evelyn looked upon her with a new impulse of adoration. Then she returned to her brief, decided tone.

"I must send you away, Miss Hope, for I have letters to despatch before supper; but let me have this little book of yours, and in a few days' time I will ask you to come and see me again."

Evelyn scarcely knew what she said, nor how she escaped to her room, where she flung herself down on her bed, in a tumult of excited feelings. After all, how kind Mrs. Allingham West had been! It was disappointing that she seemed to take sides with the reviewer instead of with Evelyn; "but perhaps when she reads my poems she will alter her mind a little," whispered Vanity. Then, after all, she had been in the same room with the celebrated authoress, taken tea from her hand, talked to her on equal terms! That was a glory and delight nothing could take away.

"Well," cried Dottie, through the door of partition, "do tell me all about it, Evelyn; oh, do!"

But Evelyn wished to remove the traces of tears from her eyes, and place her recollections of the eventful hour in order.

"Afterwards, Dot," she answered.

"I don't believe Evelyn has enjoyed herself at all," said Dottie, in confidence to Miss Wentworth, as they sat in the salon waiting for supper. "I have only caught one glimpse of her since her grand visit, and she looked as if she had been crying."

"Very likely," replied the American. "My opinion is that Mrs. Allingham West is haughty, and I am on the whole glad I did not go in for the interview myself."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

FLORA McIVOR.—"Prevent us," in old-time English, was the same thing as "go before us;" so that God's blessing might be not only on the finished work, but on that we merely think of and are going to begin. The two lines—

"Though the mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small,
Though with patience He stands waiting,
With exactness grinds He all," is by Frederick von Logan, translated by Longfellow; the name of the poem being "Retribution." The meaning seems to be clear, i.e., that even very small and insignificant actions have their effect, and their retribution or their reward.

G. H. G.—We strongly recommend you to apply for information and admission into the students' branch of the Christian Women's Education Union to Miss Petrie, hon. sec. and treasurer, Hanover Lodge, Kensington Park, London, W. Sixty-two or more ladies have been enrolled as teachers. The secular subjects taught are the English language and composition, English history and literature, Greek, Latin, arithmetic, mathematics, French, German, physical geography, church history, and Christian evidences. Members give half an hour daily to the Bible in connection with a Bible class. None can join who are under sixteen years of age. There are no fees, but members pay a small subscription towards the expenses of postage and printing.

HOUSEKEEPING.

LOUISA.—To clean rusty fire-irons cover them with oil for twenty-four hours, then rub them with emery paper, or make a paste of soft soap and emery powder and rub it on. Rub off when dry with a dry leather. 2. Wash the hands in oatmeal and water, or use a little glycerine on them while your hands are wet.

CHERRY RIPE.—The best way to clean white coral that has been much neglected is to put it into a pot large enough to hold it, where it may be well covered with cold water. Then put it on, and as it gets hot add a little washing soda to the water. After a little boiling it will be quite clean. You might try Judson's dyes, perhaps.

MARY.—It is impossible to tell you how to restore polish, unless we knew whether the furniture be varnished or French-polished. If the latter use a mixture of $\frac{1}{2}$ gill vinegar, 1 gill spirits of wine, and 1 oz. linseed oil. Shake well, and apply with a flannel made into a flat pad. Rub in a circular direction, using only a few drops at a time.

ANNIE.—If the floor be very dirty you should employ Fuller's earth to clean it. Dry it thoroughly, and mix the Fuller's earth into a paste with boiling water, adding a third part of fine sand. Sprinkle this over the boards, and then scrub with a suitable brush with the grain of the wood. If they be spotted with grease, use $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of pearlash mixed in a pint of hot water, and scrub, as before, a little sand being mixed with the pearlash.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A CONSTANT READER.—The question does not seem a very important one. If a man wants his betrothed wife to buy something agreed on by both, as a present for herself, we cannot see much difficulty in the matter. 2. Unless a clerk on £100 per annum has been able to save money, get his life insured, and so prepare for a married life, we should not advise any girl to take him.

IRIS.—Wish him many happy returns of the day. We are quite unable to judge whether a present be needful or not; ask your mother; probably not.

F. C. E.—Only by a determined attempt to bear the subject in constant remembrance will you get the better of your bad habit.

WANTING LOVE.—We regret to hear of your serious condition of health. If "one lung be gone" you should turn your mind the more exclusively on your eternal interests. Such a solemn warning should forbid your contemplating marriage. Even if the man cared for you, and proposed it, you would be highly dishonourable in encouraging his suit in your state of health. But as it is, he does not, and you have reversed the order of nature in seeking him. It is for the man to seek the woman. How often we have to remind our girls of this important fact. You have a mother; devote yourself to her, and requite her care; and remember, also, that if she be your only near relative, "there is a Friend that sticketh closer than a brother." Seek for happiness and peace in His service.

EDITH and DAISY.—“East or west, Nanie’s best,” appears to be a Scotch proverb, not a quotation. So is the Italian about which you inquire, which is only a proverbial saying with a double meaning, “Vedi Napoli e poi mori”—“See Naples and die.” There is a town called “Mori,” and you may say the Italians sarcastically make it to mean either one or the other.

GLADYS does not mention whether she would have her dinner with, or walk with, her pupil. We should think from £30 to £40 per annum would be enough, and the six weeks’ holidays would be a matter of arrangement with the parents. Writing certainly not pretty nor elegant.

MISS MAXFIELD, who formerly was hon. secretary to the Early Rising Association, Edith Grove, West Brompton, has written to say that the present hon. sec. is Miss Clift, Fernbank, Cheltenham, Miss Maxfield having resigned about two years ago. Miss Clift will be glad to hear of young ladies wishing to join the society.

SYMPATHY must say to her own doctor that she would like a second opinion on her brother’s case, and ask him to recommend a London specialist, and, if possible, get a note from him to explain the case and its previous treatment.

MISS HAINES, Bellary, S. India (whom we thank for her kind letter), has two schools of Hindoo girls under her care, and she would be very glad to receive contributions of Christmas cards, coloured pictures, and dressed dolls, to be given as prizes to the children under her charge. China-headed dolls, or those with black hair, preferred, as they fancy that light hair is a mark of old age. Any contributions designed for them to be sent to Miss Bennett, 22, Cavendish Square, W., for Miss Haines, Bellary, South India.

JESSIE.—If you find that the heat caused by wearing your hair massed on the top of your head is making it thin on that spot, you should endeavour to make some change to lighten it and let it in the air. It is a good plan to have the ends singed by a careful hairdresser. Do not attempt to do it yourself. A wash of rosemary applied to the roots with a small sponge will promote the growth.

EDNA G. F.—Do not feel discouraged by your sins, temptations, and frequent falls. Ask for Divine aid continually; the grace promised to those who ask, and that with a hearty effort to amend, will be made perfect in your weakness. When temptations come, betake yourself to prayer, or to reading, or some active employment, or to the companionship of someone who will turn the current of your thoughts.

R. V. M. G.—1. The degree of Bachelor of Arts is a step to the higher honour of Master of Arts, which latter is obtained by payment of a considerable fee. So also a Bachelor of Divinity, who has passed his exams. for that degree, has to pay a fee to be entitled a Doctor of Divinity. 2. The 7th of February, 1870, was a Monday. 3. We are pleased to hear that you so much appreciate our paper, and especially the “Answers to Correspondents.”

MADGE.—We recommend you to take a tepid bath in the morning, washing rapidly, and rubbing well till very dry, so as to quicken the circulation after it. We recommend, as usual, our “Handbook of the English Tongue,” by Dr. Angus.

ENGELBERG.

CHAPTER XI.

It was Sunday, and from an early hour the bell had been resounding over valley and hill, calling worshippers to the monastery church. Evelyn and her party of friends had resolved to follow the general example of the English in visiting the edifice; so, at a little before nine, they went through the bright, clean village, bathed in sunlight, and entered the portals softly, without the noisy, curious irreverence deprecated by the "Avis aux Etrangers." There was only standing room for them and other visitors at the back of the seated multitude.

It certainly was a wonderful sight. The church was thronged with worshippers, chiefly of the peasant class, women on the one side, men on the other. The dress of the women was specially remarkable with regard to their head-gear. Their hair was divided into rolls, one on each temple, and at the back was covered in two ways; either by a head-dress composed of tiny pieces of stiffened linen, or a sort of double spoon of steel. Through the linen head-dress were thrust long pins of silver metal, with filigree heads exquisitely wrought. These pins are greatly prized by their wearers, and are handed down as heirlooms from mother to daughter. On this occasion the majority of the women also wore white wreaths of artificial flowers. For the rest, their dress was composed of dark stuff, or of linen jacket and stuff skirt. The men gave less evidence of care in their attire, being, as a rule, in their shirt-sleeves!

In the pulpit a dignitary was preaching with an eloquence and fire that would have put many a Protestant clergyman to shame. Evelyn could scarcely understand the dialect of German in which he spoke, but one thing she could understand, that the sermon was all about angels—the angels who early indicated the site for the monastery, who gave their name to the valley, and who should be imitated by the privileged dwellers in so sacred a spot. Engel—Engel—Engel; the word recurred again and again, as the preacher, nearing the close of his subject, dwelt with enthusiasm on the destiny before his hearers, who dwelt in the valley consecrated by angels, and who one day might hope themselves to rise to the angels' sphere. As the hour of nine drew near, the curtain veiling the screen before the chancel was noiselessly drawn aside by two attendant monks, and Evelyn caught a gleam of the glories of the altar-piece by Spiegler.

The mass that followed was long, and for the most part incomprehensible to Evelyn, but she understood at least the magnificent thunder of the organ in the Kyrie eleison and Agnus Dei. There seemed many officiating, and Evelyn remembered she had heard it was the first mass of a young priest. She suddenly became aware that the congregation were rising, and filing one by one through the chancel, depositing coins on a table before the altar. The men went first, followed by the women. What could be the meaning of this? The white flower wreaths were connected in some way with the ceremony. She tried to discover, inquiring afterwards of one or two old inhabitants of the place, but they could only reply, "It is the first mass of a young priest; it is the custom here."

At length the service with its magnificence and bewildering intricacy was over, and the villagers streamed forth, some for a distant journey home again; for they came from many miles round. It was all very wonderful and interesting to Evelyn. That such a magnificent ceremonial, so largely attended, should be found in this remote Alpine valley seemed strange indeed, and her mind went pondering over the past. Ever since 1121 has this Benedictine foundation existed, and its history is full of incident.

The simpler service in the pretty little English church, filled to overflowing, brought help and refreshment. Evelyn tried to put away all thoughts of her book, of the terrible review, and to live as far as might be in gratitude to the Creator of the sublime beauty in which she was delighting.

"Now, can't we have a long excursion, all together?" demanded Algy, next day, as the party met to enjoy their early rolls and coffee. "Every one of us; you too, mother."

"That depends, my dear, where you are going to," replied Mrs. Lancaster, a good-natured smile creasing her plump cheeks.

"Well, I should like to go up to the very head of the valley, on the way to the Surenen Pass," proposed her son. "You could easily manage it—on a horse."

Mrs. Lancaster shook her head.

"None of your horses for me," she declared. "I shall be very happy at home."

It was finally decided that Mrs. Lancaster should spend the morning in the enjoyment she loved best, sitting about in the hotel gardens, chatting to one and the other acquaintance, and that she should drive out to the Tätschbachfall to meet the pedestrians for afternoon tea on their homeward way.

Before starting Evelyn made a neat little parcel of "Day-dreams," and sent it down to Mrs. Allingham West's door. With what fear and trembling she performed this act, and how different was her feeling from that with which she scattered copies broadcast on their first publication! She could scarcely bear to open the book now, and she knew that if she read the poems through again she would never dare to submit them to the critical eye of her illustrious friend! Such change already had experience wrought in her.

Evelyn found herself walking by Madame Lichtenstein, whose face and manner attracted her greatly. The two women were drawn together by a sort of mutual sympathy, and soon found themselves talking quite confidentially.

"Yes, I love Engelberg more than any other place in Switzerland except Gimmelwald," Madame Lichtenstein was saying.

"Except Gimmelwald! I never heard of it. Do you not mean Grindelwald?"

"No, Gimmelwald, a lovely spot high above the Lauterbrunnen-Thal. It was there I met my husband. I was a teacher of music in London. I went abroad with friends. I cannot tell you what that holiday was to me—poor, overworked, lonely. I met Herr Lichtenstein at the Pension Edelweiss there. He, too, was a professor of music, but of a very different stamp, as I need not say, from myself. But it is a long story—you do not want to be wearied with hearing it."

Evelyn, however, did want to be "wearied with hearing" it, and was gratified by her friend. As the story may not be unknown to some readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, it need not be repeated here in detail. The girl listened with great interest to the account of Esther Fielding's encounter with the critical professor à propos of music, her offence at his strictures, the performance of the Moonlight Sonata, the adventure upon the Schilthorn steeps, and the dénouement of all.

"I do not know why I tell you this," concluded Madame Lichtenstein. "Sometimes one feels as though one could confide to a new friend what one does not tell to every old one."

"It is a romantic story. I need not ask if it has turned out happily," said Evelyn, deeply interested.

"I think I am the happiest woman in the world," cried her friend; and she gave Evelyn many details of her congenial home life in her adopted country.

"I will tell you something in return, if you will let me, which I do not talk about even to Dottie," said the girl; and to her confidante's willing ears she poured forth the account of her recent experiences and the interview with Mrs. Allingham West. Esther Lichtenstein listened with sympathy, putting in a gentle word or two now and then.

"Oh, you must not be discouraged," she said. "It is a great honour to have so well-known an authoress talk to you at all. Even if she criticises you will not mind. And how much time you have before you! A long life, money, and friends to help you! You will study, and succeed. You must not expect to spring at once into full power."

"Like the torrent yonder," said Herr Lichtenstein, who had overheard the last sentence, and who pointed up the hillside to a broad, white stream, filling the air with noise and fury, and hurling itself down to the valley.

"What do you mean? Where does that river come from?" cried one and all; and they pressed up the side path to explore.

It was certainly a curious phenomenon. The torrent began suddenly, as a broad, deep stream, welling out of the earth and rushing along its channel with as much force and violence as if it had risen in the correct manner high up under the heavens in a mountain spring, fed by numberless kindred rills, and growing in volume as it descended.

"So you want my display of talent to begin like that?" laughed Evelyn to Herr Lichtenstein. "How very much I should take every one by surprise!"

Herr Lichtenstein's reply was oracular. "That stream has long been gathering force in silence and in dark," he said. "Only so could the waters well forth in power and abundance."

"Very good, Herr Lichtenstein! I should like to be allowed to put that down in my commonplace book," interposed Miss Wentworth.

"Madam?" inquired the uncomprehending musician. But when it was explained to him, he laughed joyously. "Your book of commonplaces? Even so, madam; that will be a fitting place for it."

They had been walking along the floor of the valley, through fields and woodland, for some time, and they now reached the Tâtschbachfall. This is the one short excursion from Engelberg that everybody makes. The white leap of the torrent above the forests, seen from afar, irresistibly draws the pedestrian; the signboards pointing in its direction, the carriage road, the footpath all point it out as a fitting goal. To make it easier still of access, a waggone runs several times a day to and fro. The party from the Abendglüh sat for a while outside the little hostelry looking on the waterfall and wondering why the game of gigantic ninepins always reappeared at every crisis of natural beauty; then they left the haunts of sightseers behind, and went on and on into a far more lovely region, where the carriage road vanishes, where the glen narrows, and the glaciers approach more daringly towards the valley. They walked through exquisite woodland with the Engelberger Aa foaming on their right and the mountains towering at every glimpse among the trees more nearly overhead. Then they left the wood and came out on wild moorland dotted with a group of chalets. They could no longer discern Engelberg, for the vale makes a sharp deflection towards the left. Anon a cleft with a white rush of water just appearing against the edge of the chasm came into view.

"That is the Stierenbachfall—the fall of the Steer's Brook," said Miss Wentworth, stopping, "and I'll just tell you about the legend, if you like."

All expressed willingness, seating themselves on the moorland, and Miss Wentworth began—

"There was once, several hundred years ago, a peasant, who so loved a favourite calf that he baptised it by a Christian name. This displeased Heaven, and the calf became a terrible monster, devouring all the pasture in the valley of Engelberg and for miles over the hills. Then came a message by a holy friar to the villagers that they must take a young bull, without spot or blemish, feed it only on pure milk for a certain number of years, and let it loose to fight with the monster. This was done. The bull—or steer—found the monster on these heights, closed with him in single combat, and they both fell together into the brook and were drowned."

"Miss Wentworth, you know everything," cried Dottie.

"Awfully interesting! only I don't quite see the moral," observed Algy, pulling up handfuls of the short, stunted grass as he spoke.

"There isn't any moral; it's a simple statement of fact," rejoined Madame Lichtenstein.

"Evelyn shall write a poem on the legend," said Algy. "Rather hard for the steer to be drowned, don't you think so? All right for the monster, but not for the good animal. Now, then, Lichtenstein, can't you dispose of that by some moral reflections?"

"I will very soon dispose of you, my young friend," rejoined the professor. "The way down into the torrent is very steep and very short; another word, and down you roll!"

"I thought it was more in your line to rescue distressed personages off Alpine ledges than pitch them over," observed the incorrigible Algy, fleeing away from the vengeance threatened by his Leipsic friend. And so, with merry talk and laughter, they climbed the hillside by the Fall, and came out upon wild, rounded heights at the very head of the Engelberger Thal. Mountains towered around them, and the path to the Surenen Pass led away in the distance. From yonder ridge they knew that Lake Lucerne could be described.

The men went on to the summit of the pass, but the women preferred to rest in this lofty, scented pasture, threaded by its brook, with the Alpine air bringing health, life, vivacity in every breath. When they reassembled, they spread luncheon—though Evelyn declared it was sacrilege to think of eating—and glad sallies of mirth and conversation rang through the solitude. A little herd-boy was the only other human creature visible, and him they plentifully enriched with the fragments of their meal.

So the day passed; one of those days long to be remembered, when the joy of God's world stirs the pulses of His creatures with such intensity that the sorrows of humanity seem far away, and the heart throbs in unison with the Divine satisfaction in His work—"And behold it was very good."

VARIETIES.

GROWING.

I hold this true—whoever wins
Man's highest stature here below,
Must grow and never cease to grow,
For when growth ceases death begins.

YOUTH AND AGE.—In youth one has tears without grief; in age, grief without tears.

A HIGH-BORN POET.—Lord Tennyson not only springs from English kings, but from the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, and from several kings of Scotland, notably Malcolm III. The Earls of Derby are also among his forefathers; he has in his veins the blood of that Stanley who routed the right of the Scots at Flodden, and whose name rang on the expiring lips of Scott's Marmion.

A COMMON WEAKNESS.—There is no greater weakness than that of letting our happiness depend too much upon the opinions of others.

BRITTLE WARE.

"Guard," said an old lady, "I hope there won't be any collisions."

"Oh, no fear, mum," answered the guard.

"I want you," said the old lady, "to be very careful. I've got two dozen eggs in this basket."

A DAILY QUESTION.—Time waits upon the soul early every morning, and says, "What wilt thou have me to do to-day?" It is a shame to say what the answer too often is, but it will one day be known.

BLONDES AND BRUNETTES.—The chances of marriage for blondes appear to be not so great as those of brunettes. Dr. Beddoe, who collected statistics on the subject, discovered that of brunettes seventy-eight per cent. were married, whilst of blondes only sixty-eight were married. Thus it would seem that the brunette has ten chances of getting married in England to a blonde's nine.

AN OLD SUPERSTITION.—It used to be a vulgar notion that everyone who bore the name of Agnes was fated to become mad.

A CALCULATING GIRL.

"Papa," said a sweet girl, "young Mr. Thistle has written me a note, in which he asks me to be his wife."

"Written you a note? Why didn't he come himself?"

"It would have been pleasanter that way, no doubt, papa, but I suppose he feels a little timid; and besides, papa, think how much more binding the note is."

PLEASANT TALK.—The soul of refined conversation is the same as the soul of refined manners, namely, goodwill towards others and a desire to secure their comfort and increase their happiness. This great law underlies all the rules on the subject. The authoritative putting of this law is—Do as you would be done by.

FLOWERS OF THE OBERLAND.

AMONG the many charms which Switzerland offers to the tourist in summer, one of the greatest perhaps is the variety of flowers to be found both in the valleys and the high pastures. Without going beyond the beaten route of the ordinary pedestrian, the bright flowers which adorn the meadows and clothe the mountain sides not only enhance the intense beauty of the scenery, but offer great attractions to the nature-loving holiday-maker.

Surely the sight of the flower-decked lower Alps must inspire even the least enthusiastic with a desire to pluck some of the bright blossoms, and carry them away as a memento, and in the long dreary winter recall the sunny days spent in that ever-beautiful country! On the well-trodden paths of the Bernese Oberland a great variety of flowers may be found, some specimens being entirely unknown in England.

In a talk on the flowers of Switzerland accessible to everyone, the far-famed Alpine rose seems to claim the first attention. Coming down from the Wengern Alp in the direction of Grindelwald, on a lovely July morning under a cloudless sky, the sight of the sloping pastures thickly covered with the low shrubs of the Rhododendron hirsutum is a sight never to be forgotten. The glorious background formed by those three gigantic mountains which bound the valley on the one side, with their precipitous grey rocks and peaks capped with eternal snow, contrasted well with the bright pink flowers glowing in the brilliant sunshine. The Rhododendron hirsutum differs from the Rhododendron ferrugineum; the leaves are hairy, and the undersides are covered with scattered but not coalescent resinous rusty-brown glands. The funnel-shaped corolla of the flowers is also dotted on the outside with resinous glands. In summer the mountainsides are quite carpeted with these beautiful rose-coloured flowery plants, with their bright myrtle-green leaves, and are among the loveliest adornments of the Alps. The Alpine rose is so associated with mountainous districts that the Swiss peasants are almost as much affected by the sight of them as they are on hearing the sounds of the Rang des Vaches.

Another beautiful flower which grows abundantly in Alpine pastures is the Astrantia major, or as the Swiss call it, the Grosse Sterndolde. The florets are a delicate whitey-green in colour, sometimes also a delicate violet, tipped with deeper green; the undersides are so tenderly and minutely marked as to look almost like a tiny green leaf lying on a larger white leaf. The stamens are very numerous, and of a violet colour, and the anthers shoot out smaller and shorter stamens. The abundance of these stamens massed together in the centre of the florets produces a feathery appearance, and is very striking.

EDELWEISS AND OTHER ALPINE FLOWERS.

There is something very charming in the blending of the colours of the Trifolium agrarium, the bright gold-coloured blossoms fading into brown. The Swiss call it "Gold Klee," and it is found in abundance in mountainous pastures. The anemone, Alpen Windröschen, had flowered and withered by July, and only the feathery heads of the seeds remained. But it looked very quaint and pretty, although the bloom was over. The anemone sends out a shoot, a little distance off the last, each year, and by thus annually moving its position, and being long-lived, it makes a long journey during its existence. It blooms from May to July.

Winding round one of the mountains near Andermatt, and gradually ascending, a glacier can be reached where there is quite a nest of the cotton plant, with large, soft, and satin-like heads. The cotton plant is almost invariably found in high marshy pastures. In that region also you are sure to come across the Grass of Parnassus (Sumpf Herzblatt), which grows in such profusion in Switzerland. The cream-coloured flowers are delicately and beautifully veined; the corolla has a curious appearance from the fan-shaped scales, which are fringed with white hairs and lie around the centre; these are its nectaries; and yellow, wax-like glands terminate each tip. The name Grass of Parnassus is supposed to be derived from the abundant growth of this flower on Mount Parnassus, where it is as common as grass.

Then, too, in marshy ground on the high elevations of the Alpine pastures, the lovely blue gentians spring up. On the top of the Furca Pass, where the cold is so intense that no trees can grow, the ground in some parts is quite blue with these lovely flowers. Directly the snow has melted, the gentian raises its beautiful head. The Gentiana Bavaria, which resembles in many ways the Gentiana verna, differs from it in the number of small obtuse egg-shaped leaves which grow up the stem; while the colour of its blossoms is of a still deeper shade of blue. Gentians are very rare in England, but have been found in hilly pastures in the county of Durham and in Ireland.

Growing on sunny banks where the soil is thin, over rocks and stones, the Anthericum ramosum is to be found. The flower of this Aestige Zaunlitie is exceedingly delicate and pretty, but so few blossoms come out at a time that the plant has always a bare appearance. The transparent petals have three delicate veins marked down the centre, and somewhat resemble tissue paper.

Perched on a high rock by the wayside, in the full blaze of sunshine, stood erect some specimens of the Alpine aster or starwort; their light violet petals, with the feathery yellow centres, looking very pretty with the sun gleaming upon them.

The pale lilac flowers of the ivy-leaved toadflax creep lovingly over the old stone walls, enlivening the dull grey of the stone; here, too, is to be found the Linaria Alpina, with its linear leaves growing thickly up the stalk, and deep purple-coloured flowers, shaped somewhat like those of the snapdragon, but spurred at the base.

Though so common, the yellow mountain violet is very pretty, with its pale yellow flowers growing singly on angular stems. This flower grows abundantly on the mountain pastures, and is very variable in its size. Some of the flowers are of a rich purple colour.

The Epipactis atrorubens (Braunrothe Sumpfwurze) seems to be rare in the Oberland, but is to be found on the mountain slopes coming from the Wengern Alp down to Grindelwald. It belongs to the orchidaceous tribe, but is not to be found in England. Both the brown-red stem and flowers have the appearance of being profusely sprinkled over with sand. The name is derived from the Greek word ἐπιπύρρον, meaning to coagulate, from the effect of the plant on milk.

The Tormentilla officinalis is to be found all over the mountain pastures, and attracts the eye, by the bright yellow flowers of four petals, growing on slender stems. The roots are large, and being astringent in their nature are used medicinally. It is said that in Lapland these roots are much valued, as they furnish a red dye for leather. In some specimens the leaves and stalks are covered with small hairs. The tormentilla is so closely allied with the potentilla, which also grows abundantly on the pastures, that the two flowers are with difficulty distinguished.

The Polygala vulgaris of the milkwort tribe is also supposed to possess valuable remedial virtues, and serves as a nutritious food for cattle. This pretty little plant is frequently found on dry hilly pastures from May to July, its crested blossoms forming patches of deep blue or purple; sometimes the blossoms are of a pink hue. It was called the Rogation flower by older writers.

Specimens of the Gymnaderia conopsea, which belongs to the orchis tribe, flourish both on the Alpine and sub-Alpine pastures and meadows, as well as on lower altitudes. Its perianth is usually purple or various shades of violet, and it has a slight scent of vanilla. On the high pastures is found the Dryas octopetala minor, resembling a small wild dog-rose, with large showy white petals; the stamens, which have yellow anthers, are very numerous, and form a dense tuft. The leaves are shiny above, white and downy underneath. The generic name has been applied to this plant from the resemblance of the leaves to those of the oak, which are sacred to the Dryads.

The Weidenröschen is a pretty delicate plant with pale rose-coloured blossoms, with darker centres; the leaves are very narrow and linear, and grow profusely up the stem of the plant. It grows on the precipices of the stony Alps, and where apparently it can get no nourishment. It flowers in July and August, and is a much more frail-looking plant than the English willow-herb.

The common Schotenklee is a remarkable-looking plant, which creeps along the ground, the stems bearing a single primrose-coloured blossom. It grows on damp or clayey banks in sunny situations. The blossoms resemble a pod.

The polygonum or snakeweed is a very showy plant, growing about eighteen inches high, and bears a spike of small pink flowers at the top of the stem. Many high pastures are pink with it. It has very strong astringent properties, and contains both gallic acid and tannin. It is said that the tannin is twice as strong as that of the oak bark used in leather. When the tannin has been exhausted, a starch remains, which can be used for food, and in Russia is made into bread. It was formerly prized as an antidote to poison, and was used as medicine in the time of the plague.

The mountain everlasting is a herb with downy leaves; it grows abundantly in mountain turf. The male flower is round, and sometimes of a beautiful rose-pink colour; the female flower is long-shaped.

The perforated St. John's wort flowers in July in thickets and hedges; the blossom, flower cup and leaves are often tipped with minute black dots; the leaves are especially remarkable for being copiously sprinkled with small pellucid dots, which are most evident when the plant is held against the light. This plant was formerly worn in Scotland to preserve the wearer against witches and enchantments; and in several continental countries the superstition lingers yet that it is a charm against thunder and lightning, and the machinations of evil spirits. In parts of France and Germany the peasantry still gather its golden bloom with much ceremony on St. John's Day, and hang it up in their windows and doorways to avert evil.

The little blossoms of the common eyebright are sprinkled over the sides of chalky cliffs, or studded over the short grass of mountains or open plains, or hidden among the taller herbage of the pasture land. The plant is often only an inch in height, and bears but a single flower; but in situations where it thrives well it becomes branched and taller, and many blossoms are scattered amongst its leaves. The foliage is bright green, and deeply notched, and the blossoms either white or pale lilac, streaked with purple.

And then, leaving the lower Alps and ascending higher, ever higher, till the white snow dazzles the eye as it wraps the majestic mountains with the pure mantle of eternal whiteness, the edelweiss, the most precious of all the flowers of Switzerland, because most difficult to find, pushes its white and woolly head through the snow, and seems to rejoice in the stillness and beauty of the surrounding scenery. This plant seems to lose half its beauty when uprooted from its native soil and transplanted to an English soil, but in spite of this it has been deemed necessary by the Swiss Government to place a notice up forbidding anyone to uproot the edelweiss, which bids fair to become extinct if no restraining hand is laid on the ruthless tourists.

There are many, many other flowers to be found in Switzerland, but let us leave them now as we have ascended to the snowy heights to gather the flower so dear to all Swiss hearts, the sight of which must ever recall the snowy regions where it grows:

A. M. G.

A CALIFORNIAN STORY.

CHAPTER III.

THE cannery was a long, low building, where in the fruit season a great deal of business went on. Cherries, apricots, peaches, pears, tomatoes, each in turn were gathered in the neighbouring orchards and gardens, brought in, and prepared for use and export. After the fruit was picked it was weighed, and each picker received credit for his box, and a cheque for each dozen, as the pay is so much per dozen boxes. In the cannery it is then assorted into first and second class and "pie" fruit—anyone who has been in America will have become acquainted with that indigestible compound, "fruit pie." A blemish on a peach mars its value for glass jar fruit, while not hurting it for tin cans, and that which is too small for first-class glass or tins is put in large cans and labelled "pie fruit." After being weighed the fruit is peeled by machinery, if necessary, then halved, and placed in the receptacle intended to hold it, the jar or can being covered or soldered down after the syrup has been poured in, when it is placed on the range to be cooked, afterwards returned to the solderer for the final operation, when the labels are fastened on and the packers take things in hand.

In addition to this industry, Mr. Aytoun was in the habit of drying large quantities of prunes and raisins in the European fashion, and had been decidedly successful in this department. He employed as many white boys and girls as he could get, his employer, Colonel Nesbit, being desirous that he should do so, but in some departments he was forced to rely upon Chinese labour, or that of half-breeds or Indians.

Mr. Abbott and Lilian had strolled on some distance in front of the others, and he took the opportunity of expressing his pleasure that he would at last have the chance of welcoming her as his mother's guest. "Although," he added, "I noticed, Miss Aytoun, that you never accepted the invitation; your brother and your cousin were kind enough to promise to come, but there was no word from you. I hope you are not trying to get out of it, as you have done before. Your brother, I know, is anxious that you should have a rest."

Lilian was somewhat surprised to find he had observed the omission, but replied pleasantly enough that she would be glad to come if her brother was not prevented joining them.

"He promised to do so."

"Yes, but you know that a hundred things may force him to change his plans at the last moment, very much against his will as it would be. If he can come, I will. But as he has been so good to me, and I came out specially to be with him, I think I ought not to leave the care of the house to him; it is very hard for him when he comes home, tired out, to have to get his dinner, and so on. Before I came he used to go without any midday meal, because of the work it involved."

"It is very nice to see such attachment between a brother and sister; what you say is all true, of course—I know it by experience; ten years ago I used to do the same thing. Anyhow, I hope the fates will be propitious, and I think we shall be able to give you a real good time."

In his own heart Frank Abbott was thinking what a charming wife this kindly and considerate girl would make, and as he glanced down at her slight figure and sweet, earnest face, he determined that he would do all that a man could do to win her for his own, and that if he succeeded, she should never do another hour's work unless by her own free will. But he was often assailed by doubts as to whether there might not be some more serious obstacle in the way than any he knew of then—whether the heart might not have been already given away before he knew her; and, in truth, there was some foundation for his fears, though even her brother was not aware of it. The young American, not accustomed to the reserve of an English girl when really well bred, imagined that she might perhaps be avoiding him because she felt herself pledged to another, for his own countrywomen are thrown so much more in the society of men than our own girls, that they have a more free and easy manner than is usual with us. But though Lilian treated him exactly as she would have done had she been perfectly free, her thoughts often travelled back to the old country, and to something which had happened there, which must be told in due time.

A week after the evening walk just described, Frank Abbott made his way over to the cannery to call on his friend, and begged to know if he could give him half an hour, as he wanted to consult him about a matter of importance. Although very much occupied, Charles Aytoun did not like to refuse the request, as it was made so urgently; and the two young men strolled along the side of the stream till they came to a shady corner, and then sat down to enjoy the pleasant coolness and the ripple of the water at their feet.

"You have evidently something very particular to say, old fellow," said young Aytoun, as they lit their cigars; "I hope it is something pleasant."

"If I can get what I want, it certainly will be pleasant for me."

"If it is anything I can give you, I suppose you can count on me. But I cannot conceive that such a thing should be in my power, so out with it at once."

"May I ask if your sister is engaged?"

"Not that I am aware of."

"Would you give your consent if I told you I wanted to try and win her?"

Charles Aytoun hesitated a moment, and his friend looked up half-anxiously.

"You know nothing against me, Aytoun; and, without boasting, I believe I may say there is no reason why I could not make a girl happy."

"It was a selfish reason which made me hesitate; it will be hard on me to lose her, should she be willing to go. Of course I could not object to your trying to win her; you have been my best friend ever since I came here."

"I am bringing a note from my mother to ask you all to come over to-morrow and camp out with us for a few days. We will choose a place near the Hope Ranch, which you said you wanted to go to, so that you have no excuse for getting out of it; and if you come, the ladies will have no reason for refusing either. Would they think me very impertinent if I ask you to open the note, and give a promise to that effect, if you think it will not inconvenience them?"

"I wish you hadn't told me of your intentions first; I cannot possibly bring my own sister to stay with a man who says he is going to ask her to be his wife. You know I cannot, Frank."

"But if I give you my solemn word of honour that I will say no word to her on the subject while she is our guest, that I will only seek her in her own home, will you consent then?"

"I suppose I must, or Mrs. Selwyn will find it out and never forgive me; she is most anxious to meet your mother."

"Then if they will have their horses ready at four, and ride along the Hope Road, I will meet them half way, and bring them on to the camp in time for a late supper. You will ride over as early as you can, and if you want pack-horses for their luggage, I can send you a couple from there; we have been camping since Friday last, but a little further off."

"I do not know what Mrs. Selwyn's ideas of luggage may be, but I am sure my sister will want nothing more than a portmanteau, unless Mrs. Abbott would like us to bring any blankets, etc."

"Oh, no, we have everything ready for four visitors; my mother has a girl friend staying with her already."

"Then one pack-horse will be enough, and I have one down from the mountains to-day, so we need not trouble you."

"Good-bye, then; but you might wish me luck in that other matter."

"I do. Good-bye."

Charles Aytoun returned that evening in a somewhat troubled frame of mind. It was hard not to be selfish, and wish to keep the bright girl who had made his home so much happier since she entered it, but yet as so attractive a maiden was sure to marry, ought he not to rejoice that a good home and husband had come in her way? If she had set her affections on some struggling new settler, such as many of those around him, would not such an isolated existence in poverty have been a miserable lot for her? A general servant would be better off, for she can leave if tired of her work, but a wife and mother has bonds that cannot be broken; and too well he remembered how one and another of his neighbours had brought home a blooming bride, who in a few years' time had developed into a faded, over-worked woman, in spite of the brave struggle which, out of love for their husbands, they had made to bear their burdens uncomplainingly. In many cases the means would be large enough to allow of help being kept, but the difficulty of inducing a decent white woman to live away from towns could not be got over; and even if one consented to come, she would too often prove less of a help than a hindrance, all good servants finding places readily enough in the cities, besides being usually unwilling to undertake the multifarious duties falling to their lot in ranch life.

The two girls found their brother and cousin disinclined for conversation that evening, though both consented to accept the invitation for the morrow; and when the time came, they locked up the house and started for their ride, the pack-horse carrying their belongings having gone on that morning. Mr. Abbott met them very soon, and the evening ride was enjoyed by all, Charles Aytoun catching them up before they arrived. At a turn of the road they came suddenly upon the camping-ground, and the beauty and novelty of the surroundings drew forth an exclamation of delighted surprise from Lily, in which Mrs. Selwyn joined.

Three or four of the tents were used for sleeping quarters, one for a kitchen, and the largest for a sitting-room. This last possessed plenty of rocking-chairs, the favourite easy chair of America, and two tables. The beds were made of branches of spruce and fir, covered over with buffalo robes and other skins, though Mrs. Abbott, who had welcomed her guests most hospitably, mentioned that there were two mattresses at the service of the English girls, who might not care to adopt the custom of the country in this respect. Both, however, decided to do exactly the correct thing, and declined such luxuries altogether; and after a pleasant stroll and a hearty supper, all were glad to go to rest, and slept as only one can sleep under canvas.

By OLIVERIA PRESCOTT, A.R.A.M., Author of "Form, or Design, in Music."

I SUPPOSE there are not many boys and girls of the age of sixteen who are as good musicians as Mozart and Mendelssohn were at that age. So few, indeed, that it would be a needless trouble to set up examinations all over the United Kingdom for the testing of their great talents. For, from what we know of the music these two wrote before they were sixteen years old, we may consider them almost as full-grown musicians. It follows, therefore, that when the Royal Academy of Music sends examiners to many towns in England, Scotland,

Ireland, and Wales to try the musicianship of boys and girls of sixteen, that they do not expect the candidates to be full-grown musicians. It follows, again, that the piece they chose one year for their musical babes, as we may call them, to look over, does not require full-grown musicians to understand it. Once more it follows that the work which is suitable for them need have no fright or terror for you, who may also be babes in music. Surely, what 300 or 400 boys and girls can do, you need not be afraid to try. I have heard so many little girls—aye, and big ones too—say, "Oh, it's too difficult for me to understand music;" but so long as you have love for music, and patience to dwell upon it, its meaning will unfold to you. Have you not seen the flower-bud seem to open and smile upon your baby-sister, while your mother holds her to the pretty thing? Just so will music unfold and smile upon you as you dwell upon its beauties.

There is one thing in the music we are going to look at, which is a little like dance-music; it is the design. It seems rather strange to compose this slow and sad music to a dance; but it is true, nevertheless. If you will follow me back into history I will show you.

There was a time, long ago, when people danced a great deal in this country. Sometimes it was round a May-pole; sometimes, I suppose, round the mulberry-bush; sometimes they danced in squares, like quadrille figures; sometimes in circles, like the "chaine Anglaise" in the Lancers, which they used to call "the hay"; sometimes, too, they danced up and down in a long line like Sir Roger de Coverley, or like that country dance in which four people turn in a wheel up the inside of a double line. These were all danced to their own tunes, which were repeated over and over till the dancers were tired. These tunes were generally a single strain of eight to sixteen bars; and each tune or strain divided naturally in half. They were like some verses of poetry, in which the words go half way through and come to a half-stop, then on to the end and come to a full stop. This is the design or form of those tunes.

People used to play these dance tunes sometimes when there was no dancing, and sometimes they would sing them, for many of them had words written for them. We, too, sometimes like to hear dance music, even when we are not inclined to dance to it.

Some more elaborate dances, as minuets, gavottes, and others, had longer tunes given them, and needed less repetition before the dancers were satisfied. Their half-tunes were as much as sixteen bars; the length of the whole being twice sixteen. These were for grander people than the country dances—for courtiers and ladies, gentlemen dressed in pink satin with lace ruffles, ladies in hoops, and powder; and the music was written by the Court composer. Therefore we may suppose there was more pains given to the composition of the music than was given to that of the country dances. For the country dances grew, no one knew how, out of the wits of the men who played from village to village with their tabors and pipe, their fiddles and harps.

After a while, we suppose, the grand people tired a little of the perpetual repetition of such short tunes, and the Court composer introduced for them a second or companion tune, with some contrast in the turn of the notes, but in the same measure. This was called an alternative, because it was played alternately with the first.

This dance music, too, was played sometimes when no dancing was going on; for in royal Courts, as well as on country greens, dance music has always been pleasant to hear. But from this there came a change in the design of the music. The two alternating tunes, which had each been played as many or as few times as was liked, became joined together when there was no dancing. The composer wrote a first tune, which he called a principal subject; and then a second tune, which he called an episode, and then copied out the first tune again.

Because the whole of this was played through without a break, they took away the dance name, minuet, gavotte, or what not, and its alternative, and gave one name to the whole; and because the first tune or subject came round again after the second or episode, they called the whole a rondo, which means round.

The slow movement we are to look at now is a rondo of this kind. You have the music by you; sit down to the piano and play the first few bars.

Now look on in front. You see about a couple of lines of music and a double bar, then a phase beginning thus:

and onwards to another double bar. All this is in the same kind of manner, and has the same key-signature—D minor. This, then, is the principal subject of the rondo—that part which took the place of the first tune of the pair written for the Court dances—the minuet and its alternative.

After the double bar at the end of this tune you find the key-signature changes; it is now that of D major. Play a few chords.

There is the same time-signature; but quite a contrast in the turn of the notes. Being in the major form of the key, too, makes it sound very different. Look on a little way. You find about two lines and then a double bar, two more lines and another double bar. All of this, then, with the change of manner, and the major key, is the episode of the rondo; it is that part which took the place of the second minuet, or alternative tune of the Court dances.

After this you find the key-signature changes back to D minor, and, if you play on a few bars you will see it is the music of the first example. Instead of the double bar and dots as a sign for the repetition of the first half, the music is written over again, and the tune covered up with arpeggios and little scales, so that you have to listen hard to recognise it. Then comes the second half of the tune (see Ex. 2), once through as it was before, and then repeated, ornamented with arpeggios and scales. The whole of this in D minor stands for the repetition of the first tune after the second has been played. Thus far it is a complete rondo.

After this the first tune is begun again without ornament or covering. It is not now the complete tune, but, as it were, a new one growing out of the old beginning. This is the end of the movement, called the "coda," the meaning of which word we may understand if we think what is a caudal appendage. It is not a piece of trimming like the tail of a gown, but a real part, like the tail of a dog. The original form of the minuet and alternative, as the old courtiers danced it, was complete without the coda or tail; but this outgrowth of more modern days makes the design more elaborate, and more beautiful. It might be said also of animals, such as Manx cats and old-fashioned sheep-dogs, that they are complete without tails, having been born so; still we generally reserve more admiration for those kinds who have tails.

When an artist is painting a picture of an animal, let us suppose a horse, he will sketch the main outline in chalk, or roughly with the paint brush, and afterwards he will fill it in and make a finished picture of it. You recognise the sketch as a horse, for there is the head, the arched neck, the body and limbs; and the better the sketch the more it will remind you of a horse. But it is not a finished picture till he has drawn every curve of the muscle, the gloss of the coat, the brightness of the eye, and all the beauties that you can see in so beautiful an animal. We have made our sketch of this piece of music. It is but a copy that we are doing, for Beethoven made the picture, just as our artist painted his horse, from nature and from his own imagination. But we have made our outline of head, body, and limbs, and we must now put in the beautiful curves and lights of Beethoven's picture as far as we can see them and point them out.

I said, awhile back, that this movement is like the old dance tunes in form. This is not only because the alternation of the first and second tunes is like that of the minuets and their alternatives, but because each tune, separately, is like the old separate tunes. This likeness is in the rhythm of the phrases and in the form of each tune.

First as to the rhythm. I suppose you know that besides the rhythm of each bar in common or triple time, there is rhythm of phrases. This is the rhythm that is like the dance tunes both court and country, because in the dance tunes the phrases are of equal length, and in this movement of Beethoven's the phrases are also of equal length. We shall find an exception here and there, but that is because the music is not intended for real dance music, but is only like it. Of course, the bar rhythm is not like dance music for the same reason. Look at the phrases of the first tune. Ex. 1 is of four bars, with a sort of stop at the end; this is one phrase. The same melody begins on other notes for another four bars with a stop; that is the second phrase. It is of the same length as the first, just as it would have been in dance music. After the double bar, Ex. 2 begins, and four bars of this are answered by four more; now comes the exception. The music that was at the first (Ex. 1) begins again; but instead of going on for twice four bars, it ends with six only. We must go a long way abroad to find the reason that this is pleasant to listen to, and does not strike us as cut too short. In looking for this we shall find the other resemblance to the old dance tunes.

When you look at the old tunes you will find that the greater number of them finish the first half, or phrase, with the dominant note or the supertonic (the V or II of the scale), and then, of course, go on and finish the latter half with the tonic (or key note). This is the oldest and smallest example of what we now call the sonata form. When longer or more elaborate movements are written, this form is more highly finished; and what was in the dance tune simply a new bit of tune with another cadence, becomes an actual repetition of the music of the first part, with a change in the end to bring it to the tonic (or key note). Now, a step further towards our movement. With still more elaborate movements a little piece of music is put in between the dominant close of the first half and the repetition for the second half. In quite long movements this is called the free fantasia. Then, it often happens that the repetition part is cut a little shorter. That is what has happened in our present movement; and the eight bars beginning as in Ex. 2 make the free fantasia, which is put between the close of the first part and its repetition. Beethoven was satisfied with the length of the second part when this long piece was put in, and we only needed to be reminded of what we had heard before. For this reason the phrase is compressed into six bars instead of the original eight.

THE DREAM OF HOME.

The episode in D major, or second tune, has also parallel phrases like a dance tune, but is without the exceptional phrase at the end. Four bars from Ex. 3 make a phrase, balanced by four bars beginning with the same, but coming to a new end on the dominant, like the old dance tunes. The second part, beginning with the accent of Ex. 3, but on different notes, has a phrase of four bars only, which answers to the free fantasia, but is much shorter than that of the D minor tune. To balance this the repetition of the beginning is compressed into four bars. Of these, two bars are of the Ex. 3, and two others the close of the first part changed into a tonic close, thus:—

The return of the D minor tune, or principal subject of the rondo, is, as we found before, changed only by ornaments in the repeated parts; the rhythm of phrases, therefore, remains the same.

When the coda begins all comparison to a dance is at an end. We are drawing gradually to a close, and rhythm is not wanted in the same sense as before. Part of a former phrase is thrown out, and we are satisfied to be drawn off to another. There is a phrase of the beginning (see Ex. 1), the latter half of which is echoed. Another phrase reminds us of the episode both beginning and ending (see Ex. 3 and 4). This is extended to a phrase of unusual length; its last bar suggests the first thought (Ex. 1), grows on into a new phrase, and sinks into a close (see on to Ex. 3).

Thus far we have looked at the main plan or design of this beautiful movement. Let us now look at the smaller changes of key, and perhaps we may find some part of the design which we have overlooked as yet. We shall at all events have the plan more impressed upon our minds.

First as to the principal subject, or first tune, which we found was a little sonata. It is in the key of D minor. That is to say, it begins in that key, remains for awhile in it, and after going away for a few bars, returns to D minor; it remains in D minor up to its close, with very short bits, like parentheses, in two other keys. The first phrase in D minor (see Ex. 1) is the part which in long sonatas would be called the first or tonic subject. The second phrase, which begins in F and changes to A minor, would be called the second subject.

In long sonatas the second subject is generally in the key of the dominant, and therefore is called the dominant subject; but it is very often in the major key of the mediant or relative major. So that Beethoven has made use of a great variety in using two keys for this division: F the mediant and A minor the dominant of D minor.

This second phrase, or second subject, begins with the same thought as the first (see Ex. 1), but in the new key of F. After (1) the music turns into a new course of melody in the other new key, A minor. The first hint of A minor is the passing note G sharp (1), which makes us feel that the chord of F (2) is no longer the tonic of F, but the VI or sub-mediante of A minor, of which G sharp is the leading note. A minor is confirmed by the close (3) (4).

This perfect cadence or close in the second principal key is the real end of the first part. It is the half-way rest of the little sonata, and the proof that it is in sonata form. The three notes, B flat, A, C sharp (5), which link the cadence with the repetition; and again, B flat, A, G sharp, which link it with the continuation, show the beauty of a change from full harmony to unison or octave passages. What a relief those few single notes are, and how freshly we come back to the chords after them!

The beginning of the second part, namely, those two four-bar phrases (Ex. 2 and onwards), corresponds with what, in long movements, is called the free fantasia. When the movement is long, there is much variety wanted, and therefore this part would have a great deal of modulation. But in this short piece it is quite enough variety to have what is here, namely a difference in the melody and in the way it is harmonised. Look at the repeated bass note (a pedal bass) all through the eight bars, and single chord nearly all the time, and how they contrast with the arpeggios and changing harmonies that were before. You should notice in this passage the gradual shortening of the phraselets; the repetition of the first two bars (see Ex. 2), then the repetition of three chords (2), (3), and (1); then the closer repetition, twice over, of (3) and (1). Here also is a pretty little bit of relief from harmony which is lighter in effect even than the octave notes at the half way; for this is but a single part moving while the others rest. It is really an arpeggio formed of the notes of the dominant seventh.

Joined by this arpeggio comes the return of the first part. It is sometimes called the recapitulation, because the former ideas are recapitulated, or told over again. Now, when we tell a story a second time, we often make little changes, but the story is the same. Thus Beethoven, telling his story in music over again, makes little changes. One is the shortening of the phrases that we mentioned before; another, that the top part is in octaves instead of chords. It is in D minor throughout, except the two parentheses mentioned before. Other little changes are in the scale down from A to D (see Ex. 1), which is repeated a note lower; then again in D minor, and again in G minor (1) (Ex. 6) before returning to D minor (2) for the close (3) which is the end of the little tune.

So far we have looked at the keys of our first tune, the little sonata with its first subject in the main tonic, its second subject in the keys of mediant and dominant, its free fantasia of new melody and changed accompaniment, its recapitulation of principal first melody, with changes, in the main key. Like the dance tunes, it has a close on the dominant half-way through and a close on the tonic at its end.

Now let us go to the keys and harmonies of the second tune or episode of the rondo (look back to Ex. 3). This, which is in D major, has no clear distinction between a first and second subject like the first tune, but the second phrase glides into the key of A in its course, and stays there till the half-close. The change is made by the G sharp in the bass, which turns what was a chord of the key of D in the first phrase [see Ex. 3 (1)] into the dominant seventh of the key of A.

The second part, or free fantasia, begins with a change of key to G. Now listen to the pretty contrast which these two flowing melodies, one upwards and the other downwards, make with the staccato and leaping passages before and after.

This little passage goes through the keys of E minor and A, and finally G natural, the 7th of the chord, changes the tonic of A into the dominant of D, and thus brings us back to the key of D for the shortened recapitulation of the first part.

In this tune, then, we have had the first part with a dominant close, and the second part with tonic close (see Ex. 4), like the old dance tunes.

In the repetition of the first tune, or principal subject of the rondo, there is, as we said before, no change of plan, of key, or of harmony, from what it was in the first place. This you can test by singing the melody of the first while you play the varied repetition. Stay, there are two little changes, which, from their very slowness, go to prove the likeness of the rest. Look on to near the end of the D minor, where at first there was a little modulation to G minor (see Ex. 6). Here, in the varied repetition, the sharp is not put to the F bass, and therefore the passage is without the change of key to G minor. The two chords of D and G are now the tonic and sub-dominant of D minor, instead of the dominant and tonic of G minor. The other little change is in the harmony next succeeding. The real variety in the repetition is made, as we said before, by means of arpeggio notes and passing notes, in and around the former harmonies.

Part of the phrase of Ex. 1, which begins the coda, has the voice parts inverted; that is to say, the bass in the bar of repeated quavers is put in the alto, and the tenor part in the bass. It is a pretty effect that the strange chord with the G sharp should be reserved this time for the repetition of the quaver bar. Then comes a chord with the accent of the beginning of the second tune (see Ex. 3), followed by a group of triplets of the same accent as those at the end of that tune (see Ex. 4). The whole of this group is formed of the dominant discord. A similar pair of groups is formed on the tonic chord, and another on the dominant follows. The group of triplets is repeated again and again, and yet again in a different form; the arpeggio is brought down the key-board with slower and slower notes till it reaches an imitation of two notes [Ex. 8 (1)] of the first idea (see Ex. 1), and is drawn on by other imitations with quicker notes in the right hand and slow in the left, to a close. Like that of the first tune (see Ex. 7), but in slower notes, this close has the whole chord of the dominant suspended [Ex. 8 (2)] over the tonic bass (3); falling afterwards into the tonic chord (4).

I have said that this movement is sad, but there are moments of relief, as the melody in F of the first tune; and even of bright cheerfulness, as in the episode in D major. But anything more sad than this little coda I cannot well imagine; and it is made more sad by its effort at gaiety, with the remembrance of the bright episode mingled with the lingering thoughts which seem to faint more and more as the music sinks back into the close, like lengthened sadness.

Perhaps I feel the music by the thoughts that are in me. Children, have you ever lost a friend, a loved teacher who was dearer to you than yourself, kind as a father, gentle as a mother, one who accepted your bounden service as if it was a favour, and gave you his help as if it was his gratitude; one whose greatest joy was to succeed, not himself, but through his pupils; whose greatest anxiety was to spur you on to do good things, and whose greatest care was that he might give you the advice that should enable you to do these things? Such an one have I lost, only yesterday, as I write these words on All Saints' Day, in 1887; and not only I, but hundreds of other men and women, girls and boys, who looked up to him as their guide and their friend in the struggling world of music. Not only we, but you, too, who never saw him nor heard his voice, have lost a friend, for George Alexander Macfarren was always thoughtful for children's music, for children's love of it and power to understand it in their childish way.

He was a friend who would forget his own pain in the joys or the griefs of others. For he had a deep pain to bear; he walked about in a darkened world, his only light the eyes of others. Truly we would have given our eyes to him, some of us, and we gladly lent him what was in our power to lend of the light of eyesight, and in return he gave all he could of the rich store of his large brain and larger heart. This paper even was to have been listened to by him before it was shown to your eyes; but, alas, during the writing of it comes the sad news, and it is finished with his memory hanging over me. As I write it comes into my mind, "This is what he thought, this is what he would have said, this is what he taught me many a time."

But he is no longer sightless now. He knows, as perhaps he never knew before, how much we loved him and trusted him. This I think, I hope, I believe, for "those who serve God shall see His face," and how can they see without eyes?

There now, I have forgotten this was to be written for musical babes. But even babes understand some things, and you will understand this some day, I hope. They say "a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things." Yes, and every tear-drop becomes a jewel in that bright crown which sheds a light like a halo to sanctify our sorrow.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE PLAGUE AND THE FEVER. THE ROUGH COUNTRY-MAN WHO HAD AN ERRAND TO KITTY.

THE state of Oxford, overcrowded with people of every condition, provisioned badly in some instances, and hardly at all in others, was bringing about the results which might have been expected. Fever and the plague broke out simultaneously, especially in the poorer streets by the river, over which the dank atmosphere was thickest and heaviest, and raged with intermittent but constantly recurring violence.

Kitty had learnt from her religion, her kind heart, and the examples afforded her by Lady Ottery and Prissy Walton, to take, even as a child, a warm interest in her poorer neighbours. She was constitutionally courageous, she experienced little or no panic, unless in the form of anxiety for her father. She felt mainly pity when, in walking out, she passed the shut-up houses with the red cross and the supplication written on the door, "The Lord have mercy on us." It did not need the watchmen with white staves guarding the houses, that none might come out or go in, to tell what was happening within. Kitty was not often abroad after ten at night, but when she was she could hear in the distance the rumble of the dead carts and a faint echo of the mournful cry, "Bring out your dead." For the dead of the plague great pits were dug as far as possible from the habitations of men.

Sometimes an attempt was made to remove the infected persons, and Kitty got sad glimpses of them, wrapped up in blankets and laid in carts, to be driven, as in earlier visitations of the pest, to "Portmede" or "Cheney Lane," where there were cabins in which the victims could be housed, or to the pest house at St. Bartholomew's—that is if the sick lived to the end of their journey.

Desperate resorts were also made to one or other of the numerous holy wells, which had been to a large extent condemned and abandoned at the Reformation, and were mostly standing roofless and in ruins. Many poor pilgrims wended their way once more to dip rags in St. Winifred's well near St. Bartholomew's Chapel, or in St. Edmund's Well at Cowley Grange. But a hue and cry got up here as in other towns, that miscreants had poisoned the wells, and violent hands were laid on them to pull them down or fill them up. This wholesale destruction, still more than the havoc caused by the civil war, was at the bottom of the extermination of the remaining holy wells.

Kitty's pilgrimage was to Oriel Lane. She could not always go into the house to interrupt her father's studies, or get a word from Mrs. Judy, who, in the goodwill which age could not conquer, did all the work she could for the cumbered mistress of the house, in addition to the housekeeper's service to her master. But Kitty could at least have a reassuring glimpse of her father bending over his beloved books and papers, wrapped in his college gown to fence him from the cold. For the balmy thrill of the new life of the year hardly reached the sluggish blood of the old scholar.

Sometimes Dr. Peter looked up and saw Kitty reconnoitring, when his whole face would brighten as it grew alive to the present and to what was passing around him. If he might not quit the passage with which he was wrestling, he would spare her a loving nod and a wave of the hand in the direction of Lady Ottery's lodging. For Oxford streets were for many reasons unsafe to a young maid to loiter in at this juncture.

Kitty would turn away at his bidding with but one yearning glance at the square tower, great window, and battlemented wall of Hall Royal, where the little family had once dwelt securely, with the lost son and brother on whom their highest hopes were centred in the midst of them.

It was impossible for Kitty to go near the sick, and as to proposing to accompany Lady Ottery on certain mysterious expeditions which the dame undertook, the girl durst not even mention such a thing. Yet the aching tenderness and the piteous yearning for the sufferers which were in Kitty's kind heart were such that if she had lived in the present day, and had not been bound by other obligations, it is possible that she might have taken to hospital nursing for the very delight of such ministrations.

One night Lady Ottery returned with a strange burden—a male infant a couple of months old, destitute of clothing with the exception of the blanket in which he was wrapped. Kitty heard afterwards, what Dame Tabitha refrained from telling at the time, that the infant was the sole salvage from one of the plague-stricken houses.

Either the watchman had been a few minutes absent from his post, or he had been bought over to consent to the effort to deliver the child. A young man and woman had appeared at an open window and cried out that they would be content to die themselves if anyone for the love of God and in mercy to a father and mother's anguish would rescue their child. They would strip him naked so that his clothes might not convey infection, and let him down from the window if any humane person would receive and rear him.

Kitty prayed to have the child entrusted to her, but even this Lady Ottery would not consent to, for though she might, as she said, risk herself, she had no right to imperil Dr. Dacre's one ewe lamb. She congratulated herself on her firmness when the poor little man, who had been thus strangely saved from the doom of his kindred, on being put out to nurse in the country, sickened and died of some childish disease, but with the odium of the plague still attaching to him.

Another burden which weighed on Kitty's mind was the thought of the prisoners in the castle. Somebody had told her of their treatment, and it haunted her day and night, even more than visions of the patients in the plague and the fever. The doctors and the clergy, to their honour, had not forsaken the last, and the people generally, from shame and from regard for their own safety as well as from charity, furnished the unfortunates, at arms length, it is true, with food and decent necessities.

But the prisoners—many of them as gently born and bred as John Dacre had been—were dealt with like dogs; nay, as no merciful man would treat his dog. They were put into the tower of the castle at a height which implied freezing cold in winter and scorching heat in summer. They had neither fire nor candle allowed them. They had not even straw to lie upon; nothing but the bare boards. They were not supplied with changes of clothes, so that the men were eaten with vermin. They were loaded with iron fetters. The sole grant for the prisoners' bare subsistence was a penny and a farthing a day each. The King paid a sixpence a day, but the provost-marshal, making merchandise of the misery of his fellow creatures, retained fourpence three farthings of it, and gave but a penny for a loaf and a farthing for a can of beer—half beer, half water—to each prisoner. "By which means," as might well be imagined, "many were very ill and diseased." In this last extremity they were "debarred the company of their wives and children or friends, debarred of the charity by which these friends would have relieved them."

Any day Kitty's old companion and dear brother Jackie might lie among these forlorn mortals. Her heart was wrung by the question, Could she do nothing for them, she who was so young, strong and well, tenderly cared for, and hardly stinted even in luxuries, by comparison, as yet? How gladly would she have given to the needy from her small superfluities; nay, shared with them her last morsel, if it had but been in her power to help in the common trouble.

She thought of the unhappy King and Queen, round whom the net in which they were entangled was closing; for the tide had turned again, and the short-lived Royalist successes were waning fast. Kitty recalled the many families of her acquaintance orphaned, bereaved, impoverished; she pondered on all England lying bleeding and bruised under the iron hoof of war.

Could she do nothing? Kitty repeated to herself, standing with clasped hands looking out in the spring dusk. She gazed now down on the hurrying street, now up at the filmy blue of the still sky, in which the evening star was lighting his lamp, and a young moon was rising and struggling to shine, as if there were peace on earth, equal to the peace in that pale, pure, far-away spring sky. Ah! there was her answer. There was peace in the sky, peace and room for the cry which could find no hearing on earth to go up to the Maker and Ruler of all—the Father in heaven, who would never forsake the most wretched of His creatures. What better could she think of doing than pray to Him who could do all, in the name of Him who went down into the depths, and suffered to the utmost for His brethren! She would pray that He might forgive the errors both of King and people in this grievous, unnatural strife of brother against brother; reconcile the combatants, bring light out of darkness, and life out of death; heal the sick, as was His wont, and bind up the broken in heart, alone in tenderness and alone in might, as when He told the number of the stars which shone out in myriads to brighten the gloom of night.

But though the days were indeed evil, and Kitty, in spite of her faith, like every other person, young or old, who felt and thought about them, was drooping under the disastrous influence, not only had social duties still to be fulfilled, social forms had to be complied with. The dwellers in Oxford rose and ate, walked out and in, attended to their avocations, and paid visits to their friends, as if all was as it had been formerly, as if no Waller and Essex, with their troops all but surrounding the city, were hanging on like blood-hounds, watching for the faintest sign of a new movement on the part of the Royalists. Indeed, one day several regiments of the besiegers, crossing over in the direction of Cowley, with banners flying and men in marching order, remained for several hours within sight of the sentinels on the city wall, so that the more peaceful of the inhabitants quaked, under the apprehension that the siege was about to be converted into an assault, and that two armies were prepared to sit down before Oxford, and commence a regular bombardment of the King's refuge. But when the alarm passed away the place subsided into its old hard-won composure. The fact was the dwellers in the town were, like the actors in a history, too near the great events which were happening to see and hear them clearly, or to fail to be distracted by importunate personal interests. In addition, the performers had several years in which to grow familiar with the situation, and so inevitably it lost its novel freshness.

Lady Ottery was particularly anxious to keep up the ordinary routine where her goddaughter was concerned, disliking for her impressionable youth the protracted experience of exceptional circumstances and oppressive cares. Thus she had arranged that she and Kitty should go again, like two loyal subjects, to one of the Queen's last receptions at Merton. The pair were dressed for the purpose, and awaiting their chairs, when Lady Ottery was unexpectedly called away. She had been summoned to the deathbed of one of her oldest friends in the town, and the expedition had to be given up.

Kitty was not very loth to relinquish the attendance at Court. Neither, in the nature of things, was she greatly depressed by the accident. She was aware that Lady Ottery's friend, whom she, Kitty, had not known personally, was far advanced in life, and had been longing for the rest which much bodily suffering rendered specially desirable for her.

The girl lingered a little before she took off her Court dress. She thought if she had asked Lady Ottery's permission, she would have liked to take her chair, and go and show her small finery—her old lace, and her brooch of brilliants to young Madam Fanshawe. She would have enjoyed the sight, though her wardrobe and that of her sister when they came to Oxford had been brought in two saddlebags. Perhaps the wish was born of the circumstance that the numerous guests under Lady Ottery's hospitable roof happened to be dispersed in prosecution of their various aims. This evening, Kitty, by a rare occurrence, was quite alone. She was not missing the absent company; she was even faintly stirred and elated by a sense of independence in finding herself for the moment solitary. She could do as she liked, and a little wavering spurt of gaiety came over her, for which she reproached herself the next moment. It was but the natural reaction from the unseasonable shadow cast over her. But Kitty did not see it in that light. What! be light-hearted because she was left to herself for a few hours in order that Lady Ottery might attend a friend's deathbed, and witness that most solemn of all sights, the departure from this earth of an immortal spirit! Actually catch herself beginning idly to hum a tune, when there was so much sorrow in the world around her! She had need to practise the scriptural injunction to the merry to sing psalms.

Poor little Kitty! she need not have taken herself to task so severely. Few were more dutiful, more full of loving sympathy with her brethren than she was. Her little spurt of blytheness was but the desperate protest of her age against what was so foreign to it and its instincts. It was but her expression of the piteous cry in the old song—

"Werna my heart licht I would dee." She might as well have blamed the fritillaries in the bean pot for blossoming as of old, when the west wind blew, though it bore the roar of warfare on its wings.

Kitty had not gathered these fritillaries; she had been fain to buy them, in memory of the day in Merton meadows three springs ago, and in charity, from a poor half-starved woman who came hawking them at the door. The drooping, dusky-red blossoms had already stood too long in the pot, and were beginning to shrink and shrivel and reveal the resemblance to the snake's tongue and fangs. As Kitty lingered, her eyes fell upon them, when she hastily took the withering flowers from the pot and flung them on the embers still burning on the dogs on the hearth. She was about to leave the room, when a servant man came in to tell her that a rough-looking countryman sought speech of her, and said his business was important and immediate.

"Who or what can it be?" Kitty thought to herself, startled, while she told the servant to show the man up. Before he could make his appearance her mind had time to rush in a whirl to her father, to Jack, to the possibility of something having happened to her Aunt Walton, who had been ailing so long; like that which had kept Lady Ottery and Kitty from waiting on the Queen at her reception. And Kitty had been singing an instant ago! Really she had been but humming a tune so low that she could hardly hear herself, which only showed, she told herself severely, that she paid a hypocritical regard to what was due to decorum.

MY WORK BASKET.

FIG. 1.

FIG. 1.—CROCHET TRIMMING FOR CHEMISE.

THE centre of the insertion is worked in oval medallions; the number of these being regulated by the length needed.

Make 30 chain stitches; turn back, and work 1 long in the 8th stitch; 4 chain; miss 4; 1 treble in the 5th stitch; 4 chain; miss 4; 1 treble; miss 4; 1 long; 3 chain; miss 1; 1 single.

This makes the foundation round which the remaining rows of the oval are worked.

1st Row.—3 double crochet into the space made by 3 chain; 7 double crochet into each of the spaces formed by the chain stitches, in all nine times, and finish the row with 4 more double crochet in the first space, to make the number complete.

2nd Row.—3 chain, to serve as a long stitch; 1 long in the next double crochet. This row is worked in the back thread of the stitches in the preceding row. Work 34 long stitches; then 3 long stitches in the next double crochet; 34 long stitches down the other side of the oval; another long stitch in the double crochet in which the first long stitch was worked, and finish the row with 1 single in the 3rd of the chain stitches that commence it.

3rd Row.—5 chain; 1 long in the next long stitch*; 2 chain; 1 long into every second stitch nine times; then 2 chain; 1 long into next stitch; again, 2 chain; 1 long into second stitch nine times*; 2 chain; 1 long in the same stitch in which the last was made; repeat from * to*; finish with 1 single in the 3rd of the commencing chain.

4th Row.—1 single in the 1st chain stitch; 3 chain to serve as a long stitch; 3 picots (a picot is made by 4 chain, draw the thread through the first); 1 long stitch in the same space as the 3 chain*; 1 chain; 1 long in the next space; 3 picots; 1 long in the same space; 3 chain; 1 double crochet in the next space but one; 2 chain; 1 long in the next space but one; 2 chain; 3 picots; 1 long in the same space; 3 chain; 1 double crochet in the next space but one; 3 chain; 1 long in next space but two; 4 picots; 1 long in the same space; 3 chain; 1 double in the next space but two; 3 chain; 1 long in next space but one; 3 picots; 1 long in same space; 3 chain; 1 double crochet in the next space but one; 3 chain; 1 long in next space but one; 3 picots; 1 long in same space*; 1 chain; 1 long in next space; 3 picots; 1 long in same space; repeat from * to*. Finish with 1 chain; 1 single in the third of the commencing chain.

The first oval is now complete, and the second is worked in the same way until the last row, when, in working the picots down the last side, they must be joined to those of the former oval in the following manner:—Having made the first picot at the side, make 7 chain; join with a single stitch to the corresponding picot in the first oval; 5 chain; 1 single in the first of the 7 chain, and finish the picot as before. The centre group of picots is joined by the second and third picot; 2 chain; join to corresponding picot in first oval; 1 double crochet in the first of the 2 chain; 2 chain; join to next picot in the same way, and finish as before. Each succeeding oval is worked and joined in the same manner.

The trimming for the top of the chemise is made in separate pieces of the same length, but joined to the sleeves. The picots at the top of the centre ovals of the back and front of the sleeves are joined to the picots at the side of the ovals at each end of the trimming for the top, as may be seen in the illustration. The small triangle at each corner is formed by a row of picots. Commence with a single stitch in the centre of the first picot at the side of the last oval of the top trimming; make 7 picots; join to the first picot in the sleeve at the end of the oval nearest the angle; make 7 picots; join to the chain connecting this last oval with the one next to it; 7 picots; join back to the stitch from which the triangle started.

The narrow insertion which is worked on each edge of the wide is begun in the centre picot of the first of one of the groups of picots at the end of the oval.

1st Row.—1 long in the centre picot*; 5 chain; 1 double in next centre picot; 5 chain; 1 long in next centre picot; 7 chain; 5 picots; 1 double crochet in the centre of the 5 chain, forming a link between two ovals; 2 chain. Now take the needle out, and insert it in the last of the 5 picots; draw the thread through; 2 chain; 1 double crochet into the first of these; draw the thread through next picot; repeat this to the end of the picots; 7 chain; 1 long in next centre picot; repeat from * all round.

2nd Row.—4 chain; 3 of these to serve as a long stitch*; 1 chain; miss 1; 1 long; repeat from * to end of row, finishing with 1 single in the third of the commencing 4 chain stitches.

3rd Row.—* 5 chain; 2 double treble stitches in 1 long, joined at the top by a chain looped over; miss 2 long, and work 2 double treble joined in the 4th long; 5 chain; 1 single into the same long; 11 chain; 1 single in the next 4th long; repeat from *.

4th Row.—5 chain; 2 double treble, joined as before, worked in the centre of the two groups of last row; 5 chain; 3 double treble in same space; 5 chain; 1 single in centre stitch of 11 chain; 5 chain; 3 double treble in next group; repeat from *.

5th Row.—5 chain; 1 double crochet where the chain stitches of last row join the group of 3 double treble stitches; repeat. In this row, at the corners where the top and sleeves meet, fewer chain stitches must be made between, so as to contract the trimming, or it may not set properly.

LACE FOR CHEMISE.

1st Row.—* 4 long stitches, separated by 1 chain, and worked into 4 following spaces formed between the long stitches of preceding row; 5 chain; work from *, missing 2 spaces.

2nd Row.—* 3 long worked into the spaces formed by the 1 chain of last row; 7 long in the 3rd of 5 chain; repeat from *.

3rd Row.—* 5 long worked into the 5 centre stitches of the 7 long of last row, and each separated from the next by a picot; 3 chain; 1 double in the centre of the 3 long; 3 chain; repeat from *.

FIG. 2.

FIG. 2.—KNITTED LACE FOR UNDERCLOTHING OR TABLECLOTHS, IN KNITTING COTTON; IN WOOL FOR WOOLLEN MATERIALS; FOR DRESSES, THREAD OR SILK IS USED.

Cast on 14 stitches.

1st Row.—Slip 1; knit 2; thread forward; take 2 together; thread twice over needle; take 2 together; 2 plain; thread forward; 2 together; 2 plain; slip 1.

2nd Row.—* 5 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 1 plain; 6 stitches in the twice over thread alternately; 1 plain; 1 purl.

3rd Row.—3 plain; thread forward; take off 2 together; 7 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; slip 1.

4th Row.—Slip 1; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 7 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; slip 1.

5th Row.—3 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 5 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 2 plain; slip 1.

6th Row.—Slip 1; 4 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 9 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; slip 1.

8th Row.—2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 8 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; slip 1.

9th Row.—Cast off 5 stitches; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; thread twice over needle; take 2 together; 2 plain; thread forward; take 2 together; 2 plain; slip 1; repeat from *.

FIG. 3.

This lace is worked in one length, each row being begun afresh.

1st Row.—1 double crochet in a picot of the braid; 1 chain; 1 long; 5 chain; 1 long in the same picot; 1 chain; 1 double in next picot; 1 double in following picot; repeat from *.

2nd Row.—3 treble in the 5 chain; 5 chain; 3 treble in the same 5 chain as first; 3 treble; 1 chain; repeat.

3rd Row.—5 treble in 5 chain; 3 chain; 5 treble in the same 5 chain; 1 double in 1 chain.

4th Row.—1 double crochet in the 3 chain; 1 picot; 1 double treble in the 3rd of the 5 long; 3 picots; second double in the 3rd of the next 5 long, drawn through the centre of the 1st double treble, so that the two form a cross stitch united by the 3 picots; 3 double crochet stitches in the following 3 chain, joined by 2 picots; repeat from *.

On the lower edge of the braid work 2 long, 3 chain in every other picot.

FIG. 4.—CROCHET COUNTERPANE IN COLOURED WOOLS.

This counterpane is made in stripes placed cornerwise.

In each square make 1 chain, 1 long, missing one—7 times.

2nd Row.—Turn back, make 3 chain; then repeat as before; the chain stitches at the beginning of each row serving as a long stitch.

Work 6 rows in this manner, and the square is finished. Then commence another square without breaking off the wool. The number of squares for each row depends on the length required for the counterpane. When a sufficient number of stripes is made, the centre joinings of 5 rings are worked.

For these, make 7 chain stitches; join; then work 2 double in the ring; make a second ring of 7 chain; work 4 double; join it to the centre of one of the squares; 4 double in the same ring; pull wool through first double; work 2 more double in centre ring. Make another ring of 7 chain, 4 double, join to the centre of a square in the second stripe; 4 double in same ring; join at first ring to centre ring. Work 2 more double in this; make another ring of 7 chain; 4 double; join to second square of second stripe; repeat as before, joining last ring to second square of first stripe; finish off with 2 double crochet in centre ring. Each ring will have 8 double crochet stitches.

For the outer joinings, make a ring of 7 chain; work 4 double; join to centre of one of the outer squares; 4 double in same ring; close. Make a second ring of 7 chain; work 6 double. Make a third ring of 7 chain; work 4 double; join to centre of next outer square; work 4 more double in same ring; close; work 2 double in middle ring, and fasten off.

The border is worked in three rows.

1st Row.—Begin with 1 long in corner of square; 9 chain; 2 single in the 2 centre of 6 stitches of the middle ring; 9 chain; repeat from *.

2nd Row.—1 long; 1 chain into every other 2nd stitch.

3rd Row.—Double crochet, 3 into each space.

THE CHEF.

BY MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK DRESSES VEGETABLES.

VEGETABLES are so constantly served separately in France that naturally more attention is given to their preparation than with us, where they are but the adjuncts to the meat.

Petits Pois à la Bourgeoise (green peas à la bourgeoise).—Put two ounces of butter in a basin with some very cold water, throw in a pint and a half of green peas, stir them, and leave half an hour; then in the water work the butter with the peas until they have taken it all up. Put in a stewpan a scallion, a bunch of parsley, the buttered peas, two small onions, a pinch of salt, and a small lump of sugar (no water); cover the stewpan and place it over a slow fire. Just before the peas are done remove the parsley, onions, and scallion, and throw in one or two balls of butter and flour worked together, mix with the peas, and finish cooking. Some cooks add the yolk of an egg mixed with two tablespoonfuls of cream just before serving.

Petits Pois à la Ménagère.—Melt two ounces of butter in an earthen stewpan, put in a quart of green peas, two young onions, a lump of sugar, salt, and the hearts of two small lettuces cut in shreds; place the stewpan over a slow fire, put a plate on the top with some water in it; cook the peas without water, shake the stewpan now and then. When done enough, thicken with a little flour and butter mixed together; cook the flour a minute or two, then take from the stove and finish with a pinch of white sugar and a small piece of butter.

Petits Pois au Lard (peas with bacon).—Cut a quarter of a pound of bacon in small dice, put it in a stewpan and cook a few minutes, add one quart of peas, a little hot water, a lump of sugar, and two or three young onions tied up with a bunch of parsley (the salt from the bacon is generally sufficient), cover the stewpan, and let the peas cook slowly. Remove the parsley and onions before serving.

Peas à la Française.—Put the peas in a stewpan with a lump of butter, a little cold water, a bunch of parsley and green onions, and a lump of sugar; cover, and cook over a quick fire for seven or eight minutes, then draw to the side and cook slowly. When done, take from the fire and finish with a lump of good butter. The parsley and onions are removed before serving.

Peas and New Potatoes with Butter.—Boil some water, throw in a quart of large peas, twenty new potatoes, washed, but not peeled, a bunch of parsley, a young onion, and some salt. The potatoes and peas should be done at the same time. Drain, remove the skins from the potatoes, place them in a dish with the peas, and pour plenty of oiled butter over both.

Preserved Peas.—Make two tablespoonfuls of white sauce hot, with a small piece of butter. Open the peas at the last moment, turn them into a sieve to drain, then stand the sieve in warm water for a minute to warm the peas a little; drain and put them in the sauce with a little sugar and salt; heat for two minutes, giving the saucepan one or two shakes; add the yolk of an egg mixed with a teaspoonful of water, and put in half an ounce of butter broken in small pieces.

Choux de Bruxelles (Brussels sprouts).—Boil the sprouts in water with salt, then drain them. Put some good fat (clarified skimmings from the stockpot are best for this purpose), or if you have not that, put some butter in a stewpan with the sprouts, pepper, salt, two tablespoonfuls of stock or gravy, and a little nutmeg; cook three or four minutes, and serve with fried sippets round. Or boil the sprouts, drain them, and put in a saucepan with butter, pepper, salt, and a squeeze of lemon.

Choux-fleurs au Beurre (cauliflower with butter).—Divide the cauliflower in branches, half-cook it in salt and water, then drain, and put in a stewpan with a lump of butter and the juice of a lemon, add a little water, let it simmer; when done drain the cauliflower, arrange on a dish, and pour over it a sauce made with butter, flour, the yolk of an egg, and a little cream.

Fried Cauliflower.—Divide the cauliflower into small and equal-sized pieces; cook them in salt and water, but let them be a little firm; drain them, season with pepper, salt, and chopped parsley; flour and dip in beaten-up egg or in frying batter; fry in hot fat, a few at a time; when they are a nice colour, drain, sprinkle with salt, and serve.

Choux-fleurs au Fromage.—Boil the cauliflower as above; when done, arrange some of the branches on a buttered dish, sprinkle them with Parmesan (grated), and pour white sauce over, then put the remainder of the cauliflower with more cheese and white sauce; cover the top with a few very fine bread-crumbs mixed with Parmesan, sprinkle a little butter over, and brown in a hot oven.

Choux-fleurs à la Sauce Tomate.—Boil the cauliflower in branches, drain, and arrange on a dish with tomato sauce over.

Choux-fleurs au Beurre Noir.—Boil as above, drain, pour black butter over them, then make a tablespoonful of vinegar hot in the frying-pan, and pour it over the butter.

Cauliflower Salad.—Divide a cauliflower in branches, cook it in salt and water with the tender green leaves; these latter must be put in the saucepan sooner than the flower, as they take longer to cook; when done, cut the leaves in short pieces, put them in a salad bowl, add the branches, season with salt, pepper, mustard, oil, and vinegar. Serve hot or cold.

Cabbage with Bacon.—Divide a cabbage in quarters, boil it in salt and water for fifteen minutes. Cut some strips of bacon, put them in a stewpan, drain the cabbage, and put it on the bacon; add some broth, a bunch of parsley, scallion, grated nutmeg, and pepper (no salt); when done, take out the cabbage, put it on a dish with the bacon on it, reduce the gravy from it, and thicken with a little butter and flour. Pour over the cabbage, and serve. Pickled pork is sometimes preferred to bacon for this.

Choux au Vinaigre (cabbage with vinegar).—Take the white inside of a large cabbage, chop it up, and boil in salt and water for ten minutes; drain it. Cook two chopped onions in butter, add the cabbage, let it cook slowly for fifteen minutes, then season and add one-third of a pint of vinegar; when done, add a lump of butter mixed with flour, stir over the fire, then remove and finish with a small piece of butter.

Choux Blancs Emincés.—Cut a cabbage in quarters, boil it twenty minutes in salt and water, drain, chop it, and put it in a stewpan with some butter and a little salt; let it dry a little, then sift in a teaspoonful of flour; moisten with half broth and half boiled milk, let it boil, then draw to the side of the fire, season with sugar and nutmeg, and let it cook slowly until done.

Chou Farci (stuffed cabbage).—Choose a large cabbage, remove the outside leaves, throw it in boiling water with salt, and boil for ten minutes, then throw it into cold water, drain, and press it with the hands to get all the moisture out. Take out the middle of the cabbage and fill it with a stuffing made of sausage meat, bacon, or the remains of cold meat, etc., chopped. Cover the stuffing with cabbage leaves, tie up the cabbage, cook it in a stewpan with slices of bacon over and under it, herbs, carrots, onions, cloves, and nutmeg; moisten with broth, and cook slowly for from two and a half to three hours. When done put the cabbage on a dish, skim and strain the gravy, and pour some over the cabbage.

Red Cabbage and Apples.—Take a red cabbage, remove the stalk and hard outside leaves, chop or slice it very finely, put it in an earthen stewpan with a chopped onion, a little water and a little vinegar. Cover it and let it cook for two hours on the side of the stove; then add four sour apples, peeled and chopped; season, and cook two hours more; when done, thicken with a small quantity of flour and butter, and finish with a few drops of vinegar.

Epinards au Jus (spinach with gravy).—Take two pounds of spinach, pick it, and boil in water with salt, then press the water from it and chop it finely. Put some butter or a piece of dripping in a stewpan with the spinach, sprinkle a tablespoonful of flour in, add salt, pepper, a little sugar and nutmeg; cook it until the moisture has evaporated, then add a little good gravy, and simmer for a quarter of an hour; take from the stove, stir in a piece of butter, and serve with fried sippets round.

Epinards à la Crème.—Proceed in the same way as "au jus"; but butter must be used, not dripping, and cream instead of gravy. Leave out the pepper, and put a little more sugar. Serve with pieces of hard-boiled eggs round.

Endive is cooked in the same way as spinach.

Lettuces.—Tie the lettuces up, boil them in water with salt for fifteen minutes, drain, and put them in a stewpan, with a little hot dripping; add some gravy, salt, pepper, and a pinch of flour, let them stew half an hour, skim, and serve.

Or use butter in place of dripping, and a little vinegar instead of gravy.

Or for Laitue à la Crème proceed in the same way, but use butter and cream instead of dripping and gravy.

Haricots Verts à la Ménagère (French beans).—Prepare and throw the beans into boiling water with a little salt; boil twelve minutes. Put a lump of butter and a chopped onion into a stewpan over the fire for a few minutes, stir in a little flour, and moisten with some of the water from the beans so as to make a thin sauce. When it boils drain the beans and put them in with a bunch of parsley; finish cooking; when done remove the parsley, add the yolks of two eggs, take from the fire, and finish with a small lump of butter.

French Beans à la Bourgeoise.—Prepare and cook the beans in boiling water, with salt, until tender. Melt a piece of good dripping or butter in a stewpan, drain the beans and put them in, shake the stewpan, and put over the fire for a few minutes, add a lump of butter mixed with flour, stir, cook the flour, then finish with some chopped parsley and a few drops of vinegar or lemon-juice.

French Beans à la Maître d'Hôtel.—Boil the beans as above, drain them, add a lump of butter, chopped parsley, salt, pepper, and a little lemon-juice.

Broad Beans, Fresh or Dried Flageolets, or Haricot Beans, à la Maître d'Hôtel are all cooked and served in the same way, but the dried beans are soaked before they are cooked.

French Beans à la Crème.—Boil as above; when drained, put them in a stewpan with some butter, make quite hot, then add a little béchamel sauce; season with salt and nutmeg, finish with some chopped parsley and small pieces of butter.

Broad Beans, Flageolets, and Haricots are cooked in this way for "à la crème."

French Beans and New Potatoes are cooked together in the same way as peas and potatoes.

Haricots au Lard.—Soak the beans twelve hours, put them in a stewpan in tepid water, with a piece of pickled pork, let them boil, then draw to the side of the stove; when done, drain the pork and beans, remove the rind from the pork, and cut it in pieces. Put the beans in a stewpan with a little butter, pepper, and salt, if needed, stir them over the fire for a few minutes, then serve with the pieces of pork round.

Scarlet Beans are cooked in the same way as French.

Lentils are cooked like haricot beans.

Asparagus is served with a tureen of "sauce hollandaise" or "sauce au beurre" prepared with some of the water in which the asparagus has been boiled.

Céleri au Jus (stewed celery).—Trim the heads of celery, put them in boiling water with a little salt, boil fifteen minutes, then dip in cold water, and drain; put them in a stewpan with some broth that has not been skimmed, add pepper and salt, cover, and let them finish cooking; when done, drain, and divide each head in two. Skim the liquor, add a little brown roux and a small piece of glaze; boil fast to reduce it a little, then pour over the celery; or serve with a thick brown made gravy over.

Céleri au Velouté.—Boil fifteen minutes as above, then cook in velouté sauce, and serve.

Fried Celery.—Boil as above, cut each head in two or three pieces, put in a dish, season with pepper, salt, chopped parsley, and vinegar or lemon-juice; leave an hour, then dip in frying batter, and fry in boiling fat; when a nice colour, drain, sprinkle with salt, and serve.

Salsify, Cardons, and Celery root may all be cooked in the same way as celery. Celery-root (sometimes called celeriac) is cut in pieces before it is cooked.

Salsifs à la Poulette.—Scrape the salsify, throw it in cold water, then cut it in lengths of about three inches; boil it with a tablespoonful of flour, and a little vinegar in the water; when it is tender, drain and put it in "sauce poulette," and serve. The salsify should be put in the sauce before the eggs are added to it, so that it can be boiled a minute in it.

Salsifs Gratinés.—Take some cooked salsify, mince it, mix a little thick béchamel sauce with it, and simmer five minutes; then season and add some grated Parmesan; put it on a buttered dish, cover the top with Parmesan, sprinkle with a little butter; put it in a moderate oven for thirty minutes, and serve in the same dish.

Concombres Farcis (stuffed cucumbers).—Peel the cucumbers and empty them from one end, fill them with a stuffing made of any kind of mince, or with quenelle forcemeat; fill the end with a piece of turnip to keep the meat in. Put some slices of bacon in a stewpan, and place the cucumbers on them; add a little stock, and stew gently; when done, drain the cucumbers, skim and thicken the gravy with butter and flour; let it reduce a little, and strain it over the cucumbers. Or when stewed they may be covered with breadcrumbs and butter, and browned. The gravy is then served separately.

Vegetable Marrows are very good cooked in this way.

Cucumbers à la Maître d'Hôtel.—Peel the cucumbers and boil them in water with salt; when tender drain and cut them in pieces, put them in a stewpan with butter, pepper, salt, chopped parsley, and scallion; cook for a few minutes, and serve.

Tomate Gratinées.—Cut the tomatoes in two, take out the seeds, and put a little salt on the halves. Put some oil in a frying-pan, place the tomatoes in, cut side down; put over the fire. When they have dried a little, turn, and three minutes after put on a dish, sprinkle with parsley chopped with a little piece of garlic, some chopped mushrooms, pepper, and breadcrumbs; pour a little oil over, and brown in the oven.

Topinambours à la Crème (Jerusalem artichokes).—Peel and trim the artichokes so that they are all of the same size and shape; boil in salt and water, drain, and put in a stewpan with butter, salt, and nutmeg; let them dry a little, then add some white sauce; boil a minute, and serve.

Jerusalem Artichokes are also "gratinés" like salsify, but are cut in slices, not minced.

Artichauts Bouillis (green artichokes boiled).—They are boiled with a little vinegar and salt in the water, and are served with "vinaigrette," "sauce au beurre," "poivrade," or "sauce hollandaise."

Fonds d'Artichauts à l'Italienne (artichoke bottoms).—Take the bottoms of artichokes, cook them in stock that has not been skimmed. Chop an onion, and cook it a pale brown in butter. When the artichokes are tender, put them on a dish with the onion, some breadcrumbs, Parmesan cheese, and a little butter on each; brown in the oven, and serve dry.

Artichoke Bottoms, Sauce Italienne.—Boil in stock as above, and serve with Italian sauce over.

Artichoke Bottoms au Citron.—Boil as above, and drain; make a sauce of butter, flour, pepper, salt, and nutmeg, put the artichokes in with a slice of lemon without rind or pips on each, cook a minute or two in the sauce, then arrange in a dish with the sauce, and a slice of lemon on each.

Carottes à la Maître d'Hôtel.—Take young, short carrots, cut them pear-shaped, and boil in water or broth with a little salt and butter; when tender, drain, and put them in a stewpan with butter, pepper, salt, and a pinch of white sugar; make quite hot, and finish with chopped parsley, a little piece more butter, and a few drops of lemon-juice. If old carrots are used they are sliced or cut in small balls.

Carottes au Blanc.—Trim young carrots, throw in boiling water and half cook them, then drain and put in a stewpan with butter, salt, and sugar; cook them five minutes, stir in some flour and a little nutmeg, moisten with a little of the water they were boiled in, and finish cooking. Before serving, add a small quantity of cream or the yolk of an egg, take from the fire, add a few drops of lemon-juice and a little piece of butter.

Carottes au Gras.—Scrape and cut the carrots in quarters and pieces about two inches long, half cook them in boiling water, then put them in a stewpan with some good skimmings or fat from bacon, a bunch of parsley, scallion, salt, and pepper; moisten with broth, and stew until there is very little gravy, then skim and strain the sauce and serve the carrots in it.

Navets à la Crème (turnips).—Cook the same as carrots au blanc, but omit the lemon-juice.

Navets Glacés.—Cut some turnips into balls about the size of marbles, boil them twenty minutes in water with salt; drain, and put in a stewpan with butter, salt, and pounded white sugar; cook for from ten to fifteen minutes, shaking the stewpan now and then; put broth enough to cover them, let the broth reduce to half the quantity, then draw to the side of the stove and finish cooking, basting them occasionally with the gravy; serve with their sauce over; if it has dried up too much, add a little broth, stir the glaze from the bottom of the stewpan, and boil a minute. Turnips cooked in this way are used to garnish dishes with either white or brown sauce.

Carrots are glazed in the same way.

Onions Glacés.—Take small onions all the same size, cut off the roots, and peel them from the tops; stand them in a stewpan in butter, then proceed as for turnips.

Potatoes à la Maître d'Hôtel.—Boil the potatoes, cut them in slices; put some butter, pepper, and salt in a stewpan, put in the potatoes for one minute only, add chopped parsley and lemon-juice, and serve. Some cooks add a chopped scallion, and some a little broth.

Pommes de Terre Soufflées (puffed fried potatoes).—Peel and slice some potatoes, wash and dry them thoroughly in a cloth, then throw them into tepid fat, and warm until they lose their stiffness; then drain and put in a frying basket; next make the fat very hot, put the potatoes in, shake the basket (they ought to puff out without colouring), then drain again; at the moment of serving, plunge the basket into very hot fat to colour the contents; drain, sprinkle with salt, and serve.

Pommes de Terre Sautées.—Cook the potatoes in their skins, let them get nearly cold, then peel and cut in slices; melt some butter in a frying-pan, put the potatoes in, colour them slightly, season, sprinkle with parsley, and serve.

Potato Croquettes.—Bake or boil the potatoes, and rub them through a sieve; to half a pound of potatoes put one ounce of butter, one dessertspoonful of cream, two yolks of eggs, and two whites beaten to a froth; add salt, sugar, and either a little nutmeg or chopped parsley; make into balls, roll them in flour, then egg and crumb them, and fry in boiling fat.

PUREES.

Purée de Pommes de Terre au Gratin.—Prepare the potatoes as for croquettes; to one pound of potato flour take four ounces of butter, four yolks of eggs, some grated Parmesan, salt, nutmeg, and two tablespoonfuls of cream; put on a dish, sift Parmesan and butter over; and bake in a hot oven for about twelve minutes.

Purée of Green Peas.—Put a quart of green peas in sufficient boiling water to cover them, add two ounces of butter, a bunch of parsley, one or two scallions, a little sugar and salt; when tender pass the peas through a sieve, make the purée hot, take from the fire, stir in a small piece of butter, and serve. Some cooks add a little gravy to the purée when they put it back in the stewpan.

Purée of Dried Peas.—Soak a quart of peas in tepid water for twelve hours, then put them in a stewpan with half a pound of bacon (or pickled pork), one carrot, one onion, a clove, bunch of thyme and parsley, a bay-leaf, a scallion, and sufficient cold water. When the peas are soft, rub them through a sieve, moistening with the liquor in which they have been cooked; put the purée in a clean stewpan, boil (stirring all the time so that it should not burn) until the purée is thick enough, then keep hot until wanted. The pork or bacon may be served on the purée.

Purées of Lentils and Haricot Beans are made in the same way.

Purée of Onions.—Chop five or six large onions, throw them into boiling water, cook five minutes and drain them. Melt an ounce of butter in a stewpan, put the onions in with a little salt and white sugar, stir, and cook a few minutes without letting them brown, add a little water or white stock; let them boil half an hour, then rub through a sieve, put the purée back in the stewpan, add a little flour and butter mixed together; boil five minutes, and finish with one or two tablespoonfuls of cream.

Purée d'Oseille (of sorrel).—Take some sorrel, a leek, a little chervil, and a lettuce, chop all together, put in a stewpan without water or butter, sprinkle a little salt over, put the lid on, and cook over a slow fire; when soft pass through a sieve, put back in a stewpan with a lump of butter, add a little flour, cook five minutes, and add a little good gravy or the yolk of an egg. At the moment of serving stir in some small pieces of butter.

Purée of Endive.—Throw the endive in boiling water; cook until it bends in the fingers, then drain, chop it finely, put it back in the stewpan with some butter or poultry fat, make it hot, shake in a little flour and a pinch of white sugar, moisten with a small quantity of broth or gravy, add salt, pepper, and a little nutmeg, let it simmer at the side of the stove. After taking from the fire, stir in a small piece of fresh butter.

This purée is also made with cream instead of gravy; butter must then be used, not poultry fat.

Purée à la Romaine (cos lettuce) and of Spinach are made in the same ways as above.

Purée aux Marrons (chestnuts).—Take some cooked chestnuts (preferably baked, if not burnt), shell and skin them, put in a stewpan with butter, add a little broth, and let them simmer until they will crush easily; then rub through a sieve, put back in the stewpan with a few spoonfuls of good gravy, or of cream, let the purée reduce, take from the stove, and finish by adding a little butter.

Purée of Carrots.—Scrape and cut a dozen large carrots in very thin slices (a cucumber slice answers well for this purpose), cut two onions in quarters, melt three ounces of butter in a stewpan, and put in the carrots and onions and some salt; stir over the fire until the carrots are limp, they must not brown at all, then add some water or pale stock and a lump of sugar, and simmer at the side of the stove two to three hours; when you can crush the carrots easily between the fingers, rub them through a sieve, put back in a stewpan with any liquor there is from them, add two tablespoonfuls of good gravy or of cream, stir, and let the purée cook until it is thick enough, then take from the fire, and finish by stirring in a little fresh butter; serve.

Purées of Turnips, Parsnips, Celery-root, etc., are made in the same way as purée of carrots. When served alone, purées are garnished with fried sippets.

I cannot conclude an article on vegetables without a few words about salads; these in France are made with almost anything; either cooked or uncooked vegetables are used.

Salade de Barbe de Capucin (a species of endive, of which the leaves are blanched) is a winter salad; sometimes slices of cooked beet-root are added to it. Barbe should never be laid in water, but washed quickly and dried. Season with salt, oil, and vinegar.

Watercress Salad.—The last minute before serving season with oil, vinegar, and salt.

Endive Salad.—Rub the bottom of the salad-bowl with a cut garlic, wash the endive, put it in a salad-basket, shake all the wet out of it, and cut it in pieces; put in the bowl, add oil, pepper, and salt, mix thoroughly with a wooden spoon and fork, add a little vinegar. The proportion used is four tablespoonfuls of oil to one of vinegar.

Salad d'Été (summer salad).—Take two or three fresh-cut lettuces, separate the leaves, and wipe them carefully one at a time with a cloth, without washing them; chop three young onions, mix with the lettuces, add some cress and a pinch each of chopped chervil and tarragon; season as above, ornament with quarters of hard-boiled eggs.

Salade de Laitues à la Crème.—Prepare some lettuces as for "salade d'été," season with vinegar, pepper, and salt, add some thick cream, stir quickly, and serve.

Salad of Potatoes and Dandelion.—Take a handful of young dandelions, wash, dry, cut them in pieces, and place in a salad bowl; skin and chop nine or ten hot potatoes, add them, with pepper and salt, to the dandelion.

Chop a quarter of a pound of bacon very small, put it in a stewpan with a few drops of vinegar; when cooked, pour it boiling hot over the salad, stir a minute or two, and serve.

Salad of Celery and Truffles.—Chop the white part of two or three heads of celery, season with salt, pepper, and four parts of oil to one of vinegar. Take two-thirds the volume of cooked truffles, chopped and seasoned in the same way, add to the celery, mix well, and serve.

Salade de Salsifis.—Take cooked salsify (cold), cut it in one-inch lengths, season with salt, pepper, mustard, and four parts of oil to one of vinegar. Just before serving sprinkle chopped parsley over the top. Celery-root is used in the same way.

Salade de Légumes à la Mayonnaise (salad of vegetables with mayonnaise).—Cook and cut in dice carrots, artichoke bottoms, French beans, beetroot, and celery-root, season with salt, pepper, oil, and vinegar, let it remain some hours, then drain on a sieve; put in a basin with some pickled gherkins and mushrooms, and one or two capsciums cut like the vegetables, stir in a few spoonfuls of thick mayonnaise sauce; arrange in a pyramid on a dish; surround with small branches of cauliflower, cooked and seasoned, or with quarters of hard-boiled eggs.

Salad of French Beans.—Cook the beans in salt and water, drain, season with salt, pepper, oil, and vinegar. French beans that have been cooked "à la crème" or "à la poulette" (see sauce poulette) make excellent salad if drained and seasoned.

Salad of Haricot Beans.—Boil the beans in the usual way in salt and water; keep them hot until wanted, then drain and put in the salad bowl; season with salt, pepper, oil, vinegar, mustard, and a very little finely-chopped onion; stir and serve. Should be eaten hot.

Lentil Salad is also eaten hot. The lentils are boiled with a small clove of garlic, and drained. Salt, pepper, oil, and vinegar are added, and chopped parsley or chervil.

Tarragon, Chervil, Pimpernel, Cress, Purslain, Scallions, and the fruit of Nasturtiums are all used in salads. They are called "fourniture de salade."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

COOKERY.

ELLA.—We have given a whole article on the making of jelly, besides many on special jellies and jams; see page 234, vol. iii. Vegetable marrow preserve is made as follows: Pare them, remove seeds, cut in pieces of about two inches square. To 1 lb. of fruit add $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of sifted sugar. Use cold water, put in the fruit, and boil until tender, adding some pieces of whole ginger and some cloves. Pour off the juice and add the sugar to it to make the syrup, and put the fruit into it for the final boiling.

GIPSY.—The mould must be dipped in hot water previously to turning out the jelly. This will make it turn out easily. The 30th August, 1855, was a Thursday.

K. C. MAC.—We are glad you found our recipe for orange marmalade so good, and thank you for that of "Norfolk rusks," which we now give. Take one and a half pounds of flour, two ounces of butter, two ounces of lard, one dessert-spoonful of baking powder, one salt-spoonful of salt, all of which mix thoroughly together. Then add one egg, beaten up with as much milk as will make it all into a stiff paste; roll it out to about the thickness of two inches, and cut into rounds with the top of a tumbler, previously dipped into flour to prevent the mixture sticking to it. Bake in a quick oven until they be of a light brown; then take them out, and pull them each in half, and put them into a slow oven to dry.

POPCORN must buy what is called a "corn popper," we believe, usually sold by the people who sell the corn.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A. R. should make her inquiries of, and give all orders for books to, our publisher, Mr. Tarn.

HILDA CLARE.—It is to be much regretted that when you first began to dawdle and behave in such an imbecile way—not to say your rebellion towards your parents in not doing immediately what you were told—you were not well punished and made to behave as they desired on every occasion when you rebelled. As it is, we should send you for six months to a strict boarding-school, since you have not sufficient moral rectitude and self-control to turn over a new leaf yourself. Pray for grace and help to shake off your sloth, and be "diligent in business, serving the Lord," and "redeeming the time," one of the precious "talents" entrusted to you. Read what our Divine Lord said of the "wicked and slothful servant" who "hid his lord's talent in a napkin."

AN OLD MOTHER (Stuttgart).—We recommend you to obtain a copy of Baedeker's Guide to Switzerland, as the prices of pensions are given all over that country. There are many at five francs a day. We cannot advertise any particular houses ourselves.

E. P. (Bradford.)—We are gratified by the strong approval you express of our paper, the articles, and "Answers to Correspondents." We are equally surprised with yourself at many of the letters on the subject of "Lovers," and the lack of dignity and common sense exhibited. The girls needed much some such teachers as the "G.O.P."

LILY HICKMAN.—You write a beautiful hand.

YORKSHIRE GIRL.—Agrippa's conscience and reason were convinced, but his inclination opposed them, and thus he was only almost persuaded. 2. Your hand would be improved by writing rather smaller.

DAGMAR VALERIAN.—We recommend you to improve your practical knowledge of instrumental music, so as to be able to accompany your voice well when of an age to learn singing, and also in the science of harmony. You should also learn elocution, so as to pronounce well, and know where the emphasis should be placed. Also make yourself well acquainted, at least, with the pronunciation of Italian, German, and French. This will give you plenty to do during the next year as a commencement, and at sixteen you may safely begin to exercise your voice, a little at a time, being careful not to overstrain it by attempting notes too high for you. The quality of your voice should be ascertained by a good master, so that you may practise suitable exercises and songs for a soprano, mezzo-soprano, or contralto, as the case may be. Training may be had at the Guildhall School of Music—secretary, Mr. C. P. Smith, Victoria Embankment, London; or at the Royal Academy of Music—secretary, Mr. John Gill, 4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, W. These gentlemen will send their prospectuses, and any further information which you may require.

DORMOUSE.—When the lady of the house enters her schoolroom, the governess should rise, or at least partially do so. Hemming should be done on the forefinger, but children, when beginning to learn, often prick their finger, and it becomes sore, and till healed there is no harm in using the middle finger as a substitute.

By WILLIAM CARTWRIGHT NEWSAM.

SLOWLY the golden light
fades in the west, Swiftly the singing bird hies to his nest;
Deep in the coppice the sounds of the day
Sweetly and slowly are dying away,
Till, on my list'ning ear, scarcely a sound Breaks the sweet solitude reigning around:
Oft have I sat in the soft fading light,
Rapt in the beautiful silence of night.

Slowly and silently climbing on high,
Soon the pale orb'd moon lights up the sky, Edging the clouds with a silvery fringe,
Flooding their depths with a luminous tinge;
Save where the gleaming star's tremulous ray Beams from the azure space far, far away:
Surely the skies fill the soul with delight,
Watched in the beautiful silence of night.

Sweet 'tis to sit in some sylvan retreat, Watching the glowworms that shine at my feet;
Whilst the pale rose, in the moon's silver ray,
Gleaming in dewy tears sighs for the day;
Softly the nightingale, sitting above, Warbles a lullaby song to his love,
And, with a tremulous thrill of delight, Breaks, like the charm, the sweet silence of night.

"SWEET SOLITUDE."

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE countryman, when he entered, was certainly big and rough-looking. He wore a coarse frieze suit with a slouched hat, which he had not removed on coming into the house, drawn well over his brow. He made a slight stumbling obeisance to Kitty, but he did not take off his hat till the servant had quitted the room, when the stranger displayed the irregular features, dark pale complexion, and pleasant, manly countenance of Anthony Walton, as he said, with a smile—

"Dost know me, Kitty?"

She knew him before he spoke, but all she could do was to gasp, "Cousin Anthony—Jack!"

"Yes, yes, it is to tell you about him I am here," he hastened to reassure her. "We were sore affrighted lest the news should reach you and my uncle that he had been taken prisoner."

"A prisoner!" echoed Kitty, with a bitter cry, which rang through the room. "Oh! not that, not that, Anthony, say not that my Jackie is where I have dreaded he might come—into one of those vile dens among other wretched men, mixed up with the offscourings of the earth, to be taken out and shot, if he do not die soon enough. Oh, poor father, to hear such a tale! Poor Mrs. Judy, who brought us up as if we were her own; and Lady Ottery and you, too, Anthony, who have had to carry such doleful tidings!"

"Hush! hush! Cousin Kitty, thou wilt alarm the house, and that will be the worse for all. Thy brother is rescued. If thou hadst waited to hear me out, I would have told thee so. I thought thou wert a braver girl than I find thee, else I had not come into the house and sought speech of thee when I heard my Lady Ottery was absent."

His appeal, after his announcement of Jack's safety, quieted her. She stood quite still, though she was still trembling, while he explained to her how, where, and when John Dacre, lying in ambush along with a detachment of Essex's soldiers, had been surprised by the very party of Royalists which the Parliamentary men were seeking to intercept, and Jack, along with several of his companions, had been taken prisoner and carried to the rear of the enemy's little force. Happily they were detained by a countermarch for the space of several days, before he could be brought in with his companions to Oxford. In the interval his deliverance had been effected by a party who set themselves to accomplish the task, friendly civilians, who had a regard for the lad and knew his plight. Anthony did not stop to say at what heavy risk, or to give the name of the friend who had been foremost in the enterprise. He hurried on with the information that being under the apprehension that Jack's father and sister would hear he had been taken prisoner, without being farther apprised that he had been enabled to escape, they would be thrown into great distress, equally injurious and uncalled for, on his account. Therefore he, Anthony, had managed to enter by the most available gate, in order to see the Dacres or Lady Ottery, and to pledge himself that Jack was at large and in no trouble, save that he was a soldier liable to a soldier's straits in the time of war. Anthony had not gone to Dr. Dacre, because he had feared that his presence might so agitate and affront his uncle as to render what would otherwise have been his welcome news unacceptable. Lady Ottery was out, so the visitor had recourse to his cousin Kitty.

"And canst thou not come into Oxford unless under cloud of night, and in such a guise as this?" asked Kitty, wondering. "Thou art not a soldier, like Jack; thou hast not borne arms against the King. I opined that thou hadst stayed at home, the squire of Islip Barnes, so that nobody could harm my aunt, the girls, and thee."

Anthony made a wry face.

"It signifieth little how peaceably inclined a man may be, cousin Kitty. They do me the honour to view me as a Parliament man in my heart, and so they are ever ready to pounce upon me. If I had come into Oxford in my proper clothes for months back, it is ten to one that I should have been where Jack had like to be. They would have arrested me as a spy, whereas I am but giving them some ground to go upon by assuming this character, in which there is less chance of my being identified. What matters it? I am as comfortable in this suit as in any other. I vow I must have been meant for a labouring man—one of my own hedgers and ditchers. But you knew me, Kitty, almost before I took off my hat, while I believe I should hardly have known you anywhere save here."

"Nonsense, sir!" remarked Kitty, brusquely.

"Nay, it is sense, not nonsense! How thou hast grown, little Kitty, since I saw thee last, some time before that poor version of St. Scholastica's day two Februaries ago."

"'Tis a long while," said Kitty, with a soft sigh.

He looked at her from head to foot with a pleased expression on his dark face.

"And how fine thou art! nay, thou hast grown as fine as the best, but truly modest withal, waiting on the King and Queen in Oxford. Prissy and Alice don't wear such pretty clothes. Sure thou art born to be a great dame, as I said I was to be a ditcher. We form such a contrast, cousin, that I scruple to take the liberty of sitting down in thy presence."

"Oh, don't begin to laugh and twit me, cousin Anthony," implored Kitty, pressing her hands together, and hardly able to keep from crying. It was all so strange and sad, though he would banter her, as he had been accustomed to do. "Rather tell me what I can do for you in return for your kindness; what refreshment you will take. The night is chill, and you have ridden some distance."

"Walked every step," he corrected her. "Ridden would have had an ugly look, as if I had stolen the horse. But what is a tramp to a long-legged animal like me? I tell thee I enjoyed it amazingly, Kitty, besides the chance of setting eyes on thee again, and carrying those at home word how thou wert looking and faring. Sister Alice's eyes will grow round at the tale of thy finery. No, I will not plague you again; I am but an ill-conditioned jester to jest against your will. But not a bit or sup will I take to arouse the suspicion of my lady's man, though I think not that, even if he did suspect, he would report upon kindred and old friends like you and me."

"But thou hast done no harm, cousin Anthony," cried Kitty again, indignantly; "why shouldst thou have to skulk and hide? A man is free to think what he will. Why may you not hold up your head, and show yourself among your neighbours?"

"Because all the world would not give me such credit for innocence as my cousin doth. I took the precaution to bring a hunch of bread and a slice of cheese in my pocket, which I munched as I came along, and I had a cup of ale at the first change house after I entered the town. Few honest fellows fare better nowadays. We must not waste time; we have but a quarter of an hour to spare. I must not stay longer with thee than a poor man would take to tell his tale—of how hard the squire of Islip Barnes do be upon him for his rent, to be sure; how his dame is down with the ague, and all their eight children are squalling and squabbling for the empty porridge pot, and the last clouts to replace their rags."

He sat down, as she would have him do, by the fire, which she heaped up. He began to stretch the limbs, which in truth were wearied with the miry byways he had been forced to choose, though he was in the flower of youth and strength. He talked of Jack and of Anthony's mother and sisters, as he did so, thrusting his hands in his pockets and leaning his head against the leather-covered back of the chair. The mask of easy indifference and high spirits which he had been wearing, gradually slipped off, and he grew graver and graver, though he would not allow that Jack was in any greater jeopardy than the thousands of soldiers who were out in the rival camps. "He is in training to be a stout soldier."

His health is rather stronger than it used to be, I think. No more headaches, tell Mrs. Judy, when a man doth not know whether or not he will carry his head on his shoulders next morning. That is, of course, he is in God's hands, as we all are, and he runs no more risk than hundreds more in his troop; while there is always the excitement and uncertainty of active warfare to make him forget his pains. Nature wants no more to recruit herself." As a proof of the truth of what he said, he told her his mother was no worse for the disturbance in her neighbourhood; and Alice was growing as strong as she looked—at least to one heedless of her complaints, and she took a good deal of diversion out of the conflicting buff coats. No, Prissy was not to be married till—he could not tell when; till there was a truce or a compromise or peace proclaimed. In the meantime, of course, she and Windebank could see little or nothing of each other, and that only under the most trying circumstances.

It was in speaking of Prissy and her lover that Anthony Walton's gathering gravity deepened into sadness and sternness. "I blame not Windebank," he said, "I believe he hath the courage of his opinions; but he hath ever loved his King and his general, and he holds that he is bound to the standard under which he serveth. But when a man is pulled two ways, it can be but a half-hearted service. Yea, verily, no man can serve two masters. It bodeth broken hearts, like that of Falkland, and disordered brains, like those of poor Windebank. I would that he were to throw down his commission, then he and Prissy might take ship to America."

"What!" cried Kitty, in dismay. "Prissy go away from you all to the New World." As she spoke she remembered that Prissy had always been Anthony's favourite sister, and that the attachment between them had been deeper and more tender even than what ordinarily exists between an affectionate brother and sister.

"Yes," he said, with his face turned away, "though I never cast eyes on her dear kind face again, I could trust her to Windebank, and she would be in God's keeping; for that matter she is so under all circumstances, that is the single grain of comfort. But I tell thee, Kitty, this England of ours, as it is now, as we have made it—God help us!—is no place for those who would live in peace with their neighbour, and yet not sin against their consciences. Dost know, child, that Hampden and his cousin the Huntingdon man, Cromwell, and more like them, were actually on board ship, bound for America, when the House called them back?"

"And wouldst thou go too, cousin Anthony?" she asked, wistfully.

He raised his head and looked at her, and then started up and faced the fire, standing with his back to her.

"I would we could all go," he said; "Jack and all, and make for ourselves a new home in the New World, as you call it."

"It would be impossible," she said, simply. "Father would never leave his books; I scarce believe he could live without them. Besides, you know he holdeth not by the new opinions," she finished, with a sigh.

"And mother's rheum would not be improved by a sea voyage. More than that, only think how sister Alice would be for swooning at the first approach of the sea sickness!" he added, turning round and speaking more lightly.

"Then will you be for going alone?" she asked again, with the same wistfulness. For whether he had petted or teased her, whether he had been in her good graces or in her bad books, she had always been accustomed to depend on her cousin Anthony. She had known all along that if she or any person he cared for were in trouble, that person in need would but have to say "Come," and he would be at the side of kinswoman or friend, to give all the aid in his power.

"Not an I can help it, cousin Kitty," he said quickly, turning away again with a heavy sigh, and she heard him mutter to the fire how hard it would be for him.

Then, man-like, his wrath began to blaze up against those who had brought about this tribulation. A man would be almost driven to believe, if he had not been taught better, that the wicked went unpunished, for while the righteous were hanging their heads, the ruffians and swashbucklers, the liars and drinkers, the cursers and cut-throats on both sides had it all their own way. Such were Rupert and his reckless crew, Lunsford and his wolfish lambs, Goring and his fiends incarnate, with those Parliamentary soldiers whom General Cromwell had denounced as but a set of "poor tapsters and runaway apprentices." Who meted out to them their deserts? What evil was befalling the vain, light women who befooled men by their silken snares? All were apparently carrying it with as high a hand as ever, though Hampden and Falkland were slain. Battle after battle had been fought, drenching the sod of England with blood, to the music of widows' wails and famishing orphans' cries. When he had stolen into Oxford, once the seat of learning and religion, as if he himself were a criminal dreading to be seen, what was he greeted with? Penitential psalms, confessions of sin, and promises of amendment? Nay, with shameful songs bawled from taverns, blasphemies shouted from college windows, profligate scamps falling out and drawing upon each other in the schools, fiddling and dancing resounding from doctors' houses.

"And you discovered me tricked out like this," Kitty Dacre interrupted him, taking guilt to herself, and casting abashed eyes on the white satin gown, the lace frills, and the diamond brooch in which she had so lately found girlish satisfaction.

"Thou poor little innocent maid!" he cried, his voice changing on the instant; "why shouldst thou not be brave in thy youth, like the birds and the flowers, as thy father was wont to say? Nay, thou art far higher than they, and must pay for thine exaltation. But thou hadst nought to do with the crying evils of the time, though thou hast suffered from them and grieved for them, I warrant, as sorely in satin as in sackcloth. Thy gown becometh thee right well, Kitty," he broke off, admiringly.

In truth Kitty looked fair—and sweet—and young, standing there in her modest gala attire, with her light brown hair drawn back and falling in heavy curls on her shoulders in the fashion of the time, her cheeks like roses, her blue eyes moist, her red lips trembling, and her breast heaving with the tales of sorrow and wrong.

"I must study the fashion of thy gown," he insisted, to comfort her; "I must carry back the tale of the shape and the pattern to sister Alice, and of how you look in it to sister Prissy; she will be sure to ask, 'And are my dear heart's cheeks still rosy, after she hath been so long immured with the crowd of human beings in Oxford? Was she able to laugh and hold her own against a masterful lout like you, as she used to do?'"

"Ah! when shall I see my kind cousin Prissy again?" she questioned, sorrowfully.

"It may be ere very long; who knows?" he said, vaguely. "And thou wast to have gone to the Queen's court to-night," he began again, quickly, as if glad to change the subject. "Thou wast to have beat all the other beauties hollow; our little cousin Kitty, think of that! Nay, it is no great matter to be proud of, for they are but candlelight beauties, painted and bedizened, the best of them; while as for thee, thou art not done growing. I did tell thee—did I not?—thou hast grown inches since I saw thee last."

"But that was more than two years ago, cousin Tony," she said, with dignity. "I trow thou hast forgot that I am growing eighteen. I was seventeen two months back, I shall grow no more."

"No, Kitty, do not grow any more; remain just as thou art," he enjoined her, gravely. "But we did not forget your birthday out at Islip Barnes. I must not let you run away with that idea. We drank your health in a cup of mother's canary, which we can no longer afford to use on common occasions. Jack was with us, and he answered to the toast, I mind me. He said, 'Though I should not see Kitty again till she be as big as a dragoon, I'll come bound to know her by the way she bites her nether lip when she laughs, and by the feel of her hug.'"

"As if I should not know Jackie, and be able to tell him among a thousand, though our heads were grey," cried Kitty, reproachfully.

There was no more talk of the inappropriateness of the frieze suit in company with her satin gown, and it was she who told him, in apprehension for his safety, that the time which he had allowed for their interview was long past. "And if you should suffer harm for coming here to relieve our minds, I could never forgive myself," she said earnestly.

"But thou must," he tried eagerly to impress her, "for even at the worst, it would be a small payment for the cheer I have derived from our brief converse, cousin Kitty."

ART AND HEART; OR, DECORATION FOR THE POOR.

By C. HARRISON TOWNSEND.

our last article we gave an illustration of the conventionalised designs of chrysanthemums, to which we then referred. We would impress upon our readers the necessity of the study of the art of taking a flower or a leaf, for instance, and so treating the design based upon its conventional repetition that the result is not only a design but a pattern. For frieze work such a method of treatment is almost always requisite; for in decorating a room of any considerable size it is too much to expect of the artist that each portion of this band of ornament should be an absolutely original transcript of nature. For instance, in the case of the Bouverie Ward, which we have already described, the actual length of the frieze was somewhere about 120 feet. Now this means a considerable draw upon the painter's power of conception and facility in the harmonious arranging of the different flower-subjects that form the frieze. It is not given to everyone to be inventive for 120 feet "on end." And monotony is less forced upon one in dealing with conventional designs that are painted than when they are printed on such a material as wall paper. Here the demands of the paperstainer as to the size of the "repeat" have to be considered. But in the painter's case design can alternate with design without much consideration of the distance apart of the repeating portion. For the purpose of the study of the methodical repetition of design, we would refer the reader to a series of Japanese handbooks of design, designed and printed in Japan, and to be obtained at the moderate cost of one or two shillings a-piece.* Here many designs that are—or are variations upon—what we are familiar with on trays and decorative pieces of Japanese work, are skeletonised and reduced to their simple elements. Some of these we illustrate, and can leave the principle upon which the Japanese artist produces them to speak for itself. An article by Mr. A. B. Pite in the Builder of March 30th, 1889, also goes thoroughly into the subject of "repeated" designs, and will be found instructive on the subject; and finally we will mention the various works, especially "The Planning of Ornament," and "The Anatomy of Pattern" of Mr. F. Lewis Day, who is perhaps one of our ablest pattern designers, using the word in its largest sense.

Probably the best specimen of purely conventional design executed under the auspices of our Society is the treatment of the Women's Convalescent Ward at Westminster Hospital. The room is a long one with an open-timber roof, the principals of which have been painted elaborately with running patterns on the beams and uprights. All round the room runs a very beautifully designed frieze, 2 feet 3 inches in depth, of which we give a sketch, and only regret that it is not possible to show also its charm of colouring. The ground is a deep, clear blue, the large leaves cream with bright green lobes, the vize leaves dark green, the blossoms and fan-shaped flower salmon-pink fading into cream, and the grapes a reddish-purple. The Society owes this beautiful piece of decorative design to Mr. William Morris, under whose direction the work was carried out.

The decorative work done by the Kyrle Society has been amongst a variety of institutions established for all kinds of different ends. It would be too long to give a complete list of these, but the work executed (within the last two or three years only) includes three boys' clubs, four working men's clubs, eleven girls' clubs and homes, five hospital wards (one of these being in a children's hospital), six parish halls, four schoolrooms, a workhouse, a temperance hall, a guild-room, and others. These examples may be taken as typical of the direction in which help is likely to be asked for in any large town.

One feature in the list ought certainly to appeal to readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER. It will be seen how many of our applications are received from girls' clubs, homes, and institutes. It is perhaps that girls using such places are apt more quickly than boys to attach the home feeling to them, and to wish to do all in their power to get them made bright and pretty. Anyhow the fact remains that institutions for girls are foremost amongst our applicants, and it really does seem as though this fact alone should lead to many offers of assistance on the part of those who have in the first place skill, and in the second, what is rarer, time, to place at the disposal either of the Kyrle Society proper, or some kindred body of workers.* But besides these there must be many readers who have a taste for the kind of work we do, and yet who, living at a distance from London, cannot range themselves under the Society's banner. If such an one finds it impossible to communicate with any of the provincial centres to which we referred in our first article, why should she not, apart from any such organisation at all, set to work, and aided by one or two enthusiastic friends, take in hand and decorate some place that will be thereafter a greater pleasure and of more help to those that use it? The standard adopted—and this we must say emphatically—should be a high one. Better no decoration at all than that of the "cheap and nasty" description. If art does anything at all it should teach, and bad art can only teach a bad lesson. It is astonishing to find what powers of correct appraisement of art the "classes" possess alike in music as in painting. The criticisms may be quaintly expressed, but often and often have we heard them go soundly and directly to the root of the matter.

And here we may say that it is not only those who paint who can help to beautify the places of the poor. Those whose means will allow can nowadays, at slight cost, purchase etchings or photogravures, which, framed simply (say in a black-reeded or inch-wide oak frame, with a small gold bead under the glass), form a more permanent and artistic ornament than the often-seen chromolithographed Christmas supplements of the illustrated papers. Better still, let those who have been fortunate enough to take a summer holiday that has offered opportunities for filling their sketch-book, present some of the results to those who will enjoy them, and thus profit by the holiday, if only at secondhand. As regards the Kyrle Society, we yearly distribute large numbers of framed water-colour drawings, engravings, and etchings. Nor should

* The address of the "Kyrle" Society is 14, Nottingham Place, W., and the Hon. Secretary of the Decorative branch will be happy to answer questions and give information and advice. There is on our books a long list of applicants standing over till our present staff of workers can take them up, or till other helpers present themselves.

* These, and the books mentioned lower down, may be obtained of Mr. B. T. Patsford, 52, High Holborn, W.C.

we forget to speak a good word for the use that the Arundel Society's series of chromolithographs after the old masters has been to us. If not all, yet many of these are charming in their delicacy of colour and suggestiveness of the beauty of the originals. From time to time the large printsellers have also been most generous to us, and their kind gifts of parcels of engravings have enabled the society to make donations of considerable art value.

The field of wood-carving again offers opportunities to the many who nowadays cultivate it. Specially executed frames may be prepared for pieces of decoration, or carved panels arranged to form an overmantel. An effective way of treating carved work for such purposes is to gild the part in relief, or at all events the highest portions of the carvings, and to pass over the whole surface of the panel a coat of varnish, with which some colouring medium of a transparent nature has been mixed. The result, if a good dark green—or with smaller subjects a very bright red—be used, is excellent.

The form of art which is likely to be most common amongst our readers, that is to say embroidery, is perhaps not so much in demand as some of the others we have mentioned. The kind of institution which asks the Kyrle Society's decorative aid is rarely one in which embroidered curtains or portières are likely to be congruous. Hospitals, Homes, and working people's institutions urge against such hangings the need of simplicity and the necessity of avoiding anything that can harbour dust or dirt.

But there are sometimes cases where decorative needlework can be usefully employed. For instance, in the Boys' Institute, Shoe Lane, we fixed an overmantel consisting of a centre panel, with a figure-subject on either side. This central one was schemed to serve as a notice-board, upon which club notices of lectures, meetings, and so on could be placed. It consisted of peacock-blue cloth mounted on a wood backing. The upper portion of the panel was embroidered with "swags" or festoons, executed in fine crewel silk of different shades of grey-green. Again, the little curtains hiding the nurse's appliances in the Bouverie Ward, Westminster Hospital, were, as we have said, worked in silks on a washable linen.

Many opportunities also arise in which the services of one able to work in hammered copper and brass would be of great use. Panels of these materials can be employed, as we have mentioned above when speaking of wood-carving, or narrow bands introduced in a sunk groove running round the frame of a painted panel.

In concluding this series of notes on the work of the Kyrle Society, we would say that it has not been so much our wish to gain recruits for the Society itself—though of these we should be glad—as to lead some of our readers to recognise the fact that the use of a talent, even though a small one, blesses him that gives and him that takes. And that it is not a stretched reading of our duty towards one's neighbour to believe that it is part of that duty to ask our poorer brother and sister to become sharers with us in these things of beauty which go to make so much of the brightness and pleasure of our own lives.

VARIETIES.

MISLEADING FIGURES.

Two American women had thirty chickens each, which they took to market. They agreed to divide equally the proceeds of their sale.

The chickens of the one were sold two for a dollar, realising for the thirty chickens—15 dollars.

Those of the other were sold three for a dollar, realising for the thirty chickens—10 dollars.

This made twenty-five dollars realised for the sixty chickens.

The merchant called on to divide the money said, "You have sold your thirty chickens two for a dollar, and you have sold your thirty chickens three for a dollar. That makes sixty chickens at the rate of five for two dollars. Well 5 into 60 goes 12 times—twice 12 is 24. That makes 24 dollars your chickens have brought."

He handed them over the money, but, as shown above, the women were cheated out of a dollar, for their chickens had actually fetched 25 dollars. And yet the merchant's figures were right.

A NEW READING.

Four P's were placed over the gate of the first president of Bordeaux, whose name was Pierre Pontac, meaning Pierre Pontac, Premier President.

A litigant who had one day waited two or three hours in his antechamber was surprised by the entrance of the President whilst he was attentively contemplating these four P's.

"Well, my friend," said the President, "what do you suppose these letters mean?"

"So far as I can make out," replied the litigant, "they can mean nothing but 'Pauvre plaideur, prenez patience.'" (Poor pleader, practise patience.)

A LESSON IN STYLE.—The style of some authors is all bristling with epithets. "If they could only understand," says a distinguished critic, "that adjectives are the greatest enemies of substantives, although they agree in gender, number, and case."

GETTING AND KEEPING.—We attract hearts by the qualities we display; we retain them by the qualities we possess.

WINGED LIES.—"A lie," says a Chinese proverb, "has no legs, and cannot stand, but it has wings, and can fly far."

A CALIFORNIAN STORY.

CHAPTER IV.

THE cooking in camp was all done out of doors, and had to be undertaken by the ladies, with considerable assistance from Frank Abbott, the two Indian women whom the hostess had brought with her doing the roughest part; the two white servants belonging to her household having been necessarily left behind in charge of her house. The labour being so equally divided gave them all a holiday, for although the Abbotts were wealthy people, they were forced to do many things which a family in the same position in Europe would never think of undertaking. Even Charles Aytoun yielded to the pressure put upon him, and consented to give up work for a few days, and everybody combined to prevent Lily from soiling her hands, Mr. Abbott waiting upon her with much devotion; and from the petting which she received from his mother, it was tolerably evident that she knew his secret and approved it.

The whole party were sitting under a huge tree at breakfast next morning, when one of the servants came up and told them there would be an "Indian cry" that day not far off, and the strangers might like to see it. It may be explained for the benefit of the ignorant that some of the Indians burn their dead, and bring the ashes to a certain burying-ground, coming every year to lament their bereavements at this place. Mr. Abbott remarked that the sight was not a very edifying one, but that the walk would be a pleasant one for the afternoon, and one of their people might follow them with the paraphernalia of five o'clock tea and light a fire in some suitable spot for them to make and enjoy it. The stroll home would be a delightful one after sunset. But the hostess suggested that it would be better to have "supper" also away from the camp, as they need not then come home till so disposed, and a pack horse could easily follow them.

The breakfast party was a pleasant sight; a great vase of lovely wild flowers adorned the middle of the table, a goodly dish of strawberries and pitcher of cream adding to its attractions, as well as the fragrant coffee, fresh eggs, rolls and deer ham beside it. The American element had decided to give up the hot breakfast of beefsteak and potatoes, which is usually considered indispensable by them, in order to give the ladies less to do, and Lily assured them that from an English point of view their health would improve in consequence, unless in the case of men who had a long day's work before them in the open air. In the afternoon they set out together for the Indians' burying-ground, and found a number of them grouped round the large grave where the ashes of their relatives and friends had been deposited for years past after cremation. The head of one of them, an old squaw, bereft of her husband, was covered with pitch scraped from the pine trees, to remain there till time wore it away. They had brought their provender with them, and it consisted of soup made of acorns, and had been poured into the closely-woven baskets which they make for the purpose. It is cooked by dropping heated stones into the basket. A large pile of wearing apparel, bearskins, and more baskets were erected near, to be burned at daybreak for the use of the departed ones in the "happy hunting-grounds." The visitors were scarcely noticed by the natives, and after they had studied the curious scene long enough, they turned away to select a good place for their supper to be prepared. All was managed very comfortably, and as soon as they were tired of reclining on their buffalo robes they turned homewards. Lily found herself alone with Mr. Abbott, who invented all sorts of excuses for delaying their departure after the others had set out.

"Do you ever feel as if you would like to live your life out in California?" he said to her suddenly, after a long silence.

"Not unless I could go home to England very often; then I think perhaps I might. But there is no chance of my doing so."

"How can you possibly know?"

"Because—well, there is a very good reason why."

"I suppose I dare not ask it," he replied, feeling rather as if a cold hand had been laid on his heart. "I wish I might."

Lily hesitated a moment. They had come to a tempting-looking seat, and she had mechanically obeyed his unspoken invitation to rest there a little; he was seated beneath her, and as she looked down at his handsome, kindly face, and noted with what interest his eyes were fixed upon her, she felt half tempted to tell him what he wanted to know. It had been impossible for her to be blind to the fact that he took every opportunity of showing her that he liked her; but she had heard much of the difference of manners in America between young people of opposite sexes and those of her own country, and believed that it was merely his way of showing kindness to his friend's sister.

"There is no reason why I should not. Only why do you care to know?"

"I will tell you some day. Do answer my question."

"Two years ago, when I was just seventeen, someone who was very good and very kind, asked me to wait for him. At first I said no, for I knew I did not care for him then as he deserved, but when he came back to me after a time I said yes."

Frank Abbott set his teeth hard; the blow was as much as he could bear without betraying his feelings. At last he said, in a low tone—

"Your brother thought you were free."

"Yes, no one knows it. Somehow I never wished to tell, and he could not marry then for four years or more. I have no parents, so there seemed nothing wrong in concealing it?"

"He loves you very dearly, of course. And you?"—for something in her tone had struck him oddly.

"He is so good. I shall in time, I know. I have never seen him since."

"You correspond, of course?"

"We did, but I have not heard from him for nearly a year now. In his last letter he said he expected to be home shortly."

"And do you not know where he is?"

"No, but I know him to be true and good, and I feel sure he will be faithful to me."

Frank Abbott mused long that night after all had retired, over the apparent wreck of all his hopes, and the strange story the girl he loved so dearly had told him. He could not, however, help feeling that there might after all be ever so slight a chance for him, and he determined to try and win her confidence, and get her to tell him more than she had done. He could see that her heart had not been won as yet by the man she trusted in, and when she had bid him good-night that evening he had noticed a kind, sweet look in her eyes that for some reason or other he thought he might take for himself. It was a nothing, a mere glance, but yet if it meant what he hoped, it was something after all. The fact of the matter being that Lily was in truth now fully aware that Frank's interest in her was more than friendly; his manner during their walk admitted of no other interpretation, and a feeling of regret for having unwittingly been the cause of pain to him had shown itself almost involuntarily in her eyes as she had bade him good-night, though it never occurred to her he would build hopes on so slight a foundation.

A few days after some English letters arrived for her, three of which, addressed by the same hand, bore marks of having travelled much, and when she inspected them more closely she observed that they had been forwarded, through a slight omission in the address, to a place of the same name in the north-west of Canada, where two of them had lain for some months past, to judge by the dates. The handwriting was one she knew well, and one which she had been accustomed to see without a tremor; now it gave her a feeling something like dread, and she kept them for several hours before she could bring herself to open or peruse them. Their contents kept her awake for many an hour that night, and she felt glad that their visit, hitherto so pleasant, had come to an end, Mrs. Selwyn being about to spend a short time with Mrs. Abbott, thus giving her back the solitude formerly so irksome, for which she now longed.

"I have enjoyed myself very much, Charley, but I am glad to be at home again," she said to her brother when they arrived home once more.

He looked at her somewhat curiously, being aware that she had received letters addressed in a man's hand, about which she had said no word to him, and though he much desired her confidence he resolved to ask no questions. She went about her work as cheerfully as ever, and several weeks passed by. Mrs. Selwyn having been suddenly called away by the illness of her husband, and the Abbotts also absent, nothing occurred to break the monotony of her life.

Summer was now well advanced, for it was the month of June, but the weather was not too hot to be agreeable, and as she sat one evening resting on the verandah, not expecting her brother until late, she heard a horse approaching, and speedily recognised the rider. In a few minutes he had alighted and was by her side.

"I thought you were two hundred miles away at least," she said, as she gave him her hand in greeting.

"We returned yesterday, but my mother will go to Santa Barbara next week, and if she finds it too hot will then go up in the mountains. My movements depend on circumstances. If you are not too tired, will you come for a little stroll and sit by the river instead of here? for I must wait to see Charley, and I heard from one of your men just now that he would be late."

"You will sleep here then—the spare room is quite ready?"

"If you will allow me."

They walked on together for half an hour or so, till they came to a lovely nook beside the stream, and then sat down talking for some time on indifferent subjects. At last he turned to her suddenly, and said, in a low tone—

"There is no use in putting it off any longer; I must tell you what is in my mind. Lily, dear, if I am right in believing you do not love the man to whom you think you are bound, I consider you ought to give me a hearing, if you have had no news of him for so long."

It was some moments before she could command herself sufficiently to reply, but at last she said slowly—

"I had news of him the day before we left you at the camp."

"Does he claim you? Nay, you must tell me all now. I will hear."

His tone was so imperative that she felt forced to answer.

"His last three letters have been sent to some other place in the States with a similar name, through a slight error in the address; also a telegram. He thinks I will not reply to him because I want to be free; two of them have been kept back for months."

"And what have you done?"

"I have told him the truth."

"And are you going to let him claim you now? Surely not. You have now a good opportunity of freeing yourself without giving the pain which a sudden announcement of your wish might have done. I would not marry a girl who could not give me her whole heart; you will be preparing misery for him and for yourself if you do so."

"Alas! it was getting very clear to poor Lily that the man beside her was one to whom she could give her heart, but she sat still, saying no word. As they got up to return, he lingered under the trees, and at last turned to her once more, and said firmly—

"If you could love me, Lily, you owe it to me to tell me so."

The bright colour in her cheeks as well as her silence seemed to him a favourable omen, and he led her back to their shady seat in so decided a manner that she felt it powerless to resist, and, keeping her hand in his, remarked—

"I will wait as long as you please for an answer, dear; but I will have one before we go home. Tell me exactly what you have written to India."

"I accepted his offer to set me free."

"Now you have to tell me whether I may take his place. Answer me, Lily."

After a little hesitation the answer was given, and by what followed it was evidently a satisfactory one; though Lily had a feeling that the whole affair had been managed in a hasty, American fashion, which ought not to be taken as a precedent. Half an hour after, they rose to go home, and he drew her arm within his, saying—

"Now we will go and tell Charley you are engaged to me; he will have to marry too, darling, as he will lose you very soon. In this country we never wait for things, you know—we like to have them at once."

[THE END]

BIRD LIFE IN AUGUST.

By A NATURALIST.

THE corn is now mostly ready for reaping; the heavy ears bend and rustle with the faintest breeze, when there is one. At times the air seems to quiver with heat. Bird life in August is disappointing to those who are not acquainted with the creatures' habits; the change from summer to winter plumage has commenced, or will shortly do so; they seek out retired situations. Besides which it must be remembered they have their families with them, and they are very like the human race in this particular, the cares of family life take the frolic out of them, as they do out of us. You will not hear much singing going on; ways and means of living have to be considered—how to get food, and where. All grain and seed-eating birds, when their nestlings are very young, feed them, more or less as the case may be, on insect food until their bills are strong enough to take grain and various seeds. Water is a vital necessity to all birds, but far more so to the grain-feeders than to those that live on insects. How to find a spot where they can be well sheltered from the fierce heat that is bringing the corn to perfection—a spot where they can drink and bathe unmolested, is to them a great consideration.

When they have found a place to their liking they will come to it from all quarters; from the fields, the hedgerows, the farms, and the dusty, baked roads. One very beautiful spot I know, lovely in all its surroundings, where I often go to observe the birds. It is situated in the heart of the great beech-woods; mighty trees are there, with great silvery-grey trunks, the roots and part of the lower portions of the trunks covered with the most velvety-looking green mosses. High up, overhead, for their grand trunks are like columns, their limbs and branches lace and interlace in a network of rich foliage, which throws fantastic lights and shadows on the rich red-brown of the decayed leaf-mould beneath.

The small copse growth is very scanty here, excepting in one spot that partly closes in a small silent pool. This is situated in a little hollow, a mere dip or depression, such as you often see in the woodlands. There is enough cover for our purpose, and we can seat ourselves on this large branch, broken off by a gale long ago, and not yet removed.

Of course perfect silence and quiet are necessary when you go to the fields and woods to observe the animal life there. There must be no moving or fidgeting about; and let no companions you may have smoke. I can tell you the birds have keen faculties of scent, although some might ridicule the notion. When I used to go after the wild fowl in days gone by, in my old marshland home, I never smoked, nor did my shooting companions, much as we enjoyed our pipes.

To return to our woodland pool, the trunks and foliage of the great trees are reflected there, as in a mirror; a large limb has fallen into it, reaching nearly across it, for the pool is small. It is cool here, there is moisture in the beech-wood in the hottest weather. A sound like a stick being snapped in two reaches our ears; it is the clap of the powerful pinions of a beautiful wood-pigeon, as he dashes down from the tree tops to drink. His mate joins him. If one of you has a pencil a pretty sketch might be made as they stand there. Coo-coo-cooee! he repeats, bending down his beautiful head and neck to her. A lovely picture of bird life is here, the clear pool with its reflections of tree trunk, foliage, broken bough, and the wood-pigeons. They will not let us observe them long. Soon they are sufficiently refreshed, and off they shoot with the same clap they gave in arriving. Others come and go, singly or in pairs, for pigeons require plenty of water.

We catch a glimpse of bird forms shooting like meteors over the tree tops. Here they come, full dash, and settle overhead, nearly in front of our place of concealment. They are turtle doves, with their delicately toned and varied plumage, that have dashed in from the corn-fields. There they sit; they spread out their beautiful tails, and softly coo-coo-coo! to each other. Three of them there are; they drop down to bathe and to drink. Then they are up in the trees again, trimming their plumage before flying off to the fields once more.

A very slight rustling attracts our attention next; we are not left long in suspense as to its origin; for, from some cover near at hand, out steps a pheasant into the bright green-tinted sunlight which flashes here and there on the edge of the pool. There he stands with one foot lifted up nearly to his breast, listening; very cautiously he places it down again and proceeds to the water. His head, neck, and red gold-barred breast flash and glitter in the sunlight. Cautiously he glides to the edge of the pool, drinks as much as he requires, and retires in the same wary manner as he arrived.

And now we hear the chirp and twitter of the finch family and their allies. Here they come; not much caution about them. They are fussy little beings, with their chirps and twitters—they drink, and wash, and dabble to their hearts' content. But suddenly there is a commotion in their midst; they scatter right and left. We can see nothing that ought to disturb them; what have their sharp little eyes or ears given them notice of? All at once the alarm note of the blackbird rings out clear and shrill through the woods, and he dashes across the pool into cover. Presently we hear a sound, and then hop, hop, hop, on the dead leaves; a thrush of this year's brood comes down to drink and wash. He has finished his toilet and sits on a dead twig of the branch in the pool, looking about him. Poor little fellow! the world is new to him, and he is out alone. Something flashes past, and the bird is gone, shrieking in the grasp of the sparrowhawk; for he also visits the quiet pool in the beech-woods.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

TWO BONNETS AND A HAT.

ONE of our recent introductions is the "collapsible bonnet," which has "seven advantages"—so it is claimed by its inventor. It will fold up without injury, can be carried in the pocket or the handbag, does not crush the hair, is a boon to people when travelling, is extremely light and comfortable, will not collapse on the head, but is firm as an ordinary bonnet, and lastly, when folded, it can be used as a fan. From all this it will readily be gathered that the collapsible bonnet is likely to prove a "perfect treasure" to those who live in the suburbs of a town, and like to come in to a friend's to spend the evening, or go to a concert. Armed with this useful affair, they can travel by omnibus if they choose, or walk, and be spared the expense of cab or brougham. The bonnet is made on a framework of wire, which folds up when taken off the head, and can be speedily fastened together by hooks and eyes into a fan. Hats of any shape or size, and small "toques," are also made on the same principle, and can be obtained from the leading drapers in the country and in London.

The newest bonnets seem to grow smaller and smaller, and some that I have lately seen in the Park are really nothing but a bow or a large flower, minus strings or any other fastening to the head, while others consist only of a circlet, showing the hair in the middle. Some very pretty poppy-bonnets will be admired for the autumn season, and they are prettier and better shaded than the bonnets of a somewhat similar kind of last year, as they are varied in their tones from deep poppy to pale pink and white, and the same flowers will represent many shades of colouring. But it is to be hoped that our headgear will increase in size before the cold weather arrives.

It has been most emphatically a floral year, for never were the beauties of the world of flowers so wonderfully copied and so lovingly worn as now, the term "artificial" hardly applying to these artistic copies, any more than we should apply the term to a truthful picture of an out-of-door scene. Many flowers that have hitherto been quite neglected—i.e., the sweet pea, the red and the white clover, honey-suckle, and numbers of the stately and wonderful orchids—are now constantly seen. The fidelity to nature is a little overstrained perhaps when we see a rose bonnet made on a frame of rose stems and branches, not even the thorns being omitted; a very little tulle or areophane may be added, but no ribbons are admitted to mar the general effect of extreme lightness.

The Alsatian-bow bonnet has certainly walked into favour with wonderful quickness, and it can be manufactured with little trouble by a very ignorant hand at millinery, even to the modelling of the ribbon-wire foundation. This can be done out of half a yard of ribbon-wire; about two yards of good ribbon are needed to make the bows, and it should be not less than $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches in width. Plain or striped moiré, or one of the new Oriental ribbons with gold threads, having a handsome arabesque design upon it, are the best to choose for the bow.

While the bonnets have been growing smaller, the hats seem to have grown larger, and certainly the transparent hats deserve a good word, for they are wonderfully becoming to both old and young, and cast a pretty varying hue of light and shade on the face beneath. They are piled up with flowers and all kinds of creeping plants, grasses being in special favour, with oats and clusters of green nuts. The flowers are put down round the brim, and the low crown is covered with a cloud of tulle, black, white, or of some colour to match the costume. The edges of these hats are bound with velvet, and the whole trimming is very simple, and easily applied, even by an inexperienced person.

In our sketch entitled "At the Paris Exhibition," one of the large "picture hats" with a deep frill of black lace round the edge of the brim will be found, a fashion revived from many years ago, when it was very popular in England, and John Leech loved to represent it in the pages of Punch. This figure wears a pretty and simply-made foulard or sateen, with an embroidered trimming, and the lady next her wears a useful black dress of Pekin silk and velvet in stripes. The effect of the front of her hat is odd, but very true to life. Of the two figures to the extreme left, one wears a newly designed mantle, with long ends in front, and peculiar winged-sleeves, while the other has on a bodice made in the French style, with a pointed Swiss sash and ends.

We have worn our comfortable and smart little jackets so long now that we shall not like to part with them. But the "coming jacket" for the winter is said to be much longer; in fact, it nearly reaches to the knee, and looks rather as if modelled on what is still known as the "paletôt" by most people. These new arrivals, however, have a waistcoat to them, so perhaps they will follow the "Directory" style, and be something like a long coat, with big pockets at the sides, and large buttons. Everything appears likely to remain in one of two styles—either "Direcold style revived is seen in "A Knot and Curls," which, however, suits only those with naturally curly hair.

Of course it might be expected that the adoption of such very tiny bonnets would end in a change in the methods of hair-dressing, and in the addition of some of the long-abandoned "frizettes" to make up the amount of tresses required. For the last ten years we have dressed the hair with such simplicity that the art of the hairdresser has been nearly uncalled for, and, in consequence, never have we been so well off for all the delicate portions of the wig-maker's trade, which has arrived at great perfection. Now, the arrangement of the hair necessitates a "frizette," and only those with wonderfully good hair will be able to manage without some additional hair as well. Any clever girl can, however, arrange her own hair after a little study of some arrangement which she fancies, and which she thinks will suit her own particular style and the size and shape of her head and face.

With regard to colours, we have a perfect craze at the present moment for "vieux rose," that lovely old soft hue which is neither pink nor rose-colour, and which proves so charming for most people who have not quite passed their youth. The lately-married Duchess of Portland is said to have been the introducer and populariser of "vieux rose," as she so frequently wears it, and it appeared constantly repeated in her trousseau dresses. In the same way we owed the combinations of pale pink and grey, and of white and yellow, each of them to the good taste of women well known in English society, famous for their taste in dress. The last combination of white and yellow is a charming one for young girls, and nothing seems to suit so well with white as the clear yellow hue of silk or satin trimmings, sashes, or ribbons. Blue, green, and red look flat beside this delicate mixture, which was a revival of the taste of the days of Rubens.

White is more used now than it ever was, and green shows no sign of failing in popularity. There are very many shades of it, and it is only when we look at Nature herself, the most lavish of colourists, that we realise how many shades of this colour there really are to be seen in every field and every hedgerow. The names themselves are a perfect gamut of trees and shrubs, each suggestive at once of a different green—i.e., willow, ivy shoots, hop, pine-tops, lettuce heart, lily-leaf, watercress, melon, and the blue green of pink leaves. Terra-cotta of different shades is extremely popular, and navy blue has returned to favour, and will always be seen.

The bouquet on the bodice is now worn quite low down, just above the waist, and the fancy for long streamers of ribbon leads us to bedeck our parasols, our fans, and our bouquets with long loops of handsome ribbon of colours to match the dress and the object decorated. Roses have been the favourite flower of the whole season, and also yellow poppies. These two flowers will probably last far into the autumn, as the tint of the red rose and the deep handsome yellow of the poppy will consort well with the other hues of the changing season.

Our selected paper pattern for the month is one of the new shirts with starched fronts, which have been so much worn during the season, and which seem to be the latest development of the "Norfolk" and "Garibaldi blouses." They have been used principally for wearing under jacket bodices, but also for wearing without them. They are made in striped shirtings, and in their look resemble a man's coloured cotton shirt as nearly as possible. The pattern consists of eight pieces—viz., two sleeve pieces, cuff, band, collar, yoke, back, and front plastron. The yoke, band, collar, and cuff will of course require cutting double, and the whole must be put together with the neatness and care employed in sewing a man's shirt. About three yards of coloured shirting will be needed. The stitching of the fronts, collar, and cuffs can be performed by the machine. The shirt is finished at the edge by a plain hem, and the side seams are left open about three inches, which gives a spring and fit to the bodice. The front is closed like a shirt with studs, and the collar also; while the band worn just at present is a leather one, to be had of different widths.

The pattern of the summer shirt may be obtained, price 1s., of "The Lady Dressmaker, care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle, polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American bodice instead of stays, new Corday skirt with pleats, new jacket-bodice with waistcoat, princess dress, jacket and waistcoat, "Little Lord Fauntleroy" suit, braided bodice and revers, Directoire jacket with folded front, Empire bodice, men's pyjama, and a mantle without sleeves.

SUMMER SHIRT.

tory" or the "Empire"—but I fancy the former has had its day, and that we shall see the "Empire" gradually advancing from its present place in evening dress to a conspicuous appearance in broad daylight. The shortened waists do not appear to be a drawback to many people, and, by the artistic world, are hailed as being "exactly in the proper place." By this class the long waist of the present day has been denounced as all "in the wrong place;" and the Greek ideal of flowing draperies and no waist is the only thing to be admired in the world of dress and fashion.

"Two Bonnets and a Hat" is a useful sketch, as it gives the method of tying the sleeves with ribbon, while the lady with the hat, in the centre, wears one of the lace collars which are the "newest thing out." The figure on the extreme left has one of the new "Empire" bodices, and her hair is arranged in the long queue resting on the neck, which is now much liked for young girls. Another

AMONG THE WILD FLOWERS.

By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N

PART III.

NO matter at what page I open the rough log of my devious wanderings, I find some allusion or other to our friends and constant companions, the wild flowers. I think they must be a power, and a power for good, in the life of even the roughest and most unkempt of gipsy men and women. Surely one could hardly feel bad, or hardly meditate evil, in the presence of those pure-eyed, bright-petalled wildings of Nature.

In the flower world there is always some pretty surprise awaiting me while on the road, for I meet old floral friends where least expected. Some that I may have left behind me away down on the south coast, and that I do not hope to meet again till my horses' heads are once more turned in that direction, appear, perhaps, in far Northumberland, or across the borders in Scotland itself. Other flowers, again, seem to follow me everywhere, all over England at any rate. Two of these are worth mentioning for their very great beauty, and because they add such a charm to the banks of wet ditches by the wayside, where they grow luxuriantly among the grass and weeds. They are both called loose-strife; one is the yellow, the other the purple; but although alike in a good many of their habits, and in the general shape of the flowers, they differ very much indeed when examined botanically, and while the purple loose-strife belongs to the natural order Lythraceæ, the yellow counts kin with the Primulaceæ. Both are perennial, however, and their roots, if transplanted to the garden and granted plenty of water and a fair degree of shade, thrive well in out-of-the-way corners. Both grow very tall, say three feet or more, standing up in an independent, sturdy way amidst the rank vegetation that surrounds them. The purple loose-strife is found in huge blood red spikelets, that attract the eye at a distance, and compel you to pull up your horses to cull a bunch; or to try at all events, for it is somewhat annoying after you get down to find there is a great gulf in the shape of an ugly wet ditch betwixt you and those nodding crimson glories. The flower stem of the yellow loose-strife is more branched, and the petals are five instead of six. But find them and examine them for yourself. They will reward you.

A very noticeable flower that anyone who knows an English hedgerow must have seen over and over again is the white campion. It is nearly as tall as the loose-strifes, but likes a drier soil—hugs the hedge in fact. It has a large white flower, like a star, with hairy leaves and stems not unlike an overgrown and straggling sweet-william. It is called the Lychnis Vespertina, a pretty name, and indicative of this flower's love for evening-tide; so there is a delightful air of romance about it which ought to recommend itself to us. The perfume, too, is very delightful and given off freely. There is a bladder-campion, the Silene inflata, which is very observable by hedgerows and in copses. It also has starry white blooms, but each flower grows from a round balloon-like shape, by which you will easily distinguish it.

Well, everything beautiful unfortunately is not pleasant, and growing by hedgerows and on grassy banks you cannot have failed to have noticed a bonnie wee pink cranesbill, with a leaf like a geranium; the flower is bigger than the pimpernel, and a trifle larger and more open than the germander speedwell, near whose charming blue it often shows its pink and pretty face. It is the Germanium Robertianum, or herb-Robert. You have collected it, I know, and thought it would look well in a bouquet, then thrown it away, because its odour is vile. You see beauty is not everything in this world.

A far more lovely flower, and one which will not offend you, is the pink campion, or Lychnis diurna. It has the same star-shaped flower, but is red. It grows from a few inches to two feet high, according to the soil. The leaves are in pairs, and of the sweet-william shape. At some little distance the Lychnis diurna may be mistaken for another sweetly pretty flower, which, however, is easily distinguished when you dismount and get close to it. I mean the Lychnis flos-cuculi, the cuckoo-flower or ragged-robin. This is a capital flower for a bouquet, for it blooms long in water, as does the mallow tribe, the foxglove, and many others.

Of course every girl knows the foxglove. I think I am right in believing the wild foxglove grows in woods and copses, or by the wayside, all the way 'twixt Land's End and John o' Groats. When crossing the Grampian range of mountains, I bivouacked for one or two nights at the Dalwhinnie hotel, and found the sideboards of that charming hostelry decorated with huge bouquets of foxgloves.

The foxglove is also called Digitalis purpurea, and dead man's bells, or dead man's fingers. The flower-stalks are from one to five feet high, and I had some in my garden last year ten feet high. From these flower-stalks depend the huge crimson bells. These are big enough for you to put your thumb in. I told a little girl this once, and she went and put her thumb in a bell. Presently the welkin rang with her shrieks. She told me there was a "bee in the naughty bell, and it had sat down on her fum." There is a bee in most of these naughty bells when the sun is shining, but very beautiful is the foxglove growing on banks, hiding in copses, or peeping coyly up through the greenery of bracken or ferns. Sometimes the flowery stem is branched, and then it is probably even more beautiful still.

Talking of bells brings to my mind the harebell or Campanula rotundifolia. It is the—

"Blue-bell of Scotland, the Scottish blue-bell."

It must not be confounded with the thick-stemmed, blue, wild hyacinth, that carpets our copses in spring-time, and loves the shade and moisture. This true blue-bell of Scotland loves the sunshine, cares but little for moisture; and, though found everywhere in Britain, is nowhere so well seen as growing over old stone and turf fences in Caledonia, covering them as with an azure canopy. It grows from a thin wiry stem, so, like the maiden-hair fern, it will not live long after being culled.

Sometimes in England I come across sheets of the lovely creeping bell-flower, the Campanula rapunculoides—not a nice name, is it?—growing on the dry banks of ditches by the wayside, and shady sides of hedges. It is also found in the woods. The bells are large and serrated as to the edges, and hang to the parent stalk. The Canterbury bell of the gardens is one of the same family.

There is also a clustered bell-flower, Campanula glomerata, the flowers of which, although growing along the stalk, look upwards instead of hanging down, and cluster at the top of the stem. Besides these bell-flowers, there is a giant bell-flower, a spreading bell-flower, and an ivy-leaved bell-flower, but you must find these out for yourselves. I but give you the hint.

I mentioned the beautiful rest-harrow in my last paper, but I could not then recall the place where I had seen it in greatest luxuriance. I now remember. It was on a hot and sultry day in July, with a purple heat-haze lying over all the landscape, blurring the distant trees, and almost hiding the hills on the horizon. It was by the side of a broad, rough road, flanked with lofty elms and hedgerows, canopied over with the tender green of the woody nightshade and sheets on sheets of wild roses, and beneath us in the valley, about three miles distant, was the spire of Stratford Church. The rest-harrow grows here all over the broad sward by the wayside, in bushes quite as large as the autumnal flowering furze, but less compact.

One of the most effective of wayside flowers is the bird's-foot trefoil, the Lotus corniculatus, a charming little leguminous flower of bright yellow when open, or if closed its pea-blossom tipped with an orange almost of the depth of scarlet. It is a delicate wee bloom in itself, but grows in broad patches, which, with the white and red clover, and the blue of the germander speedwell, give quite a character to the sward by the roadsides. In many parts of the interior of England the roads go winding in and out through the country, often very narrow in themselves, but measured from hedge to hedge very broad indeed. One may sigh to see so much good grassland actually wasted, but cannot help admiring the very great floral beauty of these lovely swards. Among these wayside or sward flowers the bugle, with its somewhat sombre dark blue labiate flowers on a nettle-like stalk holds its own. This plant is well worthy of more attention than is generally accorded to it. Perhaps country children know it better than grown-up folks, for they pluck out its blossoms to suck the honey therefrom, as they do from a variety of other flowers, including clover and honeysuckle.

Another not uncommon labiate flower is the selfheal or wild prunella; its bloom is a reddish violet, and it grows on poor cold land in fields. The red bartsia should be looked for, if only to compare it with the labiate flowers, such as the bugle. But the bartsia belongs to the scrophulariaceæ family.

To the same family belongs a prettier flower, namely, the lesser red rattle. It grows more on swampy heaths and barren wastes. There is also a yellow rattle.

A more favourite flower of mine is the century, with its bunches of star-like red or bright pink blooms, held erect on branched stalks. The worst of it is that it goes to sleep so early, and if you cull it, off to sleep it goes at once. But it is a most lovable flower for all that.

When I was a very little boy—two or three years ago, or perhaps more—I was waiting for a train with my father one day, when into the coffee-room of the hotel where we were came an American giant. He was eight feet high, and broad in proportion. He sat down on a chair, and the chair collapsed and landed him on the floor. When he got up he took two chairs, and cautiously seated himself thereon, and the two chairs, though they creaked and groaned, were equal to the occasion. I was in a terrible fright, and wondered where Jack the Giant Killer was. I suppose I looked at the man with eyes and mouth very wide open indeed, for he addressed me, "Well, little lad," he said, "did you ever see the like of me growing among corn?"

But there are far more interesting things growing among corn than American giants, especially perhaps among oats, if the ground is clean and clear. Here you find no end of charming scabiouses, which I shall mention in my next and concluding paper. You find the bonnie wee pimpernel; the corn mint, Mentha arvensis, with its whorls of lilac blossoms and sweet delicious scent; and many pretty labiate flowers besides. You find, too, the wee purple lilac bellflower, and a kind of forget-me-not called scorpion grass (Myosotis arvensis). It is very small, and its little flowers are in clusters, but of so bright and pretty a blue that it is impossible to pass it by. You find the field-marden also, with pinkish flowers, and the corn marigold and sow thistle; the last of more interest to rabbits, but not uninteresting nevertheless. I have already mentioned the corn poppy, which lends so charming an effect to fields of wheat and grain of all kinds. Well, there is a small sort of convolvulus which goes creeping along the ground, or sometimes attempts to scale the giddy heights of a wheat-stalk, and enjoy an uninterrupted glance at the sun. It is called the lesser bindweed, and the flowers are whitish with pink stripes.

But probably the most lovely of all our cornflowers are the bluebottle and corncockle. The former is a tall, upstanding flower on a strong stem, and the blossom itself is flat, star-shaped, and of a bright ultramarine blue. The blue colour is quite equal, I think, to that of the chicory that blooms on the wayside in autumn; it is called the Centaurea cyanus by naturalists.

The corncockle is really more like a garden flower than anything else. One almost wonders to see so sweet a thing with so shapely a bloom, like that of a primula, growing wild among oats or wheat. The colour is a sort of lilac purple, and the long flower-cup leaves project all round it.

Besides those I have named, there are dozens of interesting flowers to be met with in our cornfields and near them, so that one may well spend many a pleasant hour in making a collection.

I must now say a few words about thistles. The thistle is the national flower of Scotland, just as the rose is that of England, but many species of thistles find favour with flower-fanciers, quite apart from nationality of any kind. Some are exquisitely beautiful, while the perfume is very pleasant.

On waste lands by the wayside, and even in fields where the soil is but poor, the Carduus acanthoides is to be found growing in patches. It is a very tall, though small-flowered thistle, with lilac blooms of sweet scent, much beloved by bees, and the birthplace of a lovely butterfly called the painted lady. This thistle is occasionally found of a white colour.

The milk thistle is so called owing to the peculiar white veins that adorn its leaves. It is a huge, great and glorious thistle, with a large red or crimson bloom, and quite an ornament to any garden where space is no object. It will attain to a height of six feet, and the foliage is splendid, both in shape and colour. It is the Carduus marianus.

The Cnicus lanceolatus and the Cnicus palustris are two well-known thistles. The former is called the spear-plumed and the latter the marsh thistle. Both are tall and sturdy; the first has large pinkish-crimson blossoms; the marsh thistle has smaller flowers, but these group together very prettily. The Cnicus lanceolatus is sometimes called the Scotch thistle.

There is a very pretty variety of thistle—the dwarf—which I have found growing in many parts of England, especially in Yorkshire and Sussex. It quite hugs the ground, being all but stalkless. The flower is large and very beautiful. This is probably the real Scottish thistle. It certainly is prickly enough to suggest the motto, Nemo me impune lacessit.

The creeping thistle is not unlike the field thistle. It is one of the farmer's greatest foes. It is of a paler colour than the field Cnicus, the flowers are more in clusters, and the stalks less protected by prickles.

The ordinary knap-weed, with its pretty purple-red blooms, is very like a thistle in shape—a thistle without thorns, it is sometimes called. It is, however, the Centaurea nigra of botanists.

The Cnicus heterophyllus, or melancholy thistle, is, however, really a thistle without thorns. It grows in the north of England. The flowers are very beautiful and showy, and grow from long stalks. It is altogether so different from other thistles that, apart from its beauty, it is well worthy of study. The reader must not be misled by the name. There is nothing melancholy about the thistle itself. On the contrary, it is supposed by many to be a cure for melancholy. A decoction of this thistle is made into wine, and if drank care and trouble take unto themselves wings and fly away. So it is said.

But the most gorgeous of all thistles is the Carduus nutans, or nodding thistle; that is, if you happen to meet with it in perfection. In colour, in perfume, shape, and size it is facile princeps. I have found them in Yorkshire fully two inches in diameter, and I have cleared out very pretty bouquets of garden flowers to make room for them in my caravan.

I had hoped to take wild roses in this part, but the thistles have crowded them out. The chief are the sweet-briar, the field-rose, and the dog-rose, each of which will be duly noticed in my next.

OUR PRIZE COMPETITION IN PAINTING.

EXAMINERS: BIRKET FOSTER AND THE EDITOR.

THE picture entitled "A Morning Gossip," by Birket Foster, has been extensively copied by our readers in competition for prizes, no fewer than three thousand five hundred copies having been forwarded for examination.

Our readers have been enthusiastic in their work, and have enjoyed the task allotted to them of imitating the colours of Mr. Birket Foster's charming picture, which formed the frontispiece to our last December monthly part. This work was made comparatively easy by the issue in our January part of an outline drawing of the subject, thus leaving nothing but the colouring, a vastly important piece of work though for our readers to undertake. We believe and trust that this copying has done our artist friends great good in guiding them to a right appreciation of colour.

The examination was very hard work, and at the outset seemed almost beyond human powers, even to those by this time well used to such examinations, but on the original being carefully studied the comparison of the copies became easy, until after a few weeks' steady labour we were able to select eight of the best, and these were presented to Mr. Foster for further selection, the result of which is now presented.

FIRST PRIZE, TEN GUINEAS.

To be sent in cash.

Mary Jane Cox, Bromyard.

SECOND PRIZE, FIVE GUINEAS.

To be sent in cash.

Frances Lydia Cooke, Cannock.

These were undoubtedly the two best of the whole number, but there was, as well, a great deal of excellent work, and the best of this is entitled to

HONOURABLE MENTION.

Katie Pleydel Young, Southampton.
Elizabeth Metcalf, Scarborough.
Henrietta Haynes, South Hampstead.
Florence Hartwell, Bridgwater.
Ellen Louisa Stansfield, Bedford.
Kate Ransom, Clifton.

Hearty congratulations to these eight clever and industrious girls from the examiners!

Next December and January we hope to issue another picture by Mr. Birket Foster for similar treatment, and we shall be glad to welcome as many competitors as wish to avail themselves of such an opportunity.

They should, however, take note of the following advice:—Remove the plate from the monthly part, and send it flat between cardboard, by book post or parcel post. Do not send a letter with it, with the view of prejudicing the examiners in your favour, as these are never read. Only the work of the prize-winners and those obtaining honourable mention will be returned.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER XII.

HE strains of a German waltz were rising and falling through the music-room and hall of the Abendglüh Hotel. It was evening, and some of the young visitors were diverting themselves by an informal dance. Among them were Evelyn and Algy. Waltzing was one accomplishment the young man possessed in perfection, and although he was rather too short to match Evelyn as a partner, the grace of their motion as they swam together round the room atoned in critical eyes for this disparity. Through the open French windows came the sweet breath of the night air, and the dancers stepped forth ever and anon into the moonlit gardens to wander along the dusky walks and see the faint distant shimmer of the Titlis snows.

"How well these fellows play!" cried Algy, referring to the hired performers on harp, violin, piano. "I could go on for ever. I am enjoying to-night more than any night since I came here. What a pity we don't dance after supper every evening!"

"You would not enjoy it so much if we did," replied Evelyn, sagely.

Just at this moment a waiter looked in at the door over the eddying circle with an expression of bewilderment. He held a note on a salver, and by-and-by made Evelyn aware it was for her.

It contained a few words from Mrs. Allingham West, saying that she would be glad to see Miss Hope that evening for an hour—if she were not otherwise engaged.

"But you are otherwise engaged," cried Algy, "very much engaged. Just send a verbal message to tell her so. I call it very cheeky to suppose you can run off at a moment's notice to dance attendance upon her."

Cheeky! What an adjective to apply to a distinguished authoress! Evelyn shuddered at the profanity, and told her cousin that she must certainly go, and that at once.

Algy was not accustomed to have his enjoyment interfered with, and when he found that his arguments were of no avail, he waxed exceedingly cross.

"Send up your American friend instead," he urged.

"But I want to see her. It is the very greatest honour and privilege. Don't keep me, Algy."

"Well, I do call it too bad; the band won't be here again; and to spoil a fellow's enjoyment like this!"

"My dear Algy, there are plenty of girls for you to dance with. Don't be so absurd!" And Evelyn had flown.

Mrs. West, alone in her lamp-lit sitting-room, received her with dignified kindness.

"I hear that some friends from England are going to join me to-morrow," she explained, "and as this is my last lonely evening I thought we might have a little talk together about your book."

"You are very kind," faltered Evelyn.

Mrs. Allingham West, in her black lace draperies, her pale, intellectual face lit by the soft radiance of the lamp, seemed to the girl more worshipful than ever. "Day-dreams," lying in its white fanciful cover on the table, appeared irrelevant and trivial in her presence. Evelyn would have liked to take it up and hurl it out of the window. But it had to be discussed.

"I have read your poems," said Mrs. West, looking kindly at the flushed downcast face of the young authoress.

"Oh, please don't say anything about them," broke out Evelyn. "I know they are perfectly idiotic."

"How long is it since you came to that conclusion?" asked her hostess, in amusement.

"I don't know exactly. It has all had something to do with it," stammered Evelyn.

"Seeing the beauty of Switzerland and hearing Herr Lichtenstein play has made me feel that nature, and art too, are far beyond my power of expressing them. Our clever American friend didn't like the book either, I could see. And then speaking to you—"

The girl stopped.

"And the review? Had that any influence?"

"I don't know. I think it was too bad to make fun of the poems like that. Oh, how I wish I hadn't published the stupid things!" cried Evelyn, in sudden indignation.

Mrs. West saw that this was no mere mock modesty.

"Well, then, you will not be very angry with me for the advice I am going to give you, which is—publish no more poetry. I will not agree with you as to 'stupid' and 'idiotic' and so forth; but very rare power is required for the poet—a deep insight into nature and the human heart, and a power of musical expression also. Unless these exist together in some measure, there is no true poetry. Do you remember what Carlyle says in his 'Hero Worship'?"

Mrs. West reached down a volume from the shelf, turned to a page, and read—

"It is only when the heart of him is rapt into true passion of melody, and the very tones of him become musical by the greatness, depth, and music of his thoughts that we can give him right to rhyme and sing; that we call him a Poet, and listen to him as the Heroic of Speakers, whose speech is Song."

"But I felt as if I must write poetry," said Evelyn, timidly.

"Yes. I did not say, write no more. All young authors I believe write verse; it is a way of expressing thoughts and vague aspirations to which they can give vent in no other manner. And in its way it is good, for it gives command of language and improves the style. I know I wrote a great deal myself in my teens, but fortunately I could not afford to publish, or I daresay I should have done the same thing as yourself."

This was very comforting to poor Evelyn, who had actually come to feel as if the volume that was once her highest crown of pride were a brand of disgrace, so great had been the change wrought in a few short weeks.

"What do you advise me to do?" she said humbly. "I feel as if life would be dreadfully uninteresting after I get back to London, if I give up writing."

"Oh, do not do that. There are touches here and there, especially in 'The Lark,' which make me think you have some talent. But there is plenty of time before you. What you should do is to study. Study the great masters of style; become familiar with their thoughts and their way of expressing those thoughts. Read the masterpieces of literature, ancient and modern. Study some one subject if you have any bent in one particular direction. Then as to writing,—I believe you would do best in prose. Have you ever tried your hand at a story?"

"Once or twice," said Evelyn, recollecting her sketch of the maid on the Engstlen Alp.

"Well, I began with poetry, but I am not a poet. And if you would like to try prose writing, I can give you a few rules that have been helpful to me. Observe closely all that passes around you, and practise the art of writing an exact, not a vague, description of what you have seen, so as, in few words, to bring a person, place, or incident before a reader's mind. Never write of what you know nothing about. Don't reproduce secondhand imitations of other people's work, but be yourself always, and be yourself at as high a level as you can. Try and write something every day. Don't be discouraged if at first your brain works slowly—ease will come with practice; but—don't write about anything in which you feel no interest.

There are a few homely lines by Matthew Arnold which contain common sense—“What poets feel not, when they make,

A pleasure in creating,
The world in its turn will not take Pleasure in contemplating!”

This, although scarcely expressed in so set and formal a manner, was the pith of Mrs. Allingham West's advice to her young friend.

Evelyn never forgot that interview. She tried to treasure up every word that fell from the authoress's lips, and succeeded in preserving a tolerably clear recollection of the conversation from beginning to end. One idea she gained, that work—hard, continuous, diligent—was a necessity for the profession of writing, as for every other profession. This was rather new to Evelyn, who had had a vague idea that a sudden frenzy came upon an author of genius, that with wildly rolling eyes he or she seized the pen and dashed off in a few hours work that would endure. Evelyn knew that her poems had given her very little labour, save the hunting for rhymes!

But, if the profession were arduous, it was, as Mrs. Allingham West assured her, one that had no ordinary degree of delight in its exercise.

“For, whatever position you may occupy in after-years, you will have this assurance—that you can influence your fellows. Whether young or old, many or few, after all are but secondary considerations. The power of the pen is the magician's wand of modern days, and if it should be yours, never stoop to make any use of it below the best that you can. Keep your ideal high.”

Evelyn scarcely knew how she thanked her friend, nor how she left the room. A kind of delicious despair had taken possession of her; fear that she should never write again, yet a tremulous hope that after all she might realise something of the delightful vision placed before her by the woman who had the power to hold thousands spellbound.

That was Evelyn's last interview at Engelberg with Mrs. Allingham West. A tribe of friends—distinguished people, Colonel This, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. That—arrived at the hotel on the following day, took possession of suites of rooms on the same floor as Mrs. West, and effectually shut out any further intercourse. Evelyn felt a little sadly how far she was socially and intellectually below the gifted woman who had stretched out a beckoning hand from her serene heights to the wandering toiler below. But she lived on her two previous interviews, and built up many plans for the future.

“I shall be sorry to leave Engelberg,” broke out Algy. The two cousins were standing on a bridge over a raging torrent. From distant heights two streams came thundering down through forest, to mingle at this point in foam and whirl and eddying tumult—the Arnitobel, as the cataract was called. The woods were all around.

“So shall I, indeed,” said Evelyn. “I don't think I have ever enjoyed a holiday so much in my life.”

“I'm awfully glad to hear you say that,” replied Algy. The thunder of the waters made it necessary to speak at an unromantically loud pitch of voice, which Algy perceiving, proposed that they should adjourn to a seat on the further bank, a little away from the rush and roar.

“It was too bad to leave me the other night,” he observed. “I didn't enjoy the dancing at all after you went.”

“Then I am sure it was your own fault, for there were plenty of partners for you, better suited to you than I am.” Evelyn was sorry when she had said this, for Algy was sensitive on the point of his height, and flushed up now. Bending down, he flung a stone into the torrent.

“It's all very well to scoff at a fellow because he's not tall——”

“I never had any such idea,” interrupted Evelyn, truthfully.

“But I think we are very well suited to each other in every way.”

“Cousins ought to get on well, and you and I always have been good friends,” replied Evelyn, wondering at this unusually sentimental turn in the conversation.

She was still further astonished when he went on—

“I've been thinking that these two torrents are something like your life and mine.”

“So noisy and turbulent! Oh, I hope not!” cried Evelyn, laughing.

“No, no! I don't mean that; I mean—you see they have flowed in separate channels till they reach this place, and now they flow in one.” Algy's face was crimson with his poetic effort.

“So you have been in Germany, I in England, and now we are going to live in the same house?” asked Evelyn, wonderingly. “What has made you get so very pictorial all at once?”

“I thought you liked poetry and all that kind of thing,” said Algy, ruefully.

There is no knowing what he might have said in explanation if he had not perceived the form of his mother slowly descending the woodland path beyond the stream, assisted by Miss Wentworth and Dottie.

There was one advantage in Evelyn's absorption in her literary efforts. Mr. Austin Hope, in the midst of his vexation at her determination to publish, had admitted “she might do worse”; and her preoccupation had left no room in her brain for the constant dreaming over possible lovers and matchmaking which fills so many girlish heads, to the exclusion of anything else. She regarded Algy only as a brother. Like brother and sister they had been brought up in one home, and she scarcely recognised the fact that he had now arrived at man's estate. He on his part, easily susceptible, had during the last few weeks come to regard Evelyn with altogether different eyes, and every day spent together in the witching haunts of Switzerland had added to his newly-born attachment. It was fortunate for Evelyn's enjoyment of the Arnitobel scenery that he had not further opportunities on this excursion for developing his views. They climbed the hill to the Schwendi Alp, admired the glorious prospect of the sunlit Spannörter peaks, and returned, regretting that one more day was gone, and that their Engelberg stay would soon be past.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

CHRISTINA.—You have acted first and asked for our advice afterwards. You should not have left your situation in a private school before having obtained a better one elsewhere. Make inquiries for any appointment in the Orphan Working School, of the secretary, Mrs. J. Finch, 73, Cheapside, E.C., or in the Orphans' Homes, addressing the secretary, Miss Sharnan, who is honorary superintendent, Austral Street, and 21, West Square, Southwark; at Harner Street, Gravesend, and St. John's Road, Tunbridge Wells. You might find a situation as a junior teacher in one of these homes. We give the addresses, as you suggest employment in an orphanage.

ANXIOUS AND TROUBLED ONE.—You had better apply to the general secretary of the Christian Women's Education Union, Miss C. G. Cavendish, Conference Hall, 143, Clapham Road, S.W. At all events, you might obtain direct information and all necessary directions.

MISS WINDER.—We are happy to oblige you by once again informing inquirers respecting your educational societies that you have ceased to carry them on at your former address, Belle Vue House, Ulverston, Lancashire, or anywhere else.

HARRIET SWAN, and DEVONSHIRE DUMPLING, and DISAPPOINTED.—Kindly read the notice respecting Miss Winder's girls' clubs. Miss Ellman's clubs might suit you as well; address, The Rectory, Berwick, Sussex.

ARABELLA C. WINTER.—Perhaps the Mutual Assistant Drawing Club, Miss C. F. Briggs, hon. sec., Catherington House, Horndean, Hants, might suit you; or, failing that, the “A. B. C.” Drawing Club, Miss Laura Blackall, The Vicarage, Earl's Colne, Essex; D. D. Westmacott, Esq., of 1, Kensington Gate, Hyde Park, W., is, or was, the art critic.

ART.

PUNCH.—We think the thing to help you most is to draw from plaster casts, which you can easily procure. The direction of the paper is quite right.

YOUNG ARTIST.—Your question is not explicit enough; but so far as we understand it we should say that provided copies of pictures be sold as copies only, there is nothing to object to in it. Of course as you do not give particulars, our opinion is not worth much. Some great artists retain a copyright in their pictures, and you would have to find out all these particulars on the spot.

COOKERY.

MARY.—Rhubarb jelly is made in the same way as other jelly, with 1 lb. of sugar to the pound of juice. It would need careful flavouring with lemon or ginger, and as a rule we should think the rhubarb juice should be added to some other dryer fruit, and not made alone into jelly. It will take the taste of anything you mix it with. 2. The only way would be through a fashion paper which advertises exchanges of different articles.

MARIA.—To make “pressed beef” use a brisket, or the thick or thin flank. First, cure it thus—take six pounds of common salt, six ounces of saltpetre, half a pound of moist sugar, some bruised bay leaves, some basil, thyme, marjoram, winter savoury, three cloves of garlic, half an ounce of cloves, and half an ounce of mace and peppercorns. Mix all well together by pounding in a mortar, and rub it well into the beef. The latter should be left in the pickle for twelve days, after which it will be ready for cooking. Roll it up in a cloth, and tie it with twine, well covered, in the shape of a bolster; place it in cold water, and boil very slowly for four or five hours, and then press it between two dishes with a heavy weight upon it. When perfectly cold, remove the cloth, trim and glaze it, and garnish.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PAZIENZA.—The phrase "God save the mark" owes its origin to the days of (military) archery, employed and quoted, perhaps, by Shakespeare in Henry IV. Hotspur tells the King that the messenger was a "popinjay," and talked like a waiting-woman of guns, drums, and wounds (God save the mark!), meaning that he himself had been in the brunt of battle, and it would be sad indeed if his mark were displaced by this court butterfly. This is Dr. Brewer's interpretation, but he adds that the ordinary meaning attached to the phrase is represented by the prayer, "May the scars of my wounds never be effaced!" or, "God save my scars; may they ever be held in remembrance, and remain in evidence."

HINNIE RECUP.—The address of the Medical Aid Society for Necessitous Gentlewomen is 2, East India Avenue, Leadenhall Street, E.C.; secretary, Captain Hamilton. That of the London Medical Mission is 47, Endell Street, St. Giles, W.C.; superintendent, F. A. Spring, Esq.

LITTLE NELL.—There is generally a cure for nettlestings close by the nettles in the dock leaves; and in the time when bees and wasps are about, poppies are abundant too, either in gardens or in the fields. Bruise the poppy leaves, and lay them on the place that has been stung, and you will relieve it of the pain very quickly. But you should first be quite sure that the sting has not been left in the skin, and should you find the little point protruding, it must be removed with a pair of tweezers; bees usually leave their stings in the wound they have made.

BARTON is advised to consult an experienced medical man about the case described. He might recommend some doctor's private family where she could have the educational advantages of his own children, a mother's care, and both mental and bodily supervision. We do not know of any institution—not for idiots nor the insane—that would be suitable for her case. There may be some irritating constitutional disorder not apparent to her family. Possibly incipient disease of the brain or nerves is coming on. Perhaps a home in a doctor's family might be obtained through advertisement.

MAY'S FRIEND (France).—You belong to your father's family, and if he be a gentleman by birth, you are of the same position. But a man may spoil his quarterings for his children (the arms quartered on his escutcheon) by making an alliance with a family which has no legal hereditary right to "bear arms." 2. You had better write direct for the other information you desire to one of our large hospitals. For example, to the secretary of St. Thomas's Hospital, Albert Embankment, Lambeth, London, S.E. We do not enter into such questions.

The habit of remaining too much indoors is a common fault among English women and girls. This pernicious practice in time totally unfits many from taking even a slight constitutional without extreme fatigue. The Queen's practice of daily walking or driving, no matter what the weather may be, is a striking example. In sunshine and storm, in warm weather and cold, the first lady in the land turns out of her beautiful palace and braves the elements with the view of preserving health.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER XIII.

It was the very last day of the Lancasters' stay in Engelberg, and they were spending it, not in any long excursion, but in wandering about the village to which they had all grown attached. In the afternoon Herr Lichtenstein played upon the organ in the church; he had done so several times before, by special permission from the abbot. Evelyn felt a pathetic enjoyment in sitting there, listening to an arrangement of Gounod's Ave Maria. Exquisitely soft and beseeching came the earlier strains, rising to melodious thunder as the passion grew more intense. Through the great building, with its many pictures, its faint smell of incense, surged and rolled the waves of sound, controlled, nevertheless, by the hand of a master, for ere long they began to subside, and finally, in loveliest sighing, sank to rest.

Evelyn would gladly have sat there and listened to his playing for hours, but it might not be, and, with Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie, she wandered forth again, crossed the river, and roamed through the woodland paths.

"I shall always feel sorry I didn't go over the monastery," said Mrs. Lancaster, regretfully regarding the long rows of windows with here and there a monkish form appearing. "Ever since I saw the monks the other day, winding in a long line, for all the world like a black serpent, up the hill, I have felt I would just give anything to see how they live, poor fellows."

"Oh, mother, they wouldn't let you in!" Dottie insisted.

"Why, whatever harm do they suppose I should do them?" argued her mother. But no unknown stranger, man or woman, is allowed to visit the ancient precincts, and Mrs. Lancaster was obliged to be content.

There were many little details to be discussed among the three ladies. Miss Wentworth, who had faithfully kept to her friends all through their stay at Engelberg, was going back to England with them. She intended to remain in London for some months, at least, and without any mauvaise honte had arranged to travel with the Lancaster party. Evelyn had grown to like her; Algy was the only one who objected, but he was powerless. Then they had to decide whether they should go back to town at once, or linger on the sea coast to enjoy the breezes of late September. It was arranged that this should be done, but not at Dover.

"There is a lovely little place, St. Margaret's, near, which I am sure you would like, auntie," suggested Evelyn. And rooms were accordingly to be written for at the hotel. Miss Wentworth would in any case go straight on to London.

Mrs. Allingham West had quitted Engelberg with her party, bidding Evelyn a civil farewell, but not giving her any invitation to come and see her in town. This roused Mrs. Lancaster's deep indignation.

"I do think she might have paid her respects to me, but she passed me the day she said 'good-bye' to you, with never a look," complained the lady, bitterly; "and who was she, I should like to know, before she wrote this book? As poor as a church mouse, I daresay."

"She can't know everybody. It was not meant as any lack of respect to you, auntie, dear," explained Evelyn, uncomfortably aware that Mrs. Lancaster, sitting in the salon after supper in a gorgeous red dress and a face as red in a different tint, would not be hailed by Mrs. Allingham West as a kindred spirit. And the fact is that, beset as she was by troops of friends and admirers of her talent, Mrs. West was obliged in self-defence to be chary in giving invitations which would she knew be rapturously accepted. She had liked Evelyn, but she thought her poems for the most part very commonplace, and she did not feel quite sure enough as to the girl's character and abilities to invite her to continue the friendship. She reflected, with truth, that she could not know in London every sentimental young lady she met on her travels—they were too numerous; so she postponed any further advance to the possibilities of the future, resolving to keep Evelyn's card in some stray corner.

Herr Lichtenstein and his wife were going to stay a few days longer at Engelberg. That night Algy walked to and fro for an hour along the terrace path behind the hotel with his two Leipsic friends, pouring forth to them his anxieties and hopes, which, indeed, they had hardly failed to guess.

"Already! Why, my young friend, I thought you told us you were hopelessly attached to a German maiden in Heidelberg," observed Herr Lichtenstein, rather sardonically. "The fair Elspeth with the flaxen plaits—what of her?"

"Oh, that was nothing," said Algy, rather in confusion.

"Nothing! Why, when you arrived at Leipsic you told us——"

"Never mind, Max," broke in Esther, good-naturedly.

"It is a good thing he did not bring matters to a crisis with Fräulein Elspeth, or there would be somebody who would mind," declared the professor. But he was very good-natured on the whole, and listened to Algy's fervent assertions with much paternal benevolence.

"Faint heart never won fair lady," he quoted, "and you had better not delay too long if you wish to win your cousin."

But when Algy had gone into the hotel, and the lover-like husband and wife were lingering beneath the moon, Herr Lichtenstein asked Esther if she thought there were much hope for Algy, and with emphasis she answered—

"None whatever. My only comfort about the boy is that he will soon forget."

"The home life will be strained for her," mused the professor, pitifully.

But neither he nor his wife could make the path of others so smooth and sunny as their own.

Early the next morning there was the usual group round the hotel door that attended on departures, and the last farewells were said. Oh, these farewells in Switzerland! how sadly they fall! They mean the breaking up of a charmed circle of friends and of associations that one can never form again in the same way; they mean the translation into memory of a present that is sometimes almost too bright for reality. But the final good-bye was uttered, and the carriage drove away, along Pferd-Himmel and down, down through the forests, till the mountain land was left behind, and the station at Lucerne was reached in the hot, bustling afternoon.

The journey was uneventful, and it seemed to Evelyn a startlingly short time before they were established at St. Margaret's. This Algy termed "being let down gently" before they returned to London for the late autumn and the winter. In sooth the upland downs and abrupt cliffs of that charming spot, with the wide expanse of sea, were in one way a pleasant contrast to the inland beauties of Engelberg. Evelyn was glad to have the time of quiet to muse over her delightful and eventful visit to Switzerland. How much had happened since she sailed across that blue expanse to the coasts which stood out so clearly across the Channel! She had learnt wisdom, and was scarcely sadder for the learning, for she had Hope as her companion. When she was back in her charming study at The Elms, she would begin to act on Mrs. Allingham West's advice—to read diligently, to practise her pen, to set herself in real earnest to do something worth the doing. As for "Day-dreams," she hated the very name of the book. Her poems appeared to her fatuous and foolish with scarcely one exception, for there is nothing akin to the scorn and distaste with which an enlightened young author regards work he has outgrown.

Pleasant visions were these all, but they were scarcely destined to fulfilment. For on the day after their arrival at St. Margaret's Algy sought an explanation with Evelyn. The two were sitting on some rocks at the base of the cliffs, Evelyn idly watching the slow advance of the sea, when Algy suddenly broke forth, and told her he was living on the hope that before very long they two should be husband and wife.

"It is all settled with my mother and Dottie," he eagerly insisted, while Evelyn sat petrified into an image of dismay. "You know The Elms is mine after mother's death, and she proposes that we should establish ourselves there at once. The house is large enough for us all, and we could easily have part of it allotted to us and shut off from the rest, that is, if you didn't object; but you have always been like mother's own daughter, and she is so good-tempered—so is Dot—I think we should have an awfully jolly time of it. Then there's no reason to wait; I am only going to the Bar for the look of the thing; mother will make it easy for me to marry, so it might be before Christmas. Why don't you speak, Evelyn?"

As soon as Evelyn could recover from the shock of this startling proposal, she assured Algy that it was altogether out of the question.

"We are first cousins, and I never thought of anything of the kind as possible."

"Cousins do marry, very often," urged Algy. And he entreated and protested, growing almost angry at Evelyn's persistent refusal; for never in his life had he failed to get what he wanted.

"It is some nonsense about your devoting your life to literature, I suppose, and that kind of thing, but you'll get over that, Evelyn. It wouldn't be fair to let you think I should allow my wife to publish, for I shouldn't," asserted Algy, candidly. "But I should imagine that review has rather altered your ideas. You ought not to be knocked about in the world. I'll take care of you when we are married; no impertinent scoundrel of a penny-a-liner shall say a word to vex you. You will be far happier sheltered as my wife than running the risks of public life in any shape."

"You are very, very good, Algy, but it can never be," declared Evelyn, with decision. "Pray do put it altogether out of your head, and let us be like brother and sister as we used to."

It is needless to add that this suggestion failed entirely, as indeed it invariably does fail in similar cases. Evelyn's heart sank lower and lower as the full position made itself gradually plain to her. She was dreadfully sorry for Algy, and what would become of her? for Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie, she knew, would both be on his side. But she kept her ground, in spite of her distress and his persistence.

"What can be the matter with Algy?" exclaimed Dottie, as they were sitting on the downs in the afternoon. "There he is—not reading a line, but staring over the sea quite moodily. He hasn't spoken two words since luncheon. Has anything happened to vex him, I wonder?"

Evelyn reflected whether she should speak out; it was misery to her, but she felt it was best to get it over. Mrs. Lancaster was just out of hearing, leaning against a little bank, and nodding drowsily under her parasol in the afternoon sun.

"I am afraid I am the cause, Dottie."

"You!" cried Dottie, perusing her cousin's face. "Oh, Evelyn! has he spoken to you?"

Poor Evelyn nodded, and added with difficulty, "It can't ever be, Dottie. I am very, very sorry."

Dottie threw up her hands and burst into tears.

"What can I say? What can I do?" cried Evelyn, stricken to the heart. Her tone unfortunately reached Mrs. Lancaster, who, starting up to show she had not been dozing, came with slow, panting steps to the two girls.

"Crying, Dottie? Why, what's wrong, my dear?"

"Evelyn has refused Algy," wailed Dottie, too miserable to think of tact or concealment. "Oh, what shall we do?"

"Refused our Algy!" cried the mother, when the idea had penetrated her somewhat lethargic brain. "Nonsense, my dear; you don't know what you are talking about."

This was all much worse than anything Evelyn had imagined; and yet she might have expected it, for Algy was the very apple of his mother's eye, the idol of his sister. In many a cosy talk together during the last few weeks the two women had planned how the home should be made comfortable and beautiful for Algy and his bride. No expectation of Evelyn's refusal had ever entered into either of their heads; for was she not very fond of him? and what woman to whom Algernon Lancaster should throw his handkerchief would fail to pick it up?

But Dottie wept on, and Evelyn sat mute and tearless.

"If what you say is true," said Mrs. Lancaster, at last, turning redder than ever in the excitement, "Evelyn is a very unkind and ungrateful girl; but I don't believe it; there is some mistake. It couldn't be; why, they have always been so fond of one another!"

"Yes, and that is one reason," cried poor Evelyn. "He never thought of it—no more did I—till within the last six weeks. Why cannot we go back to what used to be? We were just like brother and sister!"

"I used to think of it," retorted Mrs. Lancaster; "but I didn't see that Algy's fancy went that way, so, as we can't control these things, I said nothing about it. But now that his heart is set on it, poor, dear lad—to think that my sister's own child should be the one to disappoint us all!"

The subject of these agitating remarks caught the sound of his mother's last words, uttered under considerable excitement and in a heightened tone. He rose and strolled up to them. Evelyn thought he looked smaller than ever in his dejection, and felt intensely sorry for him.

"Don't trouble your heads about me," he said, easily guessing the purport of the conversation from the condition of all three women; "I shall take the evening train up to town. I shall go to an hotel."

"Oh, Algy, darling! if you must go, they will have everything ready so nicely for you at The Elms. I will telegraph to Mrs. Grainger."

"I don't want to go to The Elms. I don't suppose I shall go back there," retorted Algy, careless of the unspeakable dismay this suggestion caused to his mother. He turned on his heel and walked away.

"Poor, dear boy!" cried Mrs. Lancaster, bursting into tears. "See what you have done, Evelyn! You have broken up our home!"

CRYING FOR THE MOON.

A WORD TO OUR GIRLS.

By A MIDDLE-AGED WOMAN.

ANY grown-up people," says Fredrika Bremer, the popular Swedish novelist, "resemble the child who wept because it could not have the moon." I do not know that girls are worse offenders in this respect than other people—probably not; but it has often occurred to me that the happiness of life would be greatly increased, and that sort of dull dissatisfaction—shall we say discontent?—which hangs like a cloud over the lives of many young people, might be considerably lessened if only they would leave off "crying for the moon." A system of compensation enters very largely into the providential ordering of human affairs. Anyone who casts an observing eye around must notice that the poorest, and apparently most unhappily situated, have always some redeeming feature in their lot; while the most prosperous have some drawback, some speck upon their "wide heaven of blue," which, if small in others' eyes, often blots out all the sunshine for them. Even the few people who have absolutely no troubles as far as their friends can see, generally possess a marvellous faculty for inventing them, for their own express benefit. A fog, a wet day, a failure in matching a ribbon, an unbecoming bonnet, or an ill-cooked dinner is enough to depress their spirits for at least four-and-twenty hours. On the other hand, we may see a lonely man or woman struggling with poverty, weakness, or advancing age, with apparently nothing to cheer and everything to sadden, endowed with a buoyant spirit (truly the "merry heart" which "doeth good like a medicine"), and manifestly enjoying life in spite of all its sorrows. I am not now referring to the spiritual joy and peace which our Lord and Saviour bestows upon those of His children who walk closely with Him, and thus are enabled to rise above the trials of their earthly life, but to a certain natural disposition which looks always on the bright side of things, and manages to extract amusement out of the gloomiest predicaments. No doubt, on the whole, this system of compensation, as I have called it for want of a better term, lightens the load of life amazingly to travellers on earth's pathways, but on the other hand it excludes the hope of perfect satisfaction or happiness in any lot. This idea youth is slow to grasp. A girl has a notion that she has a right to be happy, provided she is not doing wrong, and too often she expects to find bliss rather in her surroundings and circumstances than in herself. She has no idea of saying or feeling—

"My mind to me a kingdom is."

She wants a much wider realm. If she is disappointed in one scheme or person, she looks out for another, and no matter how often she finds flaws in her eagerly-pursued pleasures, she begins her search again in some other direction.

If girls would make up their minds to the fact that they cannot have everything, and decide what they wish for most, allowing for the necessary unpleasantnesses and deficiencies which must attend their choice, remembering that were these smoothed away the advantages they prize must inevitably vanish with them, there would be more gaiety and less grumbling in many a home. A few examples will make my meaning clear.

A young woman I once knew lived in London. She was passionately fond of scenery, of flowers, of sunsets and moonlight, autumn tints and spring perfumes. It was a positive delight to her to wander alone through lanes bordered with hedges covered with pink and white may, or wild roses and honeysuckle. She loved to sit for hours in a primrose-carpeted wood, dreamily gazing up through the gently-swaying branches to the far-away blue sky, or watching the flickering sunlight and shifting shadows on the turf at her feet. She felt "a joy akin to rapture" when she stood on the summit of some English hill or Swiss mountain, and let her eyes wander untiringly over the wonderful panorama spread before her. She seemed to realise something of the glories of immortality and eternity, petty everyday annoyances sank into insignificance. She felt poetry if she could not give it utterance. Yet the major part of her existence was passed in a London square, with bricks and mortar all around. Street cries and the rumble of cabs and omnibuses were familiar to her ear, in place of the song of the birds in spring, the mysterious delicious hum of insects in the summer air, and the solemn, almost awe-inspiring silence of the woods and fields in winter.

Very often did this girl pity herself for being condemned to the smoke and noise and ugliness of London life, and vaguely envy the happy dweller amidst rural scenes and sounds. Suddenly one day a friend asked her, "Would you really like to go away from London and live in the country?" And when she seriously considered the question for the first time in her life, she found that to leave all her relations, her friends, the London libraries, and London conveniences generally, to face the sameness and solitude and wintry severity of a country life, was much more than she felt disposed to do. She had been crying for the moon, in fact; she wanted the poetry and sweetness of the country, as well as the stir and variety and mental advantages of the town.

It is not uncommon for a reserved person who rarely reposes confidence in others, and carefully shuts up all her best and most precious feelings in her own bosom, who takes the greatest pains to conceal her grief and joy alike from outsiders, contriving to appear merry when her heart aches, and assuming careless indifference when it bounds within her, or who masks all her emotions alike by a well-bred, graceful calm, to complain of want of sympathy in her friends. She feels lonely, no one seems to care very much for her, or to enter into her inner life. Of course not! How can they? What opportunity does she give them? How can they tell that her head aches, that she has had a bad night, or received a letter with sad news, or that a hope cherished for years has just crumbled into ruins, or that some dreaded future trial has grown to-day appreciably nearer? Her manner is just the same as usual, or perhaps a little irritable, or cynical, or provoking. No doubt a discriminating judge of character, a lover, or a mother might discover that something was wrong, but the majority of our friends are not discriminating judges of character, and, it is needless to add, are neither our lovers nor our mothers. Frank, open natures, who tell everybody everything, shed torrents of tears on any melancholy occasion, and are never ashamed of showing red eyes, or of betraying their delight when anything pleasant occurs to them, meet with plenty of sympathy. It is hard sometimes for a quiet, self-contained person to witness the affection and compassion poured out upon some frivolous creature who neither understands nor values them, whose tears are dried as soon as shed, and whose deepest griefs are forgotten within a fortnight, while she herself may break her heart in secret and silence, and no one will ever know or care. Whose fault is it? How can people care for what they know nothing about? And how are they to know if you take every precaution to hide it from them? Tell your troubles to others, show your suffering, and you will have kindness and sympathy in abundance. But that is just what the reserved and proud nature cannot do. The deeper the hurt the more carefully it is hidden. Like the wounded animal who seeks solitude to die, the stricken heart shrinks into itself. To expose its grief seems profanation, the tenderest touch gives pain, till time has healed the surface. Persons of this kind would not wear their heart upon their sleeve even if they could; they pride themselves upon their reticence as the mark of a superior nature. Be it so, we do not say it is not, but in that case they must be content to be often misunderstood, and to bear the lifelong loneliness which such a disposition inevitably entails. In short, they must not "cry for the moon."

Girls should cultivate a habit of looking on all sides when they have a choice to make, in the all-important matter of marriage especially. In these days, I believe, it is by no means uncommon for an intelligent young woman to make up her mind that single life is preferable to the suffering, care, and limitation of liberty necessarily imposed by the marriage vow. While she is young and bright, especially if she has a comfortable home and resources in herself, she sees no reason to regret her decision. She compares her leisure, health, and freedom from anxiety with her married sister's chequered career, and rejoices in her own superior advantages. But years roll on, death thins the ranks of her relatives, her dearest friends drop away, or, immersed in their own home interests, leave her, quite unintentionally, out in the cold. She grows plainer and more uninteresting to mere acquaintances. She finds she is less in request than formerly at festive gatherings, her circle contracts just when she begins to feel the need for its expansion. Her married friends all have a position in the world of their own, no one troubles about their advancing age and loss of youthful sprightliness; but she seems somehow outside of everything.

She looks forward to an old age of loneliness and ever-increasing gloom, and bitterly regrets that she "missed her chance" in youth.

But she forgets that while her sister was slaving in the kitchen because the cook had to be dismissed at a moment's warning, or was kept awake night after night by a fractious baby, or obliged to sacrifice all her own little fancies and pleasures to gratify an overbearing husband, she was free as air, always able to visit or travel, practise or read, walk or drive, as the whim took her, or occasion offered. Her eye was not dimmed prematurely by watching, or her health undermined by the duties of a wife and mother. She never wished to change with her sister then.

It is impossible to enjoy a husband's protection without performing a wife's duty; the love of children must be earned by a mother's devotion. The position and dignity accorded to the matron in society can only be secured by the sacrifice of maiden privileges. Many a lonely young wife in her new establishment finds the long day dreary in her husband's absence, and pines for her father's cheerful home. Worse still, she is perhaps disappointed in the man she has chosen; she compares his selfish absorption in his own affairs with her mother's thoughtful watch over her health and tender interest in all her hopes and fears. Later on she is sometimes tempted to feel as though the pleasures of youth, of intellect, and culture were all slipping past her, as she remains anchored in her nursery or school-room. She gets a letter from her sister at Rome or Naples, and sighs a little sadly as she reflects how improbable it is that she shall ever see the Coliseum, or bend over the blue depths of the far-famed bay. When she urges her husband to accept the invitation to Norway or "the moors," she conceals from him the keen little pain she feels as she sits down to refuse her mother's pressing request to "come home" for a fortnight, or her old schoolfellow's urgent entreaty to visit her in her new house, "because they cannot both be away"; and "Fred's excursion must cost so much," she reflects. Yet she would be inconsolable if "Fred" passed out of her life, and she knows well that she would not part with one of the little curly heads around the nursery table for all the Continental trips in the world. Both matron and maid are tempted to "cry for the moon."

Husbands and wives are too often given to the same practice on other grounds. For instance, a middle-aged man, with all his habits and crotchets firmly rooted and grown into second nature, marries a lively, frivolous girl about half his age. He discovers before long that their tastes differ in almost every particular. He prefers quiet, she likes a cheerful bustle; he enjoys long tête-à-tête evenings, she wants society; he clings to a hundred little eccentric ways which have crept into his life in chambers, she desires above all things to be like other people; he is old-fashioned by choice and intention, she always aspires to know and to possess "the last new thing." The husband feels that unless he is to become a selfish tyrant and spoil his wife's life, he must in many respects remodel his own. If he is just and loves the girl, he does it more or less cheerfully, but still he has a sore feeling, as if somehow things ought not to have turned out so. He wants his life brightened by the pretty, gay young bride, but at the same time desires to retain his bachelor independence.

On the other hand, a graceful, ladylike girl, well-born and well-bred, but portionless, timidly dreading to face the world, and fearful of becoming an "old maid," marries a man her inferior in everything but fortune. She is sentimental, he is a busy City man, with his mind, if not his affections, centred in the Stock Exchange. She wants him to read Tennyson to her, he feels it hard that she minds his taking a nap after dinner. She groans over the fate which compels her to endure his brother's vulgar jokes and still more vulgar compliments, and the tedious talk about the price of butter and the inefficiency of cooks, which her sister-in-law dignifies by the title of conversation. He thinks it vexatious that his wife should "give herself airs" with his family. She mourns over his want of polish, and the absence of the little courtesies that a husband in her own rank of life would have paid her. He, poor man, thinks her unreasonable if still dissatisfied, when she has a fine house in Belgravia, a seat that a nobleman might be proud of in the country, and carte blanche to lavish what she likes on servants, equipage, and dress.

Again, a man of refined taste and good position makes a mésalliance. He marries a girl of low birth, vulgar manners, and uncultured mind. When the glamour which his passion threw over her passes away, he sees her deficiencies almost as plainly as his friends saw them all the time, and whenever she mortifies him by a breach of the unwritten laws of society, feels wronged and unkindly used. The fault is his own more than hers; he knew perfectly well, or might have known, that she must be ignorant of almost everything that to women in his rank of life would come as a matter of course. He could not be content without bringing her individual fascination and beauty into his life, and he has no right to complain because with it he has to take her folly and vulgarity. The girl, on her part, feels it is cruel that when she is honestly doing her best, her husband still finds fault with her for what appears to her no reason at all, and is disposed to forget what she owes to the man who has raised her from want and obscurity. Both these couples are to be pitied, for both are "crying for the moon," which assuredly they will never succeed in obtaining.

It would be an advantage to many young people, girls more especially, to get firmly fixed in their minds the conviction that the importance of a busy life cannot be combined with the ease of an indolent one, except in very rare and exceptional circumstances. In the nineteenth century, ripe fruit does not drop into one's mouth unsought. Nevertheless, young women who avoid responsibility, shun work, and are loath to take any extra trouble, or exert themselves unnecessarily on any occasion; who faint or go into hysterics at any painful or alarming crisis, and make it their object to slip through life as comfortably and easily as possible, often feel aggrieved that their sister or friend is a power in the family, a personage in the parish, and meets everywhere with more consideration and respect than themselves. What wonder! If the mother is ill or absent, one daughter is able and willing to take the reins; she can manage the servants, order the dinner, superintend the marketing, and keep the accounts so well that even her elders admire her capacity. The other will do her best, if necessary, but is always thankful to be left to her own pursuits, and relinquish the task to her abler sister. In the parish it is the same—the one is always ready at an emergency; she can take the organ when the organist breaks down, get up a concert or parish tea, act as local secretary for the C. M. S., or superintend the Sunday-school, if desired. It is hard to say what she cannot do at a push. She is not too self-conscious or shy to pray by a sick woman's bedside; she wins the heart of the toddling darlings who are afraid of other strangers. She can always give the Rector the parochial information he wants at the district meeting, and nobody is a better hand at a school-treat. The other has her own district and her own class, but would not for the world undertake a single duty beyond, and has secret fears that she by no means comes up to the mark in her management of them. Of course the first fills a larger place in the local estimation.

Among her friends one girl will be always available, sparkling in conversation, ready at playing accompaniments, well versed in the latest news and fashions, and quick to catch and impart a new sort of table decoration or amusing game. Blessed with an excellent memory for facts and faces, she never fails to recognise an acquaintance, inquire after a cold, or execute a commission. Her taste and adroitness are at the service of the first of her friends who tries to secure them. She always seems fresh and cheerful, and if tired or disappointed, successfully hides all appearance of it.

Her sister, on the contrary, though pleasant enough in her way, can neither sing nor play, never will execute a commission if she can possibly avoid it, has a wretched memory, is soon tired, and shows it plainly in her face and manner. If she takes a fancy to anyone, she will exert herself to please; but otherwise she does not care to take the trouble to be anything more than ordinarily polite. She seldom notices improvements or novelties, and if she did would certainly not think it worth her while to use labour and time in reproducing them. It is no use to seek news from her; she smilingly confesses "she knows nothing about her neighbours," and rather prides herself on not being a gossip. She finds her own affairs quite troublesome enough, without burdening herself with other people's. Is it very surprising that one sister is more in request than the other, and takes the first place in their social circle? The second girl does not like it; she wishes to keep her tranquil leisure, and remain in her chosen groove, but at the same time share the popularity and distinction of the energetic and hardworked sister. She cries quietly, but persistently, for the moon.

In beginning life it is well to find out what can be done in our circumstances, and what cannot. If a girl with a small dress allowance sets her heart on perfectly-fitting gowns and Parisian hats, she is hoping for impossibilities, unless, indeed, she is clever enough to make the gowns and copy the hats herself.

A young couple who have barely enough to make both ends meet in the rank of life in which their lot is cast, cannot give stylish dinner parties with champagne and ices, or indulge in expensive continental tours, though they may have been in the habit of taking such things as matters of course before they married. Young women of delicate health or weak constitution cannot with impunity venture on long walking expeditions which their stronger friends find invigorating and delightful. Neither can they devote themselves to tennis or skating with the ardour and perseverance necessary perhaps to win distinction in their set. Many a foolish girl runs all risks, disregards all warnings, and refuses even to listen to the promptings of her own secret inclinations, for fear of finding herself stranded and left behind in the rush of life around her. Her young friends may praise her "spirit" and "pluck," but she will heartily regret her imprudence in after years; if, indeed, she does not bury all her hopes and schemes in a premature grave.

It is useless to expect to find opposite qualities in the same person. Some girls, though far enough from perfection themselves, seem to imagine that every acquaintance ought to be an embodiment of every conceivable virtue and attraction. The polished dilettanti gentleman who never has anything to do but to make himself agreeable and "kill time" may be a very suitable person to criticise a dado, guide a party through an art exhibition, or make a social entertainment go off brilliantly, but you have no right to be disappointed if you find him a broken reed when you lean on him in some grave and all-important crisis. On the other hand, you must not be annoyed if the hardworked man, whose brain has been taxed all day in the law courts or the city, the study or the parish, fails to take a very lively interest in your high art needlework, your local news, or your little social plans or triumphs. He will do his best if he wishes to please, but he is not improbably a far less amusing companion than the one whose chief interests in daily life are as trivial as your own. Let, however, some great trial overshadow you, some perplexing difficulty require solution, on the outcome of which your whole future may depend, and you may find in the worker who was deficient in small talk, and made no mark in society, a friend and counsellor of inestimable value.

In conclusion, let me warn you against a common and crying evil of the present day. Do not try to combine the service of God and Mammon. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." If you desire to experience the joy of that peace "which passeth all understanding," you must not select for your friends and intimate associates those who hinder rather than help you to walk with God, however well chosen they may be with a view to social success. If you want strength to resist temptation, and wisdom to "walk circumspectly" amidst the snares of the evil one, you must find time for prayer, even though to secure it you have to sacrifice pleasant society, opportunities of improving your mind, or what you deem needful rest. You must not do what you conscientiously believe to be wrong in little things, to please those you love best, or those with whom you most desire to stand well, on the plea that "better people than you do it, and it makes life so much smoother and easier not to fuss about trifles." In a word, you must strive to "seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," at all times and in all places. I do not promise that you will never suffer earthly loss in consequence of your choice. The reverend Archbishop Sumner used to say, "A religion that costs nothing is worth nothing," but "the fashion of this world passeth away," and a day will surely come to each one of us when earth's best treasures will appear, viewed in the light of eternity, as dust in the balance compared with the unclouded faith and joyful hope which will bear us safely through the grave and gate of death, and make us "partakers of everlasting glory in the life to come."

GOOD HUMOUR.

"—pleasantry will oft cut through Hard knots that gravity could scarce undo."
Horace.

THE WEIGHT OF THE GOOSE.

If a goose weighs ten pounds, and half its own weight, what is the weight of the goose?

Many are tempted to reply on the instant fifteen pounds, but the correct answer is, of course, twenty pounds.

THE RIGHT WORD IN THE RIGHT PLACE.

We hear of some barometers being set higher than others, so that while one may be pointing at "rain," another is at "much rain." So in different families we find language pitched in a higher key than others. Exaggeration runs in families.

I know of one circle where everybody talks about and describes things in a style most painful in its want of a sense of proportion. "Hateful," "shameful," "disgusting," "horrid," "never," "ever," are words which recur with distressing frequency about events which in a household where the graces of speech were cultivated would be described as "unpleasant," "regrettable," "distasteful," "hardly," or "scarcely." In fact, the meaning is the same in both instances, only the barometer is set in the one case higher than in the other.

How much may depend on the right word being spoken at the right time, in the proper tone, by the proper person! War or peace, life or death, heaven or hell, may hang upon a single word. "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets of silver."—Spurgeon.

CHANGED TIMES.

An old farmer, who lived on the borders of Hampshire, once observed when talking about the corruption and degeneracy of the times, that it was the fine words and the flattery of men to the farmers' wives that had done all the mischief.

"For," said he, "when it was dame and porridge 'twas real good times; when 'twas mistress and broth 'twas worse a good deal; but when it came to be ma'am and soup 'twas very bad."

HOW THE CAT RANG FOR DINNER.

In a monastery in France a cat was kept that never used to receive any victuals till the bell rang to announce to the monks the hour of meals. She never failed then to be wifin hearing.

One day, however, she happened to be shut up in a solitary apartment, and the bell rang in vain so far as regarded her. Some hours afterwards she was liberated from her confinement, and ran half famished to the place where a plate of victuals used generally to be set for her, but she found none this time. In the afternoon the bell was heard ringing at an unusual hour, and when the people of the monastery came to see what was the matter, there they found the cat hanging upon the bell-rope and setting it in motion as well as she could in order that she might have her dinner served up to her.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XVIII.

KITTY DACRE'S RIDE WITH THE QUEEN TO ABINGDON, TO DO HONOUR TO A ROYAL FUGITIVE.

HEN Kitty told her friends of her visitor and his news, Lady Ottery and Mrs. Judy were both greatly exercised by the danger which John Dacre had narrowly escaped, and were full of gratitude for his deliverance. But his father only said morosely that his son had no call to be in such a position. Anthony Walton might well succour the misguided lad, since he was at the bottom of his cousin's going astray. For himself he was glad that he had been spared the sight of his nephew, since he might not have been able to refrain from speaking his mind; and considering everything, their relationship by marriage, and the facts that the fellow conceived he had done him, Peter Dacre, a service, and that Anthony Walton had stolen like a thief into the town at his own proper peril on a gratuitous errand to his kindred, it would have been awkward if one of them had been tempted to break out and hand over the rascal to the authorities.

This from the mild scholar. Kitty could not have had a more convincing proof of how demoralising mentally and morally, how fatal to all higher instincts of fairness and generosity, was the embittered strife of a civil war.

The next event was the Queen's quitting Oxford. She who had come less than a year before in such triumphant exultation, because of what her wit, courage, and enterprise had effected for the Royalist cause, was departing in dread and despair. Clarendon's testimony with regard to her was that she was ever "more forward than stout" (enduring). Henrietta Maria was not made of the stuff of which her countrywoman, Charlotte de la Tremoille, was composed. The whole antecedents and traditions of the last differed as widely as the poles are sundered from the early associations of Henrietta Maria. Charlotte de la Tremoille was the daughter of a noble and faithful Huguenot and of a princess of the heroic house of Orange. She was brought up in comparative simplicity and hardiness, and was familiar from her earliest childhood with tales of pains and penalties unshrinkingly borne, and of never-ending defiance to the powers which had supported Alva and the Inquisition. The Queen was the daughter of Henri Quatre indeed, but Henri Quatre had renounced Protestantism in order to reign over the French people, while her mother was Marie de Medici, whose law was the indulgence of her fancy and her will, and her highest aim, after the retention of power in her own vain and foolish person, the propagation of that form of Christianity which had consented to the massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Henrietta Maria's fits of daring, as when she stayed the clamour of her ladies in the storm at sea, by the confident assurance that Queens of England were never drowned, or on a later occasion when she bid her captain blow up his ship and all it contained sooner than let her fall into the hands of the Parliamentary admiral—were, so far as we can judge, as short-lived as they were high-strung. They savoured of the love of creating a sensation, and had the strong dash of what was stagey and theatrical, which formed part of her amiable, excitable, shallowly clever character. Perhaps, poor soul, she cheated herself by them, as well as cheated those who were still her dazzled and attached followers, into believing that she was, indeed, heroic. Henrietta Maria had, in common with her mother, a well-nigh frantic dread of the outbreaks of the very people she strove to coerce in angry mobs and full-blown insurrections. She knew the Parliament had found her guilty of high treason, in bringing money and ammunition from the Low Countries to fill the King's privy purse, and furnish his army with the weapons of war. As the horizon again darkened over the royal couple, the fear lest she should fall into the hands of her enemies, and their sentence be put into execution, began to haunt her like a mania. Oxford was inland and was invested by two armies, though so well surrounded by its rivers and its fortifications as to baffle its besiegers. The Queen wished to flee while the course was still open, to reach at least some town near the coast, where in case of hot pursuit she might take ship, and find a refuge in her native France. The unfortunate King would fain have kept her with him, but she pressed him day and night to consent to her departure. In place of the old lively, audacious consort, the moving spirit of every gallant gay device to pass the time, who scorned all compromise and forbade Charles on the pain of her contempt to treat with the rebels, here was a worn, faded, peevish woman, without heart or hope, full of passionate murmurs and dreary forebodings.

Where was the Queen of Davenant's verse, not many moons old?—

"Fair as unshaded light, or as the day

Of the first year, when every month was May;

Sweet as the altar's smoke, or as the new

Unfolded bud swelled by the morning's dew;

Kind as the willing saints, but calmer far

Than in their dreams forgiven votaries are."

The principal point which the lines retained was in the question with which they ended, the question on which their heroine was now loudly insisting—

"But what, sweet excellence, what dost thou here?"

Where was Waller's "Mighty Queen,"

"In whom the extremes of power and beauty move,

The Queen of Britain and the Queen of Love," and Wootton's "sun," which when it arose caused all the stars in its train to pale and set?

In excuse for her, the Queen's health was thoroughly out of order and needed mending, no less than her spirits. One of her ailments was chronic rheumatism, induced by her incautious exposure of herself to all kinds of weather, when she was playing the soldier, in marching to Oxford the previous summer, and the damp air of the Isis and the Cherwell was considered prejudicial to her.

At last it was arranged that she should quit Oxford, and repair first to Bath for the benefit of the waters, afterwards to Exeter, which had the coveted recommendation of being not far from the coast.

Charles continued to love her faithfully. He persisted in regarding her with a certain loyal perversity and egotism as not so much the victim of her own faults, as of the fact that she was his wife. In order to afford her all the support and countenance he could render her, he, with his gentlemen, escorted her as far as Abingdon.

The ladies whose harvest of Court splendour and gaiety was ended with the Queen's departure, would not be outdone by the gentlemen in any tribute of homage to their liege lady. However, as it was not wise to call attention to the proceeding, it was settled for the Queen's safety, and in deference to her present feelings, that her journey should be without ostentatious preparation and ceremony.

That did not prevent Dr. Peter Dacre from coming post-haste to Lady Ottery's, and calling on Kitty to wait on the Queen for her first stage. "It may suit her Majesty to be private, but it becometh not her true servants to let her ride without a humble convoy. An I had my will, it would be such a gathering as should daunt the crop-eared knaves in their camps."

"Nay," said Lady Ottery; "when a Queen deigns to flee, and a wife finds her best safety elsewhere than at her husband's side, I know not that she can expect a great gathering. But I judge her not. Poor, ill-advised, tempest-ostessed princess!"

Kitty herself was not loth to pay such respect as she could show to her Queen in adversity, even without recalling the prosperous days when Henrietta Maria had noticed the little girl who went to look at her and the King at the play in the hall of St. John's. Kitty could not get out of her mind the airy, graceful, black-eyed little woman who had stooped to speak graciously to the child, ay, or the exultant woman who had, one short year before, ridden by the King's side into Oxford.

The girl liked not "the candle-light beauties," as her cousin Anthony had styled them, who largely made up her Majesty's suite. They looked a simple maid down with their stares and sneers and mocking laughs, which did not fail even on an occasion like this. She cared nothing for another glimpse of the baleful beauty of that natural mask which my Lady Carlisle wore, or of the worse than mawkish sentimentality of Lady Isabella Thynne, or of the unbridled levity of Mrs. Kirke. In their society, if the men were not otherwise engaged in the war, the wildest and most profligate of the cavaliers were sure to be found. Kitty returned the superciliousness of the whole band with instinctive repugnance. But she was eager to see the last of the strange play. As she had witnessed its earlier joyous interludes, she would fain behold the tragic passages at its close.

Kitty's tears flowed freely for the white, pinched, sick woman, with the woeful, half-frenzied look in her eyes, who came out of Merton with quick, tottering steps, shrouded in wraps. She had a querulous, feverish "make haste" for the servants who were giving the finishing touches to the packing of her coach, previous to her setting out on the journey which was taking her from her husband in his extremity. Kitty, or for that matter Lady Ottery, had no coach to carry her as far as Abingdon, neither was there any friend's carriage to beg or borrow at a pinch. Dr. Dacre had hired a couple of nags, on which he and she were to ride the distance—a considerable enterprise for Dr. Peter, who was no horseman, and for Kitty, who, though she had been taught to ride, had not been on a pony's back since she was at Islip Barnes.

But at the last moment a temporary reprieve for Kitty turned up, in the form of a warm invitation from Mrs. Margaret Lucas to join her. She was seated in the last of the three coaches, which with a string of waggons in their wake formed the Queen's cavalcade, in the centre of a guard of troops. Mrs. Margaret was fully convinced that she had chosen the last carriage, three-fourths crammed with luggage, in the shadow of which she sat in solitary state, because she preferred that to the uncongenial company of the ladies crowded in the other carriages. But if you had heard the ladies' story, you would have found that they were under the strong impression that they had coaxed, manœuvred, even hustled, Mrs. Margaret as an intolerably blameless, self-satisfied bore, from her proper position to that which she was so pleased to occupy.

It did not signify. Mrs. Margaret was perfectly sincere in believing that she was there of her own free will. And her upright, exalted guileless talk, though it might savour a little of "high faluting," was so full of noble aspirations, so free from faithless cynicism, that it was like a draught of fresh spring water after the stale and polluted sources of Court gossip.

Kitty was thankful for such companionship; she had never loved Mrs. Margaret so well as when she spoke with honest tender fidelity of her willingness to retreat with her mistress into the wilds of Cornwall, or even, as some thought, to cross the German Ocean to Holland, or the English Channel to France.

"What!" cried Kitty, in amazement, "and thou hast never been abroad, and art not so glib as young Mrs. Fanshawe, who can speak French like a native. I warrant, madam, thou hast stuck fast at the lumbering French romances, as I have done."

"My mother cared not so much that we should be skilful in discoursing in foreign tongues, as that we should speak our own with nicety and ingenuity," answered Mrs. Margaret, with a little reserve, for to admit the superior accomplishments of Mrs. Fanshawe, of which Mrs. Margaret was not in the least jealous, was to imply that the beloved mother had failed somewhat in her training. "I have not read in the original the French romances you cite, Mrs. Kitty," went on the speaker, with unflinching candour, "but I have tried them in translations. I must say I did find them much to my mind in the glorification of all that is excellent—such as courage, gentleness, comeliness, both of body and mind, truth and courtesy, with the condemnation of rudeness, ugliness, grossness, and all the vices."

"Yes, but," urged Kitty, with her practical common sense, "life in France or Holland under King Louis or the Prince of Orange cannot be like life in Persia under the Grand Cyrus. I do believe you would be more at home in the last than in the first, but as it is, you will feel strange and lonesome; you will be so far away from London and Colchester. What will your mother and brothers, what will Lady Pye and Lady Killigrew and the rest do without you? Oh, Mrs. Margaret, forgive me if I distress thee; I have thought thee so happy with all thy dear friends, none far off, and none alienated. I have but one brother, as I dare to say thou hast heard tell, whom I have not seen for nigh on three years. He may not enter our father's rooms, even though Oriel were free from company and father free to return to our old quarters, because Jack hath mortally offended him by joining the rebels."

"Alack! 'tis a sad case," said Mrs. Margaret, with gentle sympathy, taking Kitty's hand and holding it closely clasped in hers. "Believe me, I feel for you from the bottom of my heart. Yes, our family hath always been one in their loves and hates, which I do count the greatest blessing. Nathless, I must go abroad. I cannot help it, if so be it is my duty; can I, dear Mrs. Kitty?" asked Mrs. Margaret, with the tears running down her cheeks. "My best of mothers, my gallant brothers, my loving sisters—Pye and the rest—have each other and their own duties likewise to occupy them. I owe myself to my Queen. Perchance though she findeth me a little too young, inexperienced and wearisome now, and favours any small prattle that can divert her sad mind, she will take to larger and more serious discourse when she hath time to consider; some day she may want me. I did not come to be her fair weather maid, but to supply the lack of her wonted service, and go with her to the ends of the earth, and die for her, if such were my honoured lot."

At Abingdon the King and Queen, who had met with such bright hopes in the Vale of Keignton the previous July, parted on the 3rd of April, 1644, never to meet again in this world. At the last moment the Queen impulsively alighted from her coach in order to cling to her husband, and fling herself with streaming eyes on his breast; and one of the first things she did on arriving at Exeter, and receiving a sum of money which her sister-in-law, Anne of Austria, sent for the relief of Henrietta Maria's necessities, was to despatch it forthwith for Charles' use. Long before then Kitty and her father were thankful, in the scuffle and excitement at Abingdon, to leave their nags behind. They availed themselves of the homely mode of transport supplied by a return waggon, to get back to Oxford before the dawn of the following day, and allay Lady Ottery's apprehensions on their account.

King Charles implored his most trusted physician to go from London to the aid of the Queen, in the pathetic scrawl—"Mayerne, for the love of me go to my wife. C. R."

The physician, who was a better doctor and a warmer-hearted man than he was either Royalist or courtier, did travel with no small difficulty from London to Exeter, in obedience to the prayer. When Henrietta Maria, in one of her violent flights, cried to him, pressing her hand to her head, "Mayerne, I am afraid I shall go mad one day," he told her coolly, "Your Majesty need not fear going mad; you have been so for some time."

In June Henrietta Maria's last child, a princess, was born at Exeter; within a fortnight of its birth, Essex advanced with his army on the town. He refused to permit her Majesty to withdraw to Bath, saying ironically that he would conduct her to London, whereupon she fled precipitately, leaving her infant behind, and accompanied only by one lady, one gentleman, and her Majesty's confessor. The Queen went to Plymouth and Pendennis, where the rest of her suite, including the dwarf Geoffrey Hudson, and her youngest maid of honour, joined her as they best could. There a Dutch ship was found, in which the whole party sailed for Holland.

Had Henrietta Maria been less precipitate she would have been delivered from Essex by Charles himself. He had left Oxford for the time, defeated Waller at Copredy Bridge, and was marching into Devonshire, with the purpose of getting Essex between the King's army and that of his nephew Prince Maurice. Essex was compelled to draw off his forces, and Charles entered the county town of Devonshire just ten days after Henrietta Maria had sailed from Pendennis. He found only his helpless baby, which he saw for the first and last time. With his unswerving adherence to his Queen's side, in the national quarrel, in defiance of the prejudices of his subjects, he had the child named for her and her sister-in-law, Anne of Austria, "Henrietta Anne," at its christening in the cathedral. Then he gave it back to its governess to be smuggled by her out of the country to join its royal mother.

In July the King's cause in the North of England was lost by the defeat of Prince Rupert at Marston Moor, where Cromwell and his Ironsides came to the front. The misfortune was balanced by the Marquis of Montrose's victory at Tippermuir in Scotland, but Charles's brief successes in Devonshire were speedily followed by the loss of a second battle of Newbury in the month of October, 1644, when Cromwell was a second time conspicuous.

In the rout of the Royalists at Newbury Essex regained all he had been compelled to yield, and was again at liberty to take up his watch of the King and his Parliament in Oxford; for Charles was once more lodged in the University city for the winter. He made occasional sallies in the vain hope of gaining an advantage over his adversaries. He listened to evil advisers in statecraft. Scotland and England were now united by the National League and Covenant, to which the representatives of the Commons had sworn in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. But what was to hinder the King from turning his attention to Ireland, and seeking to enter into an alliance with the Irish Catholics? Nothing save the horrible Irish massacres, the ghastly accounts of which had hardly died out of people's memories. The obstacle caused the King to dissemble, and to protest his innocence of the intention which he was secretly seeking to carry out—a fatal proof of his dogged determination and wilful blindness, and of the casuistry which enabled him to justify to himself the double dealing.

All the time Charles was writing resigned, tender words in his "Eikon Basilike." He was recording his grief for his separation from his wife, and yet his thankfulness for her escape. He was declaring his continued love and honour for her. He was content, he vowed, to be tossed, weather-beaten and ship-wrecked, so that she was safe in harbour. He could perish himself so that she was preserved. In her memory and in her children he might yet survive the malice of his enemies, though they should at last be satiated with his blood. He must leave her to the love and loyalty of his good subjects. He prayed to God that the sin of those who had risen up against him and his Queen might not be laid to their charge. The less he was blest with her company, the more he would retire to God and his own heart, whence no man could banish her. His enemies might envy him, for they could never deprive him of the enjoyment of her virtues while he was himself.

Little wonder that those chivalrous adherents who loved and stood by King Charles, through good report and bad report, saw only the Bayard side of his character, and recognised in him—whatever dark shadows might mar the picture—something of a modern Arthur crushed by the overwhelming odds of a great upheaval of men's religious and political convictions, for which he was not prepared, which he could not accept.

MY LADY'S REST.

A SKETCH IN FOUR CHAPTERS

CHAPTER I.

"Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas, Ease after warre, death after life, does greatly please."

FAIR and fickle is the month of May, with its varying moods—now all sunshine, then changing, at a moment's notice, to sharp showers and overcast skies. Such a change came on this afternoon as I was exploring the lanes about Ashdeane Vicarage, on this my first visit to my mother's old home.

I had been sauntering along enjoying the fresh spring air, and thinking how exquisite the young green of the trees and hedges was, when some large, heavy drops fell and a sudden shower came on, which in a few minutes reduced my print dress to a very limp and bedraggled condition.

I tried to shelter myself under the trees, but they were but slight protection, and I had just made up my mind to go home, when I noticed the smoke of a neighbouring chimney through the trees, and determined to ask leave to wait at the cottage until the rain was over.

Quickly I made my way through the trees, and found myself in front of such a pretty cottage, with a porch covered with clematis and other climbing plants. I sat down on one of the wooden seats which ran along on each side of the door, and began to wonder what sort of person the owner of this pretty place might be, when the shrill bark of a little dog made me look up.

A Skye terrier stood in front of the door, his wet, tangled hair showing that he, like me, had been caught in the rain; and from the impatient way he tried to shake the wet hair back from his bright eyes, he seemed to dislike the shower even more than I did. He stood barking at the door as if he wondered why it was not opened at once for him. He was too much preoccupied to bestow more than an inquiring sniff on me, all his attention being given to the door, which was at last opened, and a lady's voice exclaimed, "Why, Dandy, where have you been? Come in, come in, poor doggie!" and she was about to shut the door again when she caught sight of me, and paused.

I jumped up and apologised for having trespassed on her domains, but she assured me I was very welcome, and observing how wet my dress was, insisted on my coming indoors to dry it.

MEADOW-SWEET.

"If you do not mind, I shall bring you into the kitchen, as I have no fire in my sitting-room to-day," she said, and I followed her into the brightest, cosiest little kitchen imaginable, with a deep-coloured, red-tiled floor, and there on a rug in front of the fire the Skye terrier was already comfortably ensconced, just wagging his tail to greet his mistress as she entered the room. He gave rather a suspicious glance at me when he found himself obliged to retire and make room for me on his particular rug, in front of his fire; for, of course, all these little comforts existed for his special benefit, and no one else had a right to share them, and so it was, with drooping tail and a snort of disgust, that he retreated under the table, leaving me in possession of the rug. In after days Dandy and I became very good friends; but I do not think he ever forgot or fully forgave my invasion of his rights that showery day, when I first became acquainted with Mrs. Deane, and crossed the threshold of her kitchen.

When my dress was dry again my hostess begged me to come to her sitting-room and wait till the rain was quite over, and this I was not unwilling to do, as I had no friends or even acquaintances as yet in Ashdeane, and the vicar and his sister were—although kindness itself—still rather too elderly to be very companionable to me.

Mrs. Deane had a sweet, gentle face, which bore traces of past trials and cares, which, patiently endured, had only refined and sweetened her nature; so I fancied, as I looked into her soft, blue eyes and listened to her gentle voice, and when I knew her and the story of her life better, I found this was the case.

From the window, which opened on a pretty garden, I was surprised to see three other cottages, all similar to Mrs. Deane's, and each with its little garden at the back.

"You are surprised to see four cottages so near each other and all alike," said Mrs. Deane, smiling. "You have not been here long enough to hear of 'My Lady's Rest,' as they are called."

"No," I said, "I had never heard of them or of My Lady either; but I should like to hear all about it."

"Well, you must know that these are houses of rest for ladies who have worked hard and whose incomes are not sufficient to support them without continuing to work when their health and strength are beginning to grow less, so my lady built these cottages, and settled a sum of money on each inmate chosen to live in them."

"Who makes the choice?" I asked. "Surely there must be many candidates for such charming homes of rest as these cottages seem to be."

"All of us now living here were appointed by My Lady herself, and so were our predecessors. When we shall have passed away to more perfect rest than this, four others will be chosen to succeed us."

"By My Lady?" I asked.

"Yes, by My Lady," replied Mrs. Deane.

"How old My Lady must be!" I thought, "if she had appointed so many people to these homes; and was evidently intending to choose fresh ones in time to come."

But the rain had cleared off again, and everything was bathed in brilliant sunshine, and I said good-bye to Mrs. Deane, promising soon to come and see her again. As I was going down the steps, she directed my attention to the motto above the door—

"Sleep after toyle, port after stormie seas, Ease after warre, death after life, does
greatly please."

"My Lady had that carved over each of the doors," said Mrs. Deane; "she was so fond of those lines, and thought them suitable to such resting-places for careworn toilers like us."

As I hastened back to the vicarage I wondered if it should ever be my lot to join my toiling sisters in struggling for my daily bread, and to long for such a haven of rest, after the "stormie seas" of life, and then my thoughts wandered off to the woman who had planned and executed this loving deed, and I longed to see and know her.

That evening I asked Mr. Brown if he knew Mrs. Deane.

"Very well indeed," he replied, "and I had intended bringing you to see her, but it seems you have introduced yourself without my aid; she is an excellent woman, as well as a very attractive one. I should like you to make a friend of her."

"Have you known her long?" I asked; "and is it long since she came to live at the cottage?"

"Yes, I have known her for many years, long before she made her home here, and the longer I know her the more I admire her and respect her."

"I should like to hear something about her life, if I might," I went on. "I feel so much interested in her."

"I shall tell you what I have heard, partly from her and partly from other people, added to what I have known myself of her story, if you care to listen," said the vicar, and he and I began to pace up and down the beech walk as he talked.

"Ruth Marsden was the only child of a rich London merchant. She was pretty, and much admired for her own sake, as well as sought after on account of her wealth. Her parents indulged her in every wish and fancy, and the only wonder was that she was not spoiled."

"Amongst her many admirers, the favoured one seemed to be Henry Deane, a young man calculated to attract most young girls; but want of means kept him back from declaring his affection for her. He was too proud to let the world say that he had married a rich wife to support him in idleness, and so he was silent."

"Perhaps Ruth may have guessed what his feelings were, and respected him the more for it; but certain it is she refused all other offers, and at the age of twenty was still free, and apparently quite satisfied to remain so. But troubles and a dark cloud of sorrow suddenly enveloped the once bright home. Mrs. Marsden, who had long been an invalid, took fever and died; and poor Ruth was still overpowered by grief and the suddenness of her loss, when the news reached her of her father's failure for an enormous sum."

"At the time she was quite alone, Mr. Marsden being abroad on some business affairs, and he wrote a few lines to say that all was lost, and that as he could not leave Brussels just then, she must follow the advice of his lawyer, to whose house she was to go at once."

"Mr. Bruce was an old friend, and Ruth felt not quite forsaken while she had his roof to shelter herself under, and his advice and aid by which to be guided. She had at once determined to try and gain her own living, and advertised for a situation as governess."

"She had, in her ignorance, fancied that nothing would be easier than to get what she desired at once, but she was soon undeceived; she found that a great deal was expected from even a nursery governess, and a systematic training, which she had not received; and she also found that there were numbers of well-qualified and certificated teachers trying for every vacant post."

"Mr. Bruce was grieved to see her weary, dejected looks, as day after day passed and no situation turned up. At last he obtained for her a place as pupil-teacher in a school, with the principal of which he had some influence, and deeply grateful Ruth felt when she was settled down in it. It was an unpleasant change to the indulged child of fortune, but she was a brave girl, and struggled on uncomplainingly, becoming a favourite with teachers and pupils."

"Henry Deane had sought her out as soon as he heard of her losses, but she persuaded him to wait until their prospects were brighter, and then if her father consented she would marry him, and in this resolve she remained firm."

"One day she received a letter from her father, telling her that he was on the point of starting to Australia, there to retrieve his broken fortunes if possible, then he would return and make her amends for all she had had to suffer; in the meantime he might not write again for six months; she must not be uneasy."

"The six months passed, then a year came and went, and still no letter or news of her absent father, and no efforts of Mr. Bruce availed to discover any traces of his whereabouts; but still Ruth hoped against hope, and the kindly old man would not discourage her by letting her see that he was convinced that her father was dead."

"The months and years passed by in labour sweetened by hope, and at last Ruth and Henry were quietly married from Mr. Bruce's house; and it was as a bride that My Lady first saw Ruth and became interested in her."

"For some years after this it seemed as if the happiness Ruth had so well deserved was to be at last hers. Henry's business flourished, and all went well. Then troubles again assailed her. Henry's eyesight became weak, and he was at last obliged to give up all business, leaving his confidential clerk to wind up his affairs for him."

"This man cheated and robbed him, and finally disappeared with his ill-gotten gains. Where, no one could discover; and Ruth was obliged to resume her former occupation of teaching to support herself and her now almost blind husband."

"My Lady proved herself a valuable friend at this juncture, and found many pupils for the energetic wife, who had now to begin the battle of life afresh, and who, for the rest of the time her husband lived, worked hard that he might feel no want of those comforts so necessary for his failing health."

"Never once, all those years, did her courage fail; but after her husband's death, when the pressure was relaxed and the strong incentive to exertion was removed, then, but not till then, the reaction came, and Ruth was laid for many a week on a sick bed, her life almost despaired of."

"My Lady cared for and watched over her all that time, and at the end of it, when her recovery was complete, she placed her in that pretty cottage, where you made her acquaintance to-day; and that is her story. What do you think of it?"

"I don't wonder that she has such a sweet, refined face," I replied. "What an unselfish, chequered life hers has been; but did she never hear of her father again?"

"Yes. Mr. Bruce heard from him once, when he told him he hoped soon to be home again. He had done well abroad, and was able to pay off most of his former debts, and added that he was about to marry a young girl, not half his age, and with a good fortune."

"Did Mrs. Deane never hear again from him?"

"No, never; but he must be dead long ago, or some news of him would have come."

And so the conversation ended, and we went in to tea, my mind very full of all I had heard of Mrs. Deane and her trials.

THE CULTURE OF SILK IN IRELAND AND AMERICA.

By DORA DE BLAQUIERE.

FIG. 1.—(A) THE MOTH LAYING EGGS—LIFE SIZE.

AND now I must try to give such practical hints to my readers as will enable them to carry out small "educations" without much trouble. One of these, consisting of three hundred silkworms, I found was, for myself, a world of experience; and as it was my first, and ended in every way most successfully, though I was obliged to travel by railroad in search of food during the course of it, I must be thought to have won my experience somewhat dearly. The grain used was grown in Australia, the worms were larger than any I have ever seen, and the cocoons fine and well shaped.

worms are far more often injured by extreme hot weather than by cold, for if properly fed they can stand very severe cold weather—just as we can ourselves under the same circumstances—though not damp. When it is cold, however, the silkworm has less appetite, and even two meals a day will be sufficient; but the "education" will last ever so much longer. It should take about forty days for silkworms that are fed four times a day, at four hours' intervals, and at an average temperature, to be ready to spin their cocoons; but it will take less time if the worms be fed day and night. Thus it will be seen that the silkworm has to absorb—from the date of his hatching to that of his spinning his cocoon—a certain quantity of leaves, and it is immaterial whether he be thirty-two days or fifty days in doing it; excepting for the rearer, who of course is saved the fatigue, trouble, and danger of accidents, and of disease likewise, if the "education" be as curtailed as it may possibly be. Four meals a day, beginning at 7 o'clock in the morning, will not prove a difficulty to anyone to supply; the hours of feeding being 7 a.m., 11 a.m., 3 p.m., and 7 p.m. Cleanliness, regularity in feeding, and evenness in the quantity are the most important essentials in an "education." No wet or damp leaves must be given to the worms. If raining,

In the first place, we will suppose the beginner has to procure his seed or grain, as the silkworms' eggs are indifferently called. It can be purchased at a very small price in Covent Garden, and also through the Exchange and Mart. If it be the first trial, I should advise you to lay out only a shilling on it. Before, however, you come to this part of the business you must consider the subject of leaves, and to get them you must discover a mulberry tree within a walk of your residence, from whence you can obtain leaves. The time for beginning the hatching is when the leaves are bursting out, which is at the latter end of

FIG. 2.—SILKWORM SPINNING A COCOON—LIFE SIZE.

This experiment took place in June and July, 1877—a fine hot summer—and the leaves mostly used were from the black mulberry. The worms were kept in the large dress boxes of cardboard sent out by drapers with dresses, and I see, by some recent American reports, that these are considered as very suitable, the high sides of the boxes protecting the silkworms from draughts. From the first few days, for two weeks or more, these paper boxes may be kept in the sitting-room, where they give no trouble, and where they are sure of receiving attention, and will be free from bad smells and cold; though at the same time they need plenty of air. The temperature of the room should not fall below 68° Fahr.; but it has been found that silk-leaves must be gathered early in the morning and put to dry, for if not dry they must be wiped with a dry cloth.

April, or first part of May, in England. The eggs should be kept in a dry place, where the temperature never rises above fifty degrees. When the room is heated above this you must remove the eggs to a cellar. They are not affected (as I observed) by cold; on the contrary, it improves the grain greatly to expose it during the winter to the cold of the outer atmosphere. If the cellar be damp, the eggs will have to be removed every few days, and exposed to the dry outer air for an hour or two. When they are to be hatched, they must be taken from the cellar and placed in any of the warmer rooms of the house, and finally to the kitchen. Spread them on clean white paper, and put them in a warm closet, of which the temperature should be about 70°, a heat which may be gradually increased to about 80°. The worms will hatch out in about five days, but the warmer the place the sooner the hatching will take place.

The colour of the egg changes, two days before the hatching, from light yellow to an ashen grey. The box in which the eggs are kept should be covered with a coarse net or muslin, so that the worms may crawl up through the holes. Perforated paper—a stiff brown or yellow wrapping-paper, with holes made in it about half an inch apart—will answer as well. On the paper or the net some young mulberry leaves must be placed for the young worms to feed upon. Another method of collecting the young worms is to place very tender leaves about the eggs, and the hatched worms will soon crawl on them. When the leaves are well covered with the baby-worms, they may be carefully transferred to papers or boxes marked "first day's hatching," "second day's hatching," and so on, for each day, for the various days' hatchings must be kept carefully apart throughout the whole time of the "education."

After the worms are all hatched, the "education" may be considered as fairly started. The first age of the worms lasts five days, and during that time they must be fed with the young leaves which are found in the spring (the older leaves would be too hard for them); at the early periods of life any variety of mulberry leaf will answer for feeding them. The leaves for the young worms should always be cut up with a sharp clean knife, and cut quite finely during the first ages, but after the fourth and down to spinning-time they may be given entire. There are two objects in cutting the leaves: one being to give the young worms more edges on which to feed, and the other being to enable the educator to scatter the leaves more evenly, so that each worm may have its fair proportion of food, that they may grow equally, and accomplish their moultings at one and the same time. This is a very important point, saving a great deal of labour, which all beginners must remember.

The life of the worm is divided into five ages and four intervening moultings. On the fifth day of its life the young worms must be carefully watched. When they are ready for the moulting-sleep they cease eating, remain still, and on the tiny black head a spot appears like a half moon—the new head of the worm.

While in the moulting-sleep the worms are not fed at all, and when they are preparing for it they must not be cleaned, nor the litter thrown out; nor must they be disturbed until the day after the moulting. Again the newly-moulted worms must not be fed until all of them have moulted and shed their skins. This treatment will apply to all the moultings, i.e., at the other four ages.

After about three weeks the silkworms begin to change colour, refuse their food, and wander about the box or shelf, holding up their heads to look about for the resting-place which their instinct bids them seek. When they have attained their full growth they are probably an inch and a half long. If the educator be only a beginner, it is well she should be prepared for this state of things. Sheaves of straw, boughs of willow, bunches of dried twigs tied together, dry bracken, leaves, or something of that kind will answer for the spinning of the cocoons. It takes four days for a silkworm to finish its cocoon, and another three days to pass into the chrysalis state. After the spinning is over, those cocoons which are to be reeled for silk are to be gathered on the ninth day after being spun; and in order to kill the moths, they must be laid in the oven in boxes on wooden slabs, being careful to avoid scorching the cocoon. In about twenty minutes all motion and sound will have ceased, and the moth will be dead. The cocoons must then be spread out to dry in a warm room.

If the cocoons be destined for seed or grain, you must select the finest of them, hard to the touch and smaller in the middle than at the ends; of a light yellow in colour. Strip the loose floss from them and place them in boxes to await the emergence of the moths, which will take place in about twenty days, according to the weather, after the cocoons have been commenced. They always come out very early in the morning, just after sunrise, between six and eight o'clock; when out they should be placed on sheets of paper, as they pair. When the females lay their eggs it is better to put them on a cloth nailed to the wall, where they soon deposit their eggs. During the moth-life they require no food, and must be kept in rather a dark room, as they are night-moths. They are very plain-looking indeed, and they die almost directly after laying their eggs. Another method is to put the moths on sheets of paper, which can then be put away in shallow boxes to keep them from the dust until the following year.

If the cocoons have to travel to any distance, they must be carefully packed so as to avoid flattening them; but they may be put into a dry box sufficiently close as not to alter their shape. Pierced cocoons, out of which the moths have come, may be closely packed, without any harm happening to them.

I have now, I think, given such a careful description of the whole process of the "education" of silkworms, that there will be no trouble in commencing one, and, on thinking the matter over, of going into the business of silk-growing. The great thing is to avoid hurry in the process. The trees, if newly planted, will take three years to grow, and during that time our girls can be looking about them to pick up new and approved ideas and further knowledge for their enterprise. From time to time the Editor, who wishes to encourage the growth of the industry amongst his girls, will admit an article on the subject, giving the latest information and teaching there is to be obtained.

The most valuable handbook on the subject is that issued by the "American Women's Silk Culture Association," 1222, Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S. America; price one dollar. The reports also are most valuable, and should be obtained by anyone intending to go in for silk culture. The address of the new Irish industry is Miss H. H. Reeves, Tranmore, Douglas, Cork; or M. H. Westropp, Ravenswood, Carrigaline, and from them information and grain can be obtained. Any extra information will be gladly given by the author of this paper.

An interesting book, recently published, "Pen and Pencil in Asia Minor," by Mr. William Cochran (Member of the Society of Arts), contains the fullest instructions possible in sericulture—the best method of growing the mulberry, all recent experiments and appliances, and the results of the celebrated Pasteur experiments in the diseases of the silkworm, as well as the best methods of prevention. Mr. Cochran went to Asia Minor for the purpose of seeing Mr. John Griffitt, who has been for the last thirty years U.S.A. Vice-Consul at Smyrna, and the means of reviving the almost dying silk industry near that city. A skilled silk farmer himself, he studied the discoveries of Pasteur, and reproduced a breed of healthy silkworms.

THE DEBT WE OWE TO BIRDS AND BEASTS.

By GORDON STABLES, C.M., M.D., R.N.

BETWEEN the mawkish sentimentality of the old maid, who would not permit her servant to turn the bluebottle fly out of doors until it left off raining, and the conduct of the brutal costermonger, who looks upon his ass as a mere machine to be goaded to action on a minimum of food and a maximum of thwacking, there is a great gulf fixed. Probably most of us would prefer the old maid, for whatever be the reason thereof, we find the close of the nineteenth century characterised by a greater and more universal diffusion of kindness to the lower animals than was ever before witnessed. I see in this cause to rejoice rather than complain, despite the fact that owing to the strain on body and mind of our work-a-day population in the struggle for wealth, or even existence, so-called nervous disorders are vastly on the increase. Do we deserv herein the relativeness of cause and effect? Are we really becoming morbidly sensitive to the sufferings of the creatures beneath us—our fellow-mortals? I am not prepared to answer the questions; but for every new book, inculcating directly or indirectly kindness to animals, placed on the reviewer's table, we shall find one on debility of the nerve centres, or some kindred subject.

But the person who does not turn aside to avoid crushing a beetle in his path is now-a-days the exception rather than the rule, while those people whose minds are cultured and refined are saddened, even on the brightest summer's day, when walking in fields or woods, by witnessing acts of pain and cruelty perpetrated on every side of them by the stronger denizens of the wilds over the weaker. And these are seen in every grade of life, from insects upwards to that of birds and beasts. Here is a harmless fly in the talons of a monster spider; here a polecat darting away with a blackbird torn from its nest, her pretty mate, who has seen all, making the "welkin" ring with his notes of anguish; or here again the blood-stained feathers of a cushat-dove, that has been torn in pieces by a hawk, and who will croudle no more at eventide in yonder thicket of spruce. The mystery of pain is one of the mysteries of Nature herself, which she will not reveal; and there are times when one cannot help envying the almost terrible Christianity of a Gordon, who believed that everything that is good, and could see Heaven's hand and mercy even in a massacre.

Now while cheerfully admitting that there is an increase in acts of kindness to animals in our day, and a larger spirit of "live and let live" prevalent, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there is also a vast amount of thoughtless and destructive cruelty, coupled with thoughtless extravagance in the use of Nature's gifts and bounties.

In old school books there used to be a story of a boy who first ate the cake his mother had sent him, and then cried because it was all gone. We are very much in the same position; we are eating our cake, and our posterity of a few centuries hence will have to cry because we have left none for them.

There is a sad lack at present of what may be called national economy. This is noticeable on all hands, and in some instances the crime—for needless extravagance is a crime—brings its own punishment. About one-third of our precious life-giving coals, for example, is wasted in smoke; and in consequence, during at least one-third of the year the great world of London, to say nothing of many other of our large cities, is enveloped in a health-destroying fog and gloom, which might almost be called the very shadow of death itself, so fearfully does it increase our annual bills of mortality. Everyone knows there is a remedy for this state of matters, and that this remedy will be applied as soon as—the Irish Question is settled. Even the dark and loathsome streets and lanes of the East-end will catch glimpses of glorious sunshine then, and light and heat will help to banish sin and disease.

In lesser matters we are also madly, and, in a moral sense, penally extravagant. The destruction of our song birds, notably larks, to form table tit-bits for the upper ten and the middle million, is so great that already it is rare indeed to see or hear those charming birds anywhere near to a large town.

Again, the very fairest of our women-kind are still nothing more nor less than beautiful savages, for they go on "adorning" (?) themselves with the skins of birds, a large proportion of which, it is well they should know, are captured under circumstances of the greatest cruelty, torn from their nests in spring-time, when their coats or plumage are most lovely; when they are dressed, one might say, in their bridal garments. Small mercy receive they at the brutal hands of their captors; they are strangled on the spot, in sight of the despairing male birds, whose songs of joy are hushed for a season, and whose young are left in the nest to open their yellow beaks, to gape in vain for the food that never comes, and so to perish miserably of cold and starvation.

The same wanton and thoughtless extravagance goes on in the fur world, and in that of ivory and wild beasts' skins. Already the very noblest of our larger animals that dwell afar in forest or jungle are becoming woefully scarce; sacrificed they all will be ere long at the shrine of fashionable folly.

It will surely be a poor sort of a world to live in when neither buffalo nor bison roams in the wilderness or prairie; when the roar of the king of beasts awakes no more the echoes of African hills; when the elephant, the seal, and the bear can only be met with stuffed in museums; when coals have gone down, and heat and power can only be obtained from the earth's dark depths, or from the heaving breast of ocean; when the woods shall be silent in spring, and the only notion of bird-song shall be that handed down or preserved by the phonograph. It certainly will be a poor sort of world, and we creatures of the present age will be well out of it.

Perhaps many think it is but poor policy to look so far ahead. Let us consider, however, what we owe to birds and beasts in this good year of 1889. A few minutes spent in such consideration will not be time wasted, if it shall lead us to treat with greater care and kindness the dumb beasts whose pleading, wondering eyes are always upon us, look where we will.

Let us take the birds first. Directly or indirectly, we depend upon the feathered race for a very large portion of our food supply, both in eggs and in flesh. As regards game and poultry, we have very little to complain of; the former are most carefully and judiciously preserved, and since poultry shows have become an institution in the country, the breeding of fowls has almost reached the rank of an exact science.

I hope ere long to see the laws of economy as rigorously applied to the waters that surround our islands as to our moors and hills themselves, so that the living wealth that creeps and floats about our shores may have a chance of increasing for the national weal.

Indirectly we owe a very large debt indeed to the wild birds of the fields and gardens, although they are trapped and shot in the most heartless manner, and begrudged even the hips and haws and holly-berries that help them to tide over the severity of the winter season. The ignorance of gardeners especially causes them to look upon birds as their enemies. That they do a little harm at times and eat a little fruit, there is no gainsaying, but we would have neither fruit nor vegetables were it not for the wild birds. Insect life, particularly in the larval state, would become a plague, and good gardening a penance, if not an impossibility, were it not for the birds.

To say nothing of the thrushes and blackbirds that remain with us all the winter destroying the cocoons and chrysalides of thousands of hibernating moths and destructive flies, and even the snails that have hidden in crevices to sleep throughout the cold season, we have such well-known gardeners' assistants as wrens, warblers, stone-chats, hedge-accentors, wagtails, titmice, larks, robins, redstarts, etc., etc. Even sparrows, and many kinds of finches, I maintain, and am able to prove, do excellent work in the garden. In addition to the above we have owls that destroy mice, and nightjars that catch moths, and by day, martins, swifts, and swallows.

In mentioning gardeners' assistants it would be unfair to forget the bats, the toads, and our good friends the frogs.

But it is to the insect-eating or soft-billed birds in particular that we have to be grateful for keeping down the truly terrible aphides or plant lice—these are ordinarily known by the name of green flies—on roses, etc., and black flies on beans and cherries. They increase during the summer months with enormous rapidity; the eggs are laid in autumn, hatch in the spring sunshine, then begin to multiply viviparously till autumn again; but it is in the early season that the birds assist us so well. Birds also keep down wasps and earwigs, that are so great a plague or curse to the fruit-grower. They devour also wire-worms, and many other kinds of destructive "crawlin' ferlies." I have already mentioned owls as useful in keeping down mice. These latter are at times most troublesome garden pests, especially in the early spring months, when, having devoured their stores of winter food, they come forth to eat the roots of everything palatable.

A proof of the sort of plague these creatures may become, as well as of the folly exhibited by ignorant keepers in shooting down every bird of prey wherever seen, was afforded a few years ago in the south of Scotland. A raid had been made, and war à outrance declared against hawks and owls; this was carried out to the bitter end, but the field-mice increased to such an extent that whole fields of grass were utterly destroyed, the little creatures being actually in millions. So true is it that there is a balance of nature that cannot be interfered with with impunity. By this law no one species of animal is allowed to preponderate to the destruction of others, nor can any natural family be wantonly removed without others suffering in some way or another.

Birds, especially in the far north, are trapped and shot for the sake of their feathers and down. It is well known now, even outside the medical profession, that feather beds are not so healthy as mattresses; still, feathers will always be utilised for making pillows, and as for down, it will be a valuable article of commerce for centuries yet to come.

The song birds of this country have a value which it would be difficult indeed to compute. Consider them first as they are in their native woods and wilds, when in the sweet spring-time every tree harbours a musician, every bush shelters a songster; when in thicket and copse every leaf even seems to have found a voice, while far above us the fleecy clouds themselves are ringing with the glad melody of birds. One does not need to be a poet, nor a naturalist either, to enjoy such a concert as this; to the weary, to the tired brain-worker, to the toiler in towns, who has escaped from drudgery for a day, and come down to the cool green country, it means life and health itself. The soul seems to borrow from the birds a portion of their ecstatic joy, the mind becomes calm, the nerves are soothed by their songs, cares and worries are for a time forgotten, and the thoughts carried far away "to better worlds than this."

Very early on a summer's morning in the wooded midlands we are awakened by the sweet soft fluting of a blackbird on the lawn. No occasion to get up; the sun itself has not yet cleared the horizon. We sleep again, and the melody mingles with our dreams; by-and-by the robin will fill up the intervals with his pleasant lilt, and later on the bold loud notes of the chaffinch will burst forth in the blossoming orchard, and the mavis among the limes will make echo ring from tree to tree. All day long, wherever we walk, the birds will be with us; at eventide we may listen to the plaintive song of the linnet on the thorn, the drowsy whirr of the partridge among the corn, or croodle of cushat in the spruce thickets. In the silence of the night, and all the livelong night, we have melody that we scarce could distinguish by day—the voices of blackcap, woodlark, and nightingale.

"Their loud delight
Breaks through the stillness of the night,
And music's softest airs fill all the plains."

But consider the value of our song birds, even when confined in cages! To appreciate this thoroughly one would need to be an invalid for a few months; then, indeed, bird-song is soothing, and bird ways and tricks and manners well calculated to banish ennui, and make the weary time seem shorter.

In this country we perhaps do not owe a great deal to birds as scavengers, except on the immediate sea-board; but in the native towns and villages of Her Majesty's Indian dominions, to the vagabond crow (Pica vagabunda), the adjutant (Leptoptilos argala) and a few other birds, assisted, I may add, by buffaloes and blue-bottle flies, millions owe not only the health they possess, but life itself.

To the homing instinct of pigeons the world is indeed deeply indebted. Especially are these birds useful in time of war, or to a town that has been placed in a state of siege, as Paris was during the Franco-German war, when but for balloons and pigeons the city might have been considered for a time blotted out of existence. The subject is far too extensive to enter into here; but let me briefly remind the reader of a few facts. The utility of the voyageur depends upon the love of home inherent in the bird, and the power it possesses of making its way over tracts of country quite unknown to it at a great speed and unerringly. They are trained to this by being taken at first only short distances from the parent loft on favourable days. After a year of such training a bird will be able to fly over a hundred miles, and two hundred miles in the second year. What is known to the "fancy" as the carrier pigeon, is not the bird which is in use for long-distance flying, but a cross-bred pigeon—the Antwerp. Some of these, when fully matured and trained, have been known to do a journey or voyage of five hundred miles in twelve hours. Something of the enormous speed they attain on wing may be gathered from the following curious incident: A large round hole was lately found in a shop window of plate glass, cut as clean as if done by a glazier's diamond, while in the shop itself, and opposite the aperture, was the dead body of a Belgian homer, with battered head and broken neck. It had doubtless flown against the glass during the fog and darkness.

Pigeon flying as a pastime is only in its infancy in this country, though in Belgium alone there are 1,200 societies; and while the season is at its height every Saturday from that country over 200,000 birds are despatched by train to far-off parts of France, and even Spain, there to be thrown up.

It is not training alone, however, that accounts for the homing power the pigeons have, for extraordinary but authentic stories are told of even untrained birds making their way back to their lofts from places hundreds of miles away. This proves that pigeons have some curious instinct or even sense which we ourselves cannot understand, and brings to our minds the words of the poet—

"I hear a voice you cannot hear,
Which says I must not stay:
I see a hand you cannot see,
Which beckons me away."

Many sea-birds possess the same instinct, notably gulls and albatrosses; but as yet mankind has not attempted to dominate these birds, though I could easily fancy the albatross, or even some species of gulls, bringing messages betwixt Australia and the Cape of Good Hope, or betwixt Australia and America. The day may come.

Little need be said of the debt we owe to our ordinary domestic animals, such as the horse, the bullock, the donkey, dog, and harmless necessary cat. This is all self-evident. That we do not treat them with sufficient care and kindness is a fact that we ought to be heartily ashamed of.

The extraordinary love one cannot help developing for a dog or even cat, that has for many years been a fireside friend and faithful favourite, is in itself a proof of the value of such an animal.

People are often ridiculed for bestowing affection on a dog, but only by the unthinking. Everybody almost likes a good dog; few of us happily require to love the animal. But to thousands in this country the companionship of a faithful dog is an incalculable boon. From disposition, or indisposition, or force of circumstances, such may be prevented from mingling much in society. It is small wonder, then, that they come to love the dog, who seldom leaves them for a minute, whose fond brown eyes watch and read every movement and look—the dog with his ways so winning, his affection so unbounded, his heart so loyal, the same in trouble or sorrow in weal or woe, and who loves his master all the more when low and lonely.

Well, my subject is too large to do aught save touch lightly and suggestively on, and lest I outstay my welcome I draw my article to a close. But there is one thing I must allude to in conclusion—namely, the very great and intrinsic value of little pets as companions for little children.

Let them be but white mice or guinea pigs, a kitten or a puppy, I care not what, but I say that on the very day the child has been presented with a living pet, the gates of a new world have been opened wide to him; his mind will be moulded, his heart enlarged, his very soul softened by observing and studying the life and ways of even the littlest of God's lowly creatures.

OTHER DAYS.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM COWAN, M.A.

Oh, would they might come back again,
Those days before my house was bare,
When little voices thrilled my ears,
And little feet were on the stair.

Sweet was the stir of dear young life,
And sweet the cares it brought me then;
Oh, would that stir, those blessed cares,
Were in my silent home again!

Oh, would those days were back again,
When little hands clung round my knees,
And little lips to mine were pressed—
I feel them strange, these hours of ease.

Now I am poor, I dwell alone,
And totter on through strangest ways,
Still longing for what never comes—
The life and love of other days.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

HOUSEKEEPING.

BUSY BEE, TWO OF YOUR GIRLS.—To stain floors nothing can be better than the oaken stains to be procured at any oil-shop. The floors will first require a good scrubbing or two, and perhaps planing also, to make them smooth. It is a saving of the staining liquid if you size the floor first, before the staining. When the boards are dark enough and perfectly dry, you can proceed to varnish or give a polish with turpentine and beeswax, which is made as follows:—Shave up the beeswax finely into a jar, and pour on it enough turpentine to cover it; let it stand all night, and in the morning it will be of the consistency of cream. Use a woollen rag to rub it on, and polish with a roll made of flannel or felt. Varnished floors can be polished in the same manner, and kept as bright as ever. 2. Beat up the yolk of an egg, and rub it well into the roots of the hair, washing it well out afterwards with hot water. We should think that any kind of egg would answer, whether of ducks or fowls. 3. The embroidery paste about which you inquire is only ordinary stiff flour paste made extra firm by long boiling. It is used to stiffen the back of embroidery, a little tissue paper being laid over it while it is wet. It should not touch the material.

WORK.

S. W.—Many people use cold tea to sponge black silk, others use weak beer and water, others vinegar and water, and the Southern negroes in America use an old black kid glove, boiled in a quart of water till it is reduced to a pint, and then the glove is used to rub the mixture on the silk.

MAY W.—For summer use, to wear with every dress, a transparent lace, straw, or net hat, with blue or white flowers in it, which you could change for each dress as you require it, would be found both cool and pretty. You could make this at home.

FLOSS.—Send your macramé work to a cleaner; we never recommend experiments by amateurs in either cleaning or dyeing embroideries or dress materials. 2. English is spoken everywhere now, but it would be expedient to learn French, and next best, German.

SAGE and THYME.—We are glad to hear that our pattern of a woollen quilt proved so satisfactory, and was so quickly made. To have found time to complete one within three weeks, was a proof that you are industrious and deserve our assistance. "Thyme" says she can make from ten to twelve in an hour. 2. Harmony should be taught by a master. Your other question should be put to a librarian.

MISCELLANEOUS.

JESSIE CLARE.—We regret that we are quite unable to give you "a cure for knock-knees at the age of twenty-six," or at any age. If they belong to a woman, at least they are generally considered preferable to "bandy-legs." When the legs are not straight, as they should be, it is difficult to walk otherwise than as a duck, and thus double pains should be taken with the carriage.

BESSIE.—The following is said to be a good dressing for the cure of persistent scurfiness in the head:—Sesquicarbonate of ammonia, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz.; spirit of rosemary, $\frac{1}{2}$ pint; rose water, $\frac{1}{2}$ pint. Mix by shaking, and apply before brushing the hair.

SUNSHINE is thanked for her grateful and most gratifying letter.

BRIGHTONIAN.—Our readers do not always obtain answers, because they would involve controversy. All God-fearing people are not fully agreed on very many points, although holding the great central doctrines of Christianity. Our magazine cannot be used as an organ for controversy, and we are obliged to exercise great discretion in giving ex cathedra answers to all questions sent in to us. Study the scriptures prayerfully, and consult your parents and your own clergyman.

A "FAIDING" LILY should learn how to spell it before "faiding." She will find a recipe for jam or Swiss roll in vol. vii., page 47. We trust it will be a comfort to her.

PERPLEXED FIANCEE.—You would require a special licence for the purpose. The fees for it average about £29 8s.; apply at the Faculty Office, Doctors' Commons. But surely this would be the bridegroom's business.

MARY VERENA.—Probably the "elderly lady" is endeavouring to read without spectacles. She should consult an oculist. The address of the secretary of the society called The Snowdrop Bands is Mrs. A. T. Watson, Southwold, Tipton Crescent, Sheffield.

DOLLY.—A bride should turn back her veil when she sits down to the wedding breakfast, but not remove it until she changes her dress for travelling.

A. GRAY.—We are not personally acquainted with the small places you name, but think that Broadstairs in the same county (Kent) might suit you. It is situated between Ramsgate and Margate, extending along the top of the cliff. The beach is sandy, the climate bracing and healthy; apartments comfortable, and, excepting in the height of the season, are very reasonable; the season is from July to the end of September. It is cool and pleasant in July.

YOUNG NURSE.—You might find ivory dust a strengthening ingredient to employ in soups and broths, or in blancmange and sweet jellies. Put one ounce of ivory dust into two quarts of water, and boil gently till it be reduced to a pint, which will take from eight to ten hours; then strain it through a jelly bag, and use in other forms of nourishment. There is no special taste to it, so your patient will not dislike it. It is to be had at the shop of any ivory carver.

ONE WHO TRIES.—The 30th July, 1865, was a Sunday. You should write small, delicate round-hand copies. Your writing is not formed.

FAITHFUL MONARCH.—A Mr. Pepper exhibited the ghost illusion at the Royal Polytechnic Institution in July, 1853. We know of no book on the subject.

WHITE MAY writes a very good hand, and a grateful well-expressed letter, for which we thank her. HOUSEKEEPER will have to send the bed to an upholsterer's to be cleaned and baked. She cannot set it right herself at the stage of which she complains. Her whole house will be filled with moths if not sent away at once.

NELL.—Any shells would be acceptable; they might be packed in small boxes put together into a parcel; even match-boxes would hold small ones. If you made up some little brightly coloured cotton-bags, and packed them up with the shells, the Sea Shell Mission Society would be glad to receive them. For all particulars respecting this and such like societies, read a book called "Restful Work for Youthful Hands" (Griffith, Farran, and Co., St Paul's Churchyard, E.C.).

ALLIED would have to call in the help of a carpenter. M. J. W. (Leith).—We thank you for your recipe for glazing linen, viz., to tie up a small piece of paraffin was in two or three folds of muslin, and rub it on the face of the iron when hot, and iron the linen with it so prepared. The powdered borax is mixed with our correspondent amongst the dry starch, and she mixes all together with cold water, adding the turpentine at the last, and then prepares the iron as described. Although we have given the above recipe, because so continually asked for it, it is only fair to say that many regard this method of producing a beautiful glaze on linen as tending to destroy it.

NARCISSA.—The aunt takes precedence of the niece; the second generation can never supplant the first. The daughters of the house rank next after their eldest brother's wife, before their younger brothers and their wives, and before their nieces, whether the children of their eldest or of their youngest brothers. The eldest son of an earl, for example, is Lord So and So, the younger sons are Honourables only; but all the sisters take such rank as their eldest brother bore during their father's lifetime; and when he succeeds to their father's full honours, the sisters still retain their birth rank as it was, and take precedence immediately after the eldest brother and wife, he being head of the family in his father's place, and the rising generation take rank after their aunts. 2. Your pen-and-ink drawings on porcelain must be baked. We do not advertise manufactories.

A. G.—See our answer to May W.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE country lanes and breezy downs of St. Margaret-atte-Cliffe had seldom been trodden by a more lonely creature than was Evelyn Hope on the days succeeding the dénouement with Algy. She took long and solitary walks all day, going over and over again the dismal round. Her happy life was suddenly devastated. And yet it was by no calamity; rather by what many women would have considered a lucky turn in Fortune's wheel. Wealth and an assured home were placed within her reach; and by some strange irony this very circumstance drove her forth from the good things of this life she already possessed.

For Evelyn could not stay at The Elms; that became clear to her very speedily. Mrs. Lancaster should not be separated from her only son, Dottie from her adored brother, whose home-coming after his college course had been so eagerly anticipated by both. Besides, these two dear friends, who had given her so much care and love, seemed now suddenly, cruelly estranged from the desolate girl. Mrs. Lancaster's love for her orphan niece was fought down by her idolatry of her son, her anger at the baffling of his hopes. Dottie, too, thought Evelyn wayward, unreasonable, and unkind to spoil the fair scheme of life that opened so temptingly for all. Neither could understand Evelyn's refusal. Not care for Algy! she easily could if she tried; it was altogether inconceivable that she should not. So they hardened their hearts against her, thinking, perhaps, that this was one way of driving her to consent to what would be so greatly to her own advantage.

"For Evelyn has only two hundred a year of her own," said Mrs. Lancaster to Dottie; "all very ample when she lives with us, but if anything happened to me, where would she be, I should like to know, with her expensive tastes? The child must be mad to refuse Algy."

Dottie shook her head, and had recourse to tears once more.

Meanwhile Evelyn felt she had imperative need of advice and help from somebody, now that her own familiar friends had turned against her. Her uncle, Mr. Austin Hope, was in Italy, an open fly and a neat familiar on the head of its solitary occupant.

"It can't be Miss Wentworth already!" thought the girl, with an eager throb of excitement, and she pressed forward to the roadside.

Miss Wentworth had seen Evelyn, and imperiously stopping the driver, had jumped out, crossed the stile, and hurried to meet her. Never had the delicate, withered face looked so kind and welcome as now.

"Come to the hotel in time to catch the three o'clock up train," ordered Miss Wentworth, calling to the flyman, after her embrace with Evelyn. "Now, my dear, you must tell me more about all this. Let us go a walk on the cliffs before lunch-time."

"How good you are to come to me!" cried Evelyn. "Oh, I have been so wretched even since Friday."

"And you did not foresee it?"

"No; how could I? You see, Miss Wentworth, Algy and I have been like brother and sister ever since we were children together. He never used to have such a thought till quite lately."

"Ah, he had been away from you," pondered Miss Wentworth; "you met with a little of the old familiarity rubbed off; well, it can't be helped. And so his mother and sister do not take it in good part?"

"Auntie is very angry with me for the first time in her life. Dottie is not so angry, but is very miserable and reproachful. I don't know how to bear grieving them."

"Ah, well, my dear, it is natural enough, but time will mend all that. Do not fret too much over it. And as for Mr. Algernon—is it quite out of the question?"

"Perfectly," assured Evelyn. "I am fond of him, but not in that way, and I never could be. I have always looked on him as a sort of younger brother, to laugh and amuse myself with. We don't sympathise in any of the earnest things of life. Oh no, I could not marry him."

The elder lady's worn face had grown and she was never much inclined to confide in him, as the reader knows. Who else was there? None of their home neighbours would be suitable. Suddenly she thought of Miss Wentworth. The American lady had been with them all through the Engelberg stay; she knew the situation, she was shrewd and kind. Evelyn would write to her London address.

The letter was forthwith written and posted; and while Evelyn was wandering forlornly over the breezy fields on the following morning, she caught sight of coming from the station, a blue bonnet that looked familiar on the head of its solitary occupant.

"It can't be Miss Wentworth already!" thought the girl, with an eager throb of excitement, and she pressed forward to the roadside.

Miss Wentworth had seen Evelyn, and imperiously stopping the driver, had jumped out, crossed the stile, and hurried to meet her. Never had the delicate, withered face looked so kind and welcome as now.

"Come to the hotel in time to catch the three o'clock up train," ordered Miss Wentworth, calling to the flyman, after her embrace with Evelyn. "Now, my dear, you must tell me more about all this. Let us go a walk on the cliffs before lunch-time."

"How good you are to come to me!" cried Evelyn. "Oh, I have been so wretched even since Friday."

"And you did not foresee it?"

"No; how could I? You see, Miss Wentworth, Algy and I have been like brother and sister ever since we were children together. He never used to have such a thought till quite lately."

"Ah, he had been away from you," pondered Miss Wentworth; "you met with a little of the old familiarity rubbed off; well, it can't be helped. And so his mother and sister do not take it in good part?"

"Auntie is very angry with me for the first time in her life. Dottie is not so angry, but is very miserable and reproachful. I don't know how to bear grieving them."

"Ah, well, my dear, it is natural enough, but time will mend all that. Do not fret too much over it. And as for Mr. Algernon—is it quite out of the question?"

"Perfectly," assured Evelyn. "I am fond of him, but not in that way, and I never could be. I have always looked on him as a sort of younger brother, to laugh and amuse myself with. We don't sympathise in any of the earnest things of life. Oh no, I could not marry him."

The elder lady's worn face had grown sadder as she listened, with one thin hand drawn inside Evelyn's arm.

"Better no marriage than an uncongenial one, my dear child. Ah, Evelyn, I could tell you a story of my own life to show I think with you on that point. Don't dread being an old maid so much as marrying for the sake of a home, or because people try to worry you into it. If you are thoroughly sure about it, then just go your own way. And I think you are right; for I don't believe in first cousins marrying. However, that's all beside the point. You are to come back with me to London, and stay with me for the present. Don't say a word; I shall take no denial. I have delightful rooms in Bayswater; we will make them homelike, you shall cheer me up, and we will be as happy as possible. You shall show the Amuhican all about this London of yours. So go and pack up your boxes while I make it straight with Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie. I see them down on the beach yonder."

Miss Wentworth would take no denial. She waved aside all difficulties, and to poor Evelyn her proposal seemed like a way of escape from a terrible dilemma. For how could she go back to The Elms feeling that she was exiling the son of the house, and at cross purposes with her aunt and cousin? She would be utterly wretched. The future seemed very dark, but for the present she needed shelter and leisure to think what she would do, unembarrassed by the daily contact that had grown so painful.

Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie were much astonished to see Miss Wentworth descending from the cliffs; but they had little to oppose when she explained her scheme with the brevity and directness peculiar to her.

"Isn't it a grievous thing now, about poor Algy, Miss Wentworth?" appealed Mrs. Lancaster. But the American lady shook her head.

"I never enter into family quarrels. I am here only to relieve Evelyn and yourself from what must be a most unpleasant position, for the next month or two," she said. "You and she can consider what is best to be done afterwards."

So all four ladies ate their luncheon together, pretending hypocritically that Evelyn was going on a little visit of civility and pleasure to Miss Wentworth; pretending, as women have to pretend under such circumstances, and never dwelling on the pain and distress underlying it all. Mrs. Lancaster kissed the girl kindly enough when they parted, and Dottie entirely broke down. She clung round Evelyn's neck in a passion of tears.

"Nothing else could have parted us—nothing—nothing. Oh Evelyn, won't you be my sister? Do think how happy we should all be at The Elms!"

Evelyn would not trust herself to speak, and was thankful to be driven away from the inn. Miss Wentworth did not worry her with questions, but showed her the tenderest consideration on the journey, letting her alone, save for little attentions to every detail of her comfort.

"After all, my dear, it is a great blessing she is gone," said Mrs. Lancaster to Dottie. "Now we can write to your brother at once, and arrange to meet him at The Elms to-morrow; I daresay, too, separation from us will be the very best thing for Evelyn. It will bring her to a right state of feeling, and lead her to appreciate what she is throwing away."

"I hope so," said Dorothy; but there was very little hope in her voice.

"I can't help thinking," mused Mrs. Lancaster, "that Mrs. Allingham West must have set her against Algy."

"Why, mother, Mrs. West did not so much as know of Algy's existence."

"Don't you be too sure of that," retorted the elder lady. "And I daresay, what with her thinking herself so clever, because of writing that book and all, she set up Evelyn with the idea that Algy was beneath her, because he doesn't choose to write verses. Poor dear fellow!"

"I don't think Mrs. Allingham West 'set up' Evelyn at all," replied Dottie.

But Mrs. Lancaster was penetrated by her new idea, and became hopeful by degrees that when the pernicious influence of Mrs. West should have withdrawn its baleful glamour, the star of Algy would rise triumphantly in the horizon.

It is wonderful how the mildest of women can suddenly become a very lioness for fury when she thinks her offspring is injured! Poor Evelyn had not had sufficient experience of human nature to understand this transformation of her good-tempered, easy-going aunt, whom she had always regarded as pliant and kindly to the last degree. The love between aunt and niece, while not perhaps very intense or sympathetic in character, had grown through long years of intercourse, and Evelyn felt as though part of her old self had fallen from her.

Her stay with Miss Wentworth had, nevertheless, fresh pleasures of its own.

It was something entirely new for Evelyn to be brought into hourly contact with a mind possessing superior stores of information. At The Elms, in her debating society, among her familiar friends, she had always been the leader—admired, looked up to, honoured, praised, and flattered. Her stock of knowledge, to use a familiar expression, "went a very long way" among these satellites; with Miss Wentworth it went a very short way indeed.

One point in which this was particularly manifest was in the very little Evelyn knew about London itself and its historical associations. Miss Wentworth was full of them to her very finger-tips, and was astounded when she mentioned this and that historical event to find that Evelyn did not know where it had taken place.

"Never been to the Tower of London!" she ejaculated, opening her bright black eyes to their fullest extent. "What! never been in the Beauchamp Tower?"

"No," acknowledged Evelyn; "I always thought it wasn't the thing to do; a sort of thing excursionists did on Bank Holidays."

"This isn't a Bank Holiday, so put on your hat at once," ordered Miss Wentworth. And Evelyn, to her surprise, found herself enjoying a most delightful morning—a morning rich in imaginative pictures of the most thrilling description, as she wandered through the historic scenes, and studied the inscriptions—pathetic past all telling—on the walls of that prison where poor Lady Jane Grey spent the last days of her ebbing life. Her companion knew exactly what to see and how to see it.

"Why, I have always thought I would see the Tower of London the very first thing when I came to England. I have just dreamed of it," she said, in reply to Evelyn's expression of surprise.

Westminster Abbey, the National Gallery, the British Museum, Hampton Court—all these places Evelyn found herself obliged to explore anew, and to examine by the help of a stranger's appreciation. November is not usually considered an ideal month in which to go sight-seeing in London, but as a matter of fact it often presents rich store of mild and sunshiny days, and it did so in the year of Miss Wentworth's visit to Europe. The two ladies made good use of their mornings; the close of the brief afternoon found them at home again, enjoying their cup of tea with full zest after their labours. Then came long, cosy evenings, when they read in turn, and Evelyn drank in fresh thought and knowledge. For her clever friend soon found out what she had not read that she ought to read without delay, and supplied the lack as best she could. Miss Wentworth purposely discouraged Evelyn from writing; her mind required diversion, and she was just in a condition to derive benefit from new ideas and new information.

Never was "Day-dreams" mentioned between them. No further reviews had appeared, though Evelyn furtively searched the papers. It seemed to have sunk absolutely from sight and sound, like a stone tossed into a lake and causing only a momentary ripple. But one day they chanced to pass Messrs. Dalrymple's monster establishment, and Evelyn broke out—

"That was where they published my wretched book."

"Don't you want to go in and ask how it is selling?" suggested Miss Wentworth.

"No! I don't believe one copy has been sold, except those I had myself! I have never heard a word about it from Mr. Dalrymple, or had a penny back out of what I spent."

Evelyn was incorrect in her supposition. Six copies had been sold; people had bought them for presents, lured by the pretty cover. She had given away or procured for her personal use some fifty copies more. The remaining four hundred and forty-four copies—what of their fate?

Where do the books go, published by young authors at their own risk?

PROPOSING TO A PRINCESS.

The young Count Apraxin was bold enough to make a declaration of love to Anne Petrowna, the Princess Royal of Russia. Having received an answer that destroyed all hopes of his success, he waited till he found her alone, threw himself at her feet, presented his sword, and begged her to end his sufferings by plunging it in his heart.

"Give it me," said Petrowna, in the coolest manner; "give it me, and you shall see that the daughter of your emperor wants neither courage nor resolution to punish a forward fellow who forgets the difference between her and himself."

He showed himself a bragger, sheathed his sword, and begged the princess would pardon a delirium, the effect of her charms.

Anne pardoned him, but held him up to ridicule by telling the incident to every one at Court.

MARRIED BY MISTAKE.

Baron de Bourgoing, a well-known French diplomatist, was a widower, with a daughter too young to take her place in society. A story which he told one day at dinner before half-a-dozen guests, will better than any description give an idea of his unconventional bonhomie and simple chivalry.

"I am exceedingly distract," he said, "and my marriage was the result of my absence of mind. When I was a young man I fell in love with a charming girl I used to meet at balls and parties. I found out that she reciprocated my sentiments, and obtained the permission to speak to her father. The next morning I called on him, was shown into his study, and presented myself as a suitor for his daughter's hand."

"The old gentleman seemed surprised at first, but when I had assured him of the sincerity and stability of my affection, he offered no further objection, and, accepting me as his son-in-law, sent for his daughter.

"As the door opened I ran to meet my fiancée—it was another young lady—your mother, my child," he continued, suavely smiling at Mlle. de Bourgoing. "I had abstractedly come to the wrong house, pressed my suit with the wrong father, and been given the wrong wife; but of course I could not retract, or put upon the young person the indignity of refusing her."

"She did not live long," he added, with great serenity. "Pray take some more wine."

THE COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

In reading authors, if you find
Bright passages which strike the mind,
And which perhaps you may have reason
To think of at another season,
Don't be contented with the sight,
But put them down in black and white.

CELEBRATED MONUMENTS OF EMINENT WOMEN.

THE MONUMENT OF LADY IDONEA, CALLED "THE PERCY SHRINE."

HE remarkably beautiful monument known as "The Percy Shrine," at Beverley Minster, is probably the most exquisite work of art, erected to commemorate a woman, now existing in this country; and therefore, although the history attached to it is somewhat obscure, it should interest our girls.

"The Percy Shrine" is situated between the columns which support the arch leading from the choir into the north little transept in the noble church of St. John the Baptist, at Beverley, better known as Beverley Minster. It is undoubtedly a work of the time of Edward III., and if our readers will refer to the papers upon architecture which appeared in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, with our view of the Percy Shrine before them, they will see at once that it exhibits in a very marked manner all the characteristics therein described as being peculiar to what is called the "Curvilinear Decorated" development of "the Second Pointed" style—such, for instance, as the flowing lines of the tracery, the naturalistic foliage, etc. Now we refer to this because, as we shall show, a want of architectural knowledge has led several very eminent writers upon Beverley Minster to fall into the most singular errors with regard to the history of this monument, and to create an amount of confusion and doubt which has resulted in rendering it difficult to separate what is simply conjectural from what are the known facts concerning the lady whose mortal remains await the Resurrection beneath this exquisite tomb. Amongst those who have helped to create the confusion to which we have alluded, is no less a man than the celebrated Bishop Percy of Dromore, who, it appears, convinced himself and many others that the Percy Shrine commemorates Lady Maud Percy, wife of the fourth Earl Percy. But this Lady Maud did not die until the commencement of the sixteenth century, so how is it possible that she can be commemorated by a monument which is evidently a work of the fourteenth century, and which, moreover, has upon it the arms of Edward III. and of the Clifford family, to which she was in no way related?

Gough, the antiquary, singularly enough, fell into the same mistake, because he saw a small tomb opened which stood under the arch of the Percy Shrine, and which he, for some reason, concluded to contain the body of Lady Maud; but as Polson, in his excellent history of Beverley, points out, the tomb in question had nothing to do with the Percy Shrine, but had simply been removed to this site at a much later period than that of its erection, and the body was that of a girl about twelve years of age! Another member of the Percy family whom this shrine has been supposed to commemorate is Lady Eleanor Percy, wife of the third Earl Percy, who was son of the celebrated Hotspur; but here again neither the architecture nor the heraldry would agree with the conjecture, as this lady was living in the fifteenth century. Polson has undoubtedly settled the point as to the identity of the lady to whom this monument was erected. She was the Lady Idonea, wife of Henry, second Lord Percy, and daughter of Lord Robert Clifford. This lady died in 1365, having survived her husband fourteen years. She was a very charitable and religious woman, and left behind her such a reputation that, at the close of the fourteenth century, a special statute was enacted by Archbishop Arundel, that commemorative services should be continued as a mark of the reverence and affection paid to her memory. Now these facts known concerning the Lady Idonea would in every way explain what we see of the shrine. It is just the costly kind of monument that would be erected to a liberal benefactor of her Church. Its date is evidently the latter half of the fourteenth century. Lady Idonea was a daughter of Lord Clifford, hence the Clifford arms upon the monument, and as Edward III. was the reigning king, it is in no way astonishing that his statuette and arms find a place amongst its numerous and beautiful carvings. Polson relates a rather singular corroboration of these facts. When the monument was being repaired some years back a penny of Edward III. was found embedded in the stonework; discoveries of coins enclosed in the stonework of ancient buildings are not uncommon; at times, no doubt, they were purposely deposited, as we still to this day place them within the cavity of the foundation stone of a building, but probably it may frequently have happened that the stonemason was in want of what is called a "dowel"—that is, a little piece of metal or some other hard material to clasp securely together the two pieces of stone which he wanted to join. Oyster shells and flint stones were most commonly used for the purpose, and our girls will perhaps be surprised to hear that the gorgeous roof of Henry VII.'s chapel is, to a great extent, held together by native oyster shells. Now, the mason who was erecting the beautiful Percy Shrine may have been unable to find an oyster shell or flint stone which exactly suited, and so he put his hand into his pocket and took out a penny, which made the kind of dowel he required, never for a moment supposing that what he was doing would furnish an interesting proof of the date of his work. It will be said at once, "Why, a penny was ever so much more valuable in the fourteenth century than it is now, so it is not likely that a mason would have used one for such a purpose." To any of our readers who would advance this argument we say, go to Beverley Minster, get a ladder and climb to the top of the Percy Shrine, then look down upon it, and what do you notice? Why, this remarkable fact, that every finial, crocket and pinnacle is as carefully finished at the back—where it cannot possibly be seen from below—as it is in front; and we would ask, Would a man who did his work in such a style as this hesitate at making use of a penny or a shilling if he thought it would make a better dowel than an oyster shell?

Unfortunately no inscription remains upon the Percy Shrine, and if ever there was a raised tomb beneath it, it has disappeared. Probably, however, from its being called a shrine, it may have served the purpose of what was called an "Easter sepulchre"; that is to say, a canopy beneath which, in the Middle Ages, a statue of the Saviour, as He was laid in the tomb, was placed on Good Friday evening. It was thought in old times to be a great honour to have a monument used for such a purpose, and many magnificent examples still exist. Of course when this was the case no recumbent statue could be placed upon the monument.

When Leland, the antiquary, visited Beverley Minster shortly after the Reformation, he says, "there were three Percy monuments in the choir of the Minster," but where the other two could have stood it is difficult to say. It is just possible that he may have written from memory, and may have got the idea into his head that the two other fine Percy monuments existing in the church were in the choir. One of these monuments bears a striking resemblance to the Percy Shrine, though it is earlier in date and less elaborate. A strange legend is associated with it, which is not unlike Longfellow's "Monk and the Little Bird," in the "Golden Legend." Two beautiful sisters enter the convent, and are remarkable for their saintly lives, when suddenly, and without any notice, they are seen to glide out of the chapel. Years after they are discovered sleeping in the tower, and have no idea of the passage of time. A poem upon this subject was published some sixty years back, which is given at full length in Polson's "History of Beverley," but what foundation there is for the legend, or why this monument is called the tomb of "The Sisters of Beverley," it is impossible to say. It may have been erected to the memory of two ladies of the Percy family, but if so they could not have been nuns attached to Beverley Minster, inasmuch as that church was a collegiate establishment, and never at any time a convent of nuns.

MY LADY'S REST.

By FLORENCE WILLSON.

CHAPTER II.
LADY CONSTANCE.

ASHDEANE was a quiet little country parish, where life was monotonous, and marked by few changes, except the unavoidable ones worked by Time's busy hand, in the growth of one generation and the passing away of another, as some of the village trees spread into larger proportions, whilst the old poplars and elms were swept away by some sudden storm, and so made room for the younger ones.

When Mr. Brown had come, some ten years ago, to the vicarage, the villagers felt rather doubtful of his "new-fangled ways," but very soon this feeling vanished under the influence of his kindly sympathy and never-tiring interest in their welfare, temporal as well as spiritual, and there was not much they would have hesitated to do to please their vicar.

THE PERCY SHRINE IN BEVERLEY MINSTER.

A new curate had just come to Ashdeane, and everyone was wondering what he would be like. They were glad that he was not just fresh from college, but had been for several years curate in a manufacturing district in the North, where he must have gathered some experience, they thought.

The little church was very full the first Sunday morning after his arrival, and there was quite a rustle of expectation when he entered the church. One old man remarked, in a very audible whisper to his neighbour, that the "new parson" was "nought but a boy"; and very young he looked indeed—much younger in his surplice than in his out-of-door dress, as I had first seen him at the vicarage.

In the evening he preached a plain practical sermon in simple words, which seemed to go straight to his hearers' hearts, and which, short as it was, contained more instruction and help for ordinary work-a-day lives than most sermons heard in that little church.

The vicar had been anxious for Mr. Yorke to take up his quarters with him for a time until he felt more at home amongst his new people and his work; but the curate preferred going at once to the lodgings in the village which Miss Brown had found for him; but much of his time was spent with us, and he became a favourite with us all.

The vicar was rather afraid at first that Mr. Yorke would have too many new plans and ideas, which would not work well in such a quiet little parish; but he did not like to damp his ardour by dwelling on his doubts of his success, but only advised him not to start too many things at first, lest the effort to keep them going might prove too much for him.

But Mr. Yorke seemed determined to rouse up the good folk of Ashdeane, and was not afraid of work for himself, and soon all his time was fully occupied, and new life was infused into the little community by his exertions. Mrs. Deane took a great fancy to the young curate; and even her nearest neighbour, Miss Marchmont, who never praised or liked anyone, admitted that Mr. Yorke was "an estimable young man, anxious to do right, if only he had a vicar who could guide and direct him," and this from her was great praise indeed.

I was a very frequent visitor at Mrs. Deane's, and Dandy grew quite accustomed to me, and treated me in a condescendingly affable manner; but I fancy he never forgot the day when I turned him out of his place in front of the kitchen fire, although he was large-minded enough to let bygones be bygones, and tolerated my presence.

Mrs. Deane had introduced me to Miss Marchmont, and begged me to go and see her sometimes, as she was not popular, and therefore had a lonely life, which left her too much leisure to dwell on her trials and grievances.

Her father had been in the army, and her young days had been spent pleasantly enough in India, where, as a colonel's daughter, she had been made a good deal of, and it was said had been engaged to a major in her father's regiment.

When the colonel died he left little but debts behind him, and Miss Marchmont had to exert herself to earn her own living (the major having jilted her, and shortly afterwards married a wealthy widow), but her disposition was soured by disappointment, and she had no friends in the true sense of the word; even kind Mrs. Deane she kept at arm's length from her.

She had a way of making one feel uncomfortable, which was not pleasant nor attractive. I remember one afternoon she asked me to stay and have tea with her, and I at first refused, but, for fear of offending her, at last I said I would stay, and scarcely had I sat down again when Mr. Yorke appeared.

Miss Marchmont smiled very meaningfully at me, and said—

"Now you are rewarded, my dear, for spending an hour or so with a tiresome old woman; I think a little bird must have whispered to you that Mr. Yorke was coming, and that you would be spared a tête-à-tête with me."

"Oh! Mr. Yorke and I meet so often," I said, rather quickly, for I felt vexed, "that we offer no novel attractions to each other, Miss Marchmont, I assure you."

Mr. Yorke laughed, and turning to Miss Marchmont began to talk to her about some of his various parochial schemes, in which, strange to say, she seemed to be more or less interested, and as I listened my ruffled feelings grew more composed, and I soon forgot the passing annoyance.

It was strange that Miss Marchmont always had a way of rubbing people up the wrong way, and saying disagreeable things specially suited to each of her visitors. I always felt when with her as if I was being pricked all over with a sharp needle in the most sensitive places. I believe Mrs. Deane was the only person who cherished the least feeling of regard for her, and even she felt more respect for her highly honourable character than any warm feeling of sympathy with her as a friend, and one who had had her share of troubles and trials in her way through life, as she herself had had, although the effect on one character had been to soften and refine it and on the other to harden and sour it.

I was glad that when I said good-bye to Miss Marchmont and turned homewards Mr. Yorke did not accompany me; not that I minded him in the least, but I wished for no further remarks on our intimacy, such as I felt trembled on Miss Marchmont's lips, ready for utterance on the slightest provocation.

As I walked home I wondered if I should ever develop into such a disagreeable character, and hoped not; even if I had as much trouble in my life, I trusted I should benefit by it, and become more lovable and gentle, like Mrs. Deane, whose sweet disposition contrasted so favourably with poor Miss Marchmont.

The next day the vicar told me that "The Family" was expected every day at Ashdeane Manor House, and that My Lady's visit would create much excitement amongst the inmates of the cottages, with whom it was the great event of the year.

"Oh!" I exclaimed, "how I should like to see her; I have heard so much about her! Do you think it likely I shall, Mr. Brown?"

"Certainly," he said; "you are pretty sure not only of meeting her here, but also in your rambles about the country roads, for she drives and walks about a great deal whilst staying at the Manor."

"What an active old lady she must be!" I said, surprised to hear of her country walks. "We young people are a very degenerate race, I am afraid; at her age we should not care to do more than drive in an easy carriage. The last generation show us a good example."

"Why do you imagine that My Lady is so very old?" asked the vicar.

"Why, she built those houses of rest a very long time ago, and appointed all the present inmates," I replied, wondering at the question.

"Yes, quite true; I had forgotten," answered Mr. Brown, with a peculiar smile. "I wonder what you will think of her when you first see her!"

Next day I made my way to Mrs. Deane, full of curiosity as to My Lady's movements, when she expected her, etc.

"If she has actually arrived we may have a visit from her this afternoon," said Mrs. Deane; "she generally comes at once to see how we have all been getting on since her last visit, and she always goes first to Miss Marchmont."

"Why does she do that?" I exclaimed. "I should have thought she would have gone first to you, Mrs. Deane, whom she must like better."

"My Lady is very kind," said Mrs. Deane, "and knows that Miss Marchmont has not many friends, and so she pays her that little compliment; and I can assure you it is fully appreciated by the poor thing."

"Few people would be so considerate," I said. "How charming My Lady must be! I hope she will soon come."

"Perhaps she is here already, my dear; I hear a ring at the door, and Dandy is barking in great excitement, and he always welcomes Lady Constance in a noisy manner; he is very fond of her, and indeed—"

I looked up as Mrs. Deane suddenly ceased speaking, and advanced with a bright smile to receive a visitor, who had entered the room unannounced—a tall, slight girl with a graceful carriage and lovely face, and dressed very simply in a plain grey dress.

All this I took in at a glance, and wondered who the fair stranger could be, when, to my astonishment, I heard Mrs. Deane say—

"How kind of you to come so soon to see me, Lady Constance! I was just speaking about you to my young friend Barbara Lawrence, who has been very anxious to see you, having heard so much of you."

"Nothing very bad, I hope, Miss Lawrence," said My Lady, with a glance of amusement at my astonishment (all too apparent) at something about her; what she could not guess. "You seem to have expected to see a very peculiar person—I do not answer to the description given of me. Come, Mrs. Deane, what wicked things have you been saying of me?"

Mrs. Deane laughed, and I tried to apologise as best I might, murmuring that I had fancied she was much older—in fact, quite an—

"Old woman," said My Lady, finishing my hesitating words for me; "well, that was not anything very bad after all; I may live to be old some day."

"I heard so much from everyone about what had been done by Lady Bolton in years gone by, that I fancied some way or other that you were the same person."

"And you were surprised that I was not my grandmother," said My Lady, and the subject dropped.

Great was the excitement in Ashdeane when it was known that Lady Constance was going to be married, and not to a titled man, but to a rich commoner, a Mr. Willoughby, who owned a fine property near Ashdeane, so that Lady Constance's marriage would not take her away from her old home. Miss Marchmont was deeply interested in the news, although she could not help saying that she was sorry Lady Constance was not marrying one of her own rank. Noblesse oblige was a motto not sufficiently thought of in these days, when the proper barriers of rank were broken down, and society turned upside down.

No one seemed much impressed by this sadly revolutionary tendency of the age, least of all Lady Constance, who laughingly assured Miss Marchmont that Mr. Willoughby was equal to any peer in the land, and that she would be of the same opinion when she was introduced to him.

And Miss Marchmont was so gratified to think that she should have a visit from Lady Constance's future husband that no one ever heard her allude to the inequality in rank which had at first so grieved her aristocratic feelings.

a lot of petty waste, petty pilfering, petty carelessness, that word "over" is weighted with! One would think that it must be almost heavy enough by this date in the world's history to have tumbled itself "over" into some good deep pit, and smothered itself wholesomely out of sight.

Apropos of its pilfering propensities, there is a good anecdote to be told, or rather, it might be more true to call it a bad one, of "over's" achievements in this line.

Once upon a time there was a good old Quaker lady, a kind, gentle old lady, who knew herself not to be perfect, and therefore did not expect other folks to be so either. But as she also knew that she tried to do her duty by those about her, so she considered that she had a right to the same treatment from them.

Well, this pink-cheeked, silver-haired old lady had the custom of having a cake made every week for First Day. A large cake, for she was of a hospitable, generous nature, and liked to have a slice for a neighbour here, a child there, a friend who came in for a chat; and of course the maker and her fellow-servants always came in for their share, as of all the other good things going in the house.

The simple-minded, worthy Quakeress was her own housekeeper, and gave out the materials for this weekly cake herself; and every week, with the most methodical regularity and exactitude, the same number of eggs, the same weight of all the other good ingredients. And her worthy, faithful old cook every week sent up a cake looking like the twin-brother of the last.

But the old cook died, and there followed a few weeks' interregnum in the reign of cakes. Then a new cook took the old cook's place: a new cook, who had a mental dictionary, with the word "over" written in it large!

Saturday came, and the dear old Quaker dame spent her usual twenty minutes weighing out sugar and peel, sultanas, and almonds, and flour, in her store cupboard. Then she walked, in her soft, stately fashion, past the housemaid's pantry into the kitchen, with her maid following with the well-filled bowl.

"Here are the materials for thee, cook, and yonder tin is the one in which thee wilt be good enough to bake the cake."

"Yes, ma'am," said the new cook. And she mixed the ingredients given her, and she baked a cake in the big tin.

So far, so good, apparently; but when that cake appeared on the dining-room tea-table, it looked like enough to its predecessors to be reckoned for their brother, perhaps, but certainly not for their twin-brother. Next week it could not have done more than claim cousinship. And in a very short time it was so unlike the original type, that it would have been absurd for it to pretend to any relationship at all. From a most royal-like king of a cake it had dwindled down to a poor little poverty-stricken beggar-boy sort of an affair, and nothing like so good in quality as many a little beggar-boy would be if he had as fair a chance. The plums and peel, and eggs and butter had shrivelled away in even greater proportion than the flour.

Once, and twice, and thrice the old Quakeress spoke about this strange thing to the new cook; but she spoke so mildly and gently that her words were only thought upon as words, and the cake and the cook went on in their foolish ways—ways as unlike the ways of the old cook and the old cake as it was possible for them to be. Then the patient but wise old lady acted.

Once more it was Saturday evening, and the new little cake—it was a very little one this week—was brought into the parlour, to be put away in the tin in the sideboard cupboard ready for the next day's tea. The old lady sighed softly as her eyes rested on it, and there came a second sigh as she lifted it from the plate, and even—don't be too shocked—even gave a tiny little sniff at it. There had been never any need to give sniffs at those grand old predecessors; they had given forth such a full, rich aroma while in the oven, such a gloriously delicious steam as they came forth piping hot, that the whole house, even to its roomy attics, and the white-shelved apple-loft, had been redolent of the generous perfume.

But for the poor little starvelings of the present—well, they had to be sniffed at to discover whether they could truthfully be called cakes at all, and so the owner of this latest one gave it just a tiny, little, delicate sniff as she slowly weighed it in her hand, before dropping it into the tin which used to hold it "just comfortably," but which now swallowed it up as a big money-box does a threepenny-bit.

But wait; this last of the dwindling race never got to the bottom of those cavernous depths at all. When the lady had lowered it half-way down she lifted it out again, once more deposited it on the plate upon which it had made its journey from the kitchen to the dining-room, and forthwith resolved to give it a journey back again.

The punctual, precise, orderly old lady had never been known to go into her kitchen on a Saturday afternoon, and her rules and regulations were almost as the laws of the Medes and Persians that alter not. Those who respected themselves as truly as she respected herself, those who served her not with eye service, but as serving the Lord, took no advantage of this circumstance in their mistress's habits; but the mean-spirited, and base, and cowardly, and idle, and dishonourable did. The new cook did, and she introduced accordingly into her mistress's life that first exception that is said to prove the rule.

The velvet shod, drab merino gowned, gently moving old lady lifted the willow patterned plate in her hand, and carried it with its contents across the hall, down the passage, and into the kitchen.

Cook's back was towards the door; she was in the act of closely inspecting something in the oven, but she heard the turning of the handle, and called out boldly—

"That's right; come along, Sue; you're in the very nick of time, so let's have our tea, and you shall have as jolly a slice of good cake as you ever eat in your life. This will cut prime, I guess. I will say this, missis ain't stingy, and she did give out such rare good peel and butter this—"

Yes, there came a stammer there, and then a full stop, for by this time she had contrived to slide the tin she had in the oven down to the door, to get a good hold of it with a cloth, and to straighten her back, and turn round with it in her hands.

For some moments she stood there with it in her hands, big, heavy, hot thing as it was. It was not one of her fellow-servants who stood there facing her so quietly, as she had expected, but her mistress.

Cook would have liked to drop the cake. If it were smashed to bits, crumbled to atoms, the witness against her would certainly be damaged in character, and the evidence could not be so positive. But, strange and incredible as the statement may appear, she could not drop it with those calm grey eyes fixed so steadfastly upon her. Whether the eyes mesmerised her, or only exercised the powerful moral force that upright rectitude possesses in such a marvellous degree, readers can decide for themselves. This much is certain, at any rate, that Mrs. Cook had to forego her desperate desire to allow the cake to go crashing to the floor, and had, instead, to walk meekly to the table, and place it upon it for full view and examination. Then she stood with lowered eyelids, folding up her hands in her apron, waiting for "what next?"

The what next was so long in coming that she could bear the silence no longer, at last, and blurted out, with cheeks blazing like crimson peonies—

"I've never had missises as minded, when there was a bit of anything over, the servants having the good of it in the kitchen."

"Was that cake a bit over?" asked the soft voice, quietly.

"Ye—yes, mum."

"Ah-h-h! Then, cook, thee wilt please me better if thou wilt keep the proper cake, and give me the bit over this week. And this day month thou wilt find a place, if it pleases thee, where the mistress thereof knoweth no better management than to have 'bits over.' And it will please me to have another cook who knoweth not the unuseful art to make them. And so good even to you, cook."

What happened after, what cook did, thought, said, then and in the future; what further the old, wise Quaker lady did, and the future history of her cakes, rumour saith not. You have now the whole anecdote of the "Bit Over," as many a year ago I heard it graphically narrated by my mother's lips. I know no more, and so neither can those to whom it is thus repeated; but the picture, in its way, is as perfect as it can be, I have ever thought, and so, I hope, do you.

GRACE STEBBING.

MY WORK BASKET.

FIG. 1.—STOCKING IN FANCY KNITTING.

MATERIALS—Fine black silk, three shades of pink, and three of olive for the embroidery.

As it would not be advisable for any one inexperienced in making plain knitted stockings to undertake a pair in fancy knitting, it is needless for us to enter into fuller details than those now given.

The illustrations show that two fancy patterns are used—a lozenge-shaped one up the front, and one of vandyke stripes for the back and sides. The description of these patterns will be given later, but it is necessary to notice here that 39 stitches are needed for the lozenge pattern, and 8 stitches for each of the vandyke stripes; and 2 purl stitches must be made on each side of the lozenge pattern, so as to make a line of separation between the two fancy patterns.

After casting on the number of stitches required, knit 8 plain rows.

9th Row.—Pass the silk twice over the needle, and knit 2 together.

10th Row knitted plain, making but one stitch of the double silk in last row, so as to form a hole.

Seven more plain rows are then knitted; after which the welt is doubled at the fancy row, the open stitches forming an edging of tiny loops; and placing the needles side by side, the two rows are knitted off together.

Beginning with a fresh needle, 2 more plain rows complete the welt.

The fancy knitting is now begun, the leg of the stocking being shaped in the usual way by intakes.

The gussets are in plain knitting, and are each commenced with one stitch made out of a stitch in preceding row, midway between the second and third vandyke patterns, counting from the front. The increase is always made at the end of the row nearest the front, and one stitch at a time, taken up as before, so that there may be no perceptible hole.

The added stitch is in every third row until there are 25 plain stitches on the needle. After this, every other row is increased until there are 41 plain stitches for each gusset.

The heel piece is now begun with ordinary plain and purl rows, backward and forward, including both gussets and the stitches between; the fancy patterns being left on the instep needle. The heel is then finished in the usual way, by gradually taking in the stitches of the gussets on each side; and when completed and the side stitches picked up, the foot is made in the ordinary manner, the fancy patterns being carried down the instep to the toe-piece, which, as well as the sole and sides of the foot, is entirely of plain knitting.

The embroidery on the gussets is in cross stitch, two threads each way, as in marking a stocking.

The colours employed are indicated on the design.

DIRECTIONS FOR WORKING THE VANDYKE PATTERN.

Cast on 8 stitches for each stripe.

1st Row.—Silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw slip stitch over; 5 plain; repeat.

2nd Row.—3 plain; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 4 plain; repeat.

3rd Row.—Silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; 2 plain; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 3 plain; repeat.

4th Row.—5 plain; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 2 plain; repeat.

5th Row.—Silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; 4 plain; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 1 plain; repeat.

6th Row.—7 plain; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; repeat.

DIRECTIONS FOR LOZENGE SHAPE PATTERN.

As there are two or three stitches employed in this pattern not in frequent use, we will explain them before giving the details.

Cross stitch at back.—This is made with 4 stitches; slip 2 on a third needle, placing it at the back of the others; knit the next 2; then purl those on extra needle.

Cross stitch in front.—This is worked the same as former, excepting that the extra needle is placed in front, and the stitches on it are knitted; the 2 on the regular needle are purled.

Three wound stitches.—This is worked in the following way: slip 3 stitches on right needle; pass the thread in front; slip the stitches back on the left needle; pass the thread forward; repeat this until the thread is wound round the needle 6 times, not too tightly, but evenly; then knit the 3 stitches.

Take 3 together—slip 1 stitch; knit 2 together; draw the slipped stitch over them.

DETAIL OF LOZENGE PATTERN.

Cast on 39 stitches.

1st Row.—Purl 2; 3 cross stitches at back; 3 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 3 plain; 3 cross stitches in front; purl 2.

2nd Row.—Purl 2; 14 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 3 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 14 plain; 2 purl.

3rd Row.—2 purl; 2 plain; 2 cross stitches at back; 2 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 7 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 2 plain; 2 cross stitches in front; 2 plain; 2 purl.

4th Row.—2 purl; 12 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 wound stitches; 2 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 12 plain; 2 purl.

5th Row.—2 purl; 2 cross stitches at the back; 3 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 9 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 3 plain; 2 cross stitches in front; 2 purl.

6th Row.—2 purl; 10 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 wound stitches; 1 plain; 3 wound stitches; 2 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 10 plain; 2 purl.

7th Row.—2 purl; 9 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 7 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 9 plain; 2 purl.

8th Row.—2 purl; 2 plain; 1 cross stitch at back; 2 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 3 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 1 plain; 3 wound stitches; 1 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 3 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 2 plain; 1 cross stitch in front; 2 plain; 2 purl.

9th Row.—2 purl; 7 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 5 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 3 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 5 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 7 plain; 2 purl.

10th Row.—2 purl; 6 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 wound stitches; 2 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 1 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 wound stitches; 2 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 6 plain; 2 purl.

11th Row.—2 purl; 1 cross stitch at the back; 1 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 9 plain; silk forward; take 3 together; silk forward; 9 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 1 plain; 1 cross stitch in front; 2 purl.

12th Row.—2 purl; 4 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 wound stitches; 1 plain; 3 wound stitches; 2 plain; silk forward; 1 plain; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 wound stitches; 1 plain; 3 wound stitches; 2 plain; knit 1; draw over; 4 plain; 2 purl.

21st Row.—2 purl; 15 plain; silk forward; slip 1; knit 1; draw over; 1 plain; take 2 together; silk forward; 15 plain; 2 purl.

22nd Row.—2 purl; 2 plain; 3 cross stitches in front; 2 plain; silk forward; take 3 together; silk forward; 2 plain; 3 cross stitches at back; 2 plain; 2 purl; repeat from 1st row.

FIG. 2.—MEDALLION FOR BLOTCHING CASE OR CENTRE OF CUSHION.

The foundation is of good sateen or satin, in rich cream colour. The embroidery is worked with fine floss silk and gold thread.

The colours required are rich red, bright dark blue, two shades of olive, two shades of light blue, and a bronze brown.

The centre letter (N) is worked with red silk. The letter M with dark blue. The leaves are embroidered in close dots. The larger leaves in dark olive, the smaller in the lighter shade. The lower flowers in pale blue, the upper ones in a darker shade. The stems are evenly sewed over with the bronze brown.

All the dots are worked with gold thread. The band of the coronet is embroidered with the dark red floss like the centre initial. The top design is embroidered with the two shades of blue.

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

KITTY'S PERIL IN THE GREAT FIRE.

AFTER the Queen's departure, many wives and daughters of county families withdrew, while it was still in their power, from Oxford. The battles which had been fought had thinned the Royalist ranks sufficiently to leave those who were not actively engaged in the field under Rupert, or Lipton, or Astley, and were simply in attendance on the King, so diminished in number that many of the colleges were comparatively free from their guests. Alas! they were free from their students also, who were dispersed to the four winds, or sleeping the sleep that knows no waking under winter or summer sky, at Newbury or Cropredy Bridge, before Gloucester or Bridgewater. It would be long years ere the work and discipline of the schools could be restored. Still some mature scholars were fain to return to their old abodes, and resume, as far as possible, their former habits. Among these was Dr. Peter Dacre, to Kitty's and Mrs. Judy's thankful satisfaction, and without prejudice to Kitty's warm affection for Lady Ottery, who was grieved to lose her goddaughter. But none was quicker than Dame Tabitha to see that Kitty's place was by her father. As for Kitty, the sight of the dear home rooms at Oriel occupied once more by her father, herself, and Mrs. Judy, was like a return to old safe and peaceful days. It had never seemed so possible to Kitty that all might yet come right, and the dreadful ruptures in the nation and the family be closed and healed, as when she was once more looking down on the Quadrangle of Oriel. It was forlorn, it is true, and destitute even of recruits practising the art of war. It was better when she was walking in the garden, and for the moment failing to hear the sound of trumpet or bugle, or the clatter of horses' hoofs. Why, the cheerful song of the robin could be again distinguished from the very clump of box and bay beneath which she and Jackie had been wont to strew breadcrumbs for their bird visitors. Ah! where was Jackie now? and when would the brother and sister, who had been all in all to each other in childhood, kiss and clasp each other again? Kitty knew nothing except that she could trust her cousin Anthony to let her know, as he had done before, if anything further befel Jack. And what were Anthony and the others doing out at Islip Barnes? Were the filiberts all gathered? Had the frost brought the blackberries to perfection? Was the ox slaughtered in anticipation of Christmas festivities—if there were any festivities left? Had her aunt escaped her annual touch of the ague? Was Prissy's marriage to come off with the New Year? Surely, surely the contracting parties could not wait much longer, and, if peace still tarried, would marry and take their chance (or trust in Providence, which was a more seemly way of talking), like young Madam Fanshawe and her husband. Not that their case did not form as much of a warning as of an example, for Dick Fanshawe, as Secretary of War to the young Prince, was overwhelmed with business, and had to be much with the King in his sallies from Oxford, while his poor young wife was left behind, not only to pine for his company and endure wearing anxiety on his account, but to suffer the extremes of poverty, in which the Royalist families were now plunged from unpaid salaries, waste lands, and the non-receipt of rents.

But at Oriel Kitty could be more hopeful than she could be elsewhere, perhaps partly because there was a great deal for both her and Mrs. Judy to do, rendering them very busy for every hour of the twelve, to remedy the injuries done to what the women regarded as their property, and to clear away the traces of reckless misrule. For it was to disordered, dirtied in some respects, stripped quarters, that the family came back. Kitty and Mrs. Judy looked about them in dismay at the shattered window panes, twisted and torn curtains, and floor cloths and broken seats; and sniffed discontentedly at the smell of tobacco smoke, which pervaded the very beds. The last offence might be in keeping with the fact that the introducer of the Virginian weed into England had been a student of Oriel; on the other hand, his gracious Majesty, in this matter resembling his royal father, liked not tobacco smoke, as it was well known, and it seemed scant loyalty to fill Oxford, where he had taken up his residence, with the obnoxious fumes. When Kitty left, she had been careful to carry away her "golden bird," the lineal descendant of Queen Elizabeth and Lady Anglesey's canaries, but she had left various stands with sedulously tended pots of myrtles, sweet basils, and rose trees, to beautify the place for a young viscountess, the tenant to succeed the Dacres in their rooms. But Oriel had undergone many changes of lodgers in the course of eighteen months.

The Provost had done his best to prevent wanton mischief to property, not to say its scandalous misappropriation by his guests; but he had found it hard work to control the more inconsiderate and unruly portion of them. The last occupants of the Dacres' rooms had been successive braces of cavalry officers. Little wonder that Kitty's flowers were represented by a few leafless and dead sticks.

Mrs. Judy suggested that the gentlemen must have spent their time like so many children, making horses of the chairs, and playing "fives" on the carpet. Kitty chimed in with the severe reflection that never again could she doubt or contradict the depreciatory statement she had heard circulated, that a whole seam of white clay which had been discovered at Shotover had been worked out in making pipes for the soldiers idly swaggering about Oxford. However, if the depredations had been committed by members of the Parliamentary instead of the Royalist forces, a good deal more would have been made of them, naturally. As it was, when Dr. Peter found that some of his rarer books were either spoilt beyond remedy or a-missing, and that the damage extended to the Bodleian Library, where the trespassers had gone so far as to cut several of the chains which fastened the more valuable of the volumes to the shelves, and abstract the treasures, his indignation waxed hot. But he limited its expression to announcing his conviction that no man of honour could have been guilty of such base abuse of the trust reposed in him. It was an instance, and a very flagrant one, of evil communications corrupting good manners, and of the fatal disorganisation of society, which permitted rogues and vagabonds to find their way into the best of company.

The truth was that the poorer Royalists in the beginning of the war, under the more reckless of their leaders, notably under Prince Rupert, whom his opponents nicknamed Prince Robber, had accustomed themselves to indiscriminate plunder, to the detriment of their morals. The Parliamentary army had more or less followed suit, till Oliver Cromwell with a high hand put down theft, drunkenness, and profane swearing among his troopers.

In spite of such regrets, Kitty was more than content contriving, with Judy's assistance and by the help of Lady Ottery's advice, how to procure substitutes for what was ruined past repair, and how to repair, by assiduous and dainty mending and darning, what admitted of the compromise.

Dr. Dacre's slender funds could ill supply the substitutes, and it appeared as if the housekeeping money was miraculously multiplied in order to answer the irregular inroads made upon it. Kitty was forced to suspect that Mrs. Judy's hoards were undergoing a melting-down process to fill up deficiencies. But this was the old servant's secret, to which she would not confess. If she had been brought to book, she would have protested that she was only following the example of her betters. And she had more reason, for whereas she could not always see wherein their master the King had so mightily "advantaged" them, though, poor man, that might no longer be his fault, how could she lay out her savings more prudently, and in the light of common gratitude more becomingly, than in doing her part in the relining of the nest in which she had abode so long snug and warm?

Then on Sunday, the 6th of October (old style), a new and impressive interruption came to these household labours. Kitty had been at Christchurch in the morning, where, in spite of the acceptance of the Solemn League and Covenant by the Parliament in London, and the law which prohibited the wearing of "lawn sleeves," a bishop had officiated in full canonicals. Late in the afternoon a hue and cry rose that a fire had broken out, and was raging near the north gate of the town, with a high north wind blowing the flames southward. Kitty from her window watched with awe the sky to the north growing redder and redder, until the whole horizon was lurid, as if the time spoken of by the apostle had come, when the heavens should shrivel up and vanish like a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat.

Dr. Dacre had started forth on the first alarm to see what was wrong, and give what help he could. Kitty, in her difficulty in keeping still when others were so desperately busy, and in her desire to see so new and strange a sight, persuaded Mrs. Judy to walk out with her a little way to witness the marvel, not realising the nature and extent of the crowd, or how hard it would be to keep from getting entangled in it, and swept away by it. The two women would hardly have managed it, and might have paid dearly for their rashness, had they not encountered some friends of Dr. Dacre's and college servants, who helped them through, and enabled Mrs. Judy to congratulate Kitty once more on her great good luck in seeing a fire without being either scorched or scalded, or pushed into a river, or trampled under foot, which was the most pressing danger of all.

When it came to that, Kitty was not able to see much of the fire; she had neither the strength nor the stature to get the better of the press, or to look over the heads of the masses of men and women, soldiers and civilians, citizens of every degree. She stood thunderstruck, watching the crowd looking on at this last unforeseen calamity, here and there swaying to and fro in a vain effort to lend aid where the houses were mostly of wood and plaster. For although there were rivers at hand, there was no means of conveying the water except by barrels, buckets, and cans.

The houses which were burnt first were poor, small houses, so that the less could be distinguished of them, but Kitty got glimpses of flaming rafters, sending up showers of sparks to the sky, which looked angry in its glare, and of poor creatures staggering hither and thither under bundles of bedding and household stuff. She heard people say the fire originated in the recklessness of a soldier who had stolen a pig, and was roasting it in a shed behind a house in Thames Street. Other people were not hindered by the political opinions of their neighbours from telling, with bated breath, how a company of soldiers had been profaning the Lord's day by drinking toasts, singing and dancing at a tap-house close to the fish market, when fire fell down from heaven, and kindled the roof over their ungodly heads, as a rebuke to their wickedness.

The same set of gossips pointed significantly to the facts that the fire had reached as far as the "Seven Deadly Sins' Lane," and that the chief storehouses of the Royalist plunder which they had brought from the towns they had fired and sacked in their cruel malice, were already threatened in just retribution.

From the fact that the fire was detected in broad daylight, as early as three in the afternoon, it was hoped that timely enough warning had been given for the inhabitants of the houses speedily assailed to escape with their lives. But no doubt a certain number of miserable persons, bedridden, aged, or detained by their care for their few dearly-prized, worldly goods, perished in the fire.

In the course of the night two hundred houses, including the whole of the Bocherow, or Butchers' Row, were destroyed, and the fire was still raging. It had just skirted St. Mary's College, had extended as far as Quater-ways, and was advancing on the people's church of St. Martin. Then the Royalists in their turn loudly proclaimed a judgment on the turbulent townsmen for their obstinate attachment to the Roundheads, in spite of the fortunes which the citizens had been making by the prolonged residence of the King and Court among the ungrateful dogs.

"I tell thee what, Mrs. Kitty," said Mrs. Judy, who had been sitting pondering on how she could extract good from evil, "the fire hath happened on the very spot where the plague was rank last year, and where it prevailed at his Majesty's accession, before you were born. I should not wonder though it were to burn out the infection which nought else will remove."

"Salted with fire' or 'cleansed as by fire,' which is it? or are they one and the same processes?" asked Kitty, slowly. "That were hot work, Mistress Judy, yet cold comfort to the families without a roof to cover them this night."

Kitty was the next to start up with an idea which had taken possession of her.

"Oh! Mrs. Judy, I am in great fear for my young Madam Fanshawe. I've just bethought me that she was to change her lodging as Saturday fell, and that the new rooms were to be, for cheapness and quiet, in the North Baylie to which the fire is tending. Oh! what will she do if it overtake her all alone, for Mr. Richard Fanshawe is with the King at Bristol?"

"Nay, do not trouble," said Mrs. Judy, reassuringly; "her worshipful father and her sister are still in Oxford, and will look after her to a certainty; moreover, my young dame hath a fine brisk spirit of her own."

"I know not if Sir John be here at present, and not with Mr. Richard and the rest at Bristol," said Kitty, continuing to trouble herself very much indeed. "If so, Mrs. Harrison is very timorous, and will not dare to venture out without her father, and Mrs. Fanshawe's spirit is a good deal broke of late."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

YORKSHIRE.—You should ask for an increase of wages; under the circumstances it should have been given long ago without the asking. The best way will be to speak to both your master and mistress when each is alone; as perhaps your master knows nothing about the case, nor what wages you are now getting. You should be having, at the very least, from £15 to £16 per annum, judging by your work.

CHARITY.—Even though we may give an address in our paper, we expect all our readers to use their own judgment and common sense about using it, and references should be taken on all occasions from everybody, unless very well known; especially when either money or work is to be entrusted to strangers.

ALICE will find a birdseller's shop in the town she names, we should think. Bournemouth is not considered a very cheap place of residence.

HILDA.—1. Join all the letters together of each word, and take more pains in forming each letter completely; some of them are only half formed. 2. We do not approve of the taking of lemons before breakfast, unless specially ordered by a doctor for a time; it is also injurious to the enamel of the teeth; diluted (as lemonade) it might be safely taken occasionally.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.—We could not advise you to go so far without knowing more about the matter. Why not write to the English consul at one of the Japanese ports, and make some inquiry?

AMAZON.—See "Horses, and What all Girls should Know about Them," page 730, vol. v.; also, "How to Ride," vol. iii., page 3, 131. A small loop of elastic is sometimes employed to hold down the habit, but if well cut there should be no such difficulty about it.

EDITHA.—Sweet thoughts, but neither new nor original ones. "Will you trim this hat by to-morrow?" is correct, not "until to-morrow."

POPPIE.—We regret the composition is not suitable to our columns.

A DAUGHTER OF EVE.—The lines are not poetry, but rhymed prose, but they did you good to write, as an expression of feeling, so be happy; they have done their work, and, we have no doubt, been a source of pleasure to others also, to whom you have shown them.

MAY.—As a rule, the turning of words into feminines when referring to women is in bad style and unnecessary. "Manageress" is an awkward word; Mrs. or Miss So-and-So acts as manager of So-and-So is a better way of expressing what you mean. You would not say a "doctress"; you would say, "she is a doctor," or "lady-doctor"; nor "she is a linendraperess," but "a linendraper"; nor "she is a dentistess," but "dentist"; nor "an artistess," but "an artist." Perhaps "authoress" is almost the only exception, but even this feminine is non-essential; "author" is quite appropriate as applied to both sexes, and so is "poet."

OWL'S CLAWS.—Paste diamonds do not cut glass like the real stones.

F. J. E. A.—You might prevent the large slugs from frequenting your pantry and other parts of your house by sprinkling the window-sills, doorways, and all openings to the outside very thickly with salt. Ants will avoid cupboards washed with water in which camphor is dissolved.

EVA.—Dandelion tea, or decoction, is made as follows: Take two ounces of the freshly-sliced root, and boil in two pints of water till reduced to one pint; then add an ounce of compound tincture of horseradish. Dose from two to four ounces. This is used in case of a sluggish state of liver. Another method is to add three drachms of cream of tartar instead of the horseradish. A simple infusion of the sliced root in boiling water is more properly called a tea. This is used as a tonic and stomachic. The leaves form an excellent salad when young.

SUNBEAM.—A red nose is generally due to digestive troubles, or to tight lacing. We do not fancy that outward applications would be of any service.

Drinking hot water is not considered to reduce stoutness, and recent experiments appear to prove that a diet of stale bread and lean meat is more efficacious than anything else in reducing flesh.

Ivy.—In vol. vii., page 256, you will find an excellent recipe for pot pourri.

FOR just a winning girlish face,
For dimples, and the bloom of youth,
For something more than common grace,
For lips that must beguile in sooth,
For little curls all steeped in light,
For eyes which look forth pure and clear,
For smiles as tender and as bright
As angels may be wont to wear,
For these all men might love you,

For charming ways and manners sweet,
For gentleness and maiden trust,
For kindly hands and willing feet
Which seem to glorify the dust
On common roads, but most for love
So freely poured, it doth appear
You learnt to give from God above,
For joy vouchsafed when you are near:
For these your lover loves you,

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XX.

MRS. JUDY had gone to another part of the college to gossip with the Provost's housekeeper, on the great event of the fire, and on what she and her young mistress had seen, when they made so bold as to step out and look at the spectacle for themselves the night before.

Kitty could not be still; she could not appeal to her father, for, having returned home, rested a couple of hours in his chair, and eaten a hasty breakfast, he had gone out again to consult with the University authorities lest the fire should break out still more violently, and, leaving the course it had hitherto followed, come round to the colleges.

Poor Ann Fanshawe! It was not an unqualified gain to have a husband who, however loyal and devoted, could not be spared from the public service. There was one brave lad lying prone in Exeter Chapel who might be sorely missed to-day. His sister would not have run any risk of being forgotten if her brother Bill had been alive and within cry.

Kitty was tortured by a feverish fancy, and haunted by the impression of Sir John Harrison and Mr. Richard Fanshawe both from home, Mrs. Harrison helplessly timorous, and Mrs. Fanshawe too much out of the way to have been early apprised of the fire. She, a comparative stranger, would not know what to do, alone as she was, to get to her father's lodging at some distance. There might be nobody left to think or act for her except Kitty. As for Kitty, she had nobody to send to the North Baylie, for Mrs. Judy was too far up in years to be exposed to additional fatigue after what she had undergone lately; any college servant who was not tied to his ordinary work had already run to the fire; Lady Ottery's servants would be similarly engaged. It was not dark, as it had been last night; it was broad daylight on a fine October morning. There was not much sunshine, but the wind had fallen, which was in favour of the decrease of the fire, and there was a not unpleasant crispness in the air, stirring the russet and golden leaves before they dropped, more acceptable than the mist rising and creeping along by the banks of the rivers, ready to draw a thin, soft veil over the scene.

At the same time the smell of fire was on the town; Kitty could clearly detect it, just as she could see the dull, red glow long after the sun had risen in the sky. She could well believe that if the wind were to rise and roar again in that quarter, it would tear asunder the misty veil, and bring on its wings a fine deposit of white ashes.

The concourse of people would collect and remain as near as possible to the fire. The back streets and byways which were in the line of the burning would be all save deserted. Kitty knew a road to the North Baylie, along which she was sure she could hasten in ten minutes or a quarter of an hour without attracting attention. If she were but aware that her friend was not alone, that she was apprised of the approach of the fire, and was either starting for a place of safety, or had already reached it, Kitty's mind would be at rest. She could run back immediately, and would arrive at home before she had been missed probably, or Mrs. Judy had finished her gossip with the Provost's housekeeper.

With the single precaution of adding a muffler to her hood and mantle, the girl started on her fool's errand—for which of us are not fools on occasions? As she had anticipated, she met far fewer than the ordinary population in the back streets and side lanes; in fact, she found them nearly deserted. She reached without misadventure that part of the North Baylie where Mrs. Fanshawe, with marvellous humility for the wife of the Secretary of War to the Prince of Wales, had taken up her abode. But Kitty was getting nearer the fire, though she was keeping always in its rear. She could hear its hoarse roar under the deeper glow of the sky, which was now so vivid as almost to extinguish the daylight, and replace it by an artificial blaze as of hundreds of thousands of torches. She could make out the shouting of the people who were doing the little they could in pouring water on the flames, throwing up barriers of stones, and pulling down connecting houses and rafters. Occasionally a great shower of sparks rose in the air, and floating and falling at some distance, awoke in her lively apprehensions lest they should alight on her head and shoulders and burn holes in her hood and mantle, if the sparks stopped short of setting her in a blaze.

Kitty was detained a little by a slight difficulty, from the confusion and agitation of her mind, in ascertaining the house she was in search of. The strange light was bewildering; she was at the back and not at the front of the house. There were no numbers to houses in those days; the only indications to be followed were in calculating how many doors the place was from this church or that swinging sign-board.

At last when Kitty was almost sure she was right, and began to feel that even if she were wrong she durst tarry no longer, it was a relief to discover the back gate, a strong door studded with iron nails, standing open. She entered a small courtyard surrounded by such high walls that they had, no doubt, formed part of one of the extinct colleges, such as "White Monks," "Canterbury," or "Durham," which had been either suffered to fall into entire decay or had been partly replaced by other colleges.

Kitty made for the first house-door she could find, but it was shut and bolted, and no hammering she could accomplish brought an answer to her summons. She tried other doors opening into out-buildings; one was a lumber-house, one a wood-house, and a third a home brewery. All the doors yielded to her touch, but disclosed nobody within, and no passage or stair promising ingress to the house. Neither did the high courtyard communicate with the main street: the walls were built on to the house, or rather the house, which was evidently not nearly so old or so massive, was built on to them.

Kitty was finishing her exploration when she was startled by a loud sound behind her, which she found, on looking quickly round, to be the shutting and locking of the heavy door by which she had entered the court. She darted back, calling as loudly as she could, and shaking the handle of the closed door, for in a moment her alarming plight flashed upon her. The house was deserted by young Madam Fanshawe and every other occupant. No doubt all the furniture which could be carried away had been removed, and now as a further precaution against an invasion of the house out of idle curiosity, or for the purpose of theft, with the risk to life, the landlord, or somebody concerned, had locked the courtyard door, retired, and left Kitty shut up in the forsaken house, in durance vile, for an uncertain period of time.

That in itself would have been sufficiently dismal for a girl in her teens, who had always been protected and cared for. For it must be taken into account that even in ordinary circumstances, with no fire engrossing every eye and ear, it would not have been easy for Kitty to make her voice heard over the high, thick, blank walls and the empty house which encompassed her, and prevented her neighbours learning that she had been caught in a trap.

But as it was, in the immediate vicinity of a great fire, which had already devoured its two hundred, and would not stop till it had swallowed up its three hundred houses, the situation was appalling. The air was waxing each instant hotter and more stifling, the sky overhead was getting every moment more like the reflection of a burning fiery furnace. The awful living thing was drawing nearer and nearer, as with the pants of a relentless beast of prey, craving one more hapless victim.

Kitty Dacre kept her senses and her self-control for a wonderful length of time. She was slow to admit to herself, first, that the person who had locked the door without perceiving her was quite gone, and next that it was impossible for her to call attention to her imprisonment amidst the gathering noises of the fire, and its multitude of attendants. Then she tried to persuade herself that as the flames had for the most part met only wood and plaster, which were more like stubble to feed them than an obstacle to resist them, they might be arrested by the stone house with its background of strong old walls, they might turn aside, or pass it by for some more congenial aliment.

But no, the fire was unmistakably advancing, and collecting its forces for a more formidable antagonist. Kitty could not banish from her mind what she had heard in the course of the morning, that the long yellow tongues had leapt up and licked the solid masonry of St. Martin's church, scorching it from top to bottom. She left off madly beating the door with her hands and calling out for succour; she sank down at last, cowering in a corner, and asking herself piteously what was she doing there? Why was she not at home in Oriol, safe under Mrs. Judy's wing, waiting breathlessly for her father's coming in with the last details of the disaster, perhaps weeping for some young maid like herself, who was supposed to have strayed, and perished by a ghastly death in the great fire. At the most she, Kitty, need not have gone further than Lady Ottery's lodging, which was not within the circle attacked by the fire. There she could have assisted her godmother in preparing bandages and salves for those who were not hurt beyond remedy.

Kitty had acted on a headstrong, fool-hardy impulse, not waiting to consult wiser heads, or to ask permission to thrust herself into danger for the sake of young Madam Fanshawe, who had done very well without her, and was doubtless safe with her own people at this moment.

And here was the end on't for Kitty. What would her father say when he came back? Where would the old man turn in his dismay and bewilderment? Would poor Mrs. Judy, who had tried without avail to get her to listen to reason, rush abroad in her terror as soon as she missed her? And would Lady Ottery take her ivory-headed cane and stumble out on the same wild search? She, Kitty, was not worth their travail and care, only she had never dreamt of grieving and distressing them. What would Jackie say if he ever heard, and could piece together the fragments which hinted at his little sister's sad fate?

Her cousin Anthony, with Prissy and Alice and her aunt Walton, Mrs. Fanshawe, after whom she had gone in crazy pursuit, and Mrs. Margaret Lucas, who had departed on her mission to bear the Queen company in the spring days—would they all remember, wonder, and be sorry that Kitty Dacre was gone, had rashly and recklessly adventured herself when she had no call to do so, and thus had been caught at a disadvantage, and perished in her youth in the terrible Oxford fire?

A sudden rush, and crash, and hiss, louder than the others she had been listening to, smote upon ears which were growing dull in their anguish. A larger house than was common in that quarter had fallen before the fire, and such a jet and pyramid of flames shot up on its ruins that Kitty caught the white light of the crown of fire for an instant towering above the irresponsible walls. She fell back against the wall behind her, and recoiled, turning her head from one side to another, and writhing her body in despairing repulsion. A sickening heat was perceptible through the stone and lime; soon, if they did not crumble and fall on her, they would glow like an oven. She was in a huge oven, shut in to be roasted alive there, like the martyrs of whom she had read.

Kitty covered her face with her hands and tried to pray. What was she that she should deserve a better lot than the poor prisoners dragging out the loathsome remnant of their lives in the Castle tower yonder? or the miserable victims of the plague, some of whom had died alone, abandoned in the base plague-panic by those who ought to have laid down their lives sooner than forsake the sufferers?

Her death would be speedy, if it must be violent. God was in the fire. What was it that the old Bishop did when he suffered in the city ditch? As the flames rose upon him he bathed his hands in their glory, and died praising God. Ah! but she was not a blessed martyr dying for the faith, only a wretched girl suffering for her self-will and folly; but God could give her courage, as He would pardon her, if she cried for His forgiveness. Who was it that walked with the Hebrew children in the furnace? One like unto the Son of God, when not a hair of their head was singed. And "a moist whistling wind" blew round them, that must have been like the autumn wind from the Cherwell or the Isis. What would she not give to feel it now! But that was an ancient miracle, which would not be worked in the latter days for a foolish, erring maid. The Lord Jesus had not even interposed with a miracle to save a holy woman, the murdered nun whose blood served as cement for the walls of one of the colleges. What college? Why should she think of the crime and its victim at such a time? Was it here that the poor nun had sobbed out her last breath? Had she known that another maid would die where she had died?—"When thou passest through the waters." Oh! for the deepest waters of the Cherwell and the Isis to cool the scorching heat! "When thou walkest through the fire." There was peace in that verse—peace, peace; for He was the lord of the fire which, like the frost and the dew, praised Him and magnified Him for ever.

What was that knocking and rattling at the door—a vehement assault on it with blows which peeled the knuckles that delivered them, and kicks that left their dents on the oaken boards for many a day. Then in default of the key which had been unwittingly carried away, iron bars, hammers, and pickaxes were brought into play.

"Kitty, cousin Kitty, are you there? For heaven's sake speak!"

Who was calling on her? What had she to do with the deafening noise at the door? Had Lord Essex, or Sir William Waller, or was it Sir Thomas Fairfax taken Oxford by storm, and were they breaking into Oriol? but why did they not summon the Provost or her father, and not a senseless, irresponsible maid such as she was?

"Kitty, I have thee, thou art saved! Look up, sweetheart! Here is Mrs. Judy, who has shown me the way. Drink this cordial some good soul hath fetched. Let me lift thee up, and get thee out of this pit into a chair, and take thee home before thy poor father hath missed thee."

There was time enough for Kitty to hear the explanation of her cousin's presence. Indeed, she always liked to dwell on this part of the story, though she turned away shuddering from the earlier recollections. Anthony Walton, hearing the report of the fire in Oxford, which for that matter had been seen reflected in the sky, and was soon noised all over the country near, ventured into the city to ascertain the truth and satisfy himself as to the safety of his friends. Not far from Oriol he came across Mrs. Judy, who was sallying forth, the next thing to beside herself, on the discovery that Kitty was missing. Mrs. Judy had immediately guessed where the girl's froward feet would lead her, and put him on their track as far as the North Baylie. There, after a little desperate search, they hit on the closed-up house and yard, and on their own responsibility broke open the back door and rescued wandering Kitty.

But Anthony would not go in with Kitty to her father, who was still unaware of her recent danger.

"Nay, nay," he said, with a certain proud self-restraint, "I will not spoil a good deed by trumpeting it or intruding myself where I am not wanted. Mayhap my uncle, Dr. Peter Dacre, if he will have it that I have cost him his son, will set against that ill deed that I have found him his daughter—only let him take better care of her in future. And, cousin Kitty, dear life, stray no more into mischief, an you love your friends—not for the sake of any young Madam Fanshawe of them all, who hath her own husband to run after her, supposing she is such a valuable piece of goods. I may not again have the good fortune to stumble upon Mrs. Judy in the nick of time, hear her story, and be permitted to snatch you from destruction, God be praised!"

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

By SOPHIA F. A. CAULFEILD.

PART V.

It will be remembered by the readers of this series that a brief notice has been given to the daisy. The Marguerite is otherwise known as the "ox-eye daisy" or "chrysanthemum," of the genus Helianthus, and grows wild, and in as great abundance as the small daisy (Bellis perennis.) The two flowers appear to be somewhat contounded together in their historical associations, although respectively of a different species. Certainly, the larger flower, of which we now give a passing notice, is the one which is said to have been plucked, in mediæval stories, by disconsolate maidens who felt dubious as to the true-love assurances of their knights and squires. The augury on which their hopes reposed was divined and decided by the last petal of the flower which they destroyed, as they mournfully inquired, "He loves me? Loves me not! Loves me? Loves me not!" or "Loves me!" A pastime with which our village maidens are, to this day, very familiar.

The Marigold is a flower of the same character as that above named, but it differs in colour and odour. The common species which often glorifies the English cottage gardens is the Calendula officinalis. It is employed as an ingredient in soups, but appears to be of little value otherwise than for its beauty. The African marigold (Tagetes erecta) is one of the sacred flowers of northern India, and its European cousin, the Calendula, or flower of the calends, was so named by the Romans under the idea that it blossomed the whole year round. In the days of Henry VIII. it was worn with the pansy in wreaths, and went by the name of Souvenir. In some of our counties it is still called "Mary Gowles," or "Goulans," a name little euphonious, but taken from the "Grete Harball," the most ancient of English works on the subject. It used also to be called "Ruddes," from its tawny hue. But the old poets, Shakespeare included, employ the more distinctive name of "marigold." In The Winter's Tale, the latter says—

"The marigold that goes to bed with the sun,
And with him rises weeping."

It was to our mediæval monks and nuns that the "gold" was prefixed by "mari," as an old tradition existed that the Blessed Virgin used to wear this flower in her bosom. Rich in names and much in favour, it shares with the giant Helianthus annuus, the name of "sunflower;" also the "spouse of the sun," as it shares with its more remarkable sister the habit of turning its golden face towards the great luminary. In allusion to this the marigold was adopted by the maternal grandmother of Henri IV., Marguerite of Orleans, as her armorial device, and with it the motto, "Je ne veux suivre que lui seule."

But there is yet another name by which this gorgeous little flower is known, and that is perhaps the origin of the meaning given to it in the language of flowers, i.e., "sorrow," and "cares." In America there is a tradition that the Mexicans, who fell victims to the greed of gold of their cruel exterminating invaders, stained with their blood the yellow blossoms of the fields, and so they changed to a deep ruby-red colour, and have been known ever since by the lugubrious name of "death flowers."

Like the holly, the Mistletoe (Viscum album) claims a place amongst our historical flowers, being employed at the winter festival so time-honoured and dear to us all. It is somewhat difficult to record any circumstances respecting its history with which the reader is not already acquainted; yet, perhaps, the origin of the primitive fashion of kissing under the white-berried branches may be known to comparatively few. For the explanation we must go back to very early ages in the history of northern nations, and dip into the annals of Scandinavian mythology. Baldr, the Beautiful (the northern Apollo), the son of Odin, had a potent foe in the evil spirit, Loki; and this latter endeavoured to compass his destruction by the hands of the blind god, Hödr. So he made an arrow out of the wood of the mistletoe (supposed to proceed from none of the elements), and placing it in his hands, directed it to Baldr, who fell to the earth—a catastrophe which by no other weapon could have been effected, as his mother, Frigga (or Freyja), had rendered him proof against harm from any of the four elements. This outrage displeased the gods, and they restored Baldr to life, and as they dedicated to Frigga the only instrument by which her son could be harmed, she took the precaution of having it placed out of touch of the earth, and thus beyond the jurisdiction of Loki. From this old fable the practice of hanging bunches of mistletoe from the ceilings and tops of the doorways has arisen, and the "kiss of peace" beneath them followed in natural sequence. The non-formation of arrows from its wood, with which to compass the death of anyone, was guaranteed so long as hung aloft; the kiss was an assurance of good faith and harmony.

The use of the mistletoe in the heathen sacrificial rites of the Druids needs no comment, so well is the subject known. They regarded it as a cure for every disease, an antidote to all poisons, and a talisman against witchcraft and all spiritual evil influences, a belief obtaining amongst the Greeks, Romans, in France, and all European nationalities. But it is the mistletoe that grows on the oak that used to be specially esteemed by the Druids and in Scandinavian countries. The natural order to which it belongs is the Loranthaceæ, consisting of some 450 evergreen parasitic shrubs, chiefly tropical, though found in temperate climates. It cruelly kills the branch on which it grows, and whence it derives its nourishment, and thus compasses its own death. The brittle twigs which we obtain for homestead decorations might well be supposed unsuitable for the construction of the shaft that transfixed the beautiful Baldr, but the stem, if left to attain its full growth, is sometimes upwards of an inch in diameter, and subdivides into a fork, thus lending itself naturally to the form of an arrow. More mistletoes are found on the apple tree than any other, but it grows on the hawthorn, lime, maple, mountain ash, poplar, larch, pear, and others. Though propagated in Ireland and Scotland, it is not a native of those countries. There are only about ten or a dozen examples in England of mistletoe-bearing oaks. It is said that the finest specimen is one at Bredwardine, discovered by Sir G. Cornewall in 1871, a fine oak, as yet proof against the feeding of no less than fifteen clusters of this parasite. In France and Switzerland it is found on the spruce firs; in Italy on the vine and Loranthus; and in the Himalayas on the apricot. It is also a native of Siberia. The "spignel" (or "bald-meigne"), otherwise "Baldrs-money," was dedicated to Baldr, and the "may-weed"

MARGUERITE.

(Anthemis cotula) is still said to be as fair as the brow of

"Baldr, the beautiful,
God of the summer sun,
Fairest of all the gods;"

of whose story Longfellow sang so sweet a lay. No earlier notice of the time-honoured custom of "kissing under the mistletoe" appears to be on record than about the middle of the 17th century.

Few amongst our flowering shrubs and plants are so truly classical in their associations as the Myrtle, the emblem of love amongst the ancients of Greece and Rome, and of peace amongst the Jews. We find references to it in the Books of Nehemiah, Isaiah, Zechariah, as also in the Psalms. To this day the Jews employ branches of the myrtle, a broad-leaved species, in the construction of their booths or tents during the "Feast of Tabernacles," and which is cultivated near London for their special use. Those who have visited Aleppo at such seasons have seen an outer covering of myrtle branches over their tabernacles, laid upon a foundation of green reeds, forming a sort of diaper-work, and stretched between four slight supports, which are attached to a wooden divan.

Amongst the Arabs there is a tradition that when Adam was driven out

MISTLETOE.

To the loving students of Holy Writ, the Olive must have a special interest. Between thirty and forty references are made to it in the sacred books. Our Saviour's latter days on earth were connected with the Mount of Olives, which has rendered that grove of trees one of exceptional interest. But the historical character of this tree dates back to the time when the dove bore the tiny branch over the subsiding waters, and conveyed the emblem of peace to the redeemed from the flood.

Looking back to those long-ago times, our thoughts pass down through a long course of eventful centuries, to the day when, as I have already observed, our Divine Redeemer "poured out His soul unto death, in that olive-grown garden of Gethsemane, bringing pardon and peace to the children of men."

Dean Stanley speaks of the eight remarkable olives still standing on the hill of that "garden"—gnarled and venerable, perfectly distinct in character from any of their fellows. But whether they once sheltered the God-man, of Eden he carried away an ear of wheat, representing the chief food and staff of life; a date, representing fruit; and the myrtle, as the sweetest scented of flowers (in their estimation). Indeed, all Oriental nations hold the latter in special esteem, and the superstitions connected with it abound equally in the West as the East. The Roman bridal-wreath for men and women was composed of it. At the sacred Greek festival of the Eleusinian mysteries the high priest officiating and the initiates were crowned with it, and the Athenian magistrates wore it as a badge of their authority, while heroes entwined it in their wreaths of laurel, as a symbol of victory. So, likewise, it was worn in chaplets by the Romans with the same symbolic motive, and one of the observances of the 1st of April amongst the Roman ladies consisted in crowning themselves with the leaves of this beautiful tree, after bathing under its shadow, when they set forth to offer sacrifice at the altar of Venus, to whom, as the "goddess of Love," it was consecrated.

MYRTLE.

who sought the shade for meditation and prayer, we cannot decide.

The Delphic oracle was consulted by the Athenians, each holding a branch of the olive; and as to classical traditions connected with the tree, as well as those of modern date, they are fully as numerous as those regarding the myrtle. As an emblem of peace and reconciliation, the early Christians engraved a representation of it on the tombs of the martyrs, for the flood of cruel persecution had ceased for them, and the blessed peace-bringing spirit, once appearing as a dove, had brought them that which the olive branch typified—everlasting rest in "the haven where they would be."

It seems a curious confirmation of the aptness with which, in all ages, this beautiful tree has been made a symbol of "peace and security," that oil alone—of all the products of nature with which we are acquainted—can still the raging of the storm-tossed waters, and bring instant relief and security to those in peril. Victors at the Olympic games were awarded crowns of the olive, and in China they are conferred for literary merit.

The Orange tree, or Citrus aurantium, affords a blossom as fragrant as it is beautiful. The varieties are very many; amongst them the Chinese, Maltese, Tangerine, Seville, and St. Michaels are the most important.

ORANGE BLOSSOMS.

It seems not improbable that the origin of wearing orange blossoms for bridal wreaths may be traced to the mythological story of the nuptials of Juno and Jupiter, as Milton and Spenser considered the "golden apple," presented by the goddess to her spouse on the day of their marriage, was intended by the ancients to signify an orange. Those conversant with these old-world fables may remember that orange groves grew near Mount Atlas, in the garden of the Hesperides, under the care of the daughters of Hesperus, and guarded by a dragon. The story goes that Hercules slew the monster and stole the fruit; but Minerva restored them to the garden as the only place where they could be preserved. This idea has long since been proved to be as fabulous as the rest of the story. It would seem that the introduction of the tree into Europe from China was due to a present made to the old

Conde Mellor, Prime Minister of the King of Portugal; and Le Comte, the Jesuit, who wrote in 1697, stated that "the first and unique orange tree" brought into Europe was still preserved in the house of Count St. Laurent at Lisbon, and that from this tree all the others abounding in the South had sprung. On landing in India the Portuguese found it growing in abundance, according to the account given by Vasco di Gama, and it is supposed that it had been imported from that country to Arabia, Syria, and Egypt, in about the 9th century. It may be desirable to explain that the orange tree has nothing to do with the title of our William of Orange, who took it from the name of a town of France, in the department of Vaucluse, which was, from the 11th to the 16th century, the capital of a small independent principality. This most interesting town—the Arausia of the Romans—passed, at the death without issue of the last sovereign Philibert de Chalons (1531), to a younger branch of the house of Nassau. It was held by the Dutch Stadtholders until the death of our William III. (1702), and was ultimately ceded to France. But the heir-presumptive to the crown of the Netherlands still holds the title of Prince of Orange. As a natural suggestion (supplied by the beautiful hue of the golden fruit that shares the name of the ancient birthplace of the King) the loyal subjects of the Crown in Ireland adopted it for their distinctive colours.

The practice of wearing orange blossoms for bridal adornment was derived from the Saracens, who regarded them as emblematic of happiness in marriage. Orange flower water is sprinkled over the wedded pair in Crete, and in Sardinia oranges are hung on the horns of the oxen attached to the wagons that convey them on the day of their nuptials.

MY LADY'S REST.

By FLORENCE WILLSON.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. DEANE'S VISITOR.

LIFE at Ashdeane passed in the same quiet way now in the hot autumn days as it had done in the changeable month of May, when I first made my way to Mrs. Deane's cottage and incurred the displeasure of Dandy by invading his premises.

Mr. Yorke was as energetic as ever, and aided by his vicar's sympathy and larger experience, his work prospered in an encouraging manner. He had been wise enough to abandon, or, at least, to modify, some of his plans, which were too advanced for the leisurely nature and habits of his people. Miss Marchmont continued one of his most faithful supporters, and even went so far as to visit some of her poorer neighbours; but the experiment was not successful. She felt that she was conferring a favour on the people whose humble homes she visited, and they showed plainly enough that they did not appreciate her condescension or wish for it, and so she was disgusted at their ingratitude, and ceased to go amongst them.

Mr. Yorke had expected this result, and was not disappointed by it; in fact, he was better pleased that Miss Marchmont should help his poor through him, as she had done, than spoil her well-meant kindness by an irritating patronising manner.

Very different was Mrs. Deane, who was well-known and loved by all around her, and to whose sympathising ears all the village troubles and joys were told, sure of a patient hearing, and a helping hand, where needed, frankly and freely held out.

This had been a delightful summer for me. I had come to the Vicarage for change of air and rest, which had been declared necessary for me after a long illness, brought on, the doctor said, by too hard work, for most of the day I taught in a school, and the evenings were devoted to study on my own account, to pass my examinations.

These summer months I had almost completely lived in the fresh country air, and had not studied at all, and now I felt strong bodily and mentally, and able to resume my work.

But at present Miss Brown and her brother would not hear of my testing my strength, and as I was not dependent on my own exertions, I agreed to postpone my return to work, although I was beginning to weary of such an idle, easy life as I led with my kind friends at the Vicarage.

There was another reason why I was anxious to leave Ashdeane, but this I could not mention to anyone, not even to Mrs. Deane, but I could not help thinking sometimes that Mr. Yorke was anxious to interest me in his work and in himself in a degree I was not prepared to do.

Again, I persuaded myself that it was only my fancy, and that as there were very few young girls near us, it was only natural that Mr. Yorke should like to talk to me, with whom he was brought so much in contact and daily intercourse at the Vicarage, where he came and went as he liked.

Still, I sometimes felt uncomfortable on his account, all the more because I liked him, and did not want to make myself disagreeable, as if I was sure he would fall in love with me, if I was natural and friendly in my manners to him, and still less did I wish to mislead him as to my feelings.

Mrs. Deane, I imagine, had some idea of the state of affairs, although she never alluded to the subject, but once, when Miss Marchmont made some remark to me about the interest girls now-a-days took in parochial affairs, especially when good-looking young curates were connected with them, Mrs. Deane quietly turned the conversation into safer channels, for which I felt truly grateful to her.

Lady Constance was to be married in September, and Ashdeane was fully occupied with all the preparations for the event, which was to be celebrated in the little village church; the bride elect was staying in London, and would only return a day or two before the marriage to the Manor House.

Mr. Willoughby was altering and refurnishing his house, and Ashdeane was all astir with workpeople and the arrival and departure of furniture vans; people talked of nothing but the wedding, and Miss Marchmont was so deeply interested in it that she allowed me to pass unnoticed, for which I felt deeply grateful.

One hot afternoon I was sauntering slowly through the lanes to Mrs. Deane's cottage, having promised to come to tea, and bring some of my new songs with me, when I met a stranger, who seemed as if he were trying to find his way to some given point, stopping every now and then, looking about him.

I at once guessed that he must be one of Mr. Willoughby's guests, come for the wedding, and thought no more about him, as I went on to Mrs. Deane's, where Dandy gave me a lazy wag of his tail as welcome; he felt it too hot to bark or jump about in his usual fashion, and was asleep before I entered the house.

We had tea out of doors, under the trees on the tiny lawn, where we sat and talked, and I gathered flowers for the drawing-room, as I always arranged them for Mrs. Deane when spending an evening with her; and as we went into the house I fastened a spray of scarlet geranium and heliotrope in my white dress.

After filling the flower stands, I sang one song after another, and I was in the middle of one of my favourites, when some one was ushered into the room, accompanied by Dandy, who barked and growled in a very indignant and wide-awake manner.

As I turned round at the noise, I recognised the stranger I had met in the lane, and began to wonder what could have brought him there, when I was struck by Mrs. Deane's look of bewilderment as she gazed at the card the stranger gave her; she turned it over and over, and then read the name slowly aloud—"Harry Marsden," and looked from the card to her visitor, and then at me, as if in a dream.

"I am Harry Marsden," said the stranger, "and if the information is correct which I received, you must be my sister."

Mrs. Deane sat down, with a look of bewilderment on her face, and then answered—

"You must be mistaken, for I have no brother; I was an only child. Who could have so misled you, I wonder?"

"I do not think I am mistaken," replied the stranger. "You must surely have heard of your father's second marriage in Australia, and of my birth."

"I heard he was married again, but nothing more," said Mrs. Deane. "Is it possible that I should never have heard of your existence all these years!"

"I have plenty of proofs as to my identity," said the young man, half-smiling at her bewildered incredulity. "This I fancy you will recognise," and he drew a case from his pocket and showed her a miniature, which she at once recognised as one of her father.

"You know my father's portrait, I see," said her visitor. "And here are some letters of his that I should like you to read." He took out a pocket-book and turned over its contents, and happening to raise his eyes they met mine, and I felt that I had no business whatever to be there and had better retire.

"Good-bye, Mrs. Deane," I said, putting on my hat and gloves. "I shall come and see you to-morrow if I may; but now I must go back to the Vicarage."

"Good-bye, dear," she said, as she pressed my hand in her cold ones. "Come as early as you can to-morrow; I shall want to see you."

The stranger opened the door for me and accompanied me to the hall door, apologising politely for having disturbed me in the middle of my song. I assured him it was of no consequence, and with a bow we parted.

As I ran down the steps I saw Miss Marchmont staring at me, having heard our voices, I suppose, as she came up the garden path.

She was anxious, I knew, to ask me all sorts of questions; but I bowed and hurried past her, saying I was late and had not time to stop.

The vicar was very much interested in my account of Mrs. Deane's visitor, and said he should go down to the cottage that evening, and see what was the result of the interview. He seemed to think it very probable that the stranger was Mrs. Deane's brother.

Just as the vicar was starting for the cottage a visitor was announced, and Mr. Marsden was ushered into the study and had a long interview, which ended by Mr. Brown putting on his hat and accompanying his visitor to the cottage. I felt great curiosity to know the result of the interview and conversations, and hoped that Miss Brown would not go to bed that evening at her usual hour; but immediately after prayers she put away her work, and in answer to my gentle hint that I should like to wait up for her brother's return, she said he would probably be late, and that we should hear all about it in the morning, and with this comforting assurance she bid me good-night, and I had to retire satisfied.

I did not go to sleep until the vicar had returned; nor, indeed, for some time after that, and I fell asleep wondering what we should hear in the morning as to Mrs. Deane's newly-found relation.

The vicar was very fond of his garden. I always took a stroll round it before breakfast to see what new flowers were out, and I joined him there next morning, almost my first words being, "Well, is he really her brother?"

"What a clearly put question," laughed Mr. Brown, "but I quite understand your meaning, and will gratify your feminine curiosity at once. Yes, I think there is not the smallest doubt; he is Mrs. Deane's brother, and very happy she is to have someone belonging to her, after her lonely life; and that reminds me, she sent her love and hoped you would go and see her this afternoon."

Mr. Yorke joined us at luncheon, as he very often did, and asked quite as many questions about Mr. Marsden as I could have done; he seemed surprised when the vicar spoke of him as a pleasant, good-looking young fellow."

"Being Mrs. Deane's brother," he said, "I fancied he was about her age, and quite forgot that I had heard her father was married a second time, and that Mr. Marsden is only her step-brother, whose mother was probably about her own age."

"I wonder what they will do," said Miss Brown; "if he will settle down in this country, and if Mrs. Deane will leave the cottage and live with him."

"Oh," said the vicar, "I daresay he will marry and settle down here; and his sister would be foolish to give up her comfortable home at the cottage, to share that of a brother who was a perfect stranger to her, and of whose disposition she knew nothing."

Mr. Yorke walked with me to the cottage, but would not go in; he said he had promised to lend some books to Miss Marchmont, and must leave them with her, before he went to see some sick people at the other end of the parish.

Mrs. Deane had a flush on her cheeks, and a look of excitement most unusual to be seen on her tranquil pale face.

"You have heard how much richer I am than I ever thought to have been, my dear," she said, as she kissed me; "I have got a brother, and feel proud of the acquisition; you must congratulate me on his arrival."

The afternoon passed very pleasantly, and I was able to satisfy my curiosity about Mr. Marsden's appearance and manners when he joined us at tea. I liked his looks, and he had a bright, frank manner which was very attractive. The vicar called for me on his way home, and I saw that he liked the newcomer and was interested in him, and as we walked back to the vicarage, we discussed Mrs. Deane's brother, and agreed that she was very fortunate in having found such a prepossessing and lovable character in her newly-discovered relation.

Things went on as usual at Ashdeane, and the preparations for the grand wedding occupied the general attention, so that the interest in young Mr. Marsden was of short-lived duration. Most of his time was spent in London, but he was often enough at the cottage to make himself a general favourite with all Mrs. Deane's friends, with one exception, and that was Miss Marchmont, who seemed from the first to have taken an unaccountable dislike to him; I do not believe she could have told why herself, except, perhaps, because everyone else liked him.

VARIETIES.

THE HOMES AND WOMEN OF ENGLAND.

A visit was recently paid to England by the Nawab Mehdi Hassan, the Chief Justice of Hyderabad. His impressions of this country were communicated to his friends, and amongst them we find the following remarks regarding both that home-life, of which we are all so proud, and the women of England who make our homes all they should be:—

"It is," he says, "a beautiful thing. We have nothing like it in our country—this pure home-life, with all its tenderness and sympathies. In our language there is no such word as 'home'; in England every heart is stirred by it. All natural passions and questions are no doubt common to us and to Englishmen; but in them they are more systematic, civilised, and genuine. We love each other, but we do not express it in the same warm and impressive way.

"It is this home-life that is one of the chief sources of England's supremacy. There children grow up in the society of educated mothers, and become intelligent and thoughtful while they are yet children. In our country, where the women for the most part have no education, this is impossible, and they grow up into men and women quite ignorant of the simplest things—things that are known in England by the children of the very poorest people.

"It is impossible to express to you my sense of the great influence of the English women upon English life. They refine and elevate it beyond all measure; you never know where their influence will not reach.

"I am a firm believer in the complete freedom of women, although I recognise that complete equality with men is not possible; but Indian people know nothing of this great influence of women upon English thought and action—the greater because it is a silent influence, working by suasion, not by force."

WHAT EVERYBODY SAYS.

Lovers are prone to self-depreciation.

Said he tenderly as they sat looking at the stars, "I do not understand what you see in me that you love me."

"That's what everybody says," replied the ingenuous maiden.

Then the silence became so deep that you could hear the stars twinkling.

A THRIFTY MAN.

"I trust your husband had something saved up for a rainy day," said a sympathising friend.

"Indeed he had," replied the widow, with a fresh burst of tears; "he had seven umbrellas. John was the thriftiest man I ever knew."

ODD WAYS OF A FAMOUS AUTHORESS.

Mrs. Inchbald, whose "Simple Story" and "Nature and Art" are amongst the well-known works of English literature, had some odd ways. In company one day someone appeared distressed about the delivery of a note, and said he would give half-a-crown to anyone who would take it for him. Mrs. Inchbald immediately closed with the proposal, pocketed the half-crown, and set out to deliver the note.

Late in life, when living at Kensington, she observed a lady who lodged in the same house mending a hole in a black silk gown.

"Why do you give yourself that trouble?" said Mrs. Inchbald. "I always mend the holes in mine with black sticking plaster."

HOW TO TEACH THE ELEMENTS OF MUSIC.

AMONGST the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER there are doubtless many who are preparing for the profession of teaching, or who will by-and-by be called on to assist in the education of younger brothers and sisters.

A few practical hints how to make the music lesson profitable and interesting may therefore be useful to such "girls." First, then, I would say, do not imagine that the fact of your being able to play well on any instrument necessarily fits you to instruct others. You must study the art of teaching, and adapt your method to the temper and ability of each pupil. Great patience and perseverance are required to teach beginners in such a way as not to weary them, and yet prevent the formation of bad habits.

Again, do not mistake the mechanical playing of tunes for music, but let the very simplest lesson have a scientific basis, and although the progress may be slow, it will be sure. Bear in mind that the most beautiful building would soon be in ruins if the foundation were neglected. Strive to lay your foundation so securely that any superstructure may hereafter be raised upon it. The work of an elementary teacher may not bring much éclat or renown, but true work of any kind is sure eventually to meet with its reward.

You will find it easier to impart some musical truths by singing than by playing, particularly if a child has a quick ear, and perhaps stiff fingers, therefore a singing class will aid you much. Tune, time, and touch must each receive individual attention at every lesson; a beginner cannot attend fully to two things at a time. Therefore, until the hand is accustomed to a correct position, and the fingers can be lifted independently, do not trouble your pupil much about the notes, and do not be too hasty in allowing the two hands to be used together, but begin with the left, and let it always have the most work, so as to conquer its natural weakness. The habit of practising the left hand alone is very good even for advanced pupils; the rhythm and melody of the bass will be better appreciated.

Take care that the sound is pressed, not beaten, out of the keys, be content with feeble tones rather than louder ones gained by too much force from the hand. Power will come by practice, and much trouble is saved by insisting on a quiet firm grasp of the notes with the fingers from the very first. The movement of the wrist for chords and double notes should be taught first on a table, and this and finger exercises, without an instrument, may be made interesting by being taught in class. Much exercise in writing will be the surest way of learning the names of the notes.

I think that the reason why time is so imperfectly understood is that the notation of time is introduced before a sense of rhythm has been cultivated.

It is far better to teach first the beating of duple and triple time with the hand counting aloud with a strong accent on the first beat, and sometimes counting whilst the teacher plays little melodies of different rhythm. The pupil will then understand that crotchets, quavers, etc., are only the signs for notes of different length, and the time-signatures will not be such an enigma as they are to many. When a little advance has been made it will be well to read through an exercise in time alone first, for "one thing at a time" is a golden rule in order to acquire accuracy and fluency. Frequent examples and much questioning will be necessary to ensure a thorough comprehension of rhythm. Require definite and accurate replies to your questions at the commencement of every new exercise; never take it for granted that anything is understood, but make sure, and do not be discouraged by the frequent repetition needed.

The scale being the foundation of all music, take great pains to explain its formation; use some pictorial aid, such as Mr. Curwen's modulator, to show the position of the tones and semitones; and as soon as a few easy five-finger exercises can be played accurately, let them be learnt in all the keys in regular order.

By the help of the modulator the use of the black keys will be understood, but to prevent false notes being struck, require the fingers to be placed on the notes first without sounding them. Later on simple melodies, chants, and hymn tunes should be practised in the same way, not even avoiding keys with many sharps and flats.

To secure fluency, be very particular to insist on each piece being played slowly at one uniform rate, and the difficult passages studied separately; but in the very early lessons it is not wise to keep a child at one exercise until it is quite perfect; she will learn to read more quickly by passing on, and by degrees the hand and eye, assisted by the ear, will gain steadiness. In order to read well it is not sufficient to know the names of the notes: the eye must be taught to recognise intervals, scales, arpeggios, and chords, and also to keep, as it were, a little in advance of the fingers, to look forward. Teach chords and arpeggios in all the keys at a very early stage, beginning with a quiet position of the hand, in only one octave; the correct fingering will thus become familiar. Teach scales, too, not merely from the book, but let the signatures and fingering be learnt by heart; and when all the major and minor scales are perfectly known, oblige the pupil to pass from one to the other unhesitatingly. The sharpness needed to accomplish this will add zest to the lesson, and relieve the tediousness of scale practice.

Great discretion is necessary on the part of the teacher to vary the lesson without shirking these important exercises.

Even to beginners try to impart some knowledge of musical form; if you know nothing about it yourself, it will be an interesting subject for study, and cheap books can be procured. The frequent occurrence of the perfect cadence will cause it to be readily recognised, and the slightest points of rest which divide a melody will soon follow, so that when rondos and sonatas are attempted it will not be difficult to explain the outline of their form, and the knowledge will add greatly to their enjoyment, and to the musical culture of the student.

Throughout the course of instruction play to your pupils frequently and carefully. Until the hands have gained some steadiness, a beginner will have very little idea of time in what she plays, but she may be taught to hear and enjoy the beauty of good, even if simple, music. Although with a dull pupil accuracy of time and tune is all you can expect in her own performance, her ear can be cultivated by listening thoughtfully, and all should be taught to recognise intervals, major and minor scales and chords, and later on to write short phrases and melodies from ear and from memory. I have avoided details which are to be found in any good instruction-book, but the rules I have here given will be found practicable for quite young children of ordinary intelligence.

HELEN KENWAY.

MADEMOISELLE MERLE.

A SKETCH.

It is a very cold morning in Geneva. The bise wind rages pitilessly, while the sun is chary of his beams, as if he needed them all for himself; and the young ladies, mademoiselle's pupils, are seated dejectedly round the able, pressing the tips of their tingling fingers together. The stove has only recently been lit, and its cracked surface is not yet penetrated by the heat. And then a stove is such a gloomy comforter at the best to those accustomed to the cheery fires of old England. The eyes demand their own share of comfort on a bitter day, and turn unsatisfied from that hard, smooth surface, longing for the wayward flame, the companionable, heart-warming glow of the red embers, whose fitful shapes might supply at will the place of sunshine, society, or books.

There is a sudden quick, impulsive rapping at the hall door, and presently mademoiselle enters, bringing with her a breath of the bleak air outside that make the girls' teeth chatter with a sympathetic chill. But mademoiselle is warmly clad, and the cold has not penetrated to her heart, that being, moreover, of too generous a nature to be chilled by so casual a circumstance as the state of the temperature.

If her "chères amies" had been grudging of their sympathy, or niggardly in their attentions, that indeed might have acted like a wintry spell to freeze the current of her quick affections. But the chauve-pied is ready to her feet, the word of sympathy to her ear; and mademoiselle smiles upon her pupils with an earnest, cheery benignity of expression which goes far to supply the place of sunshine in the room.

"Mais vous soignez bien votre pauvre maîtresse!" she exclaims, drawing her mittens over her slender brown hands, with an involuntary shrug of her shoulders, as the wind rushes in a sudden wild sweep past the house.

Everything under mademoiselle's superintendence is done by steam. The words, "Vite, vite, mes enfants!" acts as an enlivener to the puzzled intellect, a whip to the lagging industry. The exercises are corrected, the fables recited, and the verbs galloped through before her energy has had time to cool or her feet to get warm. Mademoiselle is great at verbs. Her store of them is inexhaustible; so that if the girls might ever fondly deem their number to be accomplished, a whole list more, regular and irregular, would be run off upon her fluent tongue. And, as she considerably reminds them, if the day be too short for their task, there is always the night to fall back upon. For "Qu'est ce que votre poète, Moore, a dit? 'Steal a few hours from night, my dear!'" So, with a smile that was "childlike and bland" would the artful instructress impose upon her unresisting victims.

Mademoiselle's English accent is inimitable; it is one of her small vanities to consider it perfect. There is but one word in our language in which she acknowledges any difficulty, and that is sixth. With patient effort, and invoking the assistance of her pupils, she will shape her mouth to the utterance of this barbaric sound, till their blood runs cold, and it halts uncouthly on their own insular tongues. But mademoiselle is strictly honourable, and though the study of English is with her a passion (she avers that she learned it expressly to read "Jane Eyre" in the vernacular), it is seldom that her eagerness for improvement in it betrays her into a word of the forbidden tongue. Fortunately there is nothing to prevent her from frequently carrying away some English book, to serve for a bonne bouche in her hour of evening rest; and most characteristic are her subsequent remarks thereon. A dilapidated edition of "My Novel" came in for an ecstatic embrace, as she returned it with the exclamation, "Ah ce cher Monsieur Riccabocca!" Then, with a sudden change to satirical, yet half-admiring raillery in her tone, "Monsieur le Comte!" she ejaculated, wafting him a kiss from the tips of her fingers, which, it is to be hoped, reached its destination in safety. But "Villette" was almost too much for her equanimity to recover.

"Ah, cette pauvre Mees Lucie!" she repeated with tearful voice, pronouncing the name exactly as Madame Beck must have done, either in unconscious imitation or else in gentle mockery of that hard-hearted little woman. It was most probably the latter, for mademoiselle smiled through her tears; though the image of Miss Snowe was with her through the lesson, subduing her vehemence to a tender dejection of manner, and ever and anon drawing a quick sigh from her heart, by obtruding its shadow between her and the business in hand.

Mademoiselle is not content with borrowing books; she must also lend them; and it must be confessed that, in her own maiden simplicity, a strange caterer for the youthful mind she is. One of the first books she favoured her pupils with was "Pamela," which was returned to her the following day on the plea that their father preferred them, if they indulged in any English works of fiction, to read the more modern ones; at which delicate hint mademoiselle, as she afterwards confided to her invalid sister, became "rouge comme cela!" hitting, as she spoke, the dark mahogany case of her piano.

This failure, however, did not discourage her from appearing the very next morning with another volume in her hand, none other than "Ernest Maltravers." This she confidently presented to her pupils as a work eminently adapted for their perusal, informing them at the same time with much delicacy that it contained one page which madame their mother would have the discretion to withhold from them. Unfortunately for the young ladies, madame their mother was more narrow in her views, and reserved the book in its entirety for her own reading, they watching her with hungry eyes as she hurried through the pages of it, turning them over with a persistency which argued much for the author's powers of fascination.

"Do you think you've come to that page yet?" they would frequently inquire, their imagination having somehow fastened upon it to the exclusion of all the rest. But they were destined to remain unsatisfied on the subject.

Mademoiselle on receiving back her property, concerning which she fortunately asked no questions, launched out into uncontrollable rhapsodies thereon.

"Ah, cette caractère d'Alice, si pure!" with an airy salute towards the window, as if it were in that direction the heroine's wraith might be supposed to hover.

Mademoiselle is a fiery little creature, the spirit and vivacity due, it may be, to her Parisian training being just balanced by her own native good sense. Her skin is sallow, and she has the peering, piercing look peculiar to short sight; for she disdains the use of glasses. Yet her eyes are large and eloquent, and though they occasionally blaze out like signals of danger, their look at times is singularly soft. At the French lesson she is a veritable gunpowder magazine, fiery sparks and quick explosions following on every mistake. She stamps with her foot, she clenches her hand, she stands erect (in her favourite attitude, with her back to the stove), and thrills her pupils with the vibrating anger in her voice; though it is seldom, indeed, that the words she makes use of bear any proportion to these demonstrations of wrath—"Qu'est ce que vous avez, mesdemoiselles?" being as pronounced a reproach as she ever descends to.

The "vocabulaire" is the rock on which her good nature is usually destined to split; for with regard to this she has no mercy, and shows none even of her favourite quality of discretion. Pitiless doses of from a thousand to fifteen hundred out-of-the-way words are meted out to the young ladies every day; and even when their task has been accomplished to perfection, down to the most delicate point of accentuation (for mademoiselle will have it that the English "eat" their words, instead of uttering them, as the French do, "au bout des lèvres"), but scant praise do they receive in guerdon from their mistress, who, in this matter, evidently feels she has a character to maintain, and will on no account compromise it by the faintest show of lenity. A grim smile, or a reserved "C'est bien, mesdemoiselles," is all the acknowledgment her "chers élèves" may ever hope for.

Fortunately for themselves, the girls are not without a sense of humour, and being tickled with a desperate sort of amusement at this little peculiarity of their "professeur," as mademoiselle loves to sign herself, they find it less dreary work to attempt the conquest of these legions of words. For if they come up halting, or with any missing from their ranks, then, with a sudden fling the book is tossed to the far end of the table, where it lies forlorn, with leaves disarranged and cover falling backwards, no one daring to pick it up; while the outraged instructress stands fiery and defiant, "la flamme à l'âme, et l'éclair aux yeux," like her own favourite "Mees Lucie."

On these unlucky mornings it is no safeguard to her pupils, as on occasions of smaller import, to have their baby-sister ensconced, as she is well content to be, on mademoiselle's lap. For before giving vent to her passion she will set the little one down gently, and kissing her forehead—it not being in accordance with mademoiselle's notions of etiquette to kiss even an infant on the lips—will eject her with the softly-spoken dismissal, yet whose calmness is that of agitation betokening a rising storm, "Va, mon ange! va, mon bijou!" And when the door is shut upon the small retreating figure, what can the trembling delinquents do but bend their heads and suffer the torrent to sweep past?

It is at the music-lesson that mademoiselle shines supreme, though her gentleness here is more potent than severity, being due not to weakness but to the patience of art. A fit of laziness, a careless touch, would break it up as suddenly as a contrary wind would break the tranquillity of a summer sea. We know not if mademoiselle's method is peculiar, as are most of her other qualities, to herself; but it is in this wise she divides the hour devoted to the piano—nominally an hour, for her enthusiasm, when it meets with any response, usually leads her to prolong the stated time. Finger exercises, scales, and arpeggios occupy the first ten minutes or so; and her repertory of scales, be it mentioned, is no less inexhaustible than that of her verbs. Their number is veritably legion, and amongst them, we are convinced, are many with whose intricate and wonderful evolutions no one but herself is acquainted. When the hands have thus been brought into rappot with the instrument, there follows an "étude," or portion of an "étude," from one of the minor masters. Then comes the great feature of the lesson, the "morceau classique," to the study of which mademoiselle's whole heart is given over; and the tension this occasions is relieved by the lighter strains of some first-class "morceau de salon." All these have been carefully practised beforehand, and the lesson closes with "déchiffage," or reading from sight, which last is seldom a triumph for either teacher or pupil.

Through all these progressive stages mademoiselle's accents are honeyed, her smiles persuasive and alluring. Her slim hand hovers over those of her pupil with something of the quivering solicitude with which the mother-bird encourages the flight of her young. Her voice softly pursues the melody, if it be but that of an exercise, with an accompaniment peculiar to herself, consisting of the oft-repeated syllable, "Paw—paw," and the variety of intonation she throws into this sound is truly marvellous, from the wildest, swiftest-rushing crescendos to the most plaintive, long-drawn-out diminuendos, dying away into a scarce audible sigh. Her pupil would not break the measure then for worlds, the lesson in fact having become an inspiration, carrying on in spite of oneself. When she says (but beneath her breath, so as not to break the flow or sound), "Plus vite, mon enfant, plus fort, chantez! chantez!" the fingers fly in obedience to her will, grasping the notes with a power scarcely their own, extracting the melody with a sweetness that surprises the ear; till the touch, the expression, the fluency of the rendering strike perfect on the highly-strung nerves, the acutely listening ear of both teacher and pupil, and the last chord is taken with a throb of triumphant, if yet trembling, joy, though the performer has been but the medium of another's enthusiasm.

And then mademoiselle is happy. Her brown cheek flushes, and her eyes are bright. Placing her hand upon her pupil's shoulder, she rewards her with an approving smile and word, nay, in moments of peculiar exultation, with a kiss upon the forehead.

That same "chantez, chantez!" of mademoiselle, being new at first to her pupils, fresh from the straitlaced teaching of their English governess, confused one of them so much that, in her eagerness to obey the persistent injunction, she began with her childish voice to follow the majestic harmonies of Beethoven's "Sonate pathétique"—blushing to the roots of her hair when she discovered her mistake, which mademoiselle, in the rapture of her mood, had scarcely noticed. For it was the notes of the piano that were expected to sing—to sing; and the abashed young pupil henceforth did her best to make them do so. For if she should fail, should the fingers falter or the courage break down, it is something to remember when mademoiselle bends forward in her seat that her eyes may upbraid the delinquent, though even then her look is more of sorrow than of anger, and in accents stern, yet trembling with suppressed emotion, bids her practise the offending passage over one hundred times. Then, for mademoiselle is methodical, even in her rage, her pencil is flashed out, her nervous fingers score the bars under heavily, and “cent fois” glares forth in large red letters from the top of the page at the culprit, who would practise it a thousand times rather than falter in a note again.

But the lessons are over now. Mademoiselle rises to resume her out-of-door apparel, and, refusing with a slight disdain all offers of shelter from the still raging wind, wishes her “chères petites,” two of whom, by the way, are bigger than herself, a courteous au revoir, and steps out bravely to meet the furious blast, while it is as much as one of the girls can do to hold the door open until the last remnant of the “professeur’s” black skirt has fluttered from the threshold, and she has ceased from looking back to smile her gracious adieux.

Dear, honest little mademoiselle, who didst combine in thy small, wiry person the vivacity of a Française with the sturdy independence of character, the unflinching, unwearied discharge of duty which we English are wont to attribute to our noble selves. We seem to see thee now—thy slender form so straight and self-supporting; thy long and mobile hand, instinct, as was thy soul, with music, raised up in warning, in supplication, or in rapture; representing, as it were, in some mysterious way the very spirit of the master hovering above the work of his own creation; intently waiting on its first note of utterance; assisting with the most patient care at its every new development, yea, and compelling at times its almost perfect rendering. For was there in truth some mystic bond of sympathy, more quick than electricity, betwixt mademoiselle and her departed genii, that her soul could move in such mysterious harmony with theirs?—could divine their hidden meanings, could interpret their half-uttered thoughts, could pierce beneath the outworks of notes and measure, and grasp them hand to hand; while she blushed at times, all tremulous with emotion, like a maiden in the presence of her destined lord; and at times, with an imperious smile, seemed to demand the recognition of her kinship with them by virtue of her power to respond to every touch of theirs.

By her the very names of Mendelssohn, of Dussck, of Chopin, and, above them all, of Beethoven, were spoken with an air of subdued reverence, in a tone of hushed delight, as if they were the names of gods.

We may never meet with mademoiselle again. Let us take this opportunity of wishing her all happiness. Soon may she attain to her heart’s desire of being elected “professeure” in the Conservatoire de Musique, where at present she is but a “supplémentary,” that she may be the better able to support her aged mother and invalid sister, who are dependent for everything on her. And may the art she has served so faithfully, with such a perfect devotion, repay her humble services by weaving its sweetest strains about her declining years, that her weaker steps may be taken to the accompaniment of heaven’s own harmonies! So the music of her eternal home shall welcome her beforehand, mingling with, yet not extinguishing, those earthly strains, which we fain would think of as pursuing her still even when she has entered upon the life immortal.

THE HILL OF ANGELS

By LILY WATSON, Author of “Within Sight of the Snow,” etc.

CHAPTER XV.

CHRISTMAS came and went; week after week of the new year slipped by, and Evelyn was still leading her strange, unwonted life in the Bayswater lodgings with Miss Wentworth. What was to be the end of it all? She heard occasionally from Dottie, but the letters gave such vivid descriptions of Algy’s forlornness, and the misery to which the Lancaster household was reduced by her obstinacy, that the correspondence was by no means exhilarating. Algy himself called and wrote several times; but on one visit Evelyn happened to be out, and Miss Wentworth signified to him, with more candour than politeness, that he had better let her alone.

“She’s not the more likely to consent because she is worried within an inch of her life.”

“But what are we to do?” cried Algy, in desperation. “The Elms is a perfect desert. I don’t want to drive her away, but my mother won’t hear of my leaving home. I’m sure I wish I had never come back from the Continent.”

“I wish you never had,” was on the tip of Miss Wentworth’s tongue to reply. She was not hard-hearted; but she had watched Algy closely, had gathered certain facts about him from the Lichtensteins, and felt sure he would soon recover his disappointment.

The American lady had brought a few introductions to various people in London society. Evelyn’s acquaintance had been hitherto much restricted to her suburban circle, and it was interesting and amusing to her to appear as Miss Wentworth’s young friend here and there at a stray réunion in February.

“Mrs. Wyndham wants us to take tickets for a concert she is to give on the fifteenth on behalf of the Children’s Hospital,” announced Miss Wentworth one morning. “And as it is for a very good object, I believe we’ll go.”

The concert was a brilliant one. Artists of high rank gave their services, and the large drawing-room of Mrs. Wyndham’s house in Bruton Street was thronged on the evening in question with a fashionable audience—women in diamonds and full dress, with a goodly sprinkling of the other sex. Just as the music was about to begin, there was a slight commotion among the guests, and the hostess was seen escorting a lady to a chair that had been carefully kept vacant in the front row.

Evelyn started at the sight of the tall, slight figure, in its draperies of fine black lace with an Indian shawl thrown carelessly across the shoulders. It was Mrs. Allingham West.

A great agitation instantly arose in the girl’s mind. She longed to speak once more to her heroine; but dared she, could she claim acquaintance? It was almost a relief that the music would enforce silence, and enchain her to her chair for at least an hour and a half longer, and as she was sitting several rows behind Mrs. West, she was unable to do more than watch the poise of her fine head, catching once and again the profile of her face as she turned to her neighbour. But great was her dismay, as soon as the song was over, to hear Miss Wentworth observe, in calm, low tones—

“I am glad to observe that Mrs. Allingham West has come in. I did not wish to go back to my own country without an interview; and what failed me at Engelberg I shall get in London. We will go and speak to her shortly.”

“Oh, do you think we had better?” hesitated Evelyn, in great dismay; “she may not remember me; and you do not know her at all!”

Miss Wentworth’s reply was suggestive.

“No, I do not know her; but I mean to.”

It would be difficult to describe the anguish of Evelyn’s mind during the rest of that concert. She never knew what was sung or played. She felt terribly responsible for Miss Wentworth, and in her exaggerated girlish consciousness, and her reverence for the well-known authoress, she really felt as though she would be grateful to vanish into nothingness. Once a wild idea seized her of fainting and being taken out, so as to escape from the coming ordeal. She looked despairingly at Miss Wentworth; with her coronet of white hair, the curious pallor of her fine skin, and the brilliance of her black eyes, her whole air of weirdness and daintiness set off by her plain black velvet gown, the little American lady had certainly a most distinguished appearance; no one would.

in the wildest moments of aberration, accuse her of vulgarity; and yet the act she proposed, of deliberately introducing herself to an eminent woman—how abhorrent to every notion of English propriety! Poor Evelyn! she revolved over and over again in her mind what to say to deter her, what to do to soften the suddenness of the proceeding; but she sought in vain for any means of averting the catastrophe.

At length the concert, interminable as it seemed, came to an end; there was a buzz of applause, and then people began to rise, to take leave, to exchange a few words with one and another. Now was Miss Wentworth's time. Undaunted by any fears, or by the fact that Mrs. Allingham West was surrounded by a little court of men and women, she sailed up to the top of the room, awaited a pause in the conversation, and boldly extending a perfectly fitting little grey glove, she remarked, in her distinct American tones—

"I venture to introduce myself to Mrs. Allingham West. As an Amuh-ican I should like to have an opportunity of expressing my own appreciation—the appreciation of my countrymen and countrywomen—for her remarkable genius."

The grey glove remained extended, and Mrs. West had no alternative but to take it.

"Oh! allow me to introduce Miss Wentworth to you," hurriedly said Mrs. Wyndham, uncomfortably aware that Mrs. West was not at all fond of public compliments, interviews, and allusions to her genius of such an obtrusive character.

"You are very good, I am sure," replied the authoress, with a touch of hauteur.

"And I can see that you all agree with my little friend over there that I am doing a very unconventional thing," pursued Miss Wentworth, looking round on the little coterie of men and women in the most easy and unembarrassed manner possible. "Poor child, she is ready to sink into the ground with discomposure; but it was my only opportunity, and I am sure Mrs. Allingham West will forgive me. I leave Europe before many months are past."

This little speech, in its perfect candour, quite set the American lady right in the eyes of all; and it had, of course, the effect of turning attention to Evelyn. In her white silk gown and daffodils she stood there, alone, out of hearing; with such an expression of disturbance and discomfort on her pretty face that it went to the heart of two or three spectators. The whole situation was plain in a moment.

"Why, that is my little friend of Engelberg!" exclaimed Mrs. West, who did not remember Miss Wentworth, but recognised the girl with whom she had had so much talk. "Mr. Muir, do go and bring her to me."

A tall gentleman, with rough curly hair and beard and bright eyes, started from Mrs. West's side with alacrity to do her bidding. And Evelyn suddenly looking up, almost expecting to find

Miss Wentworth crushed to the earth by the force of British scorn, found a pleasant, friendly little stir going on, kind glances directed towards her, Miss Wentworth talking away at perfect ease to the celebrated lady, and a gentleman saying to her in a Scotch accent—

"Miss Hope, Mrs. Allingham West would like to speak to you."

"Oh!" cried Evelyn, in a subdued flutter. She recognised the messenger; it was the Scotchman she had met at the Ladies' Conversazione of the Royal Society, but she did not feel any wonder at seeing him again. The wonder was that she was really going once more to worship at the shrine of her goddess.

Nothing very wonderful passed after all! Mrs. West greeted Evelyn very kindly and cordially, and made several pleasant little speeches. Then she said—

"You must come to one of my Thursday evenings. I will send you a card."

"I am staying away from home just now," faltered Evelyn, "at Bayswater, with Miss Wentworth."

"Oh, you must both come; Mrs. Wyndham will forward the cards," replied Mrs. Allingham West, most graciously; and then there were smiles and farewells, and Mr. Muir escorted Miss Wentworth and Evelyn downstairs to their carriage.

How utterly the girl's forebodings were turned into delight! She was as grateful to Miss Wentworth as she had been ashamed of her half an hour ago.

"Oh, how glorious! How splendid! Only to think, dear Miss Wentworth, that we are actually going to Mrs. Allingham West's house! How glad I am we met her again!"

"There's nothing lost by being too modest," responded Miss Wentworth, drawing the folds of her rich opera cloak around her; "and if I admire a woman's genius I want to know why I am not to tell her so."

Evelyn had no answer ready, and was quite willing to accept the result of things as they were.

On the very Thursday she and Miss Wentworth were going to accept Mrs. West's hospitality, Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie were sitting in the resplendent drawing-room at The Elms. Dottie had lost much of the merry, bright expression that formerly characterised her, and a line of worry was on Mrs. Lancaster's usually placid brow.

"But things can't go on for ever and ever like this, mother dear," the girl was saying, in a slightly querulous tone. "Evelyn has been away from us nearly five months now. Miss Wentworth will sail for America in June; what's Evelyn to do then? This is her home, after all."

"I don't know, I'm sure," fretted Mrs. Lancaster. "I wish she would be reasonable, and come back and marry Algy. No one can expect I am to be separated from my only son."

"Don't you think Algy's getting over it?" suddenly asked Dottie. "He has looked very cheerful lately; and he has enjoyed all the dances we have been to; and last night he paid great attention to one or two of his partners, and ate a very good supper. I think he is forgetting; and do you know, mother, if Evelyn cannot like him, I think he ought to try to get over it."

"Oh, my dear!" ejaculated Mrs. Lancaster, horrified at the suggestion of Algy having cheerfully to renounce anything he wanted. "I am sure it would be dreadfully trying to him to see your cousin about."

A loud ring at the bell interrupted this colloquy, and a servant shortly announced—

"Mr. Hope!"

There was no time to utter the exclamation of dismay that rose to the lips of mother and daughter. Mr. Hope, they knew vaguely, had been wintering abroad, but of his return they knew nothing. He came into the room, military, fresh, upright as ever, and after the first civil greetings, responded—

"Yes, I only crossed yesterday. Left sunshine behind me in the South, it appears; we cheat the winter there. Where's Evelyn?"

"Evelyn!" stammered Mrs. Lancaster.

"Yes; I quite want to see the child again. I never lost sight of her for so long before. What's wrong—she's not ill, I hope?"

"She's gone away for a little time," replied the elder lady, much confused and disturbed.

"You speak as if there were something wrong," observed Mr. Hope, contracting his grey eyebrows; "kindly tell me anything you have to tell me at once."

Thus adjured, Mrs. Lancaster proceeded in much anguish and agitation to describe the circumstances that had led to Evelyn's taking up her temporary abode with Miss Wentworth. Mr. Hope's aspect was the reverse of encouraging, and the poor lady's habitual awe of him increased tenfold.

"I really did think I must have sunk into the earth," she said to Dottie afterwards.

"So you mean to tell me, madam, that you have driven away your niece from her home because of this fancy of your son's?" demanded Mr. Hope. "First cousins should be safe from that kind of thing. I call it preposterous—simply preposterous! The young fellow should have gone away again till he could get over it."

"But what were we to do?" almost wailed Mrs. Lancaster.

"I can tell you what you should not have done: and that is, turn away an orphan girl whom you had taken into your family, just because your son chose to fancy himself in love with her," retorted Mr. Hope. "A visit is all very well, but five months with a stranger American—Upon my word!"

He was pacing up and down the room, and Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie could see he was very angry indeed.

"You ought to have written to me as the child's only other relative. I would have prevented her being flung on the hospitality of strangers. An American woman, forsooth!"

"Miss Wentworth is a very nice lady," feebly interposed Mrs. Lancaster; but Mr. Hope did not like Americans, and took no heed of the interruption.

"She must come to me," he continued.

"She will be welcome at my house. My housekeeper will look after her—it's a bachelor household; but it's the best we can do for the child. Have the goodness, madam, to give me her address, and pack up any things she has left here."

The sternness of Mr. Hope's face as he said this terrified Mrs. Lancaster so much that she could utter no words in self-exculpation. She wrote down what he required, and with the briefest of farewells he strode out of the house.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK SERVES HORS D'ŒUVRE, ETC.

HORS-D'ŒUVRE are of two kinds, hot and cold; the latter in France are generally placed on table, and often remain there half through the dinner. They are eaten before or after the soup; the former are usually handed mediately after the soup. They should be small and light, and always served dry, that is to say, without any sauce or gravy. Any kind of little patties, croquettes, rissoles, croustades, shells filled with meat or fish are suitable. They are placed on folded napkins with fresh or fried parsley on them. Many hors-d'œuvre are also used as entrées; in England they frequently take the place of them, or are served as savouries at the end of a dinner; depending on what they are composed of. A Frenchman often begins his dinner with radishes and bread and butter; with us the radishes do not appear until the cheese and butter with which dinner is finished.

Butter is placed on table with the hors-d'œuvre; it is moulded into small shapes or shells; if the butter is good and firm, with a little practice it is easy to make these shells by merely scraping a piece of the butter up with the round top of a table-knife.

COLD HORS-D'ŒUVRE.

Radishes.—The small, tender leaves are left on, the radishes are slightly scraped, and the ends cut to points.

Olives, Gherkins, Cucumbers, and other salt pickles are drained and served in suitable dishes in fresh cold water. Vinegar pickles are served as they are.

Fresh Cucumbers.—Peel and cut them in thin slices, put salt over for a quarter of an hour, then arrange in a circle, one piece overlapping the next; add pepper, oil, vinegar, and chopped parsley.

Ham (raw or cooked), Sausage, and Tongue, are all served as hors-d'œuvre; they are cut in small, thin pieces, arranged in rows or circles with parsley. Tongue is not cut as thin as ham and sausage.

Fresh Ripe Figs are served at the same time as sausage and ham.

Slices of Melon (preferably cantaloups).—These are usually handed round.

Prawns arranged simply with parsley.

Salad of Salted or Smoked Herrings.—Soak the herrings in milk, skin them, and take the fillets from the bones, trim and cut them in neat pieces, arrange in small dishes, pour a sauce of mustard, oil, and vinegar over, and surround with quarters of hard-boiled eggs.

Pickled Herrings.—Cut off the heads and tails of some smoked herrings, then put them in a stewpan with plenty of cold water; let it stand on the stove until the water is quite hot, but not boiling; drain, skin, and place in a deep dish; cover them with oil, cover the dish, leave for two or three days, and serve the fillets plain or as above.

Anchovies.—Dip pickled anchovies in hot water, scrape off the skin with a knife, take the fillets off the bones, cut each in two, and place them in little dishes with little heaps of chopped hard-boiled eggs (the yolks and whites separate); sprinkle with either finely-chopped chervil, capers, or parsley, and a little oil and vinegar.

Sardines in the same way.

Sardines are also drained, wiped with a linen cloth, the tails cut off, and a little fresh oil put over them. Anchovies are boned and served with a small quantity of oil and vinegar over them.

Smoked Salmon.—Cut the salmon in very thin slices and serve surrounded with parsley.

Caviar should be served in its natural state, with cut lemon. Sometimes chopped scallion or onion are served with it. It is also spread on small rounds of fried bread, toasts, or bread with very little butter on it; this way nothing is added to the caviar, and it is a convenient way of putting it on table.

Pontargue (this is caviar dried and pressed with mullet or other fish spawn) is cut in thin slices, the skin is removed, and it is seasoned with oil, pepper, and lemon-juice.

Canapés aux Anchois.—Cut some thin slices of bread into oval shapes, butter them evenly, cover the butter with a layer of yolk of hard-boiled egg, that has been seasoned and passed through a sieve; on this arrange fillets of anchovies, either as a star or lattice-work, garnish the spaces between the fillets with chopped gherkin, egg, capers, or parsley.

Canapés au Saumon Fumé.—Cut pieces of bread as above, work a little anchovy paste or essence into some butter; cover the bread with this, then place a thin slice of smoked salmon on each piece (smoked salmon is not cooked); trim the fish off even with the bread, and serve.

Canapés au Jambon Rapé.—Grate a piece of cooked cold, lean ham; cut some thin slices of bread into long squares, mix a little mustard with some butter, cover one side of the bread with this, cover the butter with the grated ham, and serve. Grated tongue can be used in the same way.

Coquilles de Homard.—Cut in small dice any remains of lobster, add to it pickled gherkins and hard-boiled eggs, also cut up; add some whole capers; season, and mix some mayonnaise with it; put into scallop shells, smooth the tops over, and decorate with fillets of anchovies, with a little savoury jelly and chervil.

HOT HORS-D'ŒUVRE.

Anchovies à la Provençe.—Cut some thin slices of toast in six long squares; while warm rub them over lightly with a clove of garlic; take twelve anchovies, bone and pound them, add a pinch of chopped parsley, and stir in gradually some good oil; brush both sides of the toast over lightly with oil, spread the anchovies on one side of the toast, and put over the fire on a gridiron, or cook in a hot oven for seven or eight minutes; serve very hot.

Fried Anchovies.—Dip the anchovies in hot water; bone them; mix some flour with a little lemon juice and a tablespoonful of oil, dip the anchovies in this, fry them in boiling fat, and serve immediately on pieces of fried bread.

Œufs Farcis aux Anchois.—Boil eight eggs hard; when done put them in cold water for a quarter of an hour, then shell and cut them in halves, take the yolks out, and pound with twenty boned anchovies; add two tablespoonfuls of bread panade, a little piece of butter, and two yolks of raw eggs, add a pinch of finely chopped onion and a small tablespoonful of chopped parsley, season with salt and cayenne; fill the whites of eggs with this mixture; put the remainder on a dish, in this stand the sixteen half eggs close together (middle up), sprinkle with breadcrumbs and oiled butter, and bake for from fifteen to twenty minutes; serve in the dish they are cooked in.

Croustade de Jambon.—Take some remains of a ham, chop it very finely, add as much chopped parsley and sweet herbs as you have ham, and make it into a sort of paste; cut some very thin slices of ham; place in a pie-dish a layer of fine breadcrumbs, then a layer of sliced ham, then one of the mince, repeat until the dish is full; finish with very thin slices of bread at the top; press the whole well down; turn the pie-dish over on to a flat dish, then bake until brown; eaten hot or cold.

Croûtes aux Champignons.—Cook some mushrooms in butter with a little broth, season, thicken the sauce with the yolk of one egg (or more according to quantity of mushrooms), add a little lemon juice. Take the top crusts of some small dinner rolls, scoop out the crumb, butter the crusts on both sides, broil them, place on a hot dish, fill each crust full of mushrooms, and serve.

Stuffed Mushrooms.—Take a dozen of the large round mushrooms with pinkish insides, wash them well, take out the stalks, and scoop out part of the insides with a vegetable scoop, sprinkle with salt, and turn them down on a cloth to drain. Take two tablespoonfuls of finely-chopped onion and two or three finely-chopped shallots, put them in a stewpan with the mushroom stalks, insides, and two or three mushrooms, also finely chopped, and some butter, cook without browning; then add a little parsley, chopped, with a very small piece of garlic; two minutes after add three tablespoonfuls of fine breadcrumbs, and one or two tablespoonfuls of brown sauce. Draw the stewpan from the fire, add the yolk of an egg to bind the mixture, fill the mushrooms with this, cover with breadcrumbs and oiled butter; arrange on a tin, and bake in a moderate oven for thirty minutes; serve heaped on a dish.

Coquilles de Truffes Noires à la Crème.—Peel five or six clean truffles, put the peels in a stewpan with a little water and a pinch of sweet herbs; stew until the water is flavoured and reduced a little, strain it, and add it gradually to a little good béchamel or ordinary white sauce; reduce until rather thick. Cut the raw truffles in dice, cook them in a little oiled butter, season, and add the sauce to them; with this fill five or six scallop shells, cover the tops with breadcrumbs, sprinkle with oiled butter, and brown before the fire or with a salamander. Mushrooms are very good prepared in this way, and much less expensive than truffles.

Croquettes de Homard (lobster croquettes).—Cut some lobster in small dice, add to it half its quantity of cooked and chopped mushrooms, and the same quantity of bread panade (made with milk) as mushrooms, or half the quantity of bread panade and half of cold chopped fish; put all in a stewpan with sufficient thick béchamel sauce to bind the ingredients, make hot, then turn on to a plate to get cold. When cold mould into croquettes (they look well pear-shaped), roll them in egg, then in fine dry breadcrumbs, and fry in plenty of boiling fat.

Bouchées are made thus: Take some feuilletage, roll it out, and cut a dozen rounds with a scalloped-edged cutter; place these rounds on a baking-sheet, and brush them over with egg, then take a smaller plain-edged cutter, dip it in hot water, and press it lightly on the centres of rounds, so as to cut the paste half through to make the covers; make two or three slight cuts across these centres. Bake in a hot oven; when done carefully remove the covers with a knife and take out the soft paste from the inside, fill, put the covers on, and serve. Bouchées are filled with almost anything, and named according to their contents, as "bouchées de homard," which are filled with lobster, cut in dice, and mixed with béchamel sauce and chopped cooked mushrooms. Oysters, shrimps, prawns, tongue, chicken, game, mushrooms, truffles cut small and prepared with thick sauce (see "salpicons," garnitures) are used for filling these cases, or small quantities of purées of game or poultry.

Fried Oysters à la Provençale.—Take two dozen oysters, squeeze a little lemon-juice over, then throw them into boiling water for three minutes, take them out, drain, and wipe them, remove the beards and place the oysters on a plate; put a little pepper, finely-chopped parsley and oil over them, then take up two at a time, dip in butter, and throw into boiling fat; when they are a pale brown drain, and sprinkle with salt. Pile the oysters on a dish on a folded serviette, garnish with fried parsley and cut lemons.

Batter for Oysters.—Take a teacupful of flour, add a little salt and two tablespoonfuls of olive oil, moisten gradually with tepid water or beer (if with the latter keep the batter tolerably near the fire for an hour or two before it is used), it should be quite smooth and not too thick; just before using stir in lightly the well-beaten whites of two eggs.

Cromesquis d'Huitres (oyster kromesksys).—Choose large oysters, poach them in a very little water with a squeeze of lemon-juice, drain, and let them get cold, then beard and cut the oysters in small square pieces; add some good béchamel sauce (warm) that has been boiled down with some of the liquor in which the oysters were cooked (or make a little thick white sauce of the liquor, with butter, flour, and cream added to it); add a small piece of melted glaze, season with a little nutmeg, and let it cool. When cold take pieces of about the size of a small egg, flatten them, have ready some thin pancakes, cut in pieces all the same size and shape, put each piece of oyster mixture between two pieces of pancake; ten minutes before serving dip the kromesksys in frying batter, put them in hot fat, fry a nice colour, drain, and serve heaped on a serviette.

Croûtes aux Huitres.—Cut some small slices of bread, half an inch thick, trim them into ovals, hollow one side, fry them in butter, and keep hot. Beard some oysters, cut them in pieces, stew the beards in a very little water; when done take out the beards, put some good béchamel sauce, a little cayenne pepper, and the oysters in, add two or three tablespoonfuls of good cream, finish with a little butter. Fill the pieces of hot fried bread with this, and serve. These are sometimes covered with fine breadcrumbs and a little oiled butter, and glazed with a salamander.

Les Anges à Cheval (angels on horseback).—Beard some large oysters, pepper, and dip them in oiled butter or in oil. Cut some thin slices of cold boiled bacon, cut these into squares the size of the oysters. Take some little silver skewers, stick a piece of bacon, then an oyster, alternately, on the skewers, six on each, sprinkle with breadcrumbs mixed with chopped parsley. Broil three minutes over a brisk fire. Serve on the skewers on strips of bread fried in butter.

Croûtes à la Moelle de Bœuf (beef marrow crusts).—Soak some beef marrow in cold water, drain, and then put it in a stewpan with a little broth; boil two or three minutes, then take from the stove; leave ten minutes, then drain on a cloth. Cut the marrow in slices, season it with salt and cayenne; have ready some pieces of fried bread prepared as for "croûtes aux huitres," put the marrow on the fried bread, with a little finely chopped scallion over the top, and send to table very hot on a serviette.

Croûtes aux Rognons de Mouton (sheep's kidneys).—Cut some slices of crumb of bread, half an inch thick; trim them into pieces about three inches long and two inches wide; cut a little of the thickness from the centre of each piece of bread on one side, fry them, and keep them hot. Take some calf's, lamb's, or sheep's kidneys, skin them and roast in a stewpan with a little butter or fat from the kidneys; when done, take them out and put in an equal quantity of mushrooms cut in dice, shake them for a minute in the stewpan, then put in a little water and stew the mushrooms until done, then remove the fat; cut the kidneys like the mushrooms, put them back in the stewpan; season, add a little thick white sauce, a little piece of glaze, and one or two tablespoonfuls of cream; a little nutmeg may be added or not as liked. Fill the crusts with this, heaping the centres; smooth the mover, cover with fine breadcrumbs, sprinkle with oiled butter, brown the tops with a salamander, and serve.

Coquilles de Ris de Veau.—Cut cold remains of sweetbreads in dice, put them in a stewpan with a third the quantity of cold tongue, cut in the same way; add some good white sauce, a few finely-powdered sweet herbs, a little chopped parsley and nutmeg; fill some scallop-shells with this, put fine breadcrumbs over the tops and sprinkle with butter, put them in the oven for five minutes, then brown with a hot shovel.

Coquilles de Cervelles de Veau (scallops of calf's brains).—Prepare in the same way as above, but omit the tongue, and mix some grated Parmesan with the breadcrumbs.

Petites Caisses de Ris d'Agneau (little cases of lamb's sweetbread).—Boil some lamb's sweetbreads five minutes, dry them and divide each in three pieces. Put a lump of butter in a stewpan, with a few sweet herbs and a little chopped parsley, add a small quantity of thick sauce, put in the sweetbreads, and let them finish cooking. Take sufficient china ramekin cases, butter them, and line them with quenelle forcemeat; stand them in a stewpan in boiling water to poach the forcemeat, then fill with the sweetbreads and sauce, put a thin cover of the quenelle meat over, bake until set, then brush the tops over with a little thick brown sauce, or with melted glaze; put them back in the oven for two minutes, and serve.

Coquilles de Foie Gras, aux Champignons.—Cut a piece of foie gras in small dice, add half its quantity of cooked mushrooms or truffles, cut in the same way; put in a stewpan with a little good white sauce or béchamel, and a small piece of glaze; make all hot. With this fill some scallop-shells, smooth the tops, cover with fine breadcrumbs, and pour a little oiled butter over; brown with a salamander, and serve.

Foie Gras (fat livers of poultry) en Caisse.—Cut the foie gras in pieces, cook it in butter with pepper, salt, a little nutmeg, chopped parsley, shalots, and mushrooms; make small paper cases (about one inch and a half square), oil or butter them well, put a few light coloured raspings at the bottom of each, and then put some of the liver in each (do not fill them full); bake for about ten minutes; if necessary take some of the fat off, place on a dish, put a little hot sauce espagnole with a few drops of lemon-juice into each case, and serve.

Foie Gras are much used for bouchées, rissoles, croquettes, etc. Small pieces of Strasburg paté de foie gras made hot in paper cases, then served as above, are generally liked.

Palais de Bœuf au Fromage de Parme (ox palates with Parmesan).—Cook the palates in the stockpot until quite tender, then cut them into small pieces, put them in a stewpan with some bacon fat and some small onions sliced, let all colour slightly (pale gold colour only), then add a little white sauce; put in small china ramekin cases, grate Parmesan over the tops; put in the oven a few minutes to brown, and serve. A few very fine breadcrumbs are sometimes mixed with the Parmesan.

Crissins au Fromage (cheese straws).—Make some feuilletage, but for each of the last three turns shake grated Parmesan instead of flour over the paste to roll it out; when made roll the paste out tolerably thin, cut it into strips about the width of a pencil and four inches long, roll them on the table; place on a baking sheet in rows, cut all the same length, brush over with egg, sift Parmesan over them; bake in a quick oven; arrange on a serviette, and send to table hot.

Soufflé au Fromage, en Petites Caisses.—Melt a quarter of a pound of butter in a stewpan, beat the yolks of six eggs, add them to the butter, stir a few seconds over a moderate fire; then take from the stove, and stir in little by little half a pound of grated cheese (one quarter of a pound of Gruyère, and one quarter of a pound of Parmesan mixed together), add a pinch of pepper and a pinch of pounded sugar; put on the fire again, make hot, stirring all the time; when smooth take from the fire, and add the white of an egg beaten to a froth. Twenty-five minutes before the soufflé is wanted add five more whites of eggs beaten to a froth; fill eight or nine small china or paper cases with the mixture; bake in a moderate oven, and serve as soon as done. These are particularly good; they do not rise much in baking; the following recipe is also good, and has the advantage of being less expensive and more digestible.

Petit Soufflé au Fromage (little soufflés of cheese).—Boil half a pint of milk, draw it to the side of the stove, put in a small piece of butter, then throw in fine breadcrumbs until about the consistency of bread sauce, stirring all the time; boil for five minutes, continuing to stir, then draw from the fire; add two ounces of butter, the yolks of three eggs, two or three tablespoonfuls of grated Parmesan, a little salt, and a pinch of sugar and nutmeg. Beat the whites of three eggs to a firm froth, stir them into the other ingredients. Butter some small china or paper cases, put the mixture in; do not quite fill the cases. Bake for about fifteen minutes in a moderate oven.

Cheese Ramekins.—Boil one-third of a pint of water, add a few grains of salt, and one ounce of butter, then stir in gradually as much flour as the butter and water will absorb; put over the fire, and continue stirring until the paste leaves the bottom of the stewpan as you stir, then put it in a fresh stewpan, stir into it three eggs (yolks and whites), two ounces of butter, two ounces of grated Parmesan, a pinch of white sugar, and a pinch of pepper; place in small pieces on a baking sheet, put a little chopped Gruyère on each, or sprinkle with Parmesan. Bake twenty minutes in a moderate oven, and serve heaped on a serviette.

Ramequins de Dijon.—Put in a stewpan a quarter of a pint of water, a pinch of salt, the same of pepper, half a teaspoonful of pounded loaf sugar, and a quarter of a pound of butter; boil together for a minute, then draw from the fire, and stir in by degrees five ounces of flour, so as to make a nice smooth paste (if the flour is very dry it takes a little less); stir a few minutes over the fire, then put the paste in a clean saucepan, and mix with it rather more than three ounces of chopped Gruyère cheese; add three or four eggs (yolks and whites), stir over the fire for a half minute, then with a spoon take up pieces of the paste the size of a small egg, put them in balls on a baking sheet, egg them over, put a strip of Gruyère on the top of each; bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes, and serve immediately.

Cheese Tartlets.—With the remains of light pastry fill eighteen small tartlet tins, prick the paste with a fork in the centres, half fill them with flour, bake, empty the flour out again. Put a tablespoonful of flour in an earthen stewpan with four tablespoonfuls of grated Parmesan, moisten with one-third of a pint of milk or cream, add a little salt, pounded white sugar, nutmeg, and two ounces of butter; stir over the fire until the butter is melted, then take from the stove. A quarter of an hour after add the whites of four eggs beaten to a froth. Fill the tartlets, bake fifteen minutes, and serve immediately.

Beignets de Semoule au Parmesan.—Boil one pint of milk with one ounce of butter, throw in by degrees three ounces of semolina and half an ounce of potato flour; cook at the side of the stove for twenty-five minutes, add a pinch of salt, a little pounded sugar, and nutmeg; draw from the fire, and add the yolks of three eggs that have been beaten and mixed with a tablespoonful of cold water; cook for five minutes, stirring all the time, then take from the fire and add two or three tablespoonfuls of grated Parmesan, turn on to a buttered dish, and leave to get cold. When quite cold, cut in rounds with a paste-cutter, roll the beignets in grated Parmesan, then dip in egg and breadcrumb them; throw into boiling fat, and fry gold colour.

Rissoles.—Take any remains of paste (feuilletage or brisée), roll it out thin, cut some rounds about three inches across, put on the centre a forcemeat made of any kind of meat or poultry, with or without mushrooms, or use a salpicon; double one side of the paste over so as to make half rounds, pinch the edges together sufficiently to keep the meat in, put in a frying-basket, then in sufficient boiling fat to cover them; when a pale brown, drain and serve. Before being fried they are sometimes dipped in egg and breadcrumbed or rolled in broken vermicelli. Rissoles are also filled with any mixtures used for bouchées or croquettes, but it must not be too moist for this purpose. Fried parsley is put with rissoles to send to table. These and so many other small dishes depend for success so much on the way they are fried, that I must remind my readers that fat when it bubbles is not nearly hot enough to fry things that require "hot" fat; when it throws off a blue smoke it is ready for croquettes, rissoles, beignets, and all things of like kind. It is also to be remembered that the process is really boiling in fat, not a little fat in a frying-pan, or the bottom of the stewpan just covered with fat, but sufficient to entirely cover the articles to be cooked.

(To be concluded.)

THE THREE CITIZEN BRIDES OF AUGSBURG.

THE ancient city of Augsburg in Bavaria was, at an early period in the Middle Ages, celebrated for its commercial activity and the wealth of its merchant princes. Its advantageous position on one of the then great highways of trade, midway between the harbours of Italy and the great commercial cities of Upper Germany, made it a staple place for the exchange of the productions of the Levant and the manufactures of the North; and its citizens, enriched by commerce, adorned their city with stately churches and colleges, and established guilds whose wealth was often forthcoming to replenish the exhausted exchequer of the empire.

Augsburg was frequently the residence of the Emperors Maximilian and Charles V.; the session of the Germanic Diet was often held there, and some of the most distinguished of the burghers were raised to the ranks of the lower nobility.

Such frequent opportunities of intercourse with the highest and noblest of the land would be gradually productive of more polished social manners, whilst the wealth which they possessed would enable the citizens to cultivate the refining pursuits of music, poetry, and song.

The beauty of the daughters of Augsburg was as celebrated as the substantial advantages of their dowries; and not a few of the younger members of the nobility sought by such alliances to rehabilitate their fortunes.

Of the daughters of Augsburg there were three whose marriage with husbands of imperial or royal blood has kept their names in remembrance, and of their fortunes and subsequent career the following is a short account.

The first was Clara von Detten, who became the wife of Frederick the Victorious, Elector Palatine of the Rhine. From this marriage, in the fifth generation, was descended Frederick V. It will be remembered that he married Elizabeth, daughter of James I. of England. On the occasion of the religious troubles which convulsed Bohemia at the beginning of the seventeenth century, Frederick was elected king, chiefly by the Protestants of that country.

His reign was of short duration; after two years he was defeated by Ferdinand I., Emperor of Germany, at the battle of the White Mountain, near Prague, in 1620, and driven not only from his kingdom, but also out of his electorate. The ambition of his wife was the chief cause of his misfortunes. On his election his consort persuaded him, contrary to his own better judgment, to accept the proffered dignity. The fair castle of Heidelberg, which he had beautified with hanging gardens for her sake, and which looks down from its rocky height into the lovely vale of the Neckar, had lost its attraction for her when a higher title was within her reach. "I would rather," said she, "eat bread at a King's table than feast at the banquets of an Elector."

The daughter of this unfortunate pair was Sophia, the wife of Ernest of Hanover, and to her son George I. passed the succession to the crown of England.

The second bride was Philippina Welser, accounted the most beautiful woman of her time. She was the daughter of Franz Welser, citizen and merchant of Augsburg. Whilst attending one of the Diets of the Empire held at Augsburg in 1547, Ferdinand of the Tyrol, son of the Emperor Ferdinand I., lost his heart to the fair maiden, and the next year made her his wife. Ferdinand and Philippina took up their abode in the ancient Castle of Innsbruck; it became her favourite residence, and was presented to her by her husband in 1564.

Few places in Europe can vie for beauty of situation with the city of Innsbruck. It lies in the angle formed by the rivers Inn and Sill, in the midst of a green and fertile valley, round which rise in towering majesty the snowy peaks of the Tyrolean Alps, whose summits hang over the peaceful vale below.

The married life of Ferdinand and Philip-pina was one of almost unsullied happiness. There was, however, one sorrow in their cup. The alliance which his son had formed was looked upon by the proud Emperor as a degrading one, and for twelve years he refused to see or acknowledge his son's wife. At the end of that time, however, she succeeded in gaining admission to his presence, and throwing herself at his feet, her tears, her beauty, and her manifold virtues moved the stern heart of the father, and he raised her from her lowly position, and saluted her as his daughter.

Philippina died in 1580, and is buried in the Franciscan church at Innsbruck, where her tomb, surmounted by a recumbent figure, is still to be seen.

The third of the citizen brides of Augsburg was Agnes Bernhauer, whose beauty attracted the notice and gained the heart of Prince Adalbert, son of Ernest, Duke of Bavaria. They were privately married, for the bridegroom well knew that his haughty father would never give his consent to the match.

The story of the secret marriage soon reached the ears of the Duke. Enraged at what he considered a degrading connection, he refused his son admission to a tournament, accounting him one of sullied blood, and unworthy to enter the lists with knights of gentle birth. Adalbert then openly acknowledged his wife, and defied his father.

Tragic were the circumstances which soon followed. On a temporary absence of her husband, Agnes was seized by order of the Duke, and soon after condemned to death on a false accusation. She was taken to Strauburg on the Danube, bound hand and foot, hurled living from the bridge, and perished in the waters below.

This judicial murder took place in 1436. Her body was recovered, and in one of the side chapels in the graveyard of St. Peter's church in that town is still visited the last resting-place of this innocent and unfortunate woman.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

MARY C. POPE.—We are happy to assist in your good work by giving the name of your Corresponding Literary Union to aid the private home study in English classics, French history, Euclid, algebra, natural philosophy, and harmony. From all you say we should think you well qualified for conducting a correspondence club. To our readers requiring the address of such a society I therefore give, Miss Mary Pope, Wynnfild Place, Upper Rathmines, Dublin.

CONSTANT READER.—There is the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind at Upper Norwood, S.E.; apply to the principal, F. J. Campbell, Esq., LL.D., at the college in Westow Street. But there is another institution which might suit you even better—the School for the Indigent Blind (junior branch), Linden Lodge, Wandsworth Common, S.W., secretary, the Rev. B. G. Johns, who is also the chaplain. In this school the children are given religious instruction, taught to read and write, and a trade; and should a child show any real talent for music, they are taught. Admission by election; age between seven and twenty-two years. A form of admission sent on application.

MISCELLANEOUS.

M. M.—Your lines are pious in tone, but are not "poetry." We cannot say what your foreign "mission" may be, but judging from the line—"I sit and think and think," we fear that perhaps the nearer "home mission" may be neglected, and we advise you to cultivate all practical service and leave poetry and your "mission" alone for a time. "Ye do serve the Lord Christ."

QUEENIE.—The lines are not worth printing.

M. C. B.—Lacking in originality and incorrect in rhythm.

M. B. L.—Many thanks for the verses and the cordial appreciation of our paper.

DAISY'S "verses" are not verses at all, as they are not even rhymed.

LANCASHIRE.—We suppose you mean what we have always known as a "stump," used in crayon-drawing. They are to be had at any artists' colourman's, where every appliance of artistic work in that line is sold.

WHITE VIOLET.—The lines show some descriptive power, but are incorrect in metre, and lack original thought.

PEARL NOBLE.—Not badly written, but thin in thought. You may do better.

CLAUDIA.—See 2 Timothy iv.

21. Many suppose Claudia to have been a British lady, daughter of King Cogidubanus, and the wife of Pudeus.

LONDON-SUPER-MARE should wear a blue, brown, or green gauze veil, and if the sun has burnt the skin of her nose, she might benefit the skin by bathing in sage-tea, or milk of almonds, sold at the chemist's.

BELLA'S hand is not formed, but promises well.

"MACAULEY."—Read our articles on the care of the complexion, and look in our indexes for "Freckles."

WELL-WISHER inquires "when lizards make their gloves." Certainly they have pretty little fingered-feet that look like hands; but we never heard of any glove manufactory of their institution, nor ever saw a lizard wearing that article of dress. If Nature induces them to take a bath from time to time during the day, do not deprive them of the inexpensive luxury.

SOMERSET.—Miss Anning, the geologist, has been long dead. She presented many of her specimens to the British Museum, which she had discovered at her native place, Lyme Regis. Doubtless information respecting her could be obtained at the Museum.

LILY, A LOVER OF MILTON, M. H. E., IRENE.—Good thoughts and pious ones expressed in your verses, but not poetry. Doubtless it did you good to put them on paper; so far, well.

F. A. I. T. H. (Canada).—The poem is very pretty; we sympathise much with you in your misfortunes, and are glad to hear that in your far off-home you love the "G.O.P." so much, and find it useful in many ways.

HAMLET.—Not a "dress suit" at a wedding; a frock coat seems now generally worn.

A PERPLEXED ONE.—The question of a marriage between two people where the woman is older than the man seems to us so purely a personal one that we can only say, consider it well on all sides, but especially on the side of love, for if love and mutual esteem be present there is little to fear.

TEA ROSE.—We should think you quite capable, so far as writing is concerned, to be a children's maid, but we do not know whether you be a good needlewoman, what else you can do, nor whether you have any experience, and have a good temper.

A CONCERT SINGER.—We regret that we cannot help you in your wishes.

LUCINDA'S poems show much merit; we advise her to persevere.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Not a bad attempt at description, but incorrect in rhyme, and reads more like June than May.

M. D. G.—Both poems show a promise of better things. You might have read either to your classmates, we think; but study and do better still.

ETTY.—1. The lady speaks first, or bows, on meeting a gentleman in the street. 2. If her family see no objection to her going, she may.

UNE FILLE MODESTE.—We should think by the gentleman telling her how much the expenses would amount to that he intends her to pay them herself.

ETHEL.—1. H.M.S. Eurydice foundered in a squall off Dunnoose, near Ventnor, Isle of Wight, March 24th, 1878. 2. It is a usual custom to deposit coins and documents under the foundation-stone of buildings or monuments, and is of very ancient origin.

J. E. C. A.—The poem "Two Hands upon the Breast" will be found in the collected edition of Mrs. Craik's poems.

DAISY'S.—We could not judge unless you wrote the stories. How could we?

ADELINE T.—1. About sixteen yards of material, but this would depend on the size of the person for whom the gown is intended. 2. August, 5th, 1860, was a Sunday.

70TH HIGHLANDERS does not tell us what her dog is fed upon; we should say that two small meals a day were enough; we think that some improper dietary was being given to yours. Does the dog get water and exercise enough?

LAURA SIDDALL.—Do not attempt to express yourself in rhyme. Try to write good English prose; even if intended for the latter, your grammar is at fault in saying "Thou has." You should be able to write well yourself before undertaking such an office as that of an "editor."

MATRON.—2. Of course Nature did not supply a man with a beard for no reason. He is more exposed to the trials of damp and cold than the woman, whose natural duties keep her more in the shelter of home. For example, sailors, soldiers, masons, and other such like labourers employed in outdoor work. 2. Cramp usually results from some acidity in the system; this should be attended to. Nurses of experience have noted good results from standing a basin of clean cold water under the bed of a sufferer from cramp.

MISS TAYLOR.—Some of the principals of girls' clubs have retired without giving due notice. Write to Miss Ellman, The Rectory, Berwick, Sussex; or Miss Clift, Fernbank, Cheltenham, Gloucestershire; or Miss Hacking, Seymour Grove, Old Trafford, Manchester; or Miss Allen, 79, The Mall, Newport, Isle of Wight; or Miss C. Kemp, Bicton Rectory, Budleigh Salterton, S. Devon, respecting their Early Rising Clubs.

GALLOWAY GIRL, CONSTANT READER.—The causes of early grey hair are general debility of health, or lack of local nutrition and vitality. Iron taken internally, under medical advice, is a good thing, and some doctors recommend a tonic head-bath, such as the use of a cheap claret well rubbed into the surface of the skin of the head.

NANCY.—If the white cashmere be a good dress, you had far better send it to a cleaner's, and see whether they can improve it. The way to pronounce "Batehoven" is as we have now written it, only dropping the "h."

WELCOME !

By MRS. G. LINNÆUS BANKS, Author of "Ripples and Breakers," etc.

He is coming, he is coming !
I can see him from afar ;
He is coming, he is coming !
A victor from the war.
I can see his floating pennon,
Can hear the trumpets' tone ;
He is coming back rejoicing,
My Waldemar—my own.

He is coming, he is coming !
Be still, my bounding heart !
I'm almost mad with joyousness ;
Why should the tear-drops start ?

He must see my kerchief waving
Its welcome from the wall,
And will know his love awaits him,
My Waldemar—my all.

Run, run, my little foot-page,
Swift down the turret stair,
Bid every man and maiden
To greet their lord prepare ;
Bid the warders loose the drawbridge,
Raise the standard on the keep,
Our noble knight is coming,
He must not think we sleep.

'Till he sees my waving kerchief,
I cannot leave my post :
It will tell him she is waiting
Who loves—and he loves—most.

He is coming, he is coming !
And I tremble with delight,
As a sunlit blossom trembles
After a tearful night.

All rights reserved.

"MY WAVING KERCHIEF."

He is coming—sees my signal—
 Waves his scarf in glad response;
 I must hasten—first to greet him
 Must be his Ildefonse.
 Stay, let me thank the Lord of Hosts
 Upon the bended knee,
 For bringing Waldemar, my own,
 In safety back to me.

The glory and the praise be His,
 The shame be only mine,
 That in my weeping, widowed prayers
 Ere doubted the Divine.
 Yet human hearts have human fears,
 And faith will droop forlorn,
 When grief's long night shows not a star,
 But joy has come with morn.

He is coming o'er the greensward,
 Fleet as the flying wind;
 I must rush to clasp my true one,
 Lest he think I lag behind.
 Hark! the shouting of his vassals,
 Of the followers in his rear;
 My Waldemar, my wept one,
 He is coming—he is here!

CHAPTER XXI.

JOHN DACRE'S LAST VISIT HOME.

DR. DACRE, fortunately for him, did not fully realise what had been his daughter's predicament, though it was not from the lack of any effort on the part of Mrs. Judy and Lady Ottery to enlighten him, consequently he felt no compelling sense of obligation to own himself a deep debtor to his nephew Anthony, and in owing his debt to acknowledge

Anthony Walton's magnanimity in not urging his claim. Dr. Peter made no show of forgetting or forgiving former grievances; he simply rated Kitty rather sharply for her folly, which had occasioned so much inconvenience and trouble, and might have had serious results.

On the 10th of January, 1645, Archbishop Laud, the late Chancellor of the University, after lying more than three years in the Tower, was tried, found guilty of high treason, and beheaded on Tower Hill. Strafford had died like a haughty stoic, Laud died like a Christian bishop, who, whatever error he had committed in his public policy, had held the error sincerely, and in his private character was upright, disinterested, and devout. Even the Parliamentary party were not jubilant over his death when they had brought it about, as they had been over Stafford's, while to his own side in Church and State he appeared to be struck down by sacrilegious hands, and to die the death of a martyr.

Matters continued exactly as they had been between Oriel and Islip Barnes and Essex's camp, when one windy March day, at the season when the colonies of rooks were beginning to build in some of the college gardens, John Dacre walked quietly and openly across the quadrangle of Oriel. What was most changed in him was that, instead of his student's gown and trencher hat, he wore a buff coat and steel breast-plate and head-piece; but that was far too common a change to attract attention. No doubt the buff coats and armour were worn in Oxford, up to this date, in the King's service, and not in that of the London Parliament; but in good sooth there was little to choose between many young Englishmen on both sides of the question. This was especially true when, as in the case of Jack, they wore—not the short-cropped hair of the Roundheads and of the men of the present day—but the long locks to which the lads were accustomed before the comparative length of their hair was the test of their political creed.

At the same time, Jack was not sneaking into his old home, with any idea of passing himself off, to a casual observer, as a Royalist. He did not look as if he sought disguise. He had always been impetuously straightforward, and in the four years which had elapsed since he had last trodden the familiar ground, and looked up with affectionate inquiries and greetings at the square tower, the battlements, and the college's proud boast of a window, he had grown in manliness. Not only were his shoulders broader and squarer, the down on his lips and chin a fair attempt at a beard, and the red and white of his cheeks darkened by exposure to sun and wind; he carried himself with a certain quiet resolution, and an absence of eager assertion which belongs to manhood rather than to youth. They may be in their turn as precocious a ripening as the former stage was an early bloom and flush of independent thought and feeling, a passionate choice of principles to abide by, and live or die for.

Jack was there under his own colours, yet walking openly and calmly as one who has no fear for his safety. The only apprehension he entertained, and even that was somehow subdued and softened into a gentle, half-smiling doubt, as if he was not in earnest in the apprehension, had to do with the reception he would get from his father.

He was coming back in a sense like the prodigal, to express his repentance, and ask his father's forgiveness; but in another light he did not recant a single opinion, or depart from one proposition on which he had ruled his conduct and decided his fortunes. He was Captain John Dacre, in one of Lord Essex's regiments, and Captain John Dacre of Essex's battalion he intended to continue, unless, indeed, he were promoted to be major or colonel, or were transferred to Fairfax's, or, best of all, to General Cromwell's command. For where the stout, stern General was, there was sure to be gallant fighting along with decent order, reverent living, just weighing of a man's merits, and a cordial if curt mention of him, if he had done anything deserving mention, in the despatch to the Parliament in London.

John Dacre had come into Oxford by virtue of a pass to arrange for the exchange of prisoners, and the moment the business was done he repaired to Oriel, where his family were ignorant alike of his presence and his business. He ascended the particular staircase, and walked straight to his father's rooms, as if he had been there but yesterday, as if he had not been turned out with contumely. He opened the parlour door without knocking, awaking two shrill shrieks from Mrs. Judy and Kitty, who behaved as if they had seen a ghost, and causing Dr. Peter, sitting in his great chair indulging in half an hour's relaxation after his midday meal, to remain motionless and dumbfounded, gaping and staring in sheer amazement.

"Father," said Jack, "I am glad to see you well. I have come to greet you, and to say, if you will let me, how sorry I am for any rudeness and violence whereof I was guilty in our last meeting, which I might have spared you."

"Dost mean, boy, thou hast seen the error of thy ways?" cried Dr. Dacre, starting up, trembling with agitation. His thin face was very pale, and his delicate hands grasped the arms of his chair as if for support. "Thou wouldst say thou art mortally ashamed of thy disgraceful tampering and leaguings with rebels, thou renouncest the whole treacherous band, with every unhung knave and villain who was thy evil counsellor?"

"Nay, sir, nay," said Jack, striving to keep cool, but with his father's agitation communicating itself to him. "I know of no rogue or evil counsellor. I was not decoyed or even over-pressed. I made my choice not without painful deliberation, not without honestly seeking God's guidance. Though you may have held me over young, ignorant, and wholly mistaken in my decision, I am prepared to abide by it."

"Then what are you seeking here?" demanded Dr. Dacre, his heat chilling on the instant and freezing into ice. He rose to his feet, drew as far back as the room would let him from his son, and with a sudden effort dragged his chair round, and placed it between them as if to bar Jack's farther approach. But the lad stepped quickly past it and again stood before his father.

"I am here in the right of my sonship and your fatherhood. I am here in my own name and in that of my dead mother, to pray that there may be peace between us, though the whole world besides were at war. I am here to crave your pardon for all wherein I have offended you. I know I was insolent and headstrong—a presumptuous, hot-blooded, self-willed boy if you will, when we last parted. It may be that I might have delayed the step I took. It may even be that I was mistaken so far. I make no pretensions to infallibility of judgment; how should any one of us, however old and wise, take that upon him?" protested poor Jack, wistfully. "There be many good and true men who were with us in all else, but departed from us on the question of the necessity of a resort to arms. I myself have pondered it on many a weary day and sleepless night, and upon my honour I cannot yet settle it to my satisfaction. I admit all that willingly, but the thing is done, has been honestly done, and cannot be undone. I have put my hand to the plough, I cannot go back."

"I want none of thy hypocritical cant," protested Dr. Dacre, wrathfully. "Thou wilt tell me next it was honourable, and thou hadst no resource save to bear arms against thy lawful king, thy mother church, and that other mother, this grand and noble university, which hath fostered serpents in her generous, confiding bosom, which not only cherished thee, but me before thee. Lad, hadst thou no feeling for my grey hairs that thou shouldst bring them down in sorrow to the grave, because son of mine hath lifted up his hand against these sacred institutions?"

"Not to destroy them," said Jack, firmly; "not to hurt the very least of their valued possessions; to keep them intact, free from blight and blot, to hand them down as we have received them. Yea, more, for there is growth in all living things, growth or else decay, to help to carry them on to their supreme perfection."

"Father," cried Kitty at last, springing forward, "I know I am only a weak, silly maid, I could never be to you like a son; but, at least, I have never offended you. Yet I dare to offend you now. What hath my brother done that you should treat him so? should refuse to accept his plea for a reconsideration of your judgment? He is not a vile person that we should blush to own him. He is no scapegrace or wastrel; not even a vain fop and silly idler of his time and despiser of his books. Dear father, thou wast proud when he won his demyship at Magdalen, thou didst take such delight in his progress. Now, I say again, what hath he done? Made his election like a man of what side he should take in this dreadful war, and maintained his cause in hardship and suffering. I protest I am proud of him for that, though he were twice as much mistaken as he is, without doubt. You may be ashamed, but for me I am proud, and I tell you as well as him," said Kitty, drawing herself up, her breast heaving and her eyes flashing; "if he be in error, as methinks he is, he will be punished, all his side will be punished; but do not thou inflict the punishment. I cannot be with thee in this, sir; he is my dear and only brother—my dearest Jackie. If I have not kissed and embraced him as yet, and bade God bless and speed him, and show him the right way, it was that he might first have speech with you. In what deadly peril he may have placed himself to get it, he alone can tell," Kitty ended, her voice breaking with terror and distress.

"Doctor, master; oh, have pity on thine own flesh and blood!" Mrs. Judy lifted up her voice and besought him.

Dr. Peter looked around him somewhat wildly.

"So," he said, "this is the weapon that is to be employed against me, to work upon my weakness, this fellow's danger through his audacious foolhardiness. But I am not a Brutus who can give him up to justice as he deserves. I would I were, I would I were!" and he compressed his bloodless lips as if he would compel himself to speak the dread sentence; but they parted trembling and said instead, "I cannot. Thou hast made me a traitor like unto thyself, if that be any comfort to thee. But at least I will not harbour traitors. Begone, John Dacre, and let me see thy face no more. Be thankful to the treacherous blood in thy veins, and to thy mother looking out of thine eyes, for the fact that thou hast come to me, and I have let thee go scot free without calling in every King's soldier in Oxford to seize and bind thee."

"Not so, father," said Jack, steadily. "I did not come to use my danger as a weapon against you, and thus play on your feelings. I am in no peril any more than you are. Cheer up, Kitty; compose yourself, Mrs. Judy. I came here under a safe conduct in the way of my duty to treat in an exchange of prisoners, and to plead for humanity to our men. I confess I begged for the job. I did so long to see Oxford again; if that be a sin on my part, I plead guilty. Being in the town I could not choose but wait on you, and see with my own eyes how you and sister Kitty and my old friend Mrs. Judy fared. Your loyalty is so well attested," continued Jack, with a faint smile, "that I had no fear of compromising you by coming here. I would also relieve my mind by putting into words for your hearing, my pain and remorse for any undutiful word or look I may have been betrayed into, in my passion, during our last interview. And now, sir, I am ready to take my departure instantly, if you wish it."

Dr. Dacre was a second time taken aback by Jack's steadfastness and coolness. The old man was also considerably shaken by what had already transpired.

"Since you are here on these terms," he said, sullenly, "since you have thought fit to come, without the ceremony of craving my permission, you may dispense with the form in leaving, and quit the place when it suiteth you. It seems to me that you are already master here, as your crew are like to be masters of England." He turned his chair round and sat down heavily.

It was an ungracious concession, still it was an approach to a truce, and Jack was fain to make the best of it for the brief interval he could command. He turned eagerly to the women, who were drawing nearer and nearer and hovering about him.

"Let me have a look at you, Kitty," catching her by the waist and turning up her face. "Why, you are a grown woman, little Kitty, and do no despite in your looks to the stock you and I have come of. I heard tell you were as fresh and fair as a daisy, and I declare, my dearest dear, without flattery, it is true. Mrs. Judy, you do not look a day older. You are wearing as you deserve to wear. I vow your age must be less, by a round dozen of years, for the lack of the burden of my torn ruffles and cravats, and those pairs of stockings, Mrs. Judy, of which an unlucky right or left was sure to go amissing."

In the reaction from the strain which had been upon him, he spoke with positive gaiety, as if all were well, peace established, and the warfare which had undone them at an end and forgotten.

Fondly the women clutched at the respite, took up his cue, exclaimed over his growth, the hue of his cheeks, the length of his beard. Kitty laid her cheek to his, Mrs. Judy kept patting him on the shoulder. Then Mrs. Judy accomplished a bold stroke.

"I warrant, master Jackie," she said, looking defiantly at Dr. Peter, "thou wouldst be the better of meat and drink after thy ride. Indeed, I should not wonder, though, thou didst start fasting—young people are main foolish on some points. But thou wilt do the greater justice to the bread and cheese and ale which are all I have to offer between meals. Nay, I have by good luck some trifles in the shape of apple-pasties and spiced bread I baked this morning. Many a kiss thou gavest me for their like, my tall master, when thou wast a small boy not up to my knee. Thou wilt tell me if thou hast tasted their equal since I last baked them for thee?"

Both Jack and Kitty fully expected Dr. Dacre would rise up in a fury, and forbid a rogue and rebel to break bread in his honest college, and say there were enough hostelries in Oxford, with their tables open to all, without his board being defiled. But he sat silent and glum, contenting himself with turning away his head. Apparently he could not deny his son—his only son—the passing refreshment which he would have bestowed on a tired stranger or a weary dog, any more than in other circumstances he could have proclaimed Jack's presence and given him up to his enemies.

Jack was still more "heartened" to sit down and eat with all the appetite he could summon for the occasion, to declare that Mrs. Judy's was a sumptuous feast, and to accompany it with impromptu quips and cranks, spontaneous conceits, and somewhat shaky laughter. He was no longer the moody, constrained lad they had last seen him. He was the old schoolboy Jackie, who had been detained in school by some more than usually-hard imposition which had cost him vexation and trouble, perhaps a few secret tears brushed away on the cuff of his little coat, but which, when it was over and done with, he was fain to fling behind him, and rejoice with a nervous abandonment to rejoicing. In the talk there was not a word of politics or war or the straitened purses and empty cupboards of Oxford in the long siege, or the hard life and the daily casualties in a camp of soldiers. It was Jack twitting Kitty with wearing carnation ribands to set off the greater delicacy of the rose in her cheeks, and Kitty threatening to clip his locks into greater evenness of length, and reminding him of Dr. Kettle and his shears; or Mrs. Judy calling the two to order, as if they were still children, and bidding Kitty let her brother alone, and suffer him to eat his victuals in peace.

Kitty was impelled to call her brother's attention to the changes in the room, and to give him a merry account of the state in which the family had found their quarters when the Provost had ceased to want them for his guests.

Jack got up and strolled to a picture, the position of which had been altered; it was not hanging straight, and he put it right. On the table at his elbow were some books of his father's, which Dr. Dacre had been prepared to consult when the period of rest which he allowed for his digestion had come to an end. Jack just touched them with the brown sinewy hand, which was so different from the white fingers of the scholar.

"Is it Thucydides or Tacitus that you are taking up now, sir, for the benefit of the next generation?" he ventured to ask with respectful interest; "or are you carrying out your idea of commenting on Herodotus, and then going on to deal with the dramatists?"

"It is little you care for my work," said Dr. Dacre, with a scowl and a growl. "There is little learning where thou art gone."

Yet it was evident that the mere mention of the subjects which were next his heart, and had been the occupation of his life, stirred him.

"You are a little hard on us," said Jack, sedately. "The arts of war and peace do not agree well, 'tis true, but we are not all ignoramuses. I may have stopped short with being little more, for which I am truly contrite, as for other sins, since I have the honour to be the son of a ripe scholar, and ought to have done him greater credit; but Sir Thomas Fairfax hath a pretty smattering of Latin and Greek, and General Cromwell himself is not indifferent to the humanities, I do assure you. I can pledge myself for both gentlemen that they would lose half their worldly goods sooner than work lasting harm to the colleges or the great library."

"Ah, Jack," said his father, with irony, but still with a certain revulsion of feeling, and returning at a bound to familiar terms, "I know not if a scholar hath been spoiled in thee, but a special pleader hath lost his chance. I wis not where thou gottest the faculty. I was not aware before that any of my race had a creeping, twisting, insinuating lawyer trick with him."

"Mayhap it is bred of the ingenuity of the scholar," said Jack, boldly, and with perfect good humour; "but my books are not so clean forgotten as you think, sir, nor am I without hope of returning to them some day. I have one among my baggage, and I was reading an oration of Cicero's t'other night, but I confess a passage in it did puzzle me."

"Eh! what was it?" inquired Dr. Peter, with keen interest, sitting up and leaning forward. "I have always thought Cicero as plain as a pikestaff, but when a man grows rusty he is soon put out. I prithee, Jack, what was the difficulty?"

"Here it is," said Jack, pulling a small brown book out of his pocket, and opening it where a page was turned down. The two pored over it together, their heads almost touching, Dr. Peter's bald crown close to Jack's flowing locks, as the father and son discussed the passage, sentence by sentence, from different points of view. They read on and spoke out their admiration of the orator or their dissent from his oratory. It was as if they had gone back to some of the happiest moments of their past intercourse, when Jack was still an eager studious lad, and his father had supplemented the instructions of his regular tutor.

The spring afternoon was passing rapidly, longer and longer shadows were falling across the quadrangle, the sun's last rays were lighting up the great window, the pride of Hall Royal, while Jack still lingered. Suddenly Dr. Dacre stopped with his finger on the page, and looked up with a half-dazed look, which frightened not only Jack but Kitty, who was watching them gladly.

"What are we doing? What is it all about?" He passed his hand over his eyes as if to see more clearly. "Ah, Jack, Jack, thou didst break my heart years ago, and didst close it against thee, and now thou wouldst steal back to thy former place without warrant," he said reproachfully.

"Only for a few minutes, father," said Jack, softly, in an undertone, "only to hear your voice as it did use to sound once again. I thank thee with all my heart for the boon. My time is up, that is—though I have quarters in the town for the night, in order to finish my business—I will not cumber or detain you farther."

"When it comes to that," said Dr. Peter, hesitating, while Kitty's heart leapt up, "since thou hast come at all, since thou art here and hast to stay in Oxford for the night, it may be as well here as elsewhere. Thou mayst at least remain and sup with us. After all, Judy's interim hospitality is but meagre in these days of short commons, and nobody can object for thee to eat one meal with thy family."

"No, by your leave, and with you know what gratitude, for your kindness, father," said Jack, fervently. "The Provost or others in the college might object, and you must suffer no reproach or indignity for me, sir."

"I am entitled to some license," Dr. Dacre began again, still hesitating.

"No," repeated Jack, "I am bound to report myself at the Castle. The license I have profited by already is more than half due to the fact that I am your son. I must not trespass upon it farther."

He was firm, but he still lingered as if loth to go. He lifted the steel head-piece which he had removed when he came in, and fingered it, but did not put it on. It had been Dr. Dacre's habit to have evensong said before supper. Mrs. Judy, who had been out of the room for the latter part of Jack's stay, on hospitable thoughts intent, having taken it for granted that he was to be his father's guest a little longer, came in with the prayer-book, and placed it as usual before the head of the family.

Dr. Dacre paused and looked round, still with his perturbed air, but Jack had thrown down his steel cap and taken his old seat on one side of his father, while Kitty sat on the other.

The Doctor opened the book with a slightly abstracted air, but still in his ordinary deliberate and reverent fashion, and read the psalm and lesson for the day, part of the service which the Parliament in London had prescribed. If Jack concurred in the sentence of the Parliament, and had learnt to worship God in a more informal manner, he made no sign. He anticipated Kitty in what had been her duty lately of giving the responses. He said them in his strong yet melodious, manly young voice, dwelling on them as if each well-remembered, sacred word was loved by him, and lovely to him, as if it was a joy to him to join once more in the family prayers. After the amen he continued for a few seconds longer on his knees, then rose quickly, as if the act of worship formed a fit finale to his visit. He clasped Kitty, and kissed her on the lips again and again. He kissed Mrs. Judy affectionately on the forehead, as he had not done since he was a small boy, come to make it up with her after he had been under her displeasure for a childish delinquency, or as if he was just setting out, proud of his independence and responsibility, on a few days' visit to his kindred at Islip Barnes; and as if he was the same boy grown older, and bound for a longer expedition, he turned to his father, and bent, according to the custom of the time, to receive his parting blessing. Dr. Dacre gave it much moved, as by an impulse which thrilled his very heartstrings: "God bless and keep thee, my son John, and send thee and all of us the true light," and Jack was gone.

In less than a fortnight afterwards a battle was fought at Islip Bridge. It was not a great battle; it was merely the successful resistance on the part of the Parliamentary soldiers of an attempt on the Royalist side to break through the besieging line which shut in the King and his forces. Its greatest achievement was the baffling of Prince Rupert's purpose, of advancing two thousand men from Worcester, to serve as an escort to Charles to enable him to quit Oxford and join his nephew. But in scarcely one of even far more trifling skirmishes, which read as utterly insignificant on the page of history, was there not some dear life quenched and some hearth rendered desolate. On the field of Islip, within sight of the happy resort of his childhood and youth, almost within cry of his kindred, John Dacre was slain. When he lay shot through the lungs the night wind blew the long light brown locks which were so like Kitty's, that would never more be stirred by aught else, across the fine thin face, and no impatient hand swept them back again. The eyes, which were also like Kitty's, were no longer troubled in their depths of wistful, yearning sweetness, long choked at its source. Their fair dreams were ended or fled to a purer region. They were eyes unreflecting even the starry sky, at which they stared blankly. John Dacre's tribulation was ended, and his work done.

HOW WE BREATHE.

"WHAT an extraordinary subject to speak about!" you will say. "What can there be to talk about in such a thing? Such an everyday affair!" True. Such an everyday affair that by most people it will have almost been overlooked. But certain scientific men called physiologists have carefully observed this same breathing of ours, and have many interesting things to tell us about it. Concerned with this breathing a most elaborate and beautifully-made pair of bellows has been constructed, far beyond the power of human ingenuity to imitate. From time immemorial it has been recognised that the absence of this breathing for any considerable length of time is incompatible with life, and that that termination to which we all must sooner or later come, has, from very ancient times, been spoken of as "drawing your last breath." Yet really how few of us have a distinct notion of this very important process; how few of us know how we breathe, how very few why we breathe.

You have all watched a candle burn at some period or another of your lives, yet how many of you have found out what the burning of a candle means? It is an old saying that "Familiarity breeds contempt"; perhaps many may have thought it beneath their notice to inquire into the rationale of the burning of a candle. Like our breathing, it is such an everyday occurrence, that one is liable to take it for granted, and ask no more about it; and, like it, it is what is known as a chemical process.

You know that we are surrounded on this earth by a gaseous medium known as the

FIG. 2.—(A) AIR. (B) ALVEOLAR WALL. (C) BLOOD-VESSEL.

"atmospheric air." You know that if we are deprived of this air we can no longer live, that is to say, we die of suffocation. Now what is the air that we breathe that it should be so valuable?

Chemists have found out that the air is a mixture of two gases, one called "oxygen," and another called "nitrogen." It is the former gas (oxygen) which is so vitally important to us; this gas has the power, at certain degrees of heat, of uniting with various substances, and "oxidising" them, as it is called. When a candle is burnt, the oxygen of the air is uniting with the elements going to form the candle, and the visible manifestation of this is called "combustion." The nitrogen in the air is an inert gas, and serves to dilute the oxygen and modify its action. Strange as it may seem, the process which goes on as a result of our breathing is the same as that in the burning of a candle—it is a process of "oxidising." Let us, then, before we see this process, follow a draught of air in its whole course during our breathing. We will then see what becomes of the air, and finally examine the mechanism by which the air is moved.

In the act of breathing in, air is drawn into the mouth and nose, and passes thence into the "pharynx," or back part of the mouth. From here it passes into the "larynx," or voice-box. Now, stretching across this larynx are certain structures called "vocal cords," and during each act of breathing in, or "inspiration," as it is termed, these vocal cords are pulled apart by minute muscles. If it were not for the efficient action of these little muscles we should be suffocated by the vocal cords impeding the passage of air.

If you have read some previous articles on "The Microscope and Ourselves" in this magazine, you will understand what I mean when I say that the larynx or voice-box is made mainly of cartilage; it has a lining membrane which is called its "mucous membrane," and which is provided with those little microscopic lashes called "cilia." The air having successfully passed the portals of the larynx, enters the "trachea" or "windpipe"; this is a tube made up of cartilaginous rings; it has involuntary muscular tissue in it, and is lined by a ciliated mucous membrane like that of the larynx. This trachea, when it reaches the great organs of respiration, the lungs, breaks up into two lesser but still large tubes, called respectively right and left bronchus, down both of which the air passes on its way to the lungs. Each of these tubes breaks up into smaller bronchi, and these occurring to an indefinite degree constitute all the air passages of the lung. Slight changes of structure take place as we pass down from the larger to the smaller bronchi; the cartilaginous rings of the larger bronchi are not found in the smaller, and in the smaller bronchi the quantity of muscular tissue is relatively much increased. Now at the end of each terminal bronchus a little sac is attached; this is the "alveolus," as it is called; the air enters this sac, and this is its last visible destination. These sacs are made up of very thin elastic tissue, and are lined with extremely delicate thin epithelial scales. The lungs themselves then are made up of a number of branching tubes, which terminate in delicate epithelial sacs—much as if in a bunch of grapes the stalks were tubes representing the bronchi, and the grapes the sacs or alveoli.

We have now followed our breath of air in through the mouth—pharynx, larynx, trachea, and bronchi—into the terminal alveoli or sacs. What now becomes of this air? I said a little time ago that what went on in the lungs was a process comparable to that seen in the combustion of a candle; that is, that it was a process of oxidation. What is it that is oxidised? Well, running round all the alveoli are very minute blood-vessels, which we have heard described in a former article as "capillaries"—blood-vessels with very thin walls; the air in the alveoli is brought into very intimate contact with the blood in these capillaries, and the oxygen of that air combines with the blood, and oxidises it. By breathing we are incessantly supplying fresh air to the alveoli, and the heart is ever supplying fresh blood to those capillaries; and thus the process goes on. Fig. 2 is intended to diagrammatically convey some idea of the intimate relation between blood and air in the alveoli; but the blood in these capillaries does not only receive, it gives a gas back to the lungs, which gas they get rid of in breathing out. Now the gas which the blood has in it on its return to the lungs is called carbon dioxide, and is part of the result of combination of the oxygen with the tissues. Its presence may be demonstrated in expired air in a very simple way. Take a glass of clear lime-water, and blow into it by means of a glass tube; the water will become turbid, and a deposit will form. Clearly there is something in the lime-water which there was not before; that something is this gas—carbon dioxide—which by its presence has formed chalk in the lime-water. The same result is obtained if after burning a candle we collect the gases given off, and lead them into lime-water.

Now these two gases—oxygen and carbon dioxide—which play such an important part in our breathing, have a very marked and characteristic difference from one another. If we light a wooden chip and then blow out the flame, leaving the chip in a red glow, and then plunge it into a jar of oxygen, the chip relights, and does it with an extra brilliancy; if now, instead, we plunge the chip into a jar of carbon dioxide, it will not relight, but, on the contrary, it becomes quite black. From these experimental results we learn certain facts: that the processes which oxygen is concerned in, in the body, are comparable to those in the burning of a candle in air; that the results are parallel in each instance; and that while oxygen supports combustion of whatever kind, carbon dioxide depresses it.

And now let us cast a glance on the mechanism by means of which the air is allowed access to the lungs and to the blood. The lungs are placed in a bony framework, the "thorax" or chest, closed in on all sides by various muscles. Now the floor of the chest is formed by a broad flat muscle which is called the "diaphragm."

Let me by a simple mechanical contrivance give you some idea of the principles on which this muscle works. In Fig. 3, a is a glass jar, and b is an indiarubber membrane, stretched across the lower end of a, which is open above and below, being in fact a bottle with the bottom knocked out; at a is a cork with a hole in it, which admits a glass tube, b, having on its lower end an indiarubber bag c; thus air can only enter the apparatus through the glass tube b. The membrane b can be pulled down by means of a string d. Now for the experiment! Pull down the membrane b by means of the string, and what happens? the bag c is inflated, and becomes distended with air (Fig. 3 2). What does this teach us? The glass jar is the thorax, the indiarubber membrane b is the diaphragm; the glass tube b is the trachea and bronchi, and the little indiarubber bag c is the lungs. The same thing happens in inspiration; the diaphragm descends, air rushes in at the larynx and trachea, and the lungs become inflated. But this is not the whole story even of the inspiration: the whole chest is made broader from before backwards.

You all know that our ribs slope downwards. Well, when we inspire, certain muscles lift up the ribs as a whole, and thus make the upper part much greater in capacity than before; all this assists in the inflation of the lungs. The natural elasticity of the lungs does the work of expiration. Is not this a wonderful pair of bellows? What could be more perfect than quiet breathing as a mechanical act? And yet it is an act which is quite involuntary, although we can vary it at will. Yet for the greater part of our lives we are unconscious that we are performing such complex and perfect mechanical acts.

How great a building up of structure to meet function! Do you remember amoeba? How think you does he breathe? Very simply. Amoeba has no blood; but then he has no skin, and the constituent parts of his body are in much the same relation to the oxygen of the air as the blood to the lung capillaries is. Do not facts like these set one thinking how that we are "fearfully and wonderfully made," and that there are more things in our very humble selves than are dreamt of by most everyday individuals? I may have been tedious in this article, and many of you may cast it away impatiently as dry, but if from it you have learnt how and why we breathe, you know more than many other girls who think it not worth the inquiry.

W. LAWRENCE LISTON.

PAINTING.

SINCE tapestry painting (the art of painting with liquid dyes upon wool, silk, velvet, or other animal fabric) was introduced into England some years ago, a great advance has been made both in the method of painting and the materials employed. Originally the fabric used was a coarse kind of linen canvas, and the dyes were merely liquid colours which were diluted with water and painted on in thin washes until the requisite depth was obtained. The colours were not in themselves notable, nor had they any special affinity for the canvas, and as there was no means of fixing the colours so as to make them permanent, the paintings soon faded. I was one of the first to try my hand in this new style of painting over here, but I was never satisfied with the results I obtained, nor was the process of painting itself very fascinating, for it was troublesome to make the colour sink into the canvas, and with all one's care many of the threads seemed to remain uncoloured, which greatly militated against richness of effect. The colour never sank thoroughly into the canvas, but only remained upon the surface.

"Nous avons changé tout cela." It is pretty generally known that vegetable fibres, such as flax and cotton, do not take dyes as well as animal fibres, such as wool and silk, and the first step to improve tapestry painting was to change the material from linen to wool. This brought about a change in the colours themselves, for in using wool it was possible to employ colours that had a special affinity for the material. This woollen fabric is woven in the same manner as the Gobelins tapestry, and paintings executed upon it can hardly be told from real Gobelins. The woollen fabric is prepared with what dyers term a "mordant," which has a special affinity for the colours, and tends to fix them upon the material. The mordant generally employed is alum, but the woollen tissue is sold ready prepared, so that my readers need not trouble about preparing the woollen tissue themselves. The dyes sink very readily into the material, and in order to make the painting perfectly indelible it only has to be fixed by steaming, and you have a material decorated according to each one's taste, which will stand washing and cleaning, and will thus last for years. Those who have tried the old process of painting on the linen canvas cannot realise the difference there is between the two processes and how infinitely superior the latter process is to the former.

The dyes in themselves are brighter and more transparent, and when fixed are wonderfully brilliant without being crude. I have seen some most charming effects produced on the woollen tissue by Walter Crane, Coleman, Rischgitz, and others; and I am certain there is a great future before tapestry painting, as it can be applied to so many useful purposes. Portières, chair backs and seats, sofa coverings, curtains and curtain borders, pianoforte fronts and backs, screens, and hosts of other things can be cheaply and beautifully decorated with these indelible colours. And the painting is not confined to the woollen tissue. Silk and satin look even more beautiful when painted than wool, as the colours come out so much more brilliantly on silk tissue, and paintings executed on silk velvet are yet more beautiful, as the pile produces a delicious softness while retaining the brilliancy of the colours. Dresses can be decorated with these colours, and on one occasion I helped a lady friend to paint a fancy dress with these dyes.

Fans also are more durable painted with these dyes than with water colours, as the dyes sink into the silk and cannot fade or chip off, as is the case with body colour. So you see it opens up a wide field does this indelible tapestry painting for those who cultivate art at home.

There are some twenty-two colours, of which the following are the most useful. They are taken from M. Rischgitz's list:—

Scarlet, pink, purple, Indian red, orange, vermilion, light yellow, yellow ochre, red brown, chrome green, turquoise green, yellow green, deep blue, light sky blue, raw sienna, neutral tint.

There is a medium for mixing with the colours to enable them being manipulated and painted on freely. All the colours mix, but there are some mixtures which give better results than others. Very fine reds are to be obtained by these dyes, and if it can be said that the colours undergo any change in the fixing apart from the depth and brilliancy the fixing imparts to the colours, it is in intensifying the yellows and reds.

Very rich greens can be made with the chrome and turquoise greens in combination with yellow ochre and raw sienna. Fine blue greens and peacock blues can be made with these greens and light sky blue. The blues and greens, it should be noted, are very powerful, and a bottle of each of these colours goes a long way, as they require to be considerably diluted with medium. Browns can be made with neutral tint and sky and deep blue, and Indian red and red brown with blue.

It would be as well at first to obtain a small piece of tissue, and try the various colours, pure and in combination, keeping a key to them for future reference. Have this test palette fixed so that you may note what change the dyes undergo in the fixing.

When beginning your actual painting, the tissue should be tightly strained on a stretcher or board. If you are painting a set of screen panels, you might get the tissue strained by a manufacturer of artists' canvases, as when the painting is finished it can be untacked and sent to be fixed and afterwards re-strained. Those who paint tapestry regularly have two or three stretchers of various sizes, and by sewing on pieces of canvas to the tissue to make it out to the size of the nearest stretcher you have by you, the tissue can be strained ready for work. The tighter the tissue is strained the easier it is to paint. The threads of the tissue, it should be noted, run from right to left, and this is the way it should be painted. The tissue can be had forty-six and fifty-four inches, and wider, and in painting a screen the width of the panels should be such as will enable the tissue to be cut to the greatest advantage. Thus the forty-six inch stuff will cut three panels fifteen inches wide, and the fifty-four inch three panels eighteen inches wide. It is not so easy to paint the tissue if the grain runs from top to bottom.

I find small Liebig pots very useful for mixing tints in, as it is important to mix up enough of each tint at once owing to the difficulty of matching it should you run out of it before the work is finished. The colours want putting on freely, and consequently you want plenty of each tint wherever there is a large surface to cover. In light tints, such as flesh, greys, and skies, the colours will want to be considerably diluted with medium. This is especially the case with the blues and pinks. If you are painting foliage have three or four good tints mixed. Grey-greens are made of the pure greens very diluted, or with sky blue and Italian earth. Rich juicy greens with chrome or turquoise green and the warm yellows. Yellow-greens with yellow, green, and the lighter yellows. Neutral tint, a very intense colour, and deep blue can be added where very dark deep greens are wanted, as they can easily be toned with the warm yellows.

It will be noticed the colours look much darker when wet than when dry, and due allowance must be made for this. Don't be frightened of putting on the colours of sufficient depth at once, providing you are sure that the colour you are using is the right one. It is useless painting three or four times over the same tint to obtain depth when it might have been got in one painting. I believe in finishing off the painting as far as possible in one sitting, as when your first tint is laid and is getting a little dry any colours painted on this sink in very agreeably and give a charmingly soft effect. Not that this softness is always the most desirable quality to get in your work, for a certain vigour and crispness are necessary in order to counteract the softening effect the tissue has upon the colours. Tapestry painting is not a difficult art, for unlike oil and water colour painting, the worker has not to trouble about "texture," that is working his colours until they look finished, this being obtained for him by the tissue itself. All you have to do is to put the right tints on in a liquid manner, so that the whole of that part of the canvas is covered without showing the marks of the brush, and the rest is done for you by the tissue, which, owing to the way it is woven, gives a charming effect to the painting. I have seen copies of some of the pictures in the National Gallery executed on this woollen tissue, and most excellent is the effect, for all the depth of colour and tone of the original can be obtained with a certain softness which only a dyed material has. Mr. Coleman, whose Christmas cards of little semi-nude children are so well known, has painted some tapestry panels, enlargements of some of his Christmas card designs, and very charming they are. He allowed a good deal of the plain tissue to show throughout the painting (the colour of the tissue is a warm cream), and this not only economised his labour, but had a most excellent effect. Much of the effect he obtained with the outline, which was done in a warm brown, and his introduction of turquoise blues and greens (colours he is particularly fond of, as may be seen in his Christmas cards), with warm yellows produced most harmonious and delicate effects.

In painting flesh the shadows should first be put in. Neutral tint, sky blue and burnt sienna make a good grey, and the shadows should be put in delicately with this mixture. When quite dry, wash with vermilion largely diluted with medium. It is a good plan before dipping the brush into any of the very powerful colours to previously dip it into pure medium. This prevents the colour staining the hairs of the brush. For second painting use a greyish tint of sky blue; while this is still wet use bright pink thirdly for lips and cheeks. When dry accentuate with Italian earth and pink and Indian red. I don't much believe in these hard and fast rules, but it may be useful to know how a good flesh tint may be obtained, though I would not advise my readers to tie themselves down to this or any other formula.

Don't try too difficult an effect at first. A simple study of foliage and birds, such as shown in Fig. 1, would do as a beginning. The peacock would give scope for rich colour; the background might be left unpainted, or just tinted with blue and grey. The ornamental treatment of sunflowers in Fig. 2, I carried out with a background of rich blues and blue-greens; I varied the colour of the ground considerably, and the effect was not bad. Fig. 3 was taken from a screen I painted. I adhered to the pomegranate, filling in all the panels, but of course had different heads in the circles.

Fig. 4, which I termed "The Parliament of Birds," was carried out as a three-fold screen. The birds were treated somewhat quaintly with an outline, though natural colours were introduced. The birds rendered are the peacock, pelican, hen, cockatoo, owl, adjutant, penguin, cormorant, gull, flamingo, crow, etc., etc.

The whole thing was made highly decorative, and my readers may feel inclined to enlarge the design and carry it out for themselves. See that your tone of colour is harmonious. It is most important to get harmonious colours in tapestry painting (or in any other painting for that matter), for the best design in the world is spoiled by a bad tone of colour. For transferring a design to the tissue I prefer to prick the design and pounce it on, to transferring it by means of black paper. Go over the charcoal lines with some light colour, unless you intend to adopt a decorative style of work, when in that case the outline will assist you, and should be put in strongly.

Tapestry painting can be used in conjunction with embroidery. For a curtain border, for instance, the design can be carried out in the dyes, and when fixed a few stitches of silk can be introduced here and there to brighten up the effect. I have seen some excellent effects obtained in this way, and as the groundwork can be got over much more quickly by painting than with needlework, a combination of tapestry painting and needlework may be a very desirable union.

Borders to dresses might be painted on silk or velvet, if one wished to be unique, and the effect might be even better than embroidery. Fans, too, can be painted with these dyes. The silk and velvet must of course be quite light; white is best, as all the dyes are transparent, and consequently the lights must be left, for if once destroyed they cannot be restored. The worker must be certain of his touch, and have a clear idea of what has to be done or what he wants to do, for when once a tint is laid upon the tissue it cannot be removed or even lightened. There is no getting the colours out, so the only thing is not to make mistakes. Carefully plan out your and think out your design before commencing work, and then you will have little chance of going wrong. It is because people rush into colour before their plans are matured that they have to rub out and botch and bungle. Every touch should have a meaning, and be put on with intention and precision. Go the readiest way to work, for there is no merit in spending a month over a painting if it could be done equally well in three weeks. A work is finished when the intention of the worker is made clear and intelligible to the seer. Tapestry painting is much more effective when painted crisply and dexterously than when it is laboured and finniking.

MY LADY'S REST.

By FLORENCE WILLSON.

CHAPTER IV.

HOPES AND THEIR REALISATION.

LADY CONSTANCE'S wedding-day came and went, leaving behind it a store of recollections of grand doings and festivities, such as had never before been heard of at Ashdeane.

None of us were likely to forget the pretty sight of Lady Constance in her bridal dress, followed by a bevy of charming bridesmaids, all dressed alike in soft, creamy muslins, as they walked down the aisle of the village church, as they passed along filling the air with the delicious fragrance of their bouquets of Maréchal Niel roses.

I was less likely to forget that memorable day than anyone else, for many reasons which I shall mention presently; but I must not forget to say how charming Mrs. Deane looked in a soft, silvery-grey silk, given to her by the bride, who begged each lady at "My Lady's Rest" to accept from her a dress for the occasion. Miss Marchmont chose a rich, black silk, in which she looked very stiff and stately and forbidding, I thought.

After the wedding breakfast was over, and we had looked at the presents till our eyes ached with the glitter of gold and gems, we strolled off through the grounds, and it happened that Mr. Yorke and I were left alone, the rest of our party having joined the tennis players.

At first we talked about the event of the day, and about the numbers of people present, etc.; and then somehow we became silent, and I could not think of anything to say, try as I might, so I suggested that we should go and look on at the tennis.

Then Mr. Yorke began to speak, and if I had felt the silence irksome before, I would willingly have taken refuge in it again, as I listened to his words, whilst he spoke of his love for me, and his earnest wish that I should be his wife.

How sorry I felt, and how I blamed myself for not having prevented this outburst; but all I could do now was to try and stop him from saying anything more, and to assure him that I never could marry him, much as it grieved me to have to say so.

He seemed so much in earnest, and so anxious to cling to the smallest hope of my changing my mind, that the conversation was more trying than could be imagined by any ordinary fashionable young lady more accustomed to such things than I was.

Miss Marchmont met us as we were very silently walking back to our friends, and I felt that she knew what had happened by the sharp way she looked at me, and then began asking Mr. Yorke about some parochial matters in which she was interested.

I seized this opportunity to join the vicar and Mrs. Deane, who were sitting chatting under the shade of a spreading cedar.

"How pale you look, my dear!" said Mrs. Deane, as I sat down beside her. "You are tired with all the excitement of the day."

"Perhaps," said the vicar, "Mr. Yorke persuaded you to ramble too far on such a hot afternoon."

My cheeks were red enough in a moment at the mention of Mr. Yorke's name to satisfy even Mrs. Deane, and I fancy she saw something had upset me, and probably guessed what it was, for she quietly changed the conversation, and asked me to go with her for a cup of tea, which I was only too glad to do.

Mr. Marsden joined us as we entered one of the tea tents, scattered here and there through the grounds, and attended to our wants; just as he was handing me some fruit Miss Marchmont and Mr. Yorke came in also.

"Poor Yorke looks terribly victimised by his companion, don't you think so, Miss Lawrence?" said Mr. Marsden, smiling.

I did not dare to glance in his direction, feeling too uncomfortable and conscious, and finished my tea with all possible speed, so as to avoid a meeting with Miss Marchmont and her companion, and then murmuring something about the heat of the tent, I made my way into the open air. I did not know many people amongst the numbers gathered together, and naturally I kept with the vicar, his sister, and Mrs. Deane; and of course her brother was a good deal with her, when he was not playing tennis, and he was always so bright, and gave such interesting accounts of his life in the colonies, that the afternoon passed very quickly and pleasantly, and I felt sorry to go home when the time came to say good-bye, there was so much I still wished to hear. Mr. Marsden would not stay for the dance with which the day was to end, and walked to the vicarage gate with us. As we all stood there, laughing and talking, Miss Marchmont passed us, and as she said good-bye she whispered to me, in a very audible tone—

"Did you ever hear, Miss Lawrence, that it was considered prudent to be quite off with the old love before you were on with the new?"

"I do not understand you, Miss Marchmont," I answered, as indifferently as I could; "but 'proverbs' never was a favourite game of mine," and I turned away, feeling vexed and annoyed to a foolish extent; but it was so provoking to be subjected to these constant pin-pricks and to Miss Marchmont's ceaseless supervision.

"Barbara, you are tired after all the excitement of the day," said Miss Brown that evening; "you must go to bed soon and have a long sleep; you don't look like yourself this evening."

I was glad enough to go to my own room, to think over the events of the day. Very regretfully I thought of poor Mr. Yorke and his misplaced affection, and then of Miss Marchmont's sharp remark, and I wondered if she could possibly have overheard any of Mr. Marsden's conversation with me. But again I felt sure that it was only a chance dart, which had struck home in a way not probably expected by Miss Marchmont herself; it was my own conscience which had made me so quick to feel the reproach implied by her words.

For when Harry Marsden had spoken to me that evening, I knew why I felt so very certain that never as long as I lived could I care for Mr. Yorke!

The day after the wedding I had promised to spend with Mrs. Deane, and when I went to the cottage she told me that her brother had gone to London on business for a day or two.

"Oh, yes," I said, "he told me yesterday that he was going to town, and asked if I had any commissions for him to execute for me."

Mrs. Deane looked surprised for a moment, as if she wondered why her brother had mentioned his plans to me, and I thought she was going to say so, when the entrance of Dandy and the tea-tray turned the conversation.

Dandy was much too well-trained a dog to beg, and at tea-time he used always to lie quietly at his mistress's feet, as if asleep and utterly indifferent to the fact that muffins and biscuits were at hand; and even when he was called he would get up most leisurely, and with a deprecating wag of his tail (as much as to say, "If I must, I must") consent to eat up the morsels offered him.

My afternoon passed too fast, as it always did when with Mrs. Deane; we had so much in common that we seemed to forget the disparity in our ages, and I felt more as if with an elder sister than with a woman so many years my senior; and I was already looking forward sadly to the time when I should have to say good-bye to her (my newly-made but true friend) on leaving Ashdeane.

For a day or two Mr. Yorke did not come to the Vicarage, and kind Miss Brown began to grow anxious lest anything should have annoyed him, but after that he came in and out as usual, and no one but myself could have detected any change in his manner towards me.

A week had passed since Lady Constance's wedding, and Harry Marsden had not returned; he wrote a hurried note to Mrs. Deane at the end of that time, saying he was unavoidably detained in London, and the next day came a telegram saying that business obliged him to start at once for New Zealand, and that he would write to her more fully as soon as possible.

Mrs. Deane was startled by this sudden change in her brother's plans, and could not imagine what the "business" was that summoned him away so unexpectedly. When Miss Marchmont heard about it, she remarked, drily, that the word business was as useful to men as headache was supposed to be to women—it might mean temper, or love of amusement, or anything else, and no one could question its genuineness.

"Come, Miss Marchmont," said Mr. Yorke, when he heard this speech, "I could not have believed you would have said such severe things about our sex; and as for Marsden, no doubt he was obliged to hurry off by genuine business claims on him; why should we doubt it for a moment?"

"How much more generous men are than women," I thought, as I listened; but then, Dandy and I were alike in our feeling of antipathy to Miss Marchmont, and were not fair judges of her words or deeds.

It was about the middle of October when I left the Vicarage to return to my schoolwork, and it was with feelings of unmixed regret that I bade farewell to my kind friends at Ashdeane, amongst whom I had spent such a happy summer. Miss Brown and Mrs. Deane promised to write often to me, and I knew they would not forget to do so, knowing how lonely I should feel at first in the midst of strangers, after my happy home life at the Vicarage.

Very dreary the regular routine of school-work seemed at first, but I was determined to throw all my energies into it, and soon I became as much interested in it and my pupils as I used to be.

Very pressing were the Ashdeane letters that I should spend Christmas at the Vicarage or the cottage, but I feared that it might unsettle me, and accepted a holiday engagement instead, determined not to visit Ashdeane until the summer vacation set me free.

Mrs. Deane wrote frequently to me, and I could see, from the tone of her letters, how uneasy she was at the strange silence of her brother, from whom she had received no intelligence since he left London.

I tried not to think in a gloomy way about his silence; but how could we help fearing all sorts of misfortunes, when week after week passed and brought no tidings of our wanderer?

I felt I had a right to think of one who had expressed his love for me, and his hopes of claiming me as his wife, and if Mrs. Grundy should upbraid me for being so quickly won—why, I could not help it, and I had never thought about it until my heart had passed out of my own keeping into his.

So the months passed in constant work with my pupils, and hard study in my free time, by which I hoped to banish vain longings for the foreign letter that never came; and those who have made similar struggles can alone tell how I succeeded in my efforts.

When July came, bringing with it the much-longed-for vacation, I was so tired by overwork and anxiety that my friends at Ashdeane thought me sadly changed since I had said good-bye to them in the autumn, and kind Miss Brown was inclined to treat me as an invalid. Mrs. Deane understood me better than the others did, and made no fuss about my altered looks, but treated me with more tenderness, if possible, than before.

I cannot say how I dreaded meeting Miss Marchmont, and being subjected to her sharp scrutiny and sharper remarks; but when I did see her there was nothing formidable about her; she seemed unconscious of any change in my looks, and was almost gentle in her manner to me; people so often act differently from what we expect after their former conduct.

One day I was sitting with Mrs. Deane under the shade of the trees, with Dandy fast asleep at our feet, when we heard a step on the gravel walk, and looking up, saw a gentleman coming towards us. We looked up in surprise at such an unfamiliar sight, wondering who the stranger could be. Dandy had been roused by the sound of footsteps, and advanced to reconnoitre; after a questioning sniff or two he began to bark, and to jump on the stranger, in evident joy at meeting an old friend.

The stranger looked from Mrs. Deane to me, and it was only when he smiled that I recognised him, and turning to Mrs. Deane I exclaimed—

"Don't you know who it is, Mrs. Deane? Your brother, Mr. Marsden!"

"Neither of you seem inclined to welcome me home," cried Harry, laughing; "but perhaps my beard has made a change in my appearance sufficient to serve as a disguise."

What a scene followed of questions and explanations, and how simple it all was in the end! Harry had been (as we knew) summoned off to New Zealand on business which proved very complicated, as he wished to withdraw from his partnership, and there were many tedious delays. He had written to his sister, enclosing a letter to me, explaining his enforced absence, and whether the letter had not been posted, or had gone astray, we could not tell, but we never received it.

Then, just as Harry was preparing to start on his homeward journey, he was struck down by fever, and became so ill that his life was despaired of; when his strength began slowly to return, after the fever had subsided, he did not write, fearing to alarm us, and thinking that we were prepared for delays by his letter.

Then he had a relapse, and finally, when the day came for the vessel to start for England, he was carried on board in a terribly weakened state; the sea voyage had, however, worked wonders for him, and he was now quite restored to health, although much slighter and older-looking than when he left England.

Harry walked home with me that evening to the Vicarage, where he received a warm welcome, and had to tell his story over again to interested listeners; and when he told the vicar that I had promised to share his future life with him, many and fervent were the good wishes expressed by Mr. Brown and his sister for our happiness.

What did Miss Marchmont say to all this?

Well, she expressed no surprise whatever about it (she never was surprised at anything, not considering it good breeding to be astonished), but congratulated me on having secured such a suitable and wealthy parti, much more suitable, she added meaningly, than a curate would have been; and with this parting shot she actually embraced me; and one of the prettiest of my wedding presents was an Indian bracelet, the gift of Miss Marchmont, a relic of her past prosperous youth. I fancy she thought Mr. Yorke had a happy escape, and that she was grateful to Harry Marsden for coming to the rescue, and taking me out of the way of her favourite.

When Harry and I were married we tried to persuade Mrs. Deane to make her home with us, but nothing would induce her to leave the cottage; young people were better left to themselves, she said, and, besides, she was happier in her own home, with faithful Dandy, than she could be with us, dearly as she loved us; and as we were going to take a place in the neighbourhood, we could be constantly together, and so we had to agree to her wishes.

In course of years Mr. Brown gave up his living, in which he was succeeded by Mr. Yorke, whose persevering work had won for him the love and respect of his people, who gave him a warm welcome when he came to the Vicarage, bringing with him his pretty young wife; for he acted like a sensible man, and got over his boyish fancy for me, and, as Miss Marchmont declared, "made a most desirable and suitable match at last."

So when Miss Marchmont is satisfied with her favourite's choice the rest of the community need raise no dissenting voice; but, indeed, no one was inclined to do so, and Ashdeane considered itself a fortunate parish in possessing such a model vicar, although there lingered in some indolent minds a wish that he were not so energetic and determined to keep a healthy current of life circulating through their quiet and somewhat inactive lives.

At "My Lady's Rest" things went on as usual, Mrs. Deane growing—in my eyes at least—sweeter every year: the very ideal of old womanhood, from whose refined face intelligence and goodness beamed; and to me she proved herself the truest, kindest friend that anyone could have.

Happy indeed was I in my friends, my home, and my husband; happy far beyond what I could ever have hoped or imagined in the old times, when I first came to Ashdeane, and wondered if I should ever come to be an inhabitant of one of the cottages of "My Lady's Rest," near which my happy peaceful days are spent.

"Days that, in spite
Of darkness, by the light
Of a clear mind are day all night.
Life, that dares send
A challenge to his end,
And when it comes, say, 'Welcome, friend.'"

(THE END.)

ART NEEDLEWORK.

BY HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

FIG. 1.—SUNSHADE.

With the sole exception of the sunshade, all the articles with which illustrations are given in this paper on art needlework are carefully chosen as such that may be carried out easily by ordinary girl-workers from beginning to end, as there is no troublesome or expensive mounting to be done.

To commence with our exception. The sunshade, of which we give a sketch in Fig. 1, is of natural-coloured tussore. A skilful needlewoman should be able, with a little management, to embroider this in its made-up form, but it would be necessary, in order to hide the unsightly back of the embroidery, to have it lined with silk afterwards, and this cannot be done by the worker. The swallows are embroidered solidly in feather stitch (opus plumarium), in natural-coloured silks. Humming birds and butterflies are worked on dark-coloured satin on silk sunshades in the same manner. Very little work is necessary to produce a good effect. Bows of ribbon of some shade of the silk used in embroidery may be attached to the tops or handles of the sunshade, and they may also be made smarter by the addition of lace. If natural birds or butterflies be too realistic for the worker's taste, the style of the design may be Japanese, and merely outlined in gold thread. This would be handsome on a sunshade of black satin, trimmed with Spanish lace.

Fig. 2 is a pocket-handkerchief sachet of the palest blue tussore or corah silk, on which natural tulips are solidly worked in feather stitch, in a variety of delicately tinted silks, pink being the dominating colour. It is lined with pale pink quilted silk, and trimmed with cord of combined pink and blue.

Sets of pocket-handkerchief and glove sachets, with nightdress and brush and comb bags, all embroidered and made up to match, are among the most popular art needlework presents of the season. Fine white sateen, or sateen-jean, is, in our opinion, the best material to use for the set of this kind. The design can be worked with flourishing thread, which is now brought to such perfection, and can be obtained in such endless variety of colours and delicate shades, that an article solidly worked with it can scarcely be distinguished from silk embroidery. Articles thus worked can so easily be washed or cleaned without injury, especially as the lining can, if liked, be also of sateen.

Fig. 3 is a glove sachet of olive green satin, which has a design of mimosa embroidered in natural-coloured shaded silk. Both leaves and stems are of rather pale green, and the fluffy blossoms are worked in two or three shades of yellow, in feather stitch. The stitches should radiate irregularly and not very thickly from the centre of each tuft. These flowers might be worked in French knots, but this would not give the soft and fluffy effect so well as the former method. The sachet is lined with quilted yellow silk, and bound with green cord. It is merely to give a suggestion for another set, such as Fig. 2. A glove and handkerchief case should always match. The two together make a very handsome birthday or wedding present. Nightdress and brush and comb bags would then make a second pair, if the whole four articles be too large an undertaking.

FIG. 2.—HANDKERCHIEF SACHET.

FIG. 4.—WALL-POCKET.

In Fig. 4 we give a sketch of a wall-pocket, such as would be a useful and decorative present for a gentleman, or for a bachelor's room of any sort. It will hold a good many letters and cards, and can be easily made up by a neat-fingered girl. A piece of millboard, from 12 to 14 inches long, by 6 or 7 inches wide, will make the foundation, with three for the making up and finishing off of this pocket. It may be made in one material throughout, and any suitable small spray of natural or conventional flowers can be utilised for the design, which can, if preferred, be repeated at the top instead of the monogram. But if it be intended for a gentleman, the monogram, or perhaps initials and crest, or silk. The little tassels which gather up the ends can be made by the worker of a needleful of filoselle.

The same design would look very pretty on dark blue silk. Such trifles as these, and others of which we have endeavoured to give practical sketches and suggestions, have certainly advantages in the eyes of many of our pieces of thinner cardboard for the pockets. The foundation is covered with terra-cotta coloured satin, backed with sateen of the same shade, with which the pockets are also lined. The front or embroidered parts of the pockets are of terra-cotta coloured plush. The design is outlined throughout with Japanese gold thread, its leaves and flowers being partly filled in with pale pink silk, in long and short stitch. Great neatness and care are necessary the arms of the college or school, would certainly make it a more valued present.

FIG. 5.—TEAPOT HOLDER.

Fig. 5 is an improved form of a teapot or kettle holder, for drawing-room use, of which, for practical purposes, we give two sketches. It is of olive green satin, on which is embroidered a tiny group of natural primroses, shaded daintily in solid silk. Layers of cotton wool are inserted between the satin and the lining, which is of primrose-coloured girls, to whom larger and more complicated pieces of work appear too formidable to be commenced and carried out, from the fact that patience and energy are likely to fail before they are completed, and also because they do not involve any great outlay in the way of material, which is a great consideration to those who wish to offer a pretty and acceptable present, but who, at the same time, have but a limited command of pocket-money.

VARIETIES.

IN SEARCH OF A BARGAIN.

A woman went into a shop the other day to buy material for a gown. She selected, after a good deal of fussing, a gingham costing sixpence a yard.

"How many yards are there in the piece?" she asked.

"There are eleven," the assistant answered, after counting.

I will take ten," she said.

He suggested that she should take the whole piece, but she insisted that he should cut off ten yards, which was accordingly done.

"That is a remnant, I suppose?" she said, interrogatively, taking up the odd yard, as he folded the goods.

"Yes, ma'am."

"You sell remnants cheaper, don't you?"

"Sometimes," the assistant said laconically.

"What will you take for this?"

"Sixpence."

"But that was just what I paid for the piece."

"Yes; but I haven't any authority to mark goods down."

"Couldn't you send the cash boy to find the man that does mark them down, so as to see what he would take?" the customer asked anxiously.

"Just now," the assistant replied, "he is at his dinner, and I don't think he will be back to-day."

"And you couldn't mark it down yourself, and tell him about it?"

"No," the assistant said, smiling aggravatingly; "I couldn't really."

"Well," the woman replied with a sigh, "then I'm dreadfully sorry I had it cut, for I must have that yard any way, even if I have to pay sixpence for it. Ten yards wouldn't possibly do. But I ain't used to paying full price for remnants."

The assistant put the odd yard in, and what the woman told her dressmaker is unfortunately not on record.

AN EASTERN FABLE.

Riches expose us to danger as formidable as if they were a venomous serpent. We should neither look at them nor attach ourselves to them.

One day, Buddha, journeying in the province of Prasirajit, saw a place where a treasure had been deposited by someone, and it was composed of a great number of precious things. Buddha said to Ananda, "Do you not see that venomous serpent?"

"I see it," replied Ananda.

At this moment there was a man walking behind Buddha. On hearing these words he resolved to go and see the serpent. Having observed the precious and beautiful things, he bitterly blamed the words of Buddha, and considered them vain and foolish.

"These are very precious things," said he, "and yet he said that it was a venomous serpent!"

Straightway he brought all the people of his house to the spot, and by their assistance conveyed away that treasure, so that his wealth became immense.

But there was a man who presented himself before the king and told him that that person had lately found a great treasure and had not brought it to the judge. So the king immediately caused him to be cast into prison, and demanded from him the treasure which he had found.

He declared that he had spent it all.

But the king would not believe him. He caused him to be stunned with blows and put him to the most cruel tortures.

This man recognised too late the truth of the words of Buddha.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

RS. ALLINGHAM WEST'S rooms were always crowded on her "Thursday evenings." To gain admission to the presence of the celebrated novelist was a distinction eagerly coveted; although two years ago she had been left in comparative solitude. Her drawing-rooms were lit by the soft, subdued glow of many wax candles. Algerian curtains, Japanese screens, Chelsea china, the spreading leaves of many palms—these formed a background against which the pageant of London society displayed itself. There were windows with deep embrasures, and window-sills where one could sit at ease; the rooms were old-fashioned in shape, and there were recesses here and there which gave admirable opportunity for a tête-à-tête. Low ebony bookcases ran against the walls, furnished richly with books in good bindings. The authoress would not have books banished from any room, although her peculiar private sanctum, lined with shelves from floor to ceiling, was downstairs.

It may easily be imagined that Evelyn's heart was in a flutter when she entered the softly-lighted, murmuring scene with Miss Wentworth. There was an air of culture, grace, and refinement about the interior which contrasted strongly with the homes—rich and luxurious though they were—to which she had been accustomed.

The rooms were already full of all sorts of people—in great variety of dress as to the womankind—for Mrs. West entertained with impartiality great people who had "taken her up," and the poorest woman who might claim kinship with her in the sisterhood of talent. Struggling artists, musicians and painters, as well as authors, found their way to the pretty house at Chelsea, and Mrs. Allingham West did all in her power to give them a helping hand.

At first Miss Wentworth and Evelyn could not distinguish their hostess, but in a moment they saw her surrounded as usual by a cluster of men and women; the words rose to Evelyn's mind in a little confusion—

"As 'midst her handmaids in the hall
She stood superior to them all."

Her thoughtful face looked more distinguished than ever among her guests.

She greeted them kindly; then they withdrew among the others.

Miss Wentworth began talking directly with great energy, catechising the first person near her, for it was plain even to her that she could not claim the hostess for a confidential chat. Evelyn had not the American's sang froid, and stood about for a moment or two looking for a chair or for some friendly face. She felt a little abashed and lonely, for not one of all these people, some of whom she felt sure were distinguished, was known to her.

"I wish they had their names printed on their backs," she reflected. "It is so tantalising to see people who may be celebrated, and never to know it."

The tones of a voice she had heard before fell on her ear like music.

"Miss Hope, will you come into the back drawing-room? I have a seat for you," said the voice, in Scotch accents; and turning round Evelyn beheld the tall form of Mr. Muir. He skilfully piloted her among the men and women to a recessed and cushioned window seat, where they could sit and look out upon the crowd. The grand piano stood close to them, in such a way that they were fenced in from the trailing gowns.

"We shall have some music soon," remarked Mr. Muir, "but till then we may talk."

Evelyn was grateful for the seat and for the acquaintanceship among all these strange faces, but she did not know that she wanted to talk. She did not care about Mr. Muir, and remembered he had spoken disparagingly of her idol on the first occasion she ever saw him. He also appeared to recollect that encounter, for he said after a few casual remarks and replies—

"The first time we met I think you were anxious to see Mrs. Allingham West. It was at the Royal Society's Conversation."

"I remember perfectly," replied Evelyn, "and you said you did not care for her book. I did not think you were acquainted with her, from the way you spoke then."

"Must one always admire all the books of one's friends?" inquired the Scotchman. "That would be rather a tax upon friendship."

"Well, if I had a friend who had written a book, I should not disparage it to strangers," replied Evelyn, suddenly rousing up. The bright eyes of Mr. Muir flashed with a gleam of suppressed amusement.

"If you remember, I only said what I did in answer to a remark of your own. You said, 'everybody' admired it. So I felt obliged to say—I did not altogether. But I did not disparage it further than that, and yet it gained me your scorn and contempt. One longs to be an author when one sees what partisanship it can win."

Scorn and contempt! This was a curious way to talk; and yet Mr. Muir looked perfectly at ease.

"Shall I take the trouble to contradict him?" thought Evelyn, and decided in the negative.

"What made you think it gained my scorn and contempt?" asked she.

"You crushed me with a terrible remark, 'Thought is spiritual, but science is material.' I wondered at the time what it meant, and I am wondering now. Would it be impertinent to ask you to explain it? It has often weighed upon my mind."

Mr. Muir spoke with perfect seriousness, and Evelyn, if she had been the Evelyn of a few months ago, would have taken his request in sober earnest. She was so accustomed in the old days to hold forth like an oracle that she would not have been surprised at any tribute to her powers. But she was wiser now, and consequently felt both angry and mortified. She did not speak for a moment or two, then said haughtily—

"It would be rather a hard fate if every foolish remark one makes were to be remembered for a year."

"Pardon me," returned Mr. Muir, "I did not know you considered it a foolish remark, or I would not have reminded you of it." His tone was changed, and Evelyn could detect real kindness in his look.

"You must have a very good memory," she answered, smiling at him; "inconveniently good."

"I certainly remember all that passed that evening," rejoined Mr. Muir, quietly; "but then it was no ordinary occasion."

"I am sorry any stupid remarks of mine should mingle with the memory," said Evelyn. "But if you know Mrs. Allingham West, would you mind telling me as much about her as you can?"

"Ah, you have still the old fascination, I see," replied Mr. Muir. "First of all, have you read her former books?"

"What, besides 'Transmigrations'?" No."

"I think that is a mistake of yours. Why not?"

"I heard they were quite different, and I thought they would perhaps spoil the charm," acknowledged Evelyn.

The Scotchman threw back his head in a way that signified disapprobation.

"Oh, but if you really admire an author, you ought to learn as much as he or she can teach you," he said. "The reason I did not speak warmly of 'Transmigrations' was that I admired it less than her former work, which had a great hold upon me. I thought she was leaving the subjects she could touch best; but the public thought differently."

He was silent; then went on in a lower voice—

"Mrs. West had an invalid husband for many years. She wrote, to support him, articles in magazines, and stories. Some of these were of quite unusual power and charm. They contained a quiet delineation of nature, an accuracy, a freshness, that are rare, and that must in time have made their mark. At last he died. She had worked hard, but her name was little known. For awhile she could scarcely write at all; she was paralysed with grief. Then all at once she wrote this book, which brought her fame and wealth with one bound, because it hit the popular taste. He, who could best have appreciated her honours, was gone, and she said to me once: 'It is a sad use for my laurels, to lay them on my husband's grave.'"

Mr. Muir paused, for he saw tears in Evelyn's eyes.

"Ah! it is a piteous story," he resumed, in a moved tone, "and you cannot wonder that I cling with affection to the earlier books. One or two of them did for me in my youth what Wordsworth's poems did for the elder generation—opened my eyes to the teaching of Nature. And I feel jealous pity, somehow, for the stories that could not win back the husband's fading life, nor coax the cold world to look kindly on the toiling woman."

"Oh, how sad! how heartbreaking!" cried Evelyn, impulsively; "and that fame should come too late for him to know!" She stopped.

"There are consolations; for Mrs. Allingham West retains her faith in God and immortality," said Mr. Muir, gravely. "I say her faith—no mere conventional show of belief; and if you have much acquaintance with the world of literature, just now, you will know that this is not universal with writers of genius by any means—by any means. It is a difficult age to live in. The Atheists in old days had a hard time of it. I sometimes think that times are to be changed, and that the sincere Christian will soon, among clever people, be the one to need courage in avowing himself."

"Do you really think that the power of Christianity is growing less?" asked Evelyn, anxiously.

"I think that the power of hollow profession, conventional shibboleths, is growing less, and a very good thing too. But I hold with all my heart that He, the founder of Christianity, was never more loved and honoured than now. The reign of Jesus Christ is yet to come; but come it will. He must reign. The ideas He taught are permeating modern society more and more, and in time men will learn to see Him as He is."

This was a very unusual vein of conversation for an evening party, or once upon a time it would have been so; but one of the features of the present day is an increasing earnestness and interest in all aspects of life. Evelyn felt much attracted by Mr. Muir, in spite of her previous dislike. "I wonder what he is?" she thought. She enjoyed talking to him heartily. He led the conversation, after the grave and heartfelt words he had uttered, away to literature, and though once again Evelyn felt how little she had read and how little she knew, that conviction was not so novel to her as it had formerly been. The winter with Miss Wentworth, coming upon the stay at Engelberg, had done her incalculable good, widened her horizon, and shown her how great was the world of art and thought.

Mr. Muir, on his part, considered Miss Hope fresh, intelligent, and most interesting to talk to.

"She's very much changed since that evening I met her first," he reflected. "She made the impression upon me of a pretty but most conceited girl. I was either mistaken or she has altered." And he applied himself with fresh zeal to the delightful task of drawing Evelyn out.

Mrs. Allingham West cast more than one glance in their direction, but did not approach them. Evelyn was quite surprised when she found people beginning to take their leave, and it was with much reluctance that she followed Miss Wentworth to bid farewell to their hostess.

"You seem to have enjoyed talking to my friend Miss Hope," observed Mrs. West, some time afterwards, to Mr. Muir, who was one of the last to depart. "I hope you have made your peace with her?"

"Made my peace? I do not quite understand you."

"Why, did you not review her poems?"

"Her poems? Not that I am aware of."

"Yes, yes, in the Critic. What was the name of the book? The poor child nearly fainted away on the spot when she found me reading the article."

"Oh, I am sure you are mistaken," cried Mr. Muir, "she said nothing about any book."

"I have the name! 'Day-dreams,' by Espérance, reviewed in the Critic last August. Surely you recollect?"

Mr. Muir stood aghast. "I do remember something of the kind, in a general article; a paragraph or two about some small volume of poems Dalrymple sent me. Do you really mean to say she wrote them?"

"Of course she did. Espérance stands for Hope. It was her first book. She was nearly heartbroken at your severity." Mrs. Allingham West had a spice of mischief in her. "I could not help being amused to see you together all the evening," she continued; "the English bard and the Scotch reviewer! I thought you were appeasing her indignation!"

"Was it—were my remarks very unfavourable?" faltered he.

"Unfavourable! That is a very mild word for it. I should say annihilating!"

"What an unlucky fellow I am!" groaned Mr. Muir. "Did she really mind very much?"

"As I tell you, she nearly fainted."

And Mrs. West, whose gift of graphic description was improved by practice, rehearsed the whole scene that took place in her Engelberg sitting-room.

"You were quite right, you know," she concluded. "The poor girl lent me her poems, and I was obliged to give the same verdict, only by insinuation rather than open condemnation. I don't see the use of breaking a butterfly on the wheel."

"What an unfortunate thing!" exclaimed Mr. Muir. "May I ask you a favour, Mrs. West? Don't tell her."

"Certainly not," replied the lady; "but why, Mr. Muir? Haven't you the courage of your convictions? A reviewer ought to be hardened to all such considerations as hurting people's feelings."

"I would rather tell her myself," replied the reviewer in question. Mrs. West half repented her playfulness, for he looked very much perturbed as he bade his hostess good-bye.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOUBTFUL.—Your query may be answered out of a German educational journal, wherein a method is suggested by which the "moving round of the earth" is demonstrated. Take a large bowl, fill nearly full with water, and place it on the floor of a room not exposed to any shaking or jarring from train or street movements. Sprinkle a coating of Lycopodium powder, a white substance which is sometimes used for purposes of the toilet, to be obtained at an apothecary's. On the surface of this coating of powder make a straight black line an inch or two in length with powdered charcoal; then lay down upon the floor, close to the bowl, a stick, or some other straight object, such as an iron curtain rod, so as to be perfectly parallel with a crack in the floor, or with any stationary object in the room. Leave the bowl undisturbed for a few hours, and then observe the position of the black mark, with reference to the object with which it was laid parallel. It will then be found to have moved about from east to west in the direction opposite to that of the movement of the earth on its axis. The earth, in revolving, has carried the water and all in the bowl with her; but the powder on the surface has been left a little behind, and the line will always be found to have moved from east to west; which is the best proof that everything else has moved the other way. This experiment may interest many of our readers.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AN INQUIRER.—The Inland Revenue Office is at Somerset House, Strand, W.C.

H. B. PENCIL.—We grieve to hear that we gave you "awful squash, and jumped on you horribly" when you sent some "very mild" verses for criticism, but "hard words break no bones," so we hope you had no surgeon's bill for splints and attendance to pay. Your writing is good, if not graceful. With reference to your other question, the case may be explained thus: The Godhead of our blessed Lord (He having taken human nature upon Him) has been denied by many; and His command that "all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father," has been set aside. Thus a specially-marked expression of honour to the Lord Jesus has for ages been offered to Him as the God-man.

ETIENNE.—The case you name is indeed a sad one, when an intimate friendship has been formed and a discovery made of such extreme unworthiness comes so late. But in so very serious a case you can scarcely continue on the former terms with him—friends being aware that you know all—without damage to your own character; and if you had any idea of matrimony that is certainly out of the question. If he has insulted you by paying his addresses to you under false pretences (of respectability), you have full right to break off the connection. Shakespeare makes Ophelia say that the "Pansy is for thoughts," obviously from the French, penser, to think. But the flower has another name which explains itself—"heart's ease," and in presenting it the flower explains its own message of good wishes.

MRS. MELLOR and E. M. GRANT.—We could not possibly give you instruction in the rules of lawn tennis in our Correspondence columns. "The Girl's Own Indoor Book" contains full particulars. The quotation—

"And to be wroth with one we love Doth work like madness on the brain," is from Coleridge's "Christobel," part ii.

STREATHAM.—We think that you would do well to inquire about either the Girls' Friendly Society, 3, Victoria Mansions, Westminster, S.W., or the Young Women's Help Society, 20, Queen Square, W.C. The benefits provided are of five kinds: (1) help in daily life, (2) help in sickness, (3) temperance, (4) thrift, (5) literature. Perfect liberty is accorded as to the amount subscribed by workers. We could not give you any recommendation of lodgings at any seaside place. There are many insurance offices, but it would be against our rules to advertise them. We could tell you of very many boarding homes, but not at Ilfracombe. If you prefer Devonshire, there is one at Torquay at 1, Lauriston Place, Torre, and at Plymouth at 28, Bedford Street. There is also one at Hastings, Sussex; matron, Miss Webb, 39, Western Road; and at Folkestone, 11, Connaught Road, at 7s. a week.

M. A.—The League of Love is not a charitable society, but one for self-improvement. It is designed for the promotion of modesty, purity, and unselfishness, and the hon. sec. is Mrs.

Henry Kingsley, Cotswold, Lansdowne Road, Wimbledon.

LILLY had better read the article by "Medicus" on the care of the complexion, the hands and feet.

ELLINOR has a certain facility in writing verse, but lacks expression and originality.

PART IV.

SUMMER AND AUTUMN FLOWERS.

"WOULD you like a bunch of flowers, sir?"

It was Solley's boy who put the question. Solley's boy who brings milk for the camp, as early as seven o'clock, on these breezy summer mornings. Rich creamy milk from Jersey cows, that cull and eat wild flowers on the fields around Solley's farm. And butter too, that is positively redolent of the white and red clover and the purple vetches, on which the bovines have browsed, to say nothing of large fresh eggs of ducks, so big, indeed, that to settle seriously down to the discussion of two of them demands not only the appetite of a gipsy, but that of a gipsy encamped by the sea.

If, reader, you were sitting where I am at this present moment, and if you were to look out through one of the port windows of my caravan eastward, and away over green fields and hedgerows, past rustic cottages roofed brown or grey, past an old windmill, past an elm wood half hid in a purple haze, until your eye reached the horizon, you would notice the tops of weather-beaten cottages, and a solid-looking square old church tower peeping up through a kind of rolling cloudland of trees. That is the village of Mongeham, and near it lies Solley's farm. It nestles there I should say, and has a fine old-fashioned garden, and fine old-fashioned farm buildings, and low lying pastures, rich and rare, and all sorts of fine old-fashioned creatures and things; but I must confess that when Solley's boy put the question to me about the flowers, it was the garden itself that my thoughts reverted to. The bunch of flowers I felt sure would contain some roses, red and white carnations, six-week stocks, and sweet williams, with a natural accompaniment of polypod ferns and ribbon grass.

But this very morning, June 22nd, Solley's boy handed our black servant, Dresky, a covered basket, on opening which, lo, and behold! two huge bouquets of wild hedge-roses, and one of fragrant honeysuckle. To transfer these gems to vases was the work of a very few minutes. Pity it is that these roses fade so soon. Not if left to grow and blossom and trail over the hedges, however. And what a charming feature of English wayside scenery those same wild roses are! All the way from the New Forest, in lower Hampshire, right through the midland and northern counties, till you strike the sea again on the eastern shores of far Northumbria, and even across the border and into Scotland itself, they line and beautify the roadsides wherever the hedges are left to the freedom of their own

By

GORDON STABLES, M.D., R.N.

luxuriance. Within a distance of a quarter of a mile I have seen as many pink and white roses in bloom as would drape St. Paul's Cathedral from cross to basement. Independent of the small and excessively prickly burnet rose and the downy rose, the three most common hedgerow roses are the trailing field rose (Rosa arvensis), the dog rose (Rosa canina), and the sweetbriar, or Rosa rubiginosa. The field rose is a marvellous climber, or rather it is a trailing rose; but its branches in June increase so fast that their growth is almost visible. The flowers are white, abundant, and nearly devoid of scent. The dog-rose, on the other hand, is sweetly and delicately perfumed, and pink or deep red, according to the nature of the soil and shade. The well-known eglantine or sweetbriar beats all the others, however, in scent, its leaves alone sufficing to perfume the air all around the spot where it grows. Its flowers are small and deeply crimson.

The honeysuckle is another charming daughter of the hedgerow. Its leaves are out long before there is even a bud upon the may, and now in June in many places the flowers—so sweetly scented—form a splendid yellow or pink canopy over the hedges. It is called the Lonicera periclymenum by botanists.

As the summer advances we find the hedges and trees and copses adorned by many other species of wild climbing flowers. Among these are found the large white convolvulus or bindweed (Calystegia sepium). This species of convolvulus is said to be a great foe to the gardener, as, once established, it is difficult to eradicate. My own experience is different; I cultivate the plant as a climber. It is not permitted to grow anywhere except where wanted, but arbours, old walls, and buildings can be most charmingly draped with its foliage and flowers.

The lesser bindweed or convolvulus grows plentiful on the clean sea-washed shingle that forms one side of the meadow where I am at present encamped. The leaf is small, but the pink, white-striped flowers are large, multitudinous, and very pretty. The scent, too, is delightful, a kind of peachy odour which Rim-mel, I believe, would find it difficult to imitate. There is also a rose-coloured sea convolvulus, but I do not find it here.

This meadow of mine where, after a caravan journey of nearly three hundred miles, I have settled down for the summer, is almost as level as a billiard table. Early in spring it was green and covered with daisies. The daisies have now mostly fled, but there are many beautiful wild flowers growing in it nevertheless. Most conspicuous are huge patches of pink mallows, far more handsome and pretty than most garden-bed geraniums. The soil lies very lightly over shingle, so the stone-crop or wall-pepper has quite made the field its home. In some places so thickly are the beautiful wee yellow flowers patched over the ground, that we have to pick our steps as we walk, for it seems a sin to crush such floral loveliness. It is called Sedum acre by botanists, from its habit of sitting or squatting on the ground, or on walls, and the exceedingly acrid taste of its leaves and flowers.

The waterlilies, both white and yellow, are abundant in my vicinity (North Deal). The former is known and beloved by everyone. It is the Nymphaea alba of the naturalist. Although its roots are firmly fixed in the bottom of the pond or ditch which it lives and blooms to beautify, its lovely leaves and flowers float on the surface. The yellow water lily is the Nuphar lutea, and though the perfume is not so sweet as that of the white species, it is a charming flower both as regards shape and colour.

A very pretty summer and autumn wild-flower of the wayside or cornfield is the devil's-bit scabious, Scabiosa succisa. In shape it is like our garden scabious, in colour a strange deep blue. Its root, which is about as thick as the little finger, has a cut-off or bitten-off appearance, and in ancient times people actually believed it was snipped off by the Evil One, hence the name. The globular flower head, it will easily be perceived, is in reality a collection of small flowerets.

But a still more beautiful flower is the field scabious, the Knautia arvensis, and its lilac-tinted globular flower head makes a charming addition to the bouquet. It is common by the wayside in sheltered situations, and grows plentifully in the cornfields.

The silverweed, Potentilla anserina, with its large and pretty yellow buttercup-like flowers, is easily known from the peculiar appearance of its leaves, which are covered all over with a silver-grey down. The shape of these leaves has also some resemblance to the Prince of Wales's feathers, and this has caused it to be called by some prince's feather.

We have in this country a great variety of wayside or marsh flowers, which in form and colour resemble the silverweed. Lovers of wild flowers would do well to make themselves acquainted with these, so as to be able to tell and name them, not at a glance, for this would be impossible, but after a look at their leaves, flower-stalks, etc.

I may give the names and natural orders of a few of the commonest of these, and I commend them to my readers as a study in yellow.

English Names.	Latin.	Natural Order.
Silverweed	Potentilla anserina	Rosaceæ
Bulbous crowfoot	Ranunculus bulbosus	Ranunculaceæ
Goldilocks	Ranunculus auricomus	Ranunculaceæ
Lesser celandine	Ranunculus ficaria	Ranunculaceæ
Upright meadow crowfoot	Ranunculus acris	Ranunculaceæ
Marsh marigold	Caltha palustris	Ranunculaceæ
The rock rose	Helianthemum vulgare	Cistaceæ
Moneywort	Lysimachia nummularia	Primulaceæ
Wood loose-strife	Lysimachia nemorum	Primulaceæ
The avens	Geum urbanum	Rosaceæ

Another study in yellow would be a few of the following flowers, which have all points of resemblance to the cursory glance.

Dandelion	Taraxicum dens-leonis	Compositæ
Fleabane	Pulicaria dysenterica	Compositæ
Leopard's bane	Doronicum pardalines	Compositæ
Coltsfoot	Tusilago farfara	Compositæ
Corn sow thistle	Sonchus arvensis	Compositæ
Hawkbit	Apargia autumnalis	Compositæ
Water ragwort	Senecio aquaticus	Compositæ
Nippelwort	Lapsana communis	Compositæ

Studies in red, blue, or white may be arranged by the reader in somewhat the same fashion. There may be no great amount of science needed to master such exercises, but nevertheless they are very useful, and any plan that tends to assist knowledge and memory is certainly to be commended.

Many of these flowers may be carefully collected, and with specimens of their leaves, stalks, and even roots, to show peculiarities of shape, placed near each other in the preserving book.

An excellent way of acquiring a permanent knowledge of flowers is to paint them either singly or in small bouquets. Flower painting is not nearly so difficult as it seems, and the very act of sketching and colouring a floral pet, with its many little peculiarities, fixes the flower not only on the paper but in the memory. The more beautiful among them may be painted on terra-cotta vases or plaques. Very common objects of everyday use may be greatly beautified and ornamented by flower-painting. Curiously shaped old-fashioned bottles, for instance, may first be treated to a coat or two of dark colour paint as a background, and then receive a pretty flower sketch.

During summer and autumn our hedgerows are quite a study in themselves, and many is the beautiful flower to be found nestling near them, or clinging in wild luxuriance to their branches. The hedge stachys, which grows so tall and luxuriantly in July and August, is not a favourite with everyone, owing to its rather powerful odour and dullish purple or pink flowers, which at a little distance give it somewhat the appearance of a nettle. It is the Stachys sylvatica of naturalists, and is of the labiate order.

The large mullein, Verbascum thapsus, is one of our stateliest of hedge pets; its tall, erect stem, on which pretty bright yellow flowers cluster, tapering off into buds towards the top—as do those of the foxglove—have a very striking appearance and pretty effect.

The chicory or succory plant, Cichorium intybus, may be known at a glance from its tall, hard, erect stem, and the intense brightness of the blue flowers that cluster close to the stalk. It blooms on the wayside in July and August.

The vetches are a numerous and very pretty class of flowers belonging to the natural order Leguminosæ. The common vetch, Vicia sativa, or tare, which we notice growing luxuriantly in fields along with oats or rye, to form forage for cattle, may be taken as a type, for from this all the vetches may be known.

The wood vetch, Vicia sylvatica, with its light lilac inflorescence, is common enough in some of the midland counties. It grows to a height of five or six feet, holding on as it climbs by its tendrils, and beautifying every bush that supports it.

The meadow vetchling may easily be distinguished from all the others. The leaves are curiously shaped, and the flowers are bright yellow, having a resemblance to birdsfoot trefoil. It is called a wild pea, and really is indeed, but a very great beautifier of the hedgerows. It is a good climber.

The tufted vetch, Vicia cracca, may be easily known by its dense clusters of lilac-trailing bloom.

The kidney vetch, Anthyllis vulneraria, should be studied side by side with the meadow vetchling and the birdsfoot trefoil; it is especially like the latter. It grows on high dry pastures, and is plentiful enough by the wayside. It does not climb, but stands strongly on its own stalk, and this as well as its leaves are covered with soft downy hairs.

The bush vetch, Vicia sepium, is very common both in England and Scotland through all the months of summer and autumn. It is sometimes called the sweet-scented vernal grass.

Trailing over the hedges in summer we have the white bryony, Bryonia alba, and though its foliage dies off as autumn comes on, it is still an object of beauty from its clusters of berries red and green.

The wild hop is another hedge favourite, and the woody nightshade still another. The bright scarlet, or rather crimson, glittering berries of the latter mingle very charmingly with the tints of the fading hawthorn leaves or the changing colours of the foliage of dwarf oaks and elm.

While in autumn our hedges are all ablaze with the brightness lent them by the innumerable wild berries, our hills and moors both in England and Scotland are still crimson and purple with the glory of heather and heath. These are almost too well known to need description, and were I to be tempted to write about them, my Highland blood would rise to the surface, patriotism would assume sway in my soul, and I should not know where to stop.

I cannot help quoting Campbell in concluding this brief series on wild flowers, and as I have steered clear of poetry all through, I dare say I shall be forgiven. But the bard is referring to heather when he writes:—

"I love you for lulling me back into dreams
Of the blue Highland mountains and echoing streams,
And of birchen glades breathing their balm;
While the deer is seen glancing in sunshine remote,
And the deep mellow gush of the woodpigeon's note
Makes music that sweetens the calm."

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.

EVELYN found herself, on the day following her evening at Mrs. Allingham West's, in a flutter of pleasurable excitement. This literary world into which she had entered was full of new suggestions, new possibilities for her. Conversation with those of superior mental calibre to ourselves, who will take pains to draw out and to help our growing tendencies towards that which is highest, is of all things the most stimulating. Evelyn had enjoyed much of this pleasure in different forms during the past twelve months, and last night's experience was specially exhilarating. She was just discussing with Miss Wentworth what Mr. Muir had said to her about Christianity, when Mr. Austin Hope was announced.

"My uncle! I thought he was abroad," exclaimed Evelyn, and hastened to greet the visitor, who showed an unusual amount of kindness in his salutation.

"You're looking very well, in spite of what you have gone through, my dear," he observed. "What a set of preposterous idiots!"

Evelyn rightly judged that this remark referred to her relatives at The Elms.

"That young fellow did not take his degree at college, I believe," Mr. Hope went on. "Just what I should have expected of him."

Evelyn did not feel very clear in her own mind as to whether this referred to poor Algy's pretensions to herself or to his college career, but in any case she resolved to make an attempt to stand up for him.

"He is a very charming fellow, and I like him very much indeed. We were always like brother and sister."

"Just so, brother and sister; that is what it ought to have been. Had I had any other idea I would not have let you go to The Elms in the first place. However, you cannot return there under present circumstances, so what I have come to say is, you must live with me. I shall be very glad to have you," continued Mr. Hope, with a rather unsuccessful attempt at enthusiasm. "So get your bonnet on, and come along."

"But, uncle," cried the dismayed girl, "I could not leave Miss Wentworth like that. She has been kindness itself to me."

"Miss Wentworth! That's the American lady, I suppose? I never could bear Americans, especially the women. Always lecturing about women's rights, and so on. The last thing I ever should have thought could happen is that my niece should be thrown on the hospitality of a Transatlantic female."

"But, uncle, you are quite mistaken, I assure you. She is a charming woman, and most cultivated. Last night I went with her to Mrs. Allingham West's."

"I suppose she asked for a card," retorted Mr. Hope, in no wise impressed by this announcement. "Trust an American for that sort of thing."

"You really do her injustice," protested Evelyn. "I am sure you would like her. I will ask her to come downstairs—"

"No, no! Stop, my dear!" cried Mr. Hope, looking at his watch. "If you really cannot come to-day, come to-morrow. I have no time to see this Miss—what's her name? Apologise, and say everything that is civil for me. When shall we expect you?"

The prospect of going to Mr. Hope's house was most distasteful to poor Evelyn. She had lived on with Miss Wentworth, week by week, hoping "something would turn up," and vaguely expecting she would go back to The Elms by some lucky turn of events. The present had been thoroughly enjoyable, and she had not troubled herself much about the future. Her uncle was quite the last friend in the world with whom she wished to take up her abode. But what else, after all, was to be done? As Mr. Hope proceeded to point out, Miss Wentworth would be going back to America before very long.

"Didn't they say anything at The Elms about my coming back?" she faltered.

"If they had, I should not have listened to it," returned Mr. Hope, sternly. "They ought to be ashamed of themselves, every one."

Evelyn felt this was a little hard on her unfortunate relatives, but it was useless to defend them. The upshot of her interview with Mr. Hope was that she promised to come to him in a week's time. Mr. Hope demurred to the delay, but at last consented.

"Perhaps you will let me be of use to you, uncle, in keeping house and so on," she ventured, trying to make things cheerful for both of them. But Mr. Hope looked exceedingly rigid.

"As to that, my dear, I do not think I shall trouble you," he replied. "My housekeeper, Mrs. Willis, has been with me a great many years, and Stevens is an old servant. I do not suppose they will interfere with you, or you with them."

This did not add to poor Evelyn's delight in the prospect, and when her uncle had gone, she rushed upstairs to Miss Wentworth and burst into tears. The kindly American soothed her, and sympathised with her. She saw the change was inevitable, and in view of her own approaching departure for America she felt relieved that Evelyn had a settled home in prospect, though she grieved to lose her companionship.

In spite of all this, the parting was very hard when, a week later, Evelyn and her boxes were carried off by a cab. Miss Wentworth, though she was not of a demonstrative nature, kissed the girl tenderly at parting, and poor Evelyn clung about her, for the child needed a woman's love and care.

Her uncle's house, in a highly respectable road at Kensington, was of a rather sombre and forbidding aspect. There was a great flight of steps, and pillars flanked a portentous hall door. An elderly housemaid of irreproachable dress, but stiff and starched in appearance, admitted Evelyn, and looked, as the girl nervously imagined, displeasure at the sight of her boxes. Her uncle came out into the hall to greet her.

"Well, my dear, here you are! Good gracious, what a quantity of luggage the child has brought!"

"I had to bring all my things, uncle," said poor Evelyn, who possessed the average number of pretty dresses required by the claims of society.

"All your things! I should think so. What, another box? We had two come from The Elms the other day, and a case of books into the bargain."

Mr. Austin Hope, as a bachelor, had no idea of the necessities of civilisation for a London young lady, and only meant what he said good-humouredly. But Evelyn felt that even this trivial incident was depressing to the last degree.

"The cabman can carry them up, Stevens," said Mr. Hope. But Stevens, with a severe glance at the cabman's boots, replied that she and Jane would try and manage it by-and-by.

"He would have made more work than he saved, with mud on my stair-carpets," she remarked, in discussing the young lady's arrival, in the kitchen, with Mrs. Willis and Jane. Mrs. Willis was cook-housekeeper; Jane, the "young girl" who did all the rough work. It is easy to suppose that the arrival of a strange young lady for an indefinite period was not regarded with favour by the worthy trio, who had kept Mr. Hope's house in beautiful order, looked after his linen, cooked his recherché dinners, and spent his money for him from time immemorial.

It was with a sinking heart poor Evelyn followed Stevens up to the second floor. The bedroom into which she was admitted was furnished in an old-fashioned style. A mahogany four-poster, with red damask hangings and carved pillars polished to a high state of perfection, a mahogany wardrobe and dressing-table, a Brussels carpet—all was good, heavy, costly, and ugly, but exquisitely clean. Evelyn sank into a chair and waited forlornly till it should please somebody to bring up her luggage. How very desolate life had become!

At length Stevens and Jane, with a martyred aspect, staggered into the room under dress-basket No. 1.

Evelyn nervously thanked them, and was relieved to begin unpacking. "Shall I ever feel at home in this strange house?" she thought, as she put away her girlish belongings in the deep, old-fashioned drawers. It was four o'clock.

"Master bade me say dinner will be on the table punctually at seven, Miss," observed Stevens. "And is there anything we can do for you?"

"Oh, for some afternoon tea!" thought Evelyn, but she dared not begin by asking this acid personage for what was, probably, contrary to the rules of the house. She thought she remembered her uncle denouncing afternoon tea as a dangerous luxury, only fit for silly women who wanted to ruin their health. So she faintly said, "No, thank you, Stevens," and tried to forget the cosy meal she and Miss Wentworth had always taken at that hour. "If I can't have it any other way," she thought, "I will have an Etna and boil my own water up here."

The dinner to which Evelyn was formally handed in by her uncle at the exact stroke of seven might have gone far to console her for the loss of afternoon tea. It began with olives, followed by clear soup with pieces of white of egg in it; a couple of entrées succeeded, each of some unusual concoction, so far as Evelyn's experience went. Mr. Hope ate leisurely of each course; and although what he took was moderate in quantity, he seemed to enjoy and appreciate his dinner very much indeed. The wines were evidently chosen with great care to match the courses.

"What! still an abstainer! Extremes, Evelyn, extremes! You know enough Latin to understand this; Medio tutissimus ibis?"

Evelyn had not spirit enough to enter upon an argument on behalf of total abstinence just then. She wished the dinner were less tedious; half the number of courses would have amply sufficed for her.

"I had this on purpose for you, my dear," said Mr. Hope, as a sweet omelette at length made its appearance. Evelyn fancied Stevens' eye was on her disapprovingly as she ate it, unaccompanied by Mr. Hope, who waited for the savouries. She thought he could scarcely dine so elaborately every night; but in this she was mistaken.

At length it was over, and Evelyn withdrew into the small drawing-room that occupied the front of the ground floor. She had, of course, been to the house before, but her visits had rather been matters of ceremony than anything else, and had been few and far between. She knew, however, that the greater part of the first storey was occupied by her uncle's library—a noble room with books from floor to ceiling, a very paradise for a student. She feared also that she would not be made free of that apartment.

Her fear was well founded. Mr. Hope was scrupulously neat and fidgety; he could not have endured an impulsive girl, as he conceived Evelyn to be, flitting in and out, and disarranging his papers. He did a certain amount of literary work in a dilettante manner, and was engaged at the present time in writing an article for one of the reviews, "On the Influence of Climate on Species." He was particular about his manuscripts and his books of reference, keeping both with mathematical accuracy very unusual in a literary man. He spent a great deal of time at the Natural History Museum not far away, and was accustomed to enjoy plenty of congenial society. This evening he had refused an invitation, intending to make his niece happy at home; but somehow he did not know how to set about it. They talked of Engelberg as they drank their beautifully prepared coffee, and Evelyn congratulated her uncle on the excellence of the beverage, which was equal to anything she had tasted on the Continent. Then conversation flagged. Mr. Hope wanted to go and smoke a cigar in the library, and luxuriate among his books, but he did not want Evelyn there, and he did not like to leave her alone. So the slow hours dragged on their weary length till ten o'clock, when Evelyn escaped to bed, and Mr. Hope fled to smoke in peace.

"Am I always to sit in that prim drawing-room among the old china?" she desperately asked herself. "Where am I to write and to study? I must have some retreat, or I shall be miserable."

The next morning she ventured to explore a little, and found that the room behind her bedroom was untenanted. It looked upon trees that would soon put forth their leaves—for March was almost past—and conceal the backs of the opposite houses. It could be made a delightful study. Dare she ask her uncle if she might appropriate it? To sit in the drawing-room with no place for books or writing-desk would be impossible.

As she poured out his tea at the nine o'clock breakfast, she made the suggestion, timidly hinting that she should like to fit the room up out of her pocket money. Her books had already been sent from The Elms, and needed shelves. All she required besides was carpet, desk, table, and chairs.

Mr. Hope did not like the proposal very well. He foresaw difficulties with Stevens, and he did not believe, after Evelyn's folly in persisting in publishing "Day-dreams," that she had capacity or purpose to do anything in writing or study worth making much fuss about. However, he could not very well refuse her.

"You must not think you are to immure yourself because you have come to live with an old bachelor," he said, kindly enough. "My next door neighbour, Mrs. Grant, wife of Professor Grant, has promised to take you anywhere with her own daughters. She is coming to call to-day, and will be very kind to you, I am sure."

"Thank you very much, uncle; but I feel I must have some little nook I can write in. If you will let me, I will manage it without troubling you at all, even to give an order."

"Well, well; if you can be sure you will not upset Stevens or Mrs. Willis. They are invaluable servants, but just a little crotchety," replied her uncle.

Evelyn faced the difficulty without delay. Stevens did not look with favour on the scheme, but Evelyn unblushingly bribed her into compliance. "It is the only way, for I can't have these old servants make my life wretched," she reflected. It was some little consolation to set to work that very day among the Kensington shops to furnish the room, and in bustling about Evelyn half forgot her heartache.

"Now, Evelyn Hope, you must face your destiny," she said that evening to herself. "Either make up your mind to be contented here, or go back to The Elms and marry Algy."

Last night she had felt as if the latter alternative were almost possible; to-day better thoughts had come, and she resolved to brace herself up to do the best with her present life. In this determination the preparation of her study was no insignificant assistance to the lonely girl.

emit their sweet scent; again the blue veronica flowers on the wayside banks, and in the stubble the scarlet pimpernel gazes up to the brilliant sun; again, again, spring follows winter and summer spring, and the seasons pass as the revolutions of the wheel of time carries them on, and yet he is not here to watch the changes, to note the coming and going of bird, beast, and flower, he who loved them all so well that he wrote, "I wonder to myself how they can all get on without me; how they manage, bird and flower, without me to keep the calendar for them. For I noted it so carefully and lovingly day by day."

On the 14th of August, 1887, Richard Jefferies, artist and poet—artist not by right of painted pictures, poet not by right of metred lines, but both by right of his passionate love of all that was beautiful, true, and pure, and by right of the beautiful pictures and poems he has left us in word and prose—passed from the world he had loved so well, and which had given for that love only pain and poverty, to his long, hard-earned rest in the quiet grave; but he has not left us altogether; the passionate, nature-loving soul lingers about his works, and infuses them with a subtle essence of the master mind which noted nature's changes and chances, and sung them in sweet impassioned language which all who list may hear.

Jefferies' great ambition seems to have been to become a novelist, and to this end he wrote several more or less dreary volumes, but though the plot be never so poor, through them all, showing here and there, runs the beautiful stream of nature notes, like a golden thread in a cotton garment, sparkling and flashing all the more brilliantly for the contrast of the poor material; for instance, in "Greene Ferne Farm" and "The Dewy Morn," many very fine passages occur, particularly in the latter, where he describes the beauty of the human knee. Jefferies' eyes, keen to observe and detect the minutest natural occurrences, were perhaps even more keen for beauty—beauty of colour, of form, of sound, of feeling, of motion, pure real beauty. In "The Story of My Heart," his constant prayer, reiterated again and again, is "Give me physical perfection," perfect physical form. And knowing how he suffered, how for six long years he fought face to face with death, battling hard day by day for dear life, this constant cry becomes unutterably sad, and not only was death in arms against him, others fought side by side in the same ranks. "Three great giants are against me—disease, despair, and poverty," is one of his last notes. Well might he pray, well, indeed, might he cry, "Give me physical perfection." Alas! the days of miracles are past. Well might he weep tears of blood; and imagining him sitting by his window, in the long summer evenings, looking across the soft, green-carpeted meadows and waving corn, by footpath and stile, and the banks where the countless wildflowers bloomed and waited his coming, who can doubt that he shed tears of blood, tears from the heart, bitter agonising tears, whilst he uttered his profitless, passionate prayer, "Give me physical perfection." What suffering like this? The parched and weary traveller in the desert, dying of thirst and seeing the mirage of lake and river. It is nothing; a few hours and, his thirst unslaked, death will ease him of his pains; but with poor Jefferies how different! There he sat with his burning thirst and could not even die. For years, six long and awful years, he must listen to the babbling brook and not a drop must pass his parched lips, and through all this pain and torment his mind held on its way and cast its pearls before men.

Richard Jefferies, the son of a farmer and descendant of a long line of farmers, was born in 1848, at an old farmhouse in Wiltshire, that splendid shire of down and valley. Do you know the Wiltshire downs, the long sweep of grassland rising in mighty undulations, and clothed in summer with blue scabious, toadflax, hawkweed, ladies' bedstraw, crowfoot, and countless other wildflowers? A glorious country! Small wonder the thoughtful boy developed an ardent love for the beautiful earth, and particularly of this portion of it of which he at a later date wrote so often and so lovingly. How he loved to roam over these enormous stretches of breezy grassland, making those minute and countless notes of flower and bird and beast, of sun and moon and sky and clouds, which he loved to the last, reading and translating from the mighty book in a manner which was to make him famous! Jefferies seems to have spent his youth much in the usual style of the ordinarily studious country boy, save only that he joined less in field sports than others, reading all books that came in his way, enjoying slight adventures as only boys can, and building a boat, quite an achievement at that early date, when papers for boys with detailed accounts of how such a work might be well and cheaply done were few indeed. Interested in natural history by his father's strolling lectures, he, with all a boy's aptitude for such subjects, quickly learned the common objects of the country-side, and searched deeper as his knowledge grew.

At an early age his ambition and inclination lured him into literature, and he became reporter for one or two local papers. His knowledge and skill in writing of farming gained him some notice, and presently he contributed to some of the principal London papers short sketches of agricultural progress or country life and folklore. In 1878 he sprang into sudden celebrity through his wonderful book, "The Gamekeeper at Home," and in the two following years increased his reputation by the publication of "Wild Life in a Southern County," "The Amateur Poacher," and that delightful book, written ostensibly for boys and girls, but equally interesting to adults, "Word Magic," wherein his wonderful knowledge of the ways of animals and his marvellously keen perception of their moral characters, so to speak, are plainly manifest, whilst his delineation of the child Bevis is really fascinating. In 1883 his most interesting volume appears, viz., "The Story of My Heart," a wonderful and beautiful story. In it he shows how, wrung by doubt and questions which the cleverest and truest Christians can but half answer, he swerved from the old faith to search after what should be to him a more palpably true and satisfactory worship; but throughout the search the black thread of uncertainty and suffering constantly appears.

In 1887 he published his last work, "Amaryllis at the Fair," and perhaps of all his works none is more charming. The scene, Mr. Besant tells us in his "Eulogy of Richard Jefferies," is laid at the author's old home, Coate Farm, and Mr. and Mrs. Iden are his father and mother—two delightful characters; and we can well understand how such a father would influence a son with the disposition of Jefferies. But Amaryllis herself is surely his most bewitching creation—such a tender, passionate, loving girl, with all the breezy freshness of the country in her nature; and Alere Flamma, what a fine, happy Bohemian! One is almost tempted to quote the opening lines of this charming volume, were it not that once quoting commences it is difficult to stop where all is so beautiful. "After London," a romance of the possible (?) future of England, though less interesting than his other principal works, is happy in conception and carried out with the writer's usual attention to detail; but like "Amaryllis at the Fair," one feels that a second volume is wanting to complete the story, and doubtless had death spared him longer they would both have been continued; but death was ever a marplot.

That Jefferies would have made no mean art critic he more than once shows, but what particular style of painting he would have preferred it is difficult to imagine; he was certainly a severe critic of the old school of landscape painting, nor did he spare the more modern men. Had he been an artist, his naturally quick perception of colour would probably have made him eminent. As it is, he has left scattered throughout his works short notes and remarks on art which would be worth collecting and publishing in a separate volume.

Those who wish to know more of Jefferies' life of trouble and triumph would do well to read Mr. Besant's biography of him—"The Eulogy of Richard Jefferies." A eulogy it is indeed; the great novelist has nothing but praise to give, and gives it in noiggardly manner. It is easy to read Jefferies' character through his books; we catch, here and there, glimpses of his passionate hasty temper and of his sensitive, tender, and sympathetic nature. One feels that many of his criticisms were written on the spur of the moment, and that had he paused to think ere writing they would not have been so caustic. A man of strong prejudices, he yet belonged to no political faction, siding with the party which seemed to him to promise most good to the people. He carried his independence to the farthest limit when in the direst distress he refused help from the Literary Fund because he would not be patronised; from men in his own profession he would accept help, but not from outsiders. At last the end of his sufferings came. After six years of weary struggling for existence, he succumbed to the universal enemy, and was laid to rest in the churchyard at Broadwater, in Sussex. Will the swallows heed, will they tell it to the wheat—"Richard Jefferies is dead?" and will the wheat be sad and tell it to another little Guido? * Alas! we know not, for he who alone could understand them, sleeps at peace in the quiet earth.

TYPES OF VIRTUE;
OR,
IDEAL HEROINES OF ENGLISH WRITERS.

By JOHN FRANCIS BREWER.

CONSTANCY: EVANGELINE.

LOYALTY, the quality of which I spoke in the last article, is an issue of the virtue of constancy; stability, persevering resolution, firmness in mind, purpose, affection, or principle, are all included in the term. It may almost be said to be the principle of truth in its relation to time, and it is therefore so specially an attribute of the Almighty. The word is now, however, most frequently employed to denote unchangeableness in friendship and in love; that beautiful state of continuance in affection which time and altered circumstances have no power to affect.

In Longfellow's "Evangeline" we have a beautiful example of this kind of constancy; of an "affection that hopes and endures and is patient." When reading the poem, it is as well to recollect the great importance attached to betrothal, or engagements, in old French society. At the present time engagements are held in less account than ever they were, and the way in which they are made and broken would have appeared disgraceful to the primitive peasants of Acadia. Of course in England no ceremony of betrothal takes place, whereas on parts of the Continent it is a very solemn ceremony, and after it, the girl is called the bride until her marriage, when she drops the title.

The story of Evangeline is founded upon an incident which took place in the northern part of America in the eighteenth century. Acadia, or Nova Scotia, as it is now called, belonged originally to the French, but it was handed over to the English in the year 1713. Entirely French in sympathy, the Acadians, only after great difficulty, were induced to swear allegiance to the English, and when war broke out between the latter Power and France, the Acadians were accused of having assisted their old masters. Whether the accusation was a true one or not, it is difficult to say, but the Government of George II. acted with great harshness to the simple-minded peasants. Their lands and houses were forfeited, and the governor issued a summons to the whole people bidding them attend a meeting, at which he declared he had orders to remove them to distant colonies, and to put them under arrest until their departure.

The early part of the poem is descriptive of the happiness and contentment of the Acadian peasants. In a fruitful and beautiful valley lay the secluded little village of Grand-Pré. Vast meadows provided pasturage to flocks without number; fields of flax, orchards and cornfields spread out afar; and dykes that the farmers had reared with great labour shut out the turbulent tides of the great Atlantic.

"There, in the tranquil evenings of summer, when brightly the sunset Lighted the village street, and gilded the vanes on the chimneys,

Matrons and maidens sat in snow-white caps, and in kirtles
Scarlet and blue and green, with distaffs spinning the golden Flax for the gossiping looms, whose noisy shuttles within doors Mingled their sound with the whirr of the wheels and the songs of the maidens."

It is a picture of happiness such as may be seen in the primitive parts of Brittany, and also in Canada at the present time.

Somewhat apart from the village lived Benedict Bellefontaine and his daughter Evangeline, a beautiful maiden of seventeen summers. Evangeline had many suitors, but Gabriel only was welcome, the son of Basil the blacksmith, a great man in the village and much respected. Gabriel and Evangeline had grown up together since their childhood, and had been taught their letters and hymns out of the self-same book. In happiness a few swift years are passed, and they were no longer children:—

"He was a valiant youth, and his face, like the face of the morning, Gladdened the earth with its light, and ripened thought into action.

She was a woman now, with the heart and hopes of a woman."

Evil tidings, however, were soon to disturb the peaceful quiet of Grand-Pré, and by-and-by the English ships make their appearance, with their cannon pointed at the village. Basil the blacksmith angurs ill from this; not so the father of Evangeline; he will foresee no harm:—

"Fear no evil, my friend, and to-night may no shadow of sorrow Fall on this house and hearth; for this is the night of the contract."

On the same night the public notary arrives, and the betrothal of Gabriel and Evangeline is drawn up, after which the old men played at draughts while the lovers sat together "in the twilight gloom of a window's embrasure." The feast of the betrothal takes place on the morrow, and is followed by a dance, when a summons from a bell tower and the beating of a drum causes the men to flock to the church and the women to the churchyard. In silence the crowd awaits the will of the soldiers and listens to the commander, who from the steps of the altar proclaims the order of King George.

The people were for a moment speechless with wonder, and then gave way to a cry of sorrow and anger, high above which is heard the voice of Basil the blacksmith, who with uplifted arm shouts his defiance. He is struck down by a soldier, and a scene of tumult follows. This is quelled by the priest, who counsels submission and reproves the people for fighting in the church. Basil and Gabriel are carried away in different ships, and Evangeline and her father are left on the shore, whither they are joined by the priest. Towards evening a blood-red light in the heavens proclaims to them and to the other Acadians who had been left on the shore the burning of the village of Grand-Pré. Speechless, they gaze at the terrible and melancholy scene, and on turning round to speak to Benedict they find him fallen from his seat—a corpse, stretched on the sea-shore. Without bell or book they bury him, and at the first dawn of day the embarking recommences and the ruined village is left.

In this melancholy fashion the first part of Evangeline ends,

Many weary years pass; friendless and homeless, the once happy Acadians wander from city to city, and get scattered over a vast continent. Many of them in despair long for death, and not a few of them obtain their wish. "Written, their history stands on tablets of stone in the churchyards." Long amongst these wanderers Evangeline was to be seen, "lowly and meek in spirit, and patiently suffering all things." Sometimes she tarried in cities, but always urged onward by the "hunger and thirst of the spirit," she would recommence her search. Often she heard rumours of Gabriel; many of those she came across had seen him in far-off places, but the rumours were contradictory. She was advised to bestow her hand elsewhere.

"Dear child, why dream and wait for him longer?

Are there not other youths as fair as Gabriel? others

Who have hearts as tender and true, and spirits as loyal?

Here is Baptiste Leblanc, the notary's son, who has loved thee

Many a tedious year; come, give him thy hand, and be happy!

Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catherine's tresses.

Then would Evangeline answer serenely, but sadly:—"I cannot;

Whither my heart has gone there follows my hand, and not elsewhere.

For when the heart goes before, like a lamp, and illumines the pathway,

Many things are made clear that else lie hidden in darkness."

A band of exiles, among whom was Evangeline, guided by hope or hearsay, sought for their kith and kin "among the few-acred farmers on the Acadian coast and the prairies of fair Opelousas." Bound by the bonds of a common belief and a common misfortune, this remnant of a nation pursued its way "past the Ohio shore, and past the mouth of the Wabash, into the golden stream of the broad and swift Mississippi."

Accompanied by the faithful priest, Father Felician, Evangeline does not give up hope of meeting Gabriel—

"But Evangeline's heart was sustained by a vision that faintly

Floated before her eyes, and beckoned her on through the moonlight.

It was the thought of her brain that assumed the shape of a phantom.

Through those shadowy aisles had Gabriel wandered before her,

And every stroke of the oar now brought him nearer and nearer."

And again,

"Oh, Father Felician! Something says in my heart that near me

Gabriel wanders; Is it a foolish dream—an idle and vague superstition?

Or has an angel passed and revealed the truth to my spirit?"

The wanderers approach a beautiful country, and to their great joy discover their friends. Basil the blacksmith is there, and welcomes the priest and Evangeline, and leads them to the garden.

"There in an arbour of roses, with endless question and answer, Gave they vent to their hearts, and renewed their friendly embraces."

But a terrible disappointment is in store for Evangeline; doubts and misgivings steal over her heart as she observes the absence of Gabriel, and when Basil inquires of them whether they had encountered his son on their journey—

"Tears came into her eyes, and she said with a tremulous accent—

'Gone! is Gabriel gone?' and concealing her face on his shoulder,

All her o'erburdened heart gave way, and she wept and lamented.

Then the good Basil said—and his voice grew blithe as he said it—

'Be of good cheer, my child; it is only to-day he departed.'"

Evangeline takes leave of Father Felician, and departs with Basil to search for Gabriel. Frequently they hear tidings of him, and buoyed up by hope they continue their journey from place to place.

"So came the autumn, and passed, and the winter: yet Gabriel came not.

Blossomed the opening spring, and the notes of the robin and blackbird Sounded sweet upon wold and in wood: yet Gabriel came not."

* * *

"Thus did the long sad years glide on, and in seasons and places,

Divers and distant, far was seen the wandering maiden;

Now in the noisy camps and the battlefields of the army;

Now in secluded hamlets, in towns, and populous cities.

Like a phantom she came, and passed away unremembered.

Fair was she and young, when in hope began the long journey;

Faded was she and old, when in disappointment it ended."

At length she abandons her fruitless search, and lived for many years as a sister of mercy, frequenting lonely and wretched roofs in the crowded lanes of the city—

"Where distress and want concealed themselves from the sunlight, Where disease and sorrow in garrets languished neglected."

By-and-by a pestilence falls on the city, and day and night Evangeline tends the sick and the dying. One Sabbath morn, wending her way through the deserted and silent streets, she entered the almshouse:—

"Many a languid head, upraised as Evangeline entered,

Turned on its pillow of pain to gaze while she passed, for her presence Fell on their hearts like a ray of the sun on the walls of a prison."

* * *

"Suddenly, as if arrested by fear or a feeling of wonder,

Still she stood, with her colourless lips apart, while a shudder Ran through her frame."

Then she utters a terrible cry of anguish. On the pallet before her was the dying form of an old man, long and thin, with grey hair. It is Gabriel, and he recognises her.

"Vainly he strove to whisper her name, for the accents unuttered

Died on his lips, and their motion revealed what his tongue would have spoken.

Vainly he strove to rise; and Evangeline, kneeling beside him, Kissed his dying lips, and laid his head on her bosom."

* * *

"All was ended now, the hope, and the fear, and the sorrow;

All the aching of heart, the restless, unsatisfied longing;

All the dull, deep pain and constant anguish of patience;

And, as she pressed once more the lifeless head to her bosom,

Meekly she bowed her own, and murmured, 'Father, I thank thee.'"

Constancy is the quality that ennobles and purifies love and makes the marriage life happy; it is the preserver and supporter of attachment, which it carries through the shoals and quicksands of time and altered circumstances.

BIRD LIFE IN SEPTEMBER.

By A NATURALIST.

HO does not love to ramble through the woodlands and fields, in this usually so pleasant month, on a bright sunny morning, when there is a gentle whispering breeze just strong enough to dry the moisture on the leaves of the turnips and mangolds?

Such a morning, however, proves fatal to numbers of partridges. The old keeper, yonder, who is attended by his favourite Spanish pointer, gives expression to his feelings of satisfaction. "We shall get at 'em to-day, and no mistake about it, for it ain't too hot nor too chilly; they'll rise proper."

All residents in the country are familiar with the partridge. His call to his mate, early in the year, is one of the first signs that winter has gone. To the day-labourer, as he returns home from his work across the fields in the dusk of evening, his cheery call, as he runs swiftly up and down the furrows, has a pleasant sound. His legs are rather long and muscular, whereas his wings are short; for he lives chiefly on the ground—running more than flying. His hard bill, strong, and a little curved, and the short, thick, straight nails of his toes, indicate that he has his living to get mostly from the earth, where he scratches in search of grain. Most careful and affectionate parents they are; when her chicks are in danger the mother shows the most determined courage in their defence. In walking along some sandy road, bordered by trees, I have often come suddenly on a mother and family basking and dusting themselves in the sun which shines bright and warm through the numerous openings in the foliage. What a commotion ensues then! If the cock is absent the hen will drop, after making a dash almost to your feet, as though her wing was broken, or she was wounded. She appears to try vainly to raise herself, for she falls on her side and cries in painful tones. With an apparently final effort she manages to creep through the hedge into the standing corn. At racing speed, up the road comes the cock bird, head and body nearly upright, sounding his alarm note. But just as you think he will pass by you, he also runs through the hedge, and all is still. The pretty chicks had made good their escape while the mother was pretending to be crippled; a clever performance on her part, one that she and the cock go through often.

It is an interesting sight to see a covey feed before they finally settle for the night in some open field. You will hear them call to each other from the slopes of the hilly fields, when the sun is low down in the west, just before it grows dusk. By the sound you can tell that in a few moments they will be on the wing. Here they come, with a "whirr" just overhead, to pitch in the field opposite us, where they at once begin to search for the scattered grain in the stubbles. With arched backs and drooping tails, they glide hither and thither like so many shadows. One or two of their number, however, are posted as sentinels on the look out for the least sight or sound of anything suspicious; you will see these with their forms raised well up from the stubbles, and hear their note of warning or cry of "all's well," as the case may be. Resting on the ground, as they do at night, they need exercise caution, for their natural enemies are many. Dear to the heart of Englishmen who love sport is the plump partridge.

As the month draws to a close other sounds make themselves heard; the hooting of the wood-owl, the clamour of the stone curlew. Woodlarks, thrushes, and blackbirds begin their subdued autumn notes, as the days grow colder.

"Hedge-crickets sing; and, now with treble soft,

The redbreast whistles from a garden croft,
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies."

For the common swallow begins to leave us about the end of September, as well as many other birds of soft bill to whom insect food is a necessity; whilst some other birds leave the mountainous districts and come to the southern and warmer localities, where the berries which they love grow and ripen in the woods and the hedges.

Other fruit ripens there now also—fruit our boys and girls come into the lanes and fields in search of. Miss Mitford, whose writings were prized by your mothers and grandmothers when writers on natural history were less plentiful than they now are, but which you would do well to read, speaking of nutting, says—"On we go, scrambling and gathering with all our might and all our glee. Oh, what an enjoyment! All my life long I have had a passion for that sort of seeking which implies finding—the secret, I believe, of the love of field sports which is in man's mind a natural impulse," but this hedgerow nutting beats some other sports to nothing, she continues.

On the 14th of September, Holy Rood Day, in olden time, the lads and lasses went together in the woods, a nutting.

IN THE GARDEN OF THE TUILERIES.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

BY A LADY DRESSMAKER.

MANTLE AND JACKET.

NET BONNET, AND ONE OF CRAPE AND LISSE.

WE sometimes meet with such quaint provincial or national expressions in the course of our reading, that it would be well if we all kept commonplace books. Apropos of dress, I lately heard two or three Irish expressions which were delightfully odd. When a lady purchases a new garment, a very amiable wish is, "health to wear it, strength to tear it," and in America they add, "money to buy a new one," which is a very practical touch indeed. When you put on a new thing, you are said to "give the beverage of it" to the person you first kiss after putting it on. This, however, is not all Irish, for in "Bailey's Dictionary," published early in 1700, "to pay beverage" is defined as giving a treat on the first wearing of a suit of clothes. In the North of England people say, "Nip for new," a saying which sets the children running when they have on a new frock, as they know a good pinch is sure to follow if they be caught. "Sure I must put a drop on yees for luck," said an old Irishwoman to me one bright summer day; "but I'll put it where it won't show, darlin', so as not to be spoiling yer frock." "What good is that, Bridget?" "Sure ye look too nice entirely, ma'am; ye'll be having a shower of rain, or a splash of mire on yees; if I put the drop on it first, they'll be taking it for an auld gown done up new." I never found out who the "they" was; but the story is a very funny one to my mind, with its mixture of superstition and comical roguish cleverness.

The hot days of June and July, and the pleasant sense of summer which has been so unknown for a long time, made the season in London a very bright and cheerful one. Never has the dress worn been so pretty or so simple and seasonable. The great popularity of embroidered materials was one reason why the dresses looked prettier, for embroidery is always graceful and becoming, particularly in the form called "English," which is the most in vogue in the machine-made embroidery of to-day. The revival of so many of the old pure and primitive colours, green especially, in all its varied shades, adds to the beauty of dress in the summer, for green is beautiful with either black or white. It is odd, nevertheless, that with all the immense strides we have taken and improvements developed, we have not arrived at producing a good tone of green in cotton or mixed textures of wool and cotton. White silk seems to excel all others each successive year in its powers of receiving green dyes.

No one ever saw a green cotton of any pretty shade, which, in these days of cotton frocks, is a great drawback. It is also unsuitable to wear in the evening, as it is not generally becoming, save in very pale shades. There are many new greens in silk and ribbons; one called "watercress," or "Egyptian green," is the colour of the early watercress leaves; this, in plush or velvet, is very beautiful. Then there are besides that "grasshopper," "serpent," "lizard," "chicory," "absinthe," "beetle-wing," "vert métaux," or "metal green," and "young linden" — all greens that are commonly worn, and used as trimmings of dresses, and for sashes, panels, and folded waistcoats. There is a blue-grey lavender, which years ago used to be worn in mourning, and a smoky blue-grey, which is poetically called "summer night." "Briar-rose pink" and "blotting-paper pink" are both much worn, even in woollen materials. Drab is generally liked, also, and has for its trimmings one of these pinks. "Hortensia" is a red-purple, which I daresay will be carried on during the autumn and winter. If the present taste for brighter colours should continue to prevail, we shall see a partial termination to the long reign of black, which has been the favourite hue of young and old, as well as rich and poor.

Alpaca is more used in greys than in any other hue, and though a good deal of black alpaca with white waistcoat fronts has been made up during the season, the only sort really very popular has been the grey brocaded, or brocaded with stripes, which has been much made up with pink and with white for dresses, and also for dust cloaks. I do not know whether alpaca will really meet with the revival to which its merits entitle it for summer ordinary dresses, but it has not been the fashion as it became some years ago. This may be explained by the introduction of the tailor-made gown, which is worn at every season, and takes the place that the alpaca did formerly.

THE NEW BRETelles AND FRILL.

I think I mentioned in my last the revival of "accordion pleating," which is adopted for the entire skirt of many thin materials, such as "delaine," "pongee," "voile de nonne," "barege," and even muslin of all kinds. The skirt is often trimmed at the edge with several rows of narrow baby-ribbon, which must be put on before it is pleated. The "accordion pleating" forms a very graceful and pretty skirt, and the opening and shutting of its folds make it look undulating when in movement.

Narrow ribbons are taking the place of the very wide sashes that have been used throughout the year, and the newest kind of sash seems to be soft silk scarves, which are put once round the waist, and then the ends are brought forward loosely, so that the scarf hangs below the waist, and is tied with short loops and short ends, on the left side towards the front. This sash was seen on the bridesmaids' dresses at the Duchess of Portland's wedding. Of course it is only suitable for a slight figure, and a young or youngish person.

Although the tendency of all skirts is to hang in straight lines, they have much of the stiffness taken out of them by the arrangement of the embroidered borders, or flat trimmings which run up the sides. They are mounted in pleats for the front and sides, and have the back in gathers. The foundation skirt is gored at the front and sides; but the overskirt is rarely gored, and if needful they are sparsely gathered at the waist. Panels are still worn, but are much wider, and do not decrease at the top; while the newest form of revers is wider at the top than at the bottom, which entirely alters their appearance. They are also put down in folded draperies, which hang like the side of a window-valance.

I have tried to give an idea of the way in which frills are used down the front of bodices in several of the illustrations of this month. This frill is quite one of the styles of the day, and is added to the front of all blouses and bibbed-bodices. It is thickly pleated, and sometimes falls in a straight manner, as seen in the lady "In the Tuileries Gardens," or it is arranged to fall zigzag, like that worn by the lady with the bretelles. The soft silk blouses are found in immense variety for wearing with all kinds of skirts, including those of white embroidered muslin.

Cotton bodices are nearly always made with a touch of "shirt" in them, and look the best and the least "mannish" when they are made of some pretty striped or spotted cotton. They may be worn either under the dress skirt, or over it, and either with or without a jacket; the starching of the front and the manly collar make them look masculine. Nevertheless, when surmounted by the young girlish face, they cease to be so objectionable, and one remembers they are only a fashion of the hour. All our recent styles have been a little manly, and we have fully adopted the tailor of our fathers and brothers, and the reason is not far to seek. We want neat, well-made garments to wear and look well in all weathers, like the coat and great coat as made by a tailor.

One of the new fancies—that of leaving the throat and neck uncovered, and wearing very low and turned down collars—I cannot think is at all pretty or feminine. One laughs at a foolish fancy for a starched shirt-front, but to see a tanned, brown, and red neck, arms, and hands is a far more serious and ugly matter, and is a manly imitation to be much discouraged. Some very pretty Zouave jackets are made of white cotton embroidery, either open or closed work, and they are worn over plain cambric, or any kind of blouse with a belt, and any sort of underskirt. If these Zouaves be made of cloth, cashmere, or silk for dressy wear, the embroidery is sure to be of gold or silver—generally gold of very fine thread and close pattern. The most stylish mixture for the whole season has been gold on white for every kind of day festival, concerts, or garden parties.

One of our oldest friends has returned to fashion, namely, frills, which have not been seen for so long. They are put on the open sides of skirts, and border hems and fichus. Hems are also occasionally flounced quite in the olden style, the flounces being piped and drawn up on a cord. The revival of the "Empire style" and its flounced skirt has done this.

The upper part of all sleeves is wider, and have almost an epaulette effect, the old "leg-of-mutton" style of cutting them being followed. Many sleeves are cut loose and long, and the fulness is then pushed up to the shoulder, and fastened under an ornament; or there is a pointed trimming down the back of the arm, and all the sleeve fulness is gathered under it. Ribbon is often tied round the arm, finishing in a bow on the shoulder, which stands up, and assists in giving the height which is fashionable. These high shoulders suit only the tall and rather slim girls; if worn by the short and stout, they add breadth to the shoulders, and decrease the apparent height. Short people had better have sleeves which are raised by gathers into the top of the sleeve, and fit the arm closely.

The long lace cloaks are more seen than any others, as they are graceful and summery-looking. We shall probably have the same shape repeated this winter with many variations; the yoke-shaped top with very high "Medici collar" may be brought out again. There is a new cape, called the "four-in-hand," which consists of two or three capes like a coachman's, placed severally to lie on each other. It is made of cloth of any hue. The edges of the capes are either simply cut round or else have double rows of stitching. There is a "turn-down collar," and the neck is fastened by ribbons to match, the cape coming nearly to the waist at the back and front alike.

The pattern selected for this month is a plain gored princess chemise. We are frequently asked whether we have anything of the kind, and the present pattern is one of the best. It will require from two yards and a half to three yards of material, according to size and length. It is in four pieces, and is easy to make, and comfortable to wear, and is well suited to stout people.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle, polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American bodice instead of stays, new Corday skirt with pleats, new jacket-bodice with waistcoat, princess dress, jacket and waistcoat, "Little Lord Fauntleroy" suit, braided bodice and revers, Directoire jacket with folded front, Empire bodice, men's pyjama, a mantle without sleeves, and a plain gored princess chemise.

HOW WORKING GIRLS LIVE IN LONDON.

By NANETTE MASON.

PART III.

INSTEAD of going into lodgings girls sometimes become boarders, either in regular boarding-houses or with families who either have more accommodation than they themselves require, or who find it desirable to make a little money by opening their fireside circle to strangers. Girls out at business all day seldom, however, arrange for full board anywhere. In most instances it is only partial board—breakfast and tea during the week, and full board on Sundays.

Boarding is preferable to lodging in this, that there is more supervision, and that it keeps up the feeling of family life which it is desirable we should never lose. It only proves undesirable when the boarder finds herself treated not as one of the family, but as an intruder, whose very bite and sup are regarded as a dead loss to be resented, even though she has paid for them.

"An objection to some boarding-houses," says a London bachelor, "is that they are conducted on penurious principles, and that their tables are so economically provided that one never gets enough to eat. Not only is there a scant supply, but the landlady grudges, or seems to grudge, every mouthful, and her terrible eye follows you as you dip into the marmalade jar or help yourself to butter. A boarder may feel bound to eat as much as possible to get the worth of his money, but it is hard to do that in some houses."

"This is an objection, however, that applies more to small establishments than to large. When there are a dozen or more at table the effect of the terrible eye is distributed. Besides, wise landladies know very well that pinching is the worst possible policy, and that even if every boarder were a glutton and ate till he could eat no more, there would still be a good profit over." Girls of sense and spirit, when they find themselves in niggardly houses, will soon pack up their traps and seek for more liberal dwelling-places.

Admirable institutions started for the benefit of girls engaged in business in the metropolis are found in the Homes for Working Girls, in which readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER have, by their liberal contributions, already shown a deep interest. The object of the committee who manage these is, to quote their own words, "'to help those who help themselves,' by providing homes in the various districts of London for those who are earnestly striving to gain an honest living, but who are 'homeless'; at the same time to afford them profitable recreation, and above all to surround them with Christian influences and friendly guidance at the most critical period of their lives."

They are founded on the idea that woman's sphere is the home, and that girls who are to become wives should never lose touch of home life, or have any chance of feeling like fish out of water, when happy fortune sets them at last to govern households of their own. In the Homes girls are able "to live like sisters under the loving care of a Christian woman as superintendent, with dining, sitting-rooms, and library in common, and all arranged so as to secure that well-ordered freedom and cheerful independence which family life means."

The payments in the Homes are small, but everything is paid for, so that their benefits may be partaken of without the slightest lowering of independence, or the uncomfortable feeling on the part of any girl that she is the recipient of charity. The rules for conducting the Homes—and every community must observe some rules—strike one as the product of common sense. They are such as every wise girl will cheerfully obey, and praise, too, for their recognition of her reasonable personal freedom.

In the case of many establishments girls live under the roofs of their employers, board and lodging being provided for them; several large houses are indeed conspicuous in this way. How this answers depends very much on the employers. If they recognise their duty all goes well. Some, however, take little pains about either the food or lodging they provide; and in the regulations they impose, and the practices they shut their eyes to, show little knowledge of the wants and eccentricities of human nature.

A class of working girls who have practically no choice in the matter of living is that which includes the thousands in the metropolis who are engaged in domestic service. These are in the hands of the people who employ them, and they are comfortable and happy or miserable and discontented just as it happens to be a good or bad master, or, what is much more important, a good or bad "missus."

How servants live and how they have a right to live, are subjects which have been a good deal written about, and that from two points of view—that of maid and that of mistress. The fact is not to be ignored that domestic service is unpopular with the class who might be supposed to find in it a congenial occupation. It is looked down upon as not so genteel, for example, as waiting in a shop, and being there called "Miss," as if people lessened their gentility by any sort of useful labour whatever.

Another reason for domestic service being held in abhorrence by girls is the restraint which it imposes. Their nature rebels against confinement; liberty, evening liberty especially, is what they want, and no occasional "days out" will make up for the loss of it. To be independent and free, a girl rejects what at first sight one would think the best thing in the world for her, and joins the hungry army of workgirls, with its underpay and excessive competition.

"What is her freedom after all?" asks Mrs. Monument in "The Children of Gideon." "She's free to walk the streets and get into bad company; she's free to learn bad manners, and she's free to go hungry and ragged."

Faults, it must be allowed, are to be laid to the charge both of mistresses and maids. The perfect servant is a rare bird, and so is the perfect mistress. Mistresses are often over-exacting, full of whims, and with an unfortunate and irritating inclination to nag at those over whom they have control. The rules they lay down are too frequently only petty restrictions, in which the fact is lost sight of that servants are of the same flesh and blood as themselves. "The counsels of woman," says the proverb, "are cruel," and to judge by the want of consideration shown by some mistresses, there is a good deal of truth in it. A few mistresses, however, err on the side of over-indulgence, like one we met recently, who had no belief in class distinction, and showed her disapproval of them by allowing her servants to sit for a certain time in the drawing-room every afternoon and play on the piano.

General servants are in most respects the worst off. They have more difficulties than those in larger establishments of getting time to themselves either for exercise in the open air or for seeing their friends; then they are more isolated, and what with sweeping, dusting, cooking, and answering the door-bell, they are much harder worked.

Of all general servants the hardest wrought are the "slaves" in lodging-houses, as many of our working girls may have observed. The traditional character of the lodging-house domestic is not a good one; it represents her as tricky sometimes, forgetful often, discreet never, and slovenly always. "But," says a writer of experience in London life, "she has seldom had justice done her. Our observations on servants of this class confirm the conclusion that the number of people trying to do their duty in the world is much greater than is generally made out. We have known all sorts, from a girl fresh from the country and as 'green' as her native grass, who, when she brought up the tea-things, instead of setting them down and opening the door, would stand and kick at it till it was opened, to one of an ambitious turn, who aimed at being a lady's maid, studied French out of a well-thumbed grammar, and would conjugate 'avoir' and 'être' in a low tone to herself as she polished the grates or blackened the shoes. The difficulties of a lodging-house servant, often a single girl waiting upon a dozen unreasonable and exacting lodgers, must be pretty considerable, and she deserves some consideration if her memory is occasionally at fault and her appearance is seldom as fine as if she had just been taken out of a band-box."

When servants are out of a situation they often take refuge till they find something to suit them in the lodgings provided by some registry offices. There they may have to sleep five or six in a room and two or three in a bed, but the price is low—about sixpence a night. But sensible girls will be slow to go to lodgings about whose respectability they are not quite certain, and about some registry offices the less said the better. Those who know their way about prefer when in difficulties to knock at the doors of such institutions as the Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants, the Young Women's Christian Association, and the Girls' Friendly Society. An account of the Servants' Home in connection with the Young Women's Christian Association was given in one of our numbers for January by our valued contributor Miss Anne Beale.

Many foreign girls have found a welcome oasis in the desert of London in Gordon House, one of the Homes for working girls which was founded for the purpose of receiving young women who had come from Germany for domestic service in England.

Amongst the difficulties of working girls not the least are those connected with eating and drinking. Certainly in nothing has the metropolis advanced so much within the last few years as in the facilities it affords for obtaining good food, well cooked, and at moderate prices. But the real obstacle in the path is the empty pocket. Many, because of their miserable earnings, have to be contented with the commonest and scantiest food, and lead lives of semi-starvation. What sort of fare can be had, say, by a mantle finisher who, when fully employed, can earn only eight shillings a week after providing her own cotton and needles?

So far as wages are concerned, girls run small chance of hurting their constitutions by eating either too liberally or too daintily. But the injury to the bodily system arises in other ways. Working girls forget that when the requirements of health have to be satisfied on a very small sum, great judgment in the selection of food must be exercised. It won't do, for one thing, to drink tea to excess; indeed, for girls with narrow finances if the teapot were thrown out of the window and the porridge pot made to reign in its stead, they would be happier and healthier beyond telling.

Girls in lodgings often find it a cheap and excellent plan to do their own cooking, and, by means of a little cooking stove burning mineral oil, this can easily be accomplished. Such stoves are now made to great perfection and cost only a few shillings; they are easily carried anywhere; the oil gives no smell; they burn at marvellously small expense, and when the cooking is over it is a simple thing to put out the fire.

By way of furnishing an encouraging example, we may quote from the autobiography of James Nasmyth, the famous engineer. When Nasmyth came to London he had only ten shillings a week, and he resolved, he tells us, that his wages should maintain him in food and lodging. He therefore directed his attention to economical living. "In order," he says, "to keep within my weekly income, I bought the raw materials and cooked them in my own way and to my own taste." He got a little stove made by a tinsmith; but in these days there is no necessity for that. "I put the meat," he goes on to say, "in the pot with the other comestibles at nine o'clock in the morning. It simmered away all day until half-past six in the evening, when I came home with a healthy appetite to enjoy my dinner. . . .

"The meat I generally cooked in it was leg of beef, with sliced potato, bits of onion chopped down, and a modicum of white pepper and salt, with just enough water to cover the elements. When stewed slowly the meat became very tender, and the whole yielded a capital dish which a very Soyer might envy. It was partaken of with a zest that, no doubt, was a very important element in its savouriness. The whole cost of this capital dinner was about fourpence halfpenny. I sometimes varied the meat with rice boiled with a few raisins and a pennyworth of milk."

It has been said that the passion for dress in women is like that for drink in men. How it is satisfied on the low wages of working girls constitutes one of the mysteries which meet the inquirer at many points of our present subject. Too often it takes the direction of indulgence in cheap finery and pinchbeck jewellery, and many a girl may be seen hurrying to business with imitation diamond earrings—"only a shilling"—and with feathers, flowers, and ribbons that in proportion are no higher priced. And all this outside show, too, whilst not improbably her underclothing will not bear inspection, and her boots are in the last stage of decrepitude.

Sometimes the decorative tendency even leads girls into what for them is a ruinous expenditure. Take the craving for ostrich feathers which is common among very many classes of factory operatives in the metropolis. "A girl," says Mr. David F. Schloss, writing of women's work and wages, "who has not attained to the coveted dignity of an ostrich feather (Indicium atque insigne fortuna, as Cicero says of the golden bulla of the Roman nobles) is esteemed of small account by her comrades. The cost of one of these highly prized decorations is never less than 4s. (the price of a very inferior specimen) and runs as high as 17s. The necessary amount of self-denial requisite to their purchase is in many cases supplied—as the present writer has ascertained—by elaborate machinery in the form of 'feather clubs' with weekly contributions, like those of that well-known institution among the working classes, the 'goose club.'"

The instinct for making oneself attractive is not to be run down. Love of dress may be wrong, but regard for it and attention to it are certainly praiseworthy. Let every girl then try to go tastefully clad. But there are one or two points she ought never to lose sight of. For one thing, dress should suit one's occupation. It should be of the quietest possible colour and of a really serviceable material, something that will stand brushing or washing. There is not the least need for its being in the fashion. "Better out of the world than out of the fashion" is a maxim that has nothing whatever to do with the industrious.

In many businesses girls have to appear what is called "respectable," and that is to be done by taste and simplicity, both of which are cheap, and not by tawdry attempts at personal adornment, which only get people laughed at. A clean collar is really better than all the lockets, brooches, clasps, and buckles in the world, and a dress can hardly be called shabby that is neat and spotless, without holes, and complete in the way of buttons. If low-priced finery is put on to hide poverty it completely fails in that object and only makes it more glaring, not to speak of the ridiculous spectacle it presents when it grows dragged, limp, and faded. The true method for looking respectable, and charming into the bargain, is to wear the ornaments of neatness and simplicity.

So long as wages are at a point which provides for nothing but bare subsistence, we can hardly expect working girls to do anything in the way of saving. People cannot be saving who have nothing to be saving with, and the problem of keeping soul and body together to-day often leaves neither time nor spirit for solving questions about how to live to-morrow. In a few cases girls who have acquired the difficult art of managing money in microscopic quantities put by a little in the Savings Bank against a rainy day, but they are quite exceptions.

It does not happen, however, that even with wretched pittance saving is impossible. We have just seen what girls can do when bent on ornamenting themselves with ostrich feathers, and we remember the case of two dressmakers' assistants, who by painful effort saved up a considerable sum, which they spent in the hire of a carriage for a single day. In it they went to the Park and elsewhere, one of the conditions of the hiring being that whenever either of them addressed the coachman he was to touch his hat and say "My Lady!"

The Post Office, with its aids to thrift, is at everybody's door, and the benefits which are thus conferred on those inclined to make the future secure and comfortable, cannot be too widely known. In the Post Office a girl can invest her savings, insure her life, and lay up something to be an annuity in her old age. The terms, too, on which the business is conducted are frequently better than those of any private company, and the security is the best in the world. Even pence can be saved by means of the forms that are to be had at any Post Office, on which forms penny postage stamps can be fixed from time to time, and when there are twelve of them they are received by the Post Office as a Savings Bank deposit of a shilling.

Nothing gives a pleasanter feeling of independence than the knowledge that one has a few pounds at one's back in the Savings Bank. At any time the fluctuations of fashion, and many other causes, may throw a girl out of work, and unless she has saved something, what is she to do before finding new employment? There is a discipline, too, in thrift of a very valuable kind even when the income is of the smallest.

Something saved is handy also in the event of illness when the cost of medical advice has to be faced, for many have praiseworthy scruples about obtaining such advice gratis. A wise provision against ill-health is made in the Homes for Working Girls by means of a sick fund, which has proved a great success. Every resident in the Homes is required to contribute a penny a week towards this useful fund. In all cases of sickness medicine is supplied free for twenty-one days, and in the event of any resident being confined to the house on account of illness, a shilling a day is allowed for a period of not more than fourteen days.

It is not everyone who can convert illness into a profitable investment like a working girl we once met in London, who made her ill-health or pretended ill-health a means of obtaining many privileges which would otherwise have been denied her. She got on very well till one fine day when in a fainting fit one of her fellow workers was all of a sudden struck with an idea, capsized the smelling salts into her mouth, and exclaimed—

"Sally, you are shamming!"

The taste of the smelling salts made Sally forget her part, and she started to her feet spluttering rage and revenge. After that there was no more attempts to excite compassion by means of pretended ailments, and there is a moral in the incident for some girls if they have only cuteness to discover it.

(To be concluded.)

L O N E L Y .

BY AUGUSTA HANCOCK.

WHEN the ev'ning bells are ringing, ringing out their solemn chime,
And the mists creep o'er the valley in the peaceful, gloaming time, Comes the breath of wafted odours from the almond and the lime.

Comes a rush of memories stealing, stealing o'er my tired breast,
And the touch of loving fingers that mine own have softly pressed,
Now, indeed, in tender keeping, "where the weary are at rest."

Comes a dream of days far-fleeting, fleeting to the silent past,
Days of bright and golden sunshine, all too strangely sweet to last,
As the rainbow-tinted foam wreaths on the wave-washed shore upcast

Comes a voice in eager pleading, pleading, urging to the light, Saying, "Work while time is given; yonder, yonder cometh night,
And within the gates of heaven sadness melts in rapture bright."

ASCENSION DAY AT ST. JOHN'S SERVANTS' SCHOOL.

By ANNE BEALE.

ANY years ago a young lady just entering her teens said to her maid, "When I am grown up I will found a home, and you shall be the matron."

This prophecy was literally fulfilled. It was uttered by the late Lady Kinnaird, and we had the happiness of setting our small seal as witness of its fulfilment on Ascension Day last. Nearly half a century ago Lady Kinnaird did actually found St. John's Servants' School, and the faithful maid to whom she spoke those memorable words was its first matron. She began it with two children in 1842, and on Ascension Day of this year of grace, 1889, we see the result. It is the period of reunion of pupils, old and young, and all who have been educated at the school are sure of a warm welcome home on that day on which we celebrate the return of our dear Lord to His Father's kingdom.

The school is now situated near Westbourne Park Station, in Great Western Road, and is, therefore, easy of access. It has twice changed its locality, having originated in the parish of St. Andrew's, Holborn, whence it migrated to St. George-the-Martyr, and thence to its present site. When Lady Kinnaird succeeded in erecting the large and commodious building which is capable of housing 130 pupils, it was situated in the midst of fields, and might almost be said to have been in the country. Now it is surrounded by brick and mortar; albeit its friends still congratulate themselves on certain insular privileges, of which they cannot be deprived. The canal and railroad circle it like a belt, and prevent encroachments which might interfere with fresh air. Indeed, the said friends flatter themselves that the institution and playground form an island, and so healthy are the small embryo servants in this their water and steam-girdled kingdom that a home of health at Brighton has been given up. It is not, perhaps, universally known that a railroad brings with it fresh and dry air—we say nothing of its sounds.

But to return to Ascension Day, and the inmates and guests of the training home. In so doing we touch a chord of sadness. All the children, and most of the visitors, are in mourning. Striking and neat as is the costume of black gowns and white aprons worn by the former, it tells of a loss almost as irreparable to them as to the daughters of the foundress of the home, who mingle amongst them. The Dowager Lady Kinnaird was taken to a better and more permanent home, "even a heavenly," on the 1st December, 1888, and thus scarcely half a year has passed since she departed from amongst us. She was wont to consider Ascension Day one of the happiest of her year; and we cannot be surprised, because she then reaped the fruit of her labours. Of her manifold good works she loved this the best. Not even the Young Women's Christian Association, which she also founded, could afford her the pleasure of this her earliest philanthropic and Christian effort.

Over 1,500 children, varying in age from one to fifteen years, have been trained in this school, and it is strange and interesting to watch the gathering of pupils, old and new, in the large airy playground. The scholars of the past are accompanied, for the most part, by their offspring; while those of the present are vigorously going through wonderful gymnastic exercises, under the guidance of an expert teacher. It is pretty to see the little regiment of domestic soldiers perform all the evolutions of Swedish drill, and if their industrial training be equal to their physical, they will make very good servants indeed.

Amongst the onlookers are four middle-aged women, who were brought up at the school. Three of them are married, and have nearly grown-up children with them, who are watching the drill with great interest. All have held responsible positions in good families, and all unite in lamenting the absence of their benefactress, who "used to greet them so kindly year by year." Their regrets are touching tributes to the virtues of the departed.

Not less touching are those uttered by their youngsters; for all unite in testifying to the happy days spent in the school. Many of them are orphans, who look upon it as their home, and it is delightful to see the eager pleasure with which they greet one another. Arm-in-arm, or with arms circling one another's waist, they walk about the playground, discussing the past and present and all that has happened since they parted. Many of them, again, are mothers with babies in the arms; or, more truthfully to speak, in the arms of the Miss Kinnairds, who carry them from friend to friend for general admiration, playfully introducing them as their "grandchildren," their mothers having been their pupils for religious instruction.

It is a glorious day, and the skies smile upon our gathering. They could scarcely bestow their approval upon a more hopeful scene. Matron and teachers mingle with the cheerful crowd, and the representatives of the foundress of the institution are here, there, and everywhere, setting aside personal feeling and many memories, in ministering to the pleasure of others.

Comparative calm reigns while the drill proceeds; but tongues are well loosened when the large party assembles for tea. One side of the immense school and dining room is appropriated to the children, the other to the guests. The latter must number seventy or eighty, and they thoroughly enjoy themselves. "I feel at home again. I have no parents," says one interesting girl, "and I would rather be here than at service," another. But all look respectable, and one cannot be too thankful, in these ambitious times, to those who will thoroughly train girls for domestic service.

The pupils of St. John's School have come from all quarters, not only from the United Kingdom, but even from India and China. Many are daughter of sailors, thankful to place their children in safe custody while themselves away on the broad seas. Another sad chord is touched by one such as we wander through the large, airy dormitories. In a private room containing only three or four beds, lies a little girl, dying of consumption. She is the daughter of a sailor, who died of the same insidious malady. Her mother is by her bedside, and on a small table are portions of the feast prepared for her companions below. "This is my last child," says the poor mother, "the others have all gone, like their father, of consumption." It is very sad, but the little girl has every comfort—friends, medical advice, and the presence of her mother. Two-thirds of the pupils from the commencement of the school have been orphaned of one or both parents, and when, as in the case of the dear child now passing away, it has been the father, the mother has been able to pursue some avocation, while her child or children are trained and cared for in the school.

Of course the parent or friends pay for this, as it is no charity school. Still it is scarcely self-supporting, since £18 a year will not educate, clothe, and board a pupil, and it is hoped that the kind donations and subscriptions of friends will not diminish with the lamented death of the foundress. To quote from the last report. "The managers feel deeply the grave responsibility which rests upon them to carry on the school in the same spirit and in the same admirable manner, which has been the outcome of so much prayer and effort. They ask for the continued support of old and valued friends, and for the co-operation of any who would desire to see the school efficiently worked."

Amongst these six "managers" we read the names of the three daughters and daughter-in-law of the departed foundress, while her son, the Lord Kinnaird, is hon. treasurer, and one of her daughters, the Hon. Gertrude Kinnaird, is hon. secretary. Let us be thankful that they walk in the steps of parents who "went about doing good."

We go about seeing good on this bright Ascension Day. There is a "Poet's Corner" in Westminster Abbey, and at our institution there is a "Pupil's Corner." In each dormitory we remark a curtained corner appropriated to those who have attained the rank of pupil teachers. Here, on a tiny table, are many treasures. Photographs and ornaments, gathered during a brief tenure of life and office, and showing to admiring neighbours what industry and perseverance may effect. They have certainly effected much here, for from well-ventilated dormitories to school-rooms, kitchen, lavatories, playground, and what not, all breathes of work. It is truly a school for industrial training, and servants of all denominations are taught the useful and invaluable arts which shall make of them respectable members of the commonwealth. If girls only knew what was best for them, they would qualify themselves for domestic service, instead of scorning it, and striving after what they cannot attain.

Returning to the large tea-party after our tour through the house, we find the meal virtually finished, while the buzz of conversation increases. The old scholars make the most noise, and scarcely know how to enjoy their day enough. The children are comparatively quiet, and doubtless envy their elders their unbridled delight. Their turn comes when grace has been sung, and they appropriate the flowers that have adorned the tables, pinning them into every available corner of their frocks or aprons. One tiny mite has secured a purple rhododendron, and we help her to insert it into the bib of her white apron. Very proud she is when it is so placed, and very happy they all appear as they march off to another scene.

Ascension Day closes, as it should, with prayer and praise. The pupils sing hymns, and their spiritual pastors address them. The neighbouring clergy are most kind in aiding this excellent work, and several are present. We think of the good seed sown, and how it must have ripened during all these years. We think of the various means employed to bring the girls to a "saving knowledge" of Jesus Christ their Lord, and while thinking, try to realise what these means are. "Above all, we seek for the true conversion of the children," said Lady Kinnaird, and to aid in this, ladies hold Bible classes, and keep the members of them in view when they have left the school.

They are invited to join the St. John's branch of the Young Women's Christian Association, receive a monthly letter, and are otherwise reminded of their early teaching. Most of the girls belong to the Scripture Union, and cannot easily forget how they read their daily portion, joined in family prayer, and were brought up "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Neither are they likely to forget the hour spent every week in working for some missionary or charitable object, when they learn experimentally to help those who are less fortunate than themselves.

Some sceptical reader will exclaim, "Charity begins at home." So it does here; for the girls make all their own clothes and outfits for service; which proves to a demonstration that time may be found in the busiest day for helping our neighbours. And what with house-work, tending the little ones, keeping up to the awful educational "Standards," laundry work, etc., etc., the pupils of St. John's Training School have a very busy day indeed! And as to the teachers—well, they must be busier still.

They all thrive upon it, nevertheless, so it is not work that kills, and to judge from the embraces of teachers and taught, the fervent welcomes and somewhat sad farewells, they have had a happy time together, despite "laborious days."

And we certainly have all had a happy Ascension Day, from the morning service in church to the afternoon gathering, and the evening addresses, singing, and games—a day not to be forgotten. Perhaps the most notable feature of it has been the mourning garb of the large party and the regrets that have mingled with the mirth. Indeed, some few of the elders find mirth impossible, and confide to us that the blank left by the absence of the one who had been the guiding-star of the establishment for nearly fifty years, could scarcely be filled for them. "Perhaps she is with us in spirit," is, however, the feeling of some; and we all understand, as we watch the scene, the meaning of the text, "and their works do follow them." May the children of the Christian lady who from childhood devoted her life to the service of her Divine Lord, have strength given them to carry on these works and to increase them as they are already striving to do. The motto of their house is Certa Cruce Salus—"Sure salvation by the cross"—and they need no safer watchword.

CHAPTER XXII.

A "BALM OF HURT MINDS."

DEATH had not before, within Kitty's consciousness, come and touched her best beloved, so Jack's death was an overwhelming blow to her. She was little more than eighteen, and he was her only brother, while sister and mother she had none. She was so stricken that it seemed as if the whole world had come to a standstill for her, as if she could have no future in this world with her Jackie gone hence without her, even as the outlines of her past were washed out in tears.

The first thing which roused Kitty was the sense of her father's sorrow, inarticulate at first. She awoke from her dreary apathy of extreme crushing grief, to seek to creep nearer to him, to venture to show him her silent, piteous sympathy, to try to minister tenderly to him in a hundred ways, in which Mrs. Judy, faithful, afflicted soul that she was, could not approach him. Kitty would prove to Dr. Dacre that though in this life he had lost a son, he had still a daughter. Jack had taken the great step which divides the mortal from the immortal, and carries the wayfarer into infinitely vaster fields of God's universe, and if all is well with him, into an awful, unspeakable increase of nearness to the Great White Throne, where none left behind, however near and dear, can follow him. But Kitty was still beside her father, close to him, linked to him more than ever by that strong link of their common sorrow in addition to their common love, able to commune with him as he was able to commune with her.

This was the first lever to raise the mountain-load of heavy grief. Then in God's gracious economy there were other levers given her, which Kitty, in her dutifulness to God and her father, and the trained reasonableness which balanced her warm, constant affection, was qualified to use, as no man or woman of ill-regulated temper and unbalanced unreasonableness would have had the smallest chance of doing. Kitty could take the levers into her trembling young hands, and employ the weapons so as to free herself from the dark prison-house of inordinate mourning. She let in the light of God's hopeful, eternal word, and His no less hopeful world with its golden sunshine, its green earth, renewed year by year, and its myriads of kindly, natural influences for healing to the broken in heart and the bruised in spirit.

Kitty could not do it all at once or without many a pang. For it was one thing to believe with her whole heart, soul, and spirit that her brother would rise again, and that it was well with him; though it was only by an aching stretch of her poor human faculties that she could imagine confusedly and gropingly where he was now, what he was, how he was employed. And it was quite another thing to know in happy confidence that he was alive and well on this earth with her, on her own level, ready to come to her next month, or at the farthest with the new year, or at Easter or midsummer, as circumstances would permit.

Kitty could not at first and for a long time attain to the patient resignation of Mrs. Judy, who had grown accustomed by long use and wont to the trials of life. She took them almost as a matter of course, even when her motherly heart was aching most sorely for her nursing, her bright and eager Master Jackie, of whom she had secretly prophesied great things, who was to have been a still more notable scholar than was Dr. Dacre.

Kitty could but feel after the humble thankfulness which, with the woman's inveterate habit of looking round and discovering how God could be praised in all circumstances, lay at the root of Mrs. Judy's cheerful philosophy. It caused her again and again to bring forward what a good, what a blessed thing it was that Master Jackie had taken it upon him, out of his own head, in his integrity and natural affection, to pay that short visit home when he had come into Oxford to see about the exchange of prisoners. What a merciful thing it was, to be sure, that they had seen him once again! And did not Mrs. Kitty remember how pleasant and delightful the dear lad, who had grown so fine a young man, had been that windy March afternoon, and how he had departed after evening prayers at peace with all? What a terrible trial, how infinitely worse it would have been if his father and he had not met this once again, been reconciled, and spoken good words like gentlemen and Christians! Master Jackie might have fallen in the beginning of the war, when the last speech he and Dr. Dacre had held together was full of cruel strife and fierce contention.

Kitty had but a vague consciousness how absolutely glad she would be one day that the hands of loving friends prepared Jack for his rest. Prissy Walton and her mother washed his wounds, smoothed his locks, and crossed his arms on his breast in the attitude of one who is watching and waiting; Alice strewed rosemary on his pillow Anthony lifted him into his coffin.

Another privilege was granted to John Dacre's friends. By dint of urgent representation and private favour, with which few would have found the heart, even if they had possessed the knowledge in time, to interfere, the coffin was brought by night within the range of the sentries, into the village of St. Clement's, near to the east gate of the beleaguered city, and laid down before the wicket by the lodge of Magdalen. The gate was opened, and the sad burden found its way into a vault beneath Magdalen Chapel. Kitty never saw her brother's face again in this world. She was not even present at the hurried darkling ceremony, the last in which he was destined to figure here. But she knew that he slept within the walls of his college, which he had loved, under the pavement of the chapel in which he and Anthony Walton had sat many a time side by side, listening to the sweet voices of the choristers, contending for mastery with the thrushes in the early summer mornings. Or there the lads had heartily prayed for spiritual light in the dusky twilight of the November afternoons. The true light which his father had asked for Jack had come to him, and whereas he had only seen men as trees walking, now all wisdom was clear to him.

People may ask why the dust of women and soldiers is to be found in the old sanctuary of monks and scholars? But exclusiveness has its limits; women have been buried in the narrow quarters reserved for men, and John Dacre is not the only man of war among the men of peace; witness young William Harrison of Balls in Exeter Chapel.

When Kitty got a letter from Anthony Walton about Jack's death, she cried so bitterly over it, that it might have struck a shortsighted onlooker it had only served to hurt her, while in reality it was one of her greatest consolations.

"Dear Cousin Kitty," Anthony wrote in blurred characters, "I could not save him for you and his father; would God I could! Mayhap if I had been a soldier I might have been at dear Jack's side and done something; I cannot tell. But I deemed it better in the beginning—with what struggle and constraint I need not trouble you—to bide still at Islip Barnes. I wot all men have something of the fighting cock in them, and, I methinks, a bigger than ordinary share. Yet it seemed a plain obligation, which only idle vanity and a restless spirit could set aside, that I, the sole man in the household, with poor mother weak and ailing, and Prissy and Alice young and unprotected, should rest content with being Squire of Islip Barnes, and lending what counsel and help a civilian could furnish. Jack owned no such obligation, and he reckoned that as he was cut off from his natural vocation and his people, he was called to fight for the liberties of himself and his fellow-countrymen. How difficult it was for him, fresh from his desk and his books, to accept and take to a camp life, with all its roughing and hardship, it were but pain to recall, unless to lend additional lustre to the fact that he never faltered or complained; he did his duty as a soldier, manfully, and he grew in mental as well as in bodily stature under the discipline. It could not be otherwise, since he was doing his best under whatever hard conditions. I know not that he had any underlying inclination and aptitude for a soldier's life, such as some gentlemen have developed in these times, and so it hath been made easier for them. Beyond a man's courage and that fighting spirit which is more or less in all our sex, I know not that he was a born soldier; while I do know that, like Falkland, your brother had a great sorrow and horror wrought in him by the spectacle of the havoc and outrages of war. His heart on one side was as tender and gracious as a woman's; and so the more honour to him, say I, that he set his face sternly to do the right in fighting when fighting was called for. Kitty, John Dacre had a very sensitive, no less than a sweet and noble nature, and it seemeth to me that he could not, brave as he was, have gone through a prolonged experience of this troubled life of ours without much shrinking and suffering. For there are enemies within and without, and a man's outward enemies are often very savages to him in their incapacity to fathom his thoughts and feelings. Jack had to pass through one ordeal which cost him dear; will you grudge that, by God's grace, he hath grown soon ripe and gone early to reap his reward? Cousin Kitty, I am in great anxiety of mind about some who are dear to us, which I have nought to do to mention to you, at this moment, thus heaping sorrow on sorrow on your dear bowed head; but I would have thee take this as one more proof that life is not so full of peace and happiness, so unclouded in its promise, that we should clamour to keep it either for ourselves or those we love. Oh! when will this woeful struggle be ended? already it hath lasted four years of bloodshed, ruin to trade and agriculture, hardening of men's hearts against their fellows. Yet no terms are come to or even broached, such as would bring satisfaction to both sides, and lasting tranquillity to the country. The conclusion of the whole matter is as far off as when we started. Jack died like a gallant Christian soldier, with a prayer on his lips and his sword in his hand. He fell for the cause he believed to be right, in the thickest of the fight, with his face to the foe, doing what he could to bring the war to a speedy termination. I hear tell that his death is much lamented by his companions-in-arms and his superior officers, as well it may be. It were a mighty difference to die the death of a traitor, condemned by both sides, with none to understand and make allowance, and even to find ground for approval and admiration, save one or two wrong hearts; but I say no more.

"Your faithful cousin and servant,
"ANTHONY WALTON."

Kitty, though she had cried like a child over this letter when she read it first, would have gone on to cherish it as one of her most precious possessions; but having ventured to show it to her father, he took it from her and stored it away where no eye but his could read it. She could only blame herself for grudging it to him, because it was plain he dwelt upon it and learned it by heart. Among the new impressions she received, which struck Kitty as something she could not quite understand, was the mournful pride which her father took in poor Jack's gallantry, though it had been displayed on what Dr. Peter Dacre still and always held to be the wrong side in the Civil War. The part Jack had played as a soldier seemed to assume a greater prominence and worth in the old man's eyes, even than the dead lad's promise as a student, though on that too, when he spoke at all on the subject, Dr. Dacre was disposed to insist with piteous pertinacity, "a rare scholar would my son have been if he had been spared—a youth who, after the rust of four years' adverse circumstances, could still construe as he did, and descant with enthusiasm on the merits of his author, would have been a credit to his college and university, there cannot be two opinions on that score; but God's will be done." Then he would turn, and pacing up and down, enlarge with still more glowing, faltering earnestness on the heroic elements in Jack's death. "In the thick of the fight, with his face to the enemy—thy poor brother—my brave lad! The boy did always show himself fearless and ready to hold his own, if need were; though 'twas the sweetest temper that ever a miserable man drove desperate."

Kitty could only conjecture it was the fighting spirit which had so long lain dormant in the quiet scholar that had come in touch with the soldier's rôle Jack had filled faithfully, and responded to it. Or could it be that Dr. Peter Dacre had learnt to see that there may be two sides to a question, and supposing they are in violent conflict, he who strikes home for his side, and most quickly decides the day, is to be commended, not censured? John Dacre had not died as the fool dieth.

Lady Ottery took Kitty in hand that grief-laden spring, and sought to win her from absorption in her bereavement. Lady Ottery was one of John Dacre's sincerest mourners. "That an old dry stock like me should be spared, and the young tree, full of sap for future years, be cut down in its glory and strength!" she was tempted to cry. But none knew better than Dame Tabitha that God's ways are not as man's ways. Like Mrs. Judy, the old lady had not lived to grey hairs without taking it to heart and consenting to it meekly. Man's heritage on earth is not peace but strife, not success but disappointment, not unbroken smiles but many a salt tear. And it is not everyone who learns without a hard apprenticeship that there is a rainbow radiance in the tears, and a grand lasting delight beyond all the small fleeting pleasures of self-indulgence, in the toil and the drudgery, in the very defeat which can never be utter and final, seeing it is incurred in fighting the great Master's battle, in doing the behests of the mighty Maker of the Universe.

For it is a goodly world, notwithstanding its crosses, with joys as deep as its sorrows are heavy—a world full of glorious possibilities, of God-given pledges, which if not fulfilled here will be redeemed yonder; a world as full of beauty as are the angelic spheres, which every good man and woman thanks God for having created, and is humbly grateful to have entered.

But if the heritage of trouble which is inseparably bound up with the heritage of bliss comes not soon, it will come late; while the shoulder which has borne the yoke in its youth, will fit itself early to the burden, will learn to bear it loyally, nay, cheerfully, and will be qualified to welcome with an adoring heart every halt in the green pastures by the still waters, every ray of sunshine, as a foretaste of the good land—the pilgrim's rest.

Lady Ottery sought to rouse Kitty Dacre to the fact of the heavy afflictions of others, to draw her out to relieve them as the best antidote to her own melancholy. There was young merry Madam Fanshawe, to whom Kitty had taken a fancy when they were girl-companions, whom she had stolen forth to find and warn the day she, Kitty, was caught in the great fire. Eighteen months ago Ann Harrison had come to Oxford, a sprightly girl, unawakened to the seriousness of life, with hardly a care beyond her half-assumed fits of petulance at having to exchange, in company with her family, the manor-house of Balls for the lodging over the baker's shop and her father's liberal table, with the good clothes to which she and her sister had been used, for one meal a day and scanty changes of wardrobe. A year ago Kitty had been at Ann Harrison's marriage in Wolvercot Church, when even in her mourning for her young brother, a happy bride had vowed to love, honour, and obey the man of her heart—the noble gentleman whom above all others she admired. Now Mrs. Fanshawe was lying, sick and solitary, in her poor lodging, her husband unable to be with her in her hour of trial, her newborn baby sobbing out its last breath, her father and sister in such straits themselves that they could do little to relieve the poverty which, in the midst of the other evils, was pressing hard upon the young mother.

Kitty hastened to her friend to help to nurse her dying infant, and heard her tell how Dick Fanshawe—mature, dignified man that he was—had wept to leave his wife and child in such a plight. Then the ailing woman would gather up all her strength to sing his praises. How patient he had been with her girlish follies, how long-suffering to her ignorance and indiscretion! How she had been set upon by some of the elder matrons among the fine-lady meddlers and mischief-makers in politics still at Oxford, to worm out of her husband his State secrets, and retail them for the benefit of the fantastic plots of these ladies and their like-minded allies! He had first sought to stop her mouth with kisses; then when she pouted and pretended to believe he did not love her because he would not confide to her the contents of a certain packet which he had to lay before the Council, he had remonstrated with her very gravely, but still with the utmost gentleness and kindness. He had used such words as these: "My dear life, all the secrets of my heart are yours; it is my pride and happiness to confide them to you, but I cannot impart to thee the secrets of my master and the nation. That were to hand over to thee property which is not mine to give, and to betray trust as no man of honour would betray it, base conduct for which thou wouldst be the first to hold me in scorn."

"Ah! Mrs. Kitty Dacre, was there ever such another?" protested Madam Fanshawe, proud and happy in the middle of her doleful case.

"I think my Jackie might have been like him if God had spared him to us," cried Kitty, with a gush of softened tears. She was able to go out of herself, and take a friendly interest in Mrs.

Fanshawe's precarious circumstances. She spared a tear for the babe of a day, though she said, shaking her young head with somewhat morbid, grandmotherly wisdom, which was not like sound-minded Kitty, that the little innocent was well away out of a woeful world.

Kitty was glad when, the first time Madam Fanshawe was able to go abroad to church, a friend of her husband's brought her fifty gold pieces which he had sent her. And when the farther good news came of the arrival of two of his men with horses, to carry her and her father and sister to join him at Bristol, Kitty could not sit churlishly apart, nursing her own sore grief. She could not refuse to rejoice a little with her friend, and to go with her in that first walk she had taken for many a day in St. John's Gardens. As the couple paced the turf there, looking up at the beautiful window of the library in which Archbishop Laud was wont to sit, and speaking of what changes had occurred since the play of the "Hospital of Lovers" was acted in the hall, and the child Kitty had been fascinated by the horrible story of Master William Prynn's cropped ears, drums were heard beating in the highway under the wall. Sir John Harrison came hurrying up to join his daughter and Kitty, and tell them it was Sir Charles Lee and his company of foot passing by. The ladies climbed a mound of earth in the garden as best they could, to see the soldiers, whose leader, recognising the Harrisons, caused his men to fire a parting volley in their honour. But the muskets were loaded, and a stray ball passing over Ann Fanshawe's head, had well-nigh deprived Dick Fanshawe of his faithful helpmate.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

L. A. W.—We think that it would be worth your while to apply to Miss Jessie Deedes, 120, Ebury Street, S.W., for a pamphlet on the Lower Branches of Industrial Work, published by the East London Organising Committee of the Girls' Friendly Society. It will give you some hints as to many branches of light work, as, for example, card box-making, envelope folding and gumming, clay pipe-making, babies' boot-making, cigarette-making, packing fruit and sweetmeats, silk-sorting and skeining, etc. Miss Deedes could give you addresses.

D. B. (Hungary).—We think you had better get Dr. Angus' "Handbook of the English Tongue," published at our office. Apply for it to Mr. Tarn, 56, Paternoster Row, E.C. The best style of English handwriting is small, round, and slightly sloping from left to right; no very long spidery tops and tails, and no sharp angles. We thank you for your kind appreciative letter and good wishes, which we cordially reciprocate.

EDITH W. C., matron, North Eastern Hospital for Children, Goldsmith Row, Hackney Road, E. According to your desire we name the fact that no pupils will be wanted for nearly two years, and that they are not received for a less term than three years.

FANNY.—The address of the Sloyd Association of Great Britain and Ireland, for training the eye and hand, with the view of developing the intellectual and artistic powers, such as they may be, in the student, is 106, Great Portland Street. Apply to the superintendent or lady principal.

ANXIOUS ONE.—The National Art Training School is at South Kensington, S.W. Address Miss Trulock, lady superintendent (or the secretary), Science and Art Department.

A. S. O. E.—If you really desired information as to the qualifications required in a Zenana missionary, and the steps to be taken by a competitor for such an appointment, you would have spent half an hour in looking through our multitudinous answers to similar questions under the above heading. One or two qualifications essential in a missionary you certainly have not got, i.e., good temper, good manners, and patience. Apply to Miss Webb, secretary of the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East, in Zenanas, Harems, and Schools, 267, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

EVELYN B.—The salaries of female librarians vary from six shillings weekly to £50 per annum; but the vacancies are very few indeed.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HILDA.—The wholesomest bed is a hair mattress resting on an iron bedstead with wire netting. To lie on a feather-bed in winter would do no harm perhaps; but a hair mattress and a feather duvet as an upper covering (instead of additional blankets) would be preferable. Wool mattresses are not to be recommended, and straw ones are too hard to be agreeable. Your writing is legible and good for manuscript writing; but for correspondence a small graceful "running hand," with well-formed letters, is more suitable, long spidery tops and tails being avoided.

CHERRY BLOSSOM is our second inquirer for some method of "getting the green of her teeth." (She should have bestowed a second "f" to her "of.") We are perfectly inexperienced as to the existence of "green on the teeth," but advise our young friend to give her teeth a good brushing with powdered and prepared charcoal, to be had at any chemist's. Should that fail in removing the stain she should go to a dentist.

HOUSEKEEPER.—It is not usual to rise from your chair when a man shakes hands with you at an evening reception (at least, scarcely rise) unless at home and receiving or helping the hostess to receive guests. Always subscribe yourself "sincerely," "faithfully" (in business letters), or "affectionately yours;" or if writing to members of your own immediate family, always name your relationship—daughter, sister, or niece. The rules of good breeding claim it of you—not to say affection. The other question is an enigma, owing to an illegibly written word. How could you "set a sponge?" You could "set" a trap, or "set" a drawing, or "set" an example; but you then speak of "baking" the article, and we are quite mystified!

ARDENT ADMIRER OF THE "G.O.P."—Jane Taylor was a daughter of Isaac Taylor; was a writer for young people; born September 23rd, 1783; died April, 13th, 1824. Published "Hymns for Infant Minds," 1807, "Essays in Rhyme on Morals and Manners," 1816, "Display," 1815. We think that this must be the writer to whom you refer.

F. H. K.—The passage to which you refer (St. Luke xiv. 33), is one which we have often explained. Our Saviour was preaching to Jews, His countrymen and women, who, as a nation, rejected Him. To confess Him was to be cast out of the synagogue, and out of home, too, in most cases. Thus in such times of persecution, the convert had to make a choice between Christ, and friends, relatives, home, bread, reputation, and life itself. So it was amongst heathen converts. In the present day, and in a Christian country, no such forsaking of family and home and life are required of you.

GRACE.—We are sorry to find from your letter that you are so low-spirited. Do not think so much of yourself. There are twenty-five "I's" in a very short note; perhaps that shows what the true ailment is, i.e., too much self.

MY LIFE IN JERUSALEM.

By CONSTANCE M. FINN.

JERUSALEM AND THE MOUNT OF OLIVES FROM SCOPUS.

HE first few hours of my life were spent in a canvas tent, which was pitched under an old olive tree, one of a grove on the north side of the city of Jerusalem.

What could be more interesting or romantic for the beginning of one's life?

Till lately a great many people scarcely seemed to realise that the Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Bethany, and other places one has read of all one's life in the Bible, are places in which one can live and have daily occupations, as in other countries; but for nearly thirteen years I lived as a child in and near Jerusalem, and I should like to tell you some of the things I remember very well, and with so much pleasure.

Though we spoke English, and in many ways lived as English children would live anywhere else, there were many things round us very different to what you would see in most countries.

To begin with the houses. They were nearly all built of stone, with domed roofs or flat terraces, upon which you could walk in the cool of the evening. One of the houses we lived in is a fair specimen of the rest, so I will try to describe it to you. When you got inside the hall door you would have been surprised to find yourself still in the open air, and not in a covered passage; for instead of the passages and stairs being shut in under the same roof as the rest of the house, they were quite open to the sky. You generally would find yourself in a square courtyard, and all the sitting-rooms opening out of it. This is very cool and pleasant in summer, and we were able to have plants and trees just outside the doors of the rooms.

Outside the dining-room door we had a white jasmine, and over my bedroom, opening into the same courtyard, was trained a beautiful passion flower tree, and scattered about in different parts were pots or wooden boxes, containing all kinds of sweet scented plants, sweet basil, mignonette, pinks, etc.

Sometimes the whole courtyard was covered in by wooden lattice work, stretching from side to side, and a vine or some creeper growing over it; but that was not the case in some of the houses.

These arrangements were very pleasant in hot weather, but I think you who are accustomed to nice warm houses and nurseries or schoolrooms would scarcely have liked it so well in winter, when the rain and snow came down. Now I can fancy that you will be surprised at my speaking of snow in Jerusalem, for you will suppose that in that Eastern climate we ought not to have it. We very seldom had it on the plains, but if you study a map and books about the Holy Land, or go there yourself some day, you will find that Jerusalem stands nearly 3,000 feet above the Mediterranean Sea level, quite on the top of the chain of mountains which is continued from Lebanon (or the "white" mountain, as its name means), and that some of the heights of Lebanon are 10,000 feet above the sea, and covered with perpetual snow. You will find it a very interesting thing to look out for all the texts in the Bible which speak of the climate and products of the Holy Land from the very beginning to the end. There are a great number in the Psalms, and more than you imagine in the other books of the Bible.

It is a wonderful country for its variations of climate, from snow in Lebanon to tropical heat in the plains and valleys, and you will therefore find allusions to snow and ice, as well as to extreme heat, and mention of trees and plants which need one or the other.

But the winter in Jerusalem never lasts very long; the natives have no word to express a season like our word winter; they only speak of "the rains." These begin generally in November and end in March, and we have no such thing as a fog. Nor do we ever have ice thick enough to skate upon. Snowstorms come down heavily sometimes, and you may see Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives covered with white; but the sun soon comes out and melts away the snow, and you seem to have spring again. I daresay you would not like one thing which happened to us every winter, and that was that if snow fell in the night after we had gone to bed we could not get down to breakfast in the morning till someone came to dig a way for us, as the steps were snowed over as one long slide. And if it was snowing or raining we had to wrap ourselves in cloaks and waterproofs and to carry umbrellas. I should not like it now, but I remember thinking it great fun to be wrapped up and carried to bed at night, and also to see the dinner brought up on a tray which was covered with a piece of oilcloth to keep the food from being spoiled on its way from the kitchen to the dining-room, the servant who carried it being wrapped in a native overcoat, with a hood over his head, which he left just inside the door with his overshoes. Sometimes the tray came in quite white with the snow. We had no open fireplaces in the sitting-rooms or bedrooms, or any coal, but we used American stoves, in which wood was burnt, and charcoal in the kitchen for cooking. The wood was not in chips or sticks, but fragments of immense roots of forest trees, dug out of the hillsides in the country, and brought by the peasantry in camel loads to Jerusalem.

I do not remember much of what we had to eat and drink, except that we ate less meat, more rice, plenty of olives and honey, fewer potatoes, and a great deal more fruit than here in England. We seldom had jam, and the butter was made of goat's milk, and this we could only get for about four months in the year. Beef we seldom had, but mutton, goat's and kid's flesh, and fowls.

There were no bells in the rooms by means of which to summon the servants, so we had to call or clap our hands outside the door. Our servants were of all nations. The men were sometimes Greek Christians, Mahomedans, or sometimes Abyssinian Christians. These latter were gentle, obedient, and affectionate men, who only became servants to English families till they had earned enough to take them back to their own country, from which they had come as pilgrims to see the holy city, so dear to all Eastern Christians. They were brown or black, but not the jet black of negroes, and their skin and features were very delicate and refined.

Our cooks were generally women, also Christians, and natives of Bethlehem; and our nurses were often Spanish Jewesses. One, however, was a native Arab Christian woman, whose kindness and devotion to us will never be forgotten. She was one of the sweetest and gentlest women I have ever seen, then or since. Our groom was an Egyptian and a Mahomedan; a good old fellow, and very kind to the creatures under his charge; but his great fault was opium smoking, which made him sometimes very stupid.

We had to learn a little of each of their languages in order to speak to them, and I remember once teaching an Abyssinian servant some French sentences, which he wrote down in his note-book in his own characters, and then he taught me some Abyssinian words, which I am sorry to say I have quite forgotten. We often saw him with his Psalter in his hands, and heard him chanting or reciting the Psalms.

All our servants were extremely respectful and kind, and most of them very clean. One Spanish Jewess that we had as nurse, I remember now by the soapy smell of her calico dress, as well as her kind face and gentle voice. On festival days they generally had on some gay dress, which we admired very much. With the Christians this was at Easter, or as they call it "the great feast;" the Mahomedan feast of Ramadan was not fixed, and the Jewesses brought us thin flat unleavened cakes at Passover-time; they, poor creatures, were too poor to buy beautiful clothes such as the others wore, and instead of jewels in their hair, there were often real flowers, which many people think are the best jewellery. There are some Jewesses in Jerusalem who are well off, but they are few; the majority are in a fearful state of poverty and distress.

The Arab builders of the houses had a quaint way of inserting china plates in the roof and walls of some of the rooms. Our drawing-room ceiling in the last house we lived in was ornamented with blue-and-white willow-pattern plates fixed in the mortar. The view from the windows of this drawing-room was a very beautiful one, right across the whole city—the Mount of Olives behind, and the mountains of Moab in the far distance. Our stables at the back of the house were formed of the best part of a ruin called Goliath's Castle, close to the city wall. I should have told you that Jerusalem is enclosed by a very fine and very interesting stone wall, in which there are four gateways, out of which you must go if you wish to get into the country. These gates were always closed and locked at sunset, but I am told that now one is left open at night for the convenience of travellers, but a sentry is always watching at it, day and night. On Friday for an hour in the middle of the day the gates are closed while the sentries, who are Mahomedans, go and worship in their Mosque.

There were few days that we children missed our afternoon ride into the country. Our lessons were learnt and said in the morning, and it depended on how we got through them, and how we had behaved, whether our ride was long or short, or whether we were allowed to dismount and pick wild flowers or not.

You may wonder what lessons we learnt, and I can only tell you that we used Markham and Mangnall, wrote copies, and did sums like any of you, and many a cry have I had over Mayor's spelling-book.

We had two donkeys on which we rode—Jerry and Gipsy. Jerry was a beautiful creature; he had been brought from Egypt (where they have the best donkeys), and was of a delicate mouse colour; thin and slim, the size of a small pony, quite as active and more graceful. Gipsy was a much commoner-looking donkey and smaller, but a good little fellow, very much attached to Jerry, and as steady as old time; almost too steady, for the only fault we had to find with him was that he would not go as fast as we liked. When we were out and wanted a good run, we had to resort to a trick with him. We turned him round suddenly and stopped short, till Jerry had gone a long way, or even out of sight; and then we turned round and let him go. Away he ran, as fast as his legs could carry him, and we, laughing heartily, enjoyed what we thought a good joke.

Jerry had an English leather saddle, but Gipsy had only a padded seat, covered with a crimson cloth and edged with crimson fringe.

What fun we used to have in our rides, especially when I was old enough to be allowed to ride Jerry! Sometimes, if he had not been out for a few days, he was so very frisky that I could scarcely hold him in with all my strength. He was very strong, and could be ridden quite as long a journey as the horses; he would sometimes prance and curvet in imitation of them, which was very amusing. When we got right out of the city we were allowed to dismount and pick the wild flowers which covered the country. In the autumn there were purple, yellow, and white crocuses; and in the spring, little blue irises, star of Bethlehem, scarlet anemones (which covered the hills and fields, and made our eyes ache to look at them they were so dazzlingly bright), blue periwinkle, pimpernel, speedwell, pheasants' eye, poppies, and quantities of other flowers which you know here. For our mother's birthday in March we always went to the valley of Hinnom, on the south side of the city, to pick a large bunch for her of cyclamen of all shades, from deep crimson to delicately-tinted white, and the deep blue grape hyacinth, both of which grew in great numbers there.

We never rode far, not more than a mile or two, for the roads are not such as you have here—some are not more than paths, and some not that. Sometimes we rode out of the gate which most travellers know, and which they call the Jaffa Gate, because it is the one they enter the city by when they arrive from Jaffa, or Joppa, the seaport town at which they land. Close to this are two public promenades, where the fashionable people meet to look at each other, as people do in Hyde Park and Rotten Row. Out of this gate we also rode when we wanted a good gallop on the Bethlehem plain, on the road to Bethlehem: this was on the west side of the city. Sometimes we went out of the gate on the north, called the Damascus Gate, close to which is the olive grove, where I was born in a tent. In this grove we listened to the turtle-doves and wood-pigeons, and once in riding fast under one of these olive trees I was caught by my hair in the branches, which was not comfortable. There is one tree in this grove thirty-eight feet round, and nearly all of them look very ancient; some are quite hollow inside, and look as if they ought to be worn out, all knotted and gnarled with age; but I am now told that the olive is a very long-lived tree, and that it is almost impossible to kill an olive tree, unless you dig the root right out of the earth. That is why we may look with great respect on the old olive trees round Jerusalem; for though some have been cut down, fresh shoots sprang up from the original root hundreds of years ago. There is something to my mind very interesting in an olive tree, and very pretty too; the leaves are green on the upper, and silvery white on the lower side, and when a fresh breeze is blowing it is difficult to say what colour they are; the wood is very pretty, and the smell of it refreshing, and as for the fruit, when it was pickled we were extremely fond of it, and ate quantities of olives with bread. I am quite aware that very few English children agree with me as to their being nice, so I can only say, wait till you taste them in Jerusalem. You cannot eat olives just as they are off the tree, they must be first pickled. Olives are of two colours—purple and green.

Sometimes we rode out of the gate called St. Stephen's Gate (in memory of the martyrdom of St. Stephen), down the slope of Mount Moriah, where there were a good many squill plants, and also a pretty little pink flower which we found nowhere else, and into the valley of Jehoshaphat, which separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. Sometimes we rode past the garden of Gethsemane, and up the Mount of Olives, a very hot and dusty ride on a summer's day, but the view from the top, looking back on Jerusalem westwards, was worth any fatigue.

Sometimes, instead of riding up it we kept along the foot of the Mount of Olives, past the tombs of Zechariah and St. James the Less, and the pillar of Absalom, all cut out of the live rock, and along the valley nearly paved with Jewish gravestones, till we came to the village of Siloam. Here everything was green and fresh, the houses built partly up the hill, and surrounded with little plots of vegetable gardens. The cauliflowers and cabbages grow here to an enormous size. I remember being once invited to sit on a carpet spread in the middle of one of these gardens, and being given refreshment in the shape of fried eggs swimming on the top of a bowl of melted butter. We managed to dip out the eggs with a wooden spoon and bits of the flat bread cakes which the natives make.*

In spring, when the Brook Kedron overflowed after the winter rains, and the almond trees were in blossom, it was a pretty scene just beyond the village, for hundreds of people came in picnic parties from Jerusalem to smoke, eat, and swing among the trees.

Sometimes we rode southwards on to Mount Zion, close to where we have our English cemetery, and here we often picked up pieces of marbles and porphyry, green and purple, ancient coins and bits of tesserae, relics of the former grandeur of the palaces there.

We had very few toys but those that were sent to us from England, and we seldom bought sweets.

There was one man who came round with a tray on his head, containing pink sugar horses with a bit of gilt stuck on their backs for a saddle, and of these we were very fond, and we also got melon seeds dried and roasted; when we were very rich we sometimes bought tiny peppermints at the one European shop.

There were all sorts of made sweetmeat dishes which we sometimes had as a great treat. One was like an immense mincepie, made of light crust and mince-meat, and marked in diamond shapes on the top. Another was a delicious compound, in which there were raisins, walnuts, little nuts cut of the pine cones, besides other good things.

We scarcely ever had any children to play with, so we had to fall back on our own resources, and invented a kingdom of our own, of which we were kings and princes, and transacted all the business. We had a newspaper written out regularly, recording the principal events, and the "Foreign Intelligence" was carefully copied from the Times. We used also to dry quantities of the wild flowers, and either send them to our friends in England or give them to travellers.

On Sundays we always went to the English church on Mount Zion, to join in the same service that you have here, but it began at ten o'clock, so that we might get home in summer before the middle of the day.

It was strange on the way to church to see the open market-place, through which we had to pass, thronged with peasant men and women, selling vegetables and fruits, making a great noise whilst bargaining for the different wares. But they had had their day of worship on Friday, and the Jews had had theirs on Saturday. I once went to a Jewish wedding, but do not remember much about it, except one very ridiculous thing that was done. After the service was over at the house of the bride's father, she pretended to be unwilling to leave her home, so when she was at last ready to start, an old woman danced before her dressed in the most ridiculous way, and with a wreath on her head made of vegetables, trying to make her laugh and be cheerful, whilst other women pushed the bride forward when she pretended to lag behind.

The climate of Jerusalem was very temperate. The most trying thing was the sirocco wind which blew in May—a hot wind from the desert, bringing up with it quantities of fine sand, which got into every corner. The ill-fitting windows and doors were not able to keep it out, and a table dusted clean would be again in a few minutes covered with dust. This wind would blow for some days continuously, and then leave off; but in a few days it began again, and while it lasted it made us all feel ill and cross. Travellers who came while it was blowing would sometimes say, "If this is what you have in May, what will it be like in June?" But in June this wind had gone, and we had delicious warm but not too hot weather, tempered by cool mountain and sea breezes, and at night heavy dews, which refreshed the earth instead of rain. We do not expect a drop of rain between May and October, but have long, cloudless days and these cooling dews at night, and such moonlight and stars! About this time we began to think of moving out of the city and into tents in the country.

* I remember also seeing some men trying to swim in the Pool of Siloam, with black goat skins filled with air tied on their backs, to keep them from sinking; they looked very queer.

Our camping-ground was not always the same; one was generally chosen where there was a stone house or cottage built in which we might sit during the day. After the sun had been shining a few hours the tents became unbearably hot, and it was not safe or pleasant to sit in them. Moving into tents was always great fun. Such packings up and running about! We children could think of little but the jolly time that was coming. When at last all was safely stowed away that we were not going to take with us, and the tents and beds rolled up, the luggage was packed on camels or mules' backs, and sent on before, while we followed, riding on horses or donkeys.

Several summers were spent at our own country place only a mile and a half out of the city. The cottage stood on rising ground, and the tents were pitched round and below it.

It was not all holiday-time; we did lessons in the morning, and in the afternoon wandered about among the rocks and in the fields in search of new plants and flowers. Sometimes we ran races or jumped from the rocks, and I often came home with the skin scraped off my knees. One plant we looked for each year in the same place; it was a creeping, white everlasting, which was to be found in only one place, and an upright red everlasting near it. There was also one plant of fennel, and one particular bush of wild thyme on the road which we always looked for. Sometimes we searched for creatures, tortoises, chameleons, pretty little praying mantises, and at night fireflies and glowworms. Now and then we saw a snake, but they never disturbed us much. There was only one on the grounds that we were afraid of, and that we tried each summer for several years to destroy, and at last one year it was suffocated in its hole under a rock by lighting a bonfire at the entrance. Scorpions and centipedes were also about, but very rarely troubled us.

Close to the house we had our garden flowers. One large rose-tree grew under the kitchen window; its beautiful single white blossoms were very sweet. There were also pink roses, violets, china cups, mignonette, petunias, marvel of Peru, one ice plant, a rosemary bush, a plant called "Fil," like a Cape jasmine, and a creeper—the blossom of which was in shape something like a snail, and was therefore called "Halazonee," or snail—of purple and white colour, with a creamy white tendril coming out of the centre of each blossom.

Here I had also some pigeons of my own, and there were some silkworms near, which we sometimes went to see. In front of the house there was a very pretty arrangement, a long stone bench, like a sofa, just outside the door, on which we could sit in the cool of the day. Overhead was a lattice-work verandah supported by wooden posts, and covered with a vine, whose leaves formed a fresh green shade, and sometimes bunches of grapes hung down over our heads.

There was also close by a beautiful pomegranate tree, with its glossy leaves and scarlet bell-shaped flowers. Also some large trees which had sweet-scented, small, lilac flowers, which I have never seen since; I believe in India they are called "Neem."

Our Mahommedan servant who took charge of this place used to make up pyramid bouquets of these flowers, arranged with roses round a stick, and tied securely on without a green leaf showing.

Not far off was the Valley of Roses, where quantities are grown and brought to Jerusalem by peasant women in piled-up baskets carried on their heads.

From here we had a very fine view of Jerusalem on the west side, and facing us in the wall was the grand tower of David, which is now the Turkish citadel. It was a very pretty sight to see salutes fired from there, and to watch the curling smoke and then hear the report, whenever there was a Mahommedan festival, the Turkish scarlet flag and white crescent floating gaily in the breeze. We could also hear the call to prayers from the minarets in the city when the wind blew our way. The Mahommedans, instead of ringing a bell to summon the worshippers to remind the people that it is the prayer hour, have tall towers called minarets, near the top of which men with powerful voices walk round and call out, in a clear, musical voice, the notices: "Prayer is better than sleep"; and the Mahommedan belief, "There is no God but One, and Mahomet is His prophet."

(To be concluded.)

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

By SOPHIA F. A. CAULFEILD.

PART VI.

ROSE. THE ROYAL BADGE.
(From old embroidery).

HE Passion-flower (Pas-siflora cœrulea) was a native of the forests of South America, and first introduced to our notice by a Mexican, Emmanuel de Villegas, an Augustinian friar, who brought over a drawing of the flower thought to bear in so many respects a resemblance to the several accessories of our Saviour's passion and death. When shown to Bosio, a writer on sacred subjects at Rome, 1610, he forebore to make any allusion to them in his works, until further confirmation arrived from New Spain, when some Dominicans at Bologna engraved and published the drawings received, with their description. Then, fully assured, Bosio introduced the flower to further notice. The crown of thorns, three nails, blood-tinged fringe of filaments (representing the scourge), the column of flagellation, five spots of blood, leaves like spears having round spots beneath them, denoting the thirty pieces of silver, and the seed-vessels, or sponge for the vinegar, all attracted notice, as the beautiful blossoms hung from the branches of the forest trees. The passion-flower is also a native of Peru, but the upper petals there are of a tawny hue.

In 1625 the flower was blooming in the garden of Cardinal Odoardo Farnese (Rome), and his physician and manager of his garden, Aldinus, wrote of the curative properties of the plant, and added that its white petals typified the white robe and purity of Christ, observing that as it would fain climb upwards, but cannot without support, so the Christian's faith needs support, and his weakness must be supplemented with Divine power from on high. Some may say that the so-called Fiore della Passione bears an emblematic character in the eyes only of the superstitious. Be the idea far-strained in its several minutiae, at least it is well to find food for reflection in the works of the great Father's hands, and they will lose the benefit of much designed to edify who fail to discern those "many voices in the world," which are "none of them without sig-nification to him who owns the seeing eye and the hearing ear."

Although as a distinctive badge of a large party in the realm the Primrose cannot be omitted in our series of historical flowers, there is little of old-world interest attached to it. The ancient name for it was Paralisos, from the name of a son of Priapus and Flora, who dying of grief at the loss of his betrothed Melicerta, was rescued from death by his parents, and transformed into "the rather primrose, that forsaken dies." Chaucer called it the "Primerole," derived from the old French Primeverole, the first spring flower.

Associated with the memory and principles of the late Lord Beaconsfield, who honoured it with his special preference, it gives its name to the great League which endeavours to promulgate and carry out his views.

The Rose of Sharon is familiar by name to all students of the Scriptures; but it seems to be an error to associate that typical flower with the rose of our gardens. The rose of Scripture is believed to have been the tulip. The so-called "Rose of Jericho," brought from the "Casa Nuova" Convent of Jerusalem, is, likewise, no species of the real rose. These "resurrection flowers" (Anastatica Hierochuntina) are only called roses because their little branches curl inwards, and assume a round rose shape.

PRIMROSE BADGE.

The presentation of "the golden rose" by a Roman Pontiff dates back to the eleventh century, and is ascribed to the pontificate of St. Leo IX. It takes the form of a branch, planted in a vase, well supplied with leaves, buds, blossoms, and thorns, the topmost flower being the largest, and the whole wrought in pure gold. Within the principal flower is a small receptacle—usually a cup with a lid—in which, when blessing it on "Rose Sunday" (the fourth in Lent), his Holiness places some balm and musk; and on the pedestal his name and arms are engraved. Our kings, Henry IV., James III. of Scotland, and Henry VIII., were recipients of this distinction.

Amongst the ancients the rose was dedicated to Venus. According to Catullus, the pink colouring was due to its blushing for the wound its thorns inflicted on the foot of the goddess when she hastened to the aid of Adonis, an ancient epigram recording the fable—

"Her step she fixes on the cruel thorns,
And with her blood the pallid rose adorns."

Brides and bridegrooms were crowned with chaplets of white and red roses, Roman brides wearing them in combination with myrtle blossoms. Indeed, there were no public festivities into which they did not enter. The Falernian wine was drunk in goblets swimming with rose petals, and the Lucrine Lake, at the Regatta of Baïæ, was strewn with them. Cleopatra had a bed-like carpet of roses an ell deep on the floor of her banquet-chamber, kept in place by a thin netting; and Nero and Heliogabalus were specially extravagant in their employment. According to Suetonius, the former spent more than four million sesterces (some £30,000) on these flowers at one supper alone. It was amongst the ancients a symbol of joy, amongst moderns of love; but it was originally the emblem of the god of silence—Hippocrates. To this fact we owe the phrase "Under the rose" as signifying secrecy. Roses used to be painted on our banquet-room ceilings, and the central ornament in plaster is still called "a rose," though of conventional type. Carrying out the idea thus, the Jacobins adopted the white rose as a symbol of the "Pretender," whose followers assisted him "under the rose."

SUNFLOWER.

The "Rosary," introduced by St. Dominic, was attributed to the legend, that a chaplet of roses was thrown to him by the Blessed Virgin Mary. In the first instance it consisted of a string of beads composed of rose leaves, compressed into moulds in that form. But their employment as chaplets is of Eastern origin, dating from the time of the Egyptian anchorites, and their use (with variations as to size and number) obtains amongst the Mahomedans and the Buddhists of China, Japan, and India. The phrase, "a bed of roses," has reference to a once existing fact, for, as I said, the Greeks and Romans had their beds and cushions stuffed with them. There is a pretty tradition ascribed to Zoroaster, that the rose was free from thorns until the coming into the world of Ahrimanes, the evil spirit. It is greatly esteemed in Persia, where there is a feast held in its honour, lasting the whole time that the flower remains in bloom; and pelting with them is a favourite game. The world-famed "attar" which they manufacture from them has made them a valuable article of commerce.

The "rose of England," par excellence, is the large red one (Rosa centifolia), of which the "cabbage rose" of Provence is a variety. It became the distinctive badge of England at the time of the Wars of the Roses (into which history I need scarcely enter), although the elder Pliny seems to find a connection between the name "Albion" and the white roses, ob rosas albas, which abounded in this country. At Upsal, the northern portal of the cathedral is covered with them, which the local historian, Scheffer, supposed was designed to commemorate the fact that the Christian missionaries to the North came from England. The first appearance of this flower on the Great Seal was in the reign of Edward IV., and it was repeated on those of all the succeeding monarchs, down to James II., and it appeared on the coinage in the "Rose-noble" of Henry VI. The coins struck to commemorate the coronation of Charles I. bore it on the reverse, an equestrian figure of that monarch on the obverse. On the badge of Mary I. it is united with the pomegranate, and on that of James I. with the thistle. That of Edward IV. and Richard II. represented a white rose. The origin of the Rosa Galica, or Rose of Provins, is attributed to the poet King of Navarre and Count of Champagne, Thibault IV., surnamed "the Song-maker." It is said that on his return from the Crusades he brought back a rose tree, which he planted in his City of Provins, where so greatly did it thrive that it made its new home famous, and the king's successor adopted the flower as his badge. The charming peculiarity of giving forth sweetness in its decay has been exquisitely enlarged upon by Elizabeth Browning in her poem "To a Dead Rose."

The Shamrock, which constitutes the national badge of Ireland, has been noticed under the name "trefoil," thus I shall only note the assertion of some that "shamrock" is derived from the Arabic Shamrookh, a club or "shillelagh"; and if so the emblem is more apposite than most are to those who adopt them in its suitability as a badge for the peasant population of that unquiet land.

The magnificent Sunflower must now claim a brief notice, so popular has it recently become. It is a herbaceous plant (Helianthus annuus giganteus) which attains a height of twenty feet, and the golden-rayed flowers often measure a foot and a half in diameter. Numerous representations of them, made in pure gold, were found by the early Spanish invaders of Peru in the Temples of the Sun, the workmanship of which was perfectly exquisite, so much so as to outvalue by far their weight in that precious metal. The priestesses were crowned with these; they wore them in their bosoms and carried them in their hands, as emblems of the sun. But this gorgeous flower, so much affected as an ornament and badge by aspirants to æstheticism, is not that of classical fable; the

"Symbol of unhappy love Sacred to the slighted Clytie," whose devotion to Apollo (Helios—the Sun) may be remembered by many of my readers, was transformed into the classic heliotrope, an insignificant flower of the natural order of Boraginæ—a native of the South and West of Europe—not the Peruvian heliotrope, vulgarly called "cherry-pie." Moore adopts the theory that the sunflower was so designated because of its ever turning towards the sun; but Gerarde, writing in 1507, says: "Some have reported it to turn with the sunne, which I could never observe . . . but I think it was so called because it resembles the radiant beams of the sunne."

VIOLET.

(1500. In the British Museum.)

The incomparable Marguerite de Valois, sister of Francis I., when Duchesse d'Alençon, chose (says Brantôme) the sunflower for her device, "to show that her heart was devoted to God; this flower bearing the greatest affinity to the sun by the similarity of its rays and leaves, and that it turns to where He moves." Thus she signified, he continues, "how she directed all her thoughts, will, and affections towards that great sun, which is God." Her device was accompanied by the motto—Non inferiora secutus. A medal was struck in 1636 in honour of Frederick Henry of Orange, bearing a sunflower with the same motto; and Catherine, daughter of the Emperor Albert I., adopted the same flower, but with the motto—Deorsum nunquam, "never downwards."

How the Thistle became the symbol of Scotland I need scarcely relate, yet some reader may not have heard that an attempt being made to surprise the Scotch army at night, on one memorable occasion, by the invading Danes, one of the latter trod on a prickly thistle, and his involuntary exclamation roused some wakeful ones, who, flying to arms, drove out the enemy. The stemless thistle (Oniscus acaulis) is considered by some to be the true Scotch device, being that represented in the gold bonnet-piece of James V. But opinion is divided on the question of the species. The Scotch order of knighthood was instituted, it is believed, by Achaius, King of the Scots, on the occasion of his victory over Athelstan.

I must now conclude with that lowly-growing and sweet amongst the sweetest of flowers, the Violet (Viola odorata). I have spoken of the games at Toulouse, when a golden violet was awarded for the best poem. When the unfortunate foundress was undergoing imprisonment, she sent her emblem to her knight to be worn as a token of her constancy, and thenceforth it was adopted (with a similar significance) by the Troubadours. In the olden days of "Merrie England," it told the same story from those presenting it, and in the reign of Charles II. it was reputed by doctors to cure consumption. Pliny affirmed that a chaplet of violets was a preventive of headache. As a family badge it was adopted by the Bonapartes, from the time of the exile to Elba of Napoleon I., and it is said that the ex-Empress Eugenie appeared one evening decorated with a profusion of them, during the time that her future husband was paying her his addresses, as significant of her intention to accept his suit. At the touching funeral of her most promising and England-loving son, the Prince Imperial, I noticed that the coffin, drawn on a gun-carriage, was covered with violets, and an arch composed of them surmounted the head, several feet in height. As an emblem of sweetness, unobtrusive and lowly, the suitability of the flower is very obvious; as that of "constancy," the idea seems obscure. On what more beautiful attributes can I leave the reader to dwell, or can I commend to her cultivation in "the garden of the soul"? Modesty, sweetness, and constancy—surely these are amongst the spiritual blossoms that bear a "sweet-smelling savour," and amongst those "fruits of the spirit" which are "lovely and of good report."

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MR. HOPE was genuinely anxious to make Evelyn as comfortable as possible, and not to let her find her life under his roof dreary. As he had prophesied, Mrs. Grant, a motherly, good-natured soul, innocent of her husband's scientific tastes, was extremely kind to the girl, and would have had her be all day long with her own daughters. But these were two young ladies of the most conventional type; without an interest beyond dress and amusement, and Evelyn, though grateful for their goodwill, much preferred solitude to their society.

One evening Mr. Hope, Evelyn, and the Grant family found themselves at one of those exhibitions which, under the familiar appellations of Healtheries, Fisheries, Colinderies, etc., have enlivened London of late years. The gardens were glittering with electric light; the fountains were playing in silver radiance, and an excellent band was rehearsing strains of well-chosen music. A throng of people, testifying by their dress to the comparative exclusiveness of a "half-crown day," strolled about, enjoying the breath of the spring night, the music, and the brilliance of the illuminations.

"This is one of the tolls one has to pay to society in the course of the season," grumbled Mr. Hope, who would very much rather have been in his library at home. The Misses Grant were in high spirits, greeting one and another acquaintance. Evelyn felt terribly lonely, and as the plaintive strains of a waltz by Gung'l sounded from the orchestra, her melancholy deepened. Just then she heard her uncle accosting someone, and looking up, she perceived it was Mr. Muir.

Evelyn's first introduction to him a year ago had been through Mr. Hope, and she was aware that the two men knew and liked one another. She felt it was a very pleasant coincidence, and was glad when Mr. Muir took a vacant chair at her side.

"Mr. Hope tells me you are staying with him for the present," he said, after the first greetings had passed. Evelyn felt, she did not know how or why, that he was thoroughly glad to see her; and as she always had the consciousness through all her uncle's kindness that she was at his house on sufferance, this cordiality and interest were pleasant to her. She felt very much inclined to tell him more about herself, for she knew instinctively he would like to hear.

"I have no settled home," she answered, "I am rather like a wanderer on the face of the earth."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. When I met you first, I was living with my aunt and cousin, where I had been ever since I was a child. Afterwards I went to stay with an American lady, Miss Wentworth. Now I am at Kensington. I have scarcely any relatives belonging to me; my parents died long ago."

"I am very sorry," was all Mr. Muir's reply; but Evelyn knew it was not conventional, and that he was very sorry for her. "You will probably return to your aunt?" he remarked in a minute or two.

"I don't think so."

Evelyn gave a sudden, violent start, and almost knocked her chair backwards as she spoke; for among the crowds of people sauntering close by she had recognised Algy—Algy, looking particularly bright and handsome, with a gardenia in his buttonhole, side by side with a well-dressed young lady of dark eyes and vivacious mien, whom Evelyn knew to be Emily Thorne, a former member of the Mayflower Club. The two were evidently on the best of terms. Algy was discoursing eloquently, and Miss Thorne appeared to be listening with much delight. Neither of them saw Evelyn; they were far too intent upon their own conversation. She looked for Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie, but if they were in the grounds they certainly were nowhere in the immediate vicinity.

"Has anything startled you? Did anyone push against you?" asked Mr.

Muir, looking savagely after the figure of the retreating Algy.

"No, thank you; I recognised someone I knew, that was all," replied Evelyn. But she could scarcely hide her discomposure. It is a little startling when one imagines oneself first and best, to suspect that the place is filled. Theoretically, Evelyn was glad Algy should console himself, but a throng of other reflections crowded upon her mind. If this were so, why did they not tell her?—why did they not ask her to come back? "They must care very little about me," thought the orphan girl, bitterly.

It would take too long to describe in detail how it came to pass, but Evelyn found herself by-and-by talking confidentially to Mr. Muir about her life. She had too much sense of honour to relate what had passed between Algy and herself, and merely let him understand there had been a family disagreement. The loneliness of her present lot he could well appreciate, for though he liked Mr. Hope, he knew perfectly well that he was not in the least fitted to take charge of a girl like Evelyn.

Mr. Hope was a "man's man," not a "woman's man," and Mr. Muir almost shuddered to think of a bright young life in that perfectly-appointed, stereotyped household.

"And what resource do you find, then?" he asked gently. "You must need one."

Evelyn hesitated a little.

"I am very fond of writing," she confessed. "My uncle has let me have a study to myself, and there I spend the most of my time—when I am indoors. I love writing with my whole heart. I live in it, and if it were not for that just now, I really do not know what would become of me."

"Have you written much before?" Mr. Muir felt guilty as he asked this question, but Evelyn unsuspectingly replied—

"I have always been writing. At school I always had the composition prizes. My father used to write a good deal for reviews, and so forth, so I suppose I inherit his love for it. When I was a little thing I used to write verses; people thought them very wonderful, and once some were published in a local newspaper. I shall never forget how proud I was. Then as I grew older I loved to write poetry. At last, do you know, I published a volume."

Mr. Muir was silent.

"It was last summer," continued Evelyn. If it had not been dark as they paced to and fro, she would scarcely have made this frank avowal. "My friends admired my poetry so much, I thought other people would do the same, but it was a dreadful mistake of mine. There was one review only, but that was most cruel. It was in the Critic, and as soon as I read it I gave up all hope of ever doing anything as a poet."

"Was it only the review that made you come to that decision?"

"No," acknowledged Evelyn, "I think going to Switzerland, and contrasting my own verses with the glory and beauty of everything around me, made me feel how poor and paltry they were. There was a musician at Engelberg, who played very splendidly. His music had an effect upon me too in the same way. But my talks with Mrs. Allingham West did the most."

"Did these things discourage you altogether from writing?"

"Not altogether. They gave me a different view of life. I felt poetry was no longer the easy thing I had supposed it to be. I still felt I must write, but in another way."

"And what is that, if I may ask you?"

"When I was at Engelberg I tried to make a little sketch of a girl I saw at the Engstlen Alp, giving her an imaginary history, but describing just what I saw around me. I found that seemed to 'go' easily, and I found great pleasure in it. Now I am writing a story, quite a brief one, in four or five chapters, the scene of which is laid in the same neighbourhood. It is called 'The Hill of Angels.'"

"That is a very pretty title."

"Engel-Berg—you have heard perhaps of the old legend," continued Evelyn. "I am connecting that with a modern story."

"Will you tell me something of the plot?" he asked.

Evelyn, a little diffidently, complied.

"You cannot think how intensely I enjoy it," she continued. "I seem to live in the beautiful Swiss valley while I write. When I go and shut myself up I am surrounded by all the lovely scenes I am trying to describe. I see the clouds wreathing, and rising, and soaring away from the hill, and I dream over Wordsworth's sonnet."

Mr. Muir did not recollect the sonnet in question, and Evelyn's soft voice repeated the last lines.

"Resplendent apparition! if in vain

My ears did listen, 'twas enough to gaze

And watch the slow departing of the train,

Whose skirts the glowing mountain thirsted to detain."

"You make me long to go to Engelberg," said Mr. Muir, greatly pleased.

"And what will become of this story when it is finished?"

"I do not know," she replied. "I do not think I shall venture into print again."

"Oh, but why not?" he asked.

"One failure ought not to discourage you for ever."

Evelyn shook her head.

"You did not read that review," she said, "or you would not think I could face publicity a second time."

The terrible moment had come! Mr. Muir felt he could in common honesty no longer shirk the question of authorship. And yet Evelyn, in her desolate girlhood, her winsomeness, her bright intelligence, her efforts after literary achievement, appealed so powerfully to his sympathies, he could not bear to reveal himself as the monster of her imagination. However, he was not accustomed to shrink from telling the truth.

"Miss Hope, I have something to say that will very likely surprise you," he announced abruptly. "You speak of a review in the Critic of your poems. I wrote that review!"

Evelyn started away from his side as though a shot had struck her.

"You!"

It was only one word, but it was eloquent.

"I review for that paper," he continued. "When I met you at Chelsea, I had, of course, no idea you were the author. Indeed, I had forgotten the circumstance altogether, it made no impression on me; but Mrs. West told me afterwards."

Evelyn was silent; a perfect tumult of feelings surging in her breast. In spite of the fact that she had ceased to admire "Day-dreams," she still regarded the reviewer whose words had stung her so keenly as a sort of monster in human form. Then the mortification to her of feeling that this man by her side had read, had mercilessly criticised her efforts, had ridiculed them in print, was intolerable. She felt angry even to think that Mr. Muir had read her poems, reviewing apart. She had grown to like him, to trust him, to wish to stand well with him; and now this terrible gulf had suddenly appeared between them. "He has been drawing me out only to ridicule me afresh, of course!" she thought, in the bitterness of her heart; but she merely said in the most icy tones she could command, "What a very curious coincidence! Don't you think we had better try to find my uncle and Mrs. Grant? They must be somewhere near the kiosk."

"No," replied Mr. Muir, "not until you have heard me say a word or two. I can see you are very angry with me."

Evelyn disdained to reply.

"I would not willingly say a word to hurt or grieve you," he exclaimed, with real feeling in his voice; "but how could I possibly tell—to begin with, how did I know I would ever see or speak to the author, much less that it would be you?" Mr. Muir's speech was rather involved, but it must be owned that explanation was difficult.

"How was it you said 'she' in that review?" demanded Evelyn.

"Oh, it was easy to guess it was a woman's work, but that was all. Mr. Hope never told me you had written any poems."

"Yes, 'a woman's work,'" broke out poor Evelyn, hurt, humiliated, hardly knowing what she said. "I have been talking freely to you of my hopes and my efforts, not knowing who you were; but of course you were only laughing at me afresh, and my 'woman's work.'"

"Now you are just talking like an unreasonable child," said Mr. Muir, emphatically. "I told you once, Miss Hope, and I tell you again, I would not lightly grieve or distress you. I have no such thought as to laugh at you. If I had, I should be unworthy the name of a gentleman. I wrote the couple of paragraphs in the Critic, in the ordinary exercise of my craft, saying what I honestly believed about the little book. I wish now that you had not been the author; but how can you blame me for that?"

Evelyn's mortification and vexation were not very easy to account for to herself, but they were none the less real; it was a cruel blow to her pride to find herself placed in this position, vis-à-vis with her new acquaintance. It is one thing to speak disparagingly of your own work to a friend, and quite another thing to find that he not only shares, but has forestalled and outrun your own poor opinion. She thought she was very angry indeed with Mr. Muir, and additionally angry with him for the words he had just used. "Of course he thinks he can treat me as he chooses," she meditated in the bitterness of her spirit, and she repeated in her most chilling tones—

"If you will not take me back to my friends, Mr. Muir, I shall find the way by myself!"

There was no more to be said just then. Mr. Muir silently escorted Evelyn through the moving crowd, spoke a few words on different subjects to Mr. Hope, and wished the party good-night.

FORBIDDEN LETTERS.

By MARY E. HULLAH, Author of "Celia and Her Legacy," "No," etc.

CHAPTER I.

GOOD-BYE, Willie, and don't forget me now that I am going to live such a long way off."

Willie was a very small boy; he stood on tip-toe on the kerbstone, striving to look into the window of the cab which was waiting in front of a shabby house in a dull London street.

Inside the cab was a girl in a black dress and hat; her pretty, oval face was very pale, and her eyes looked swollen and red.

"Good-bye," she said again, as she came closer to the window. "Give me another kiss, and run in to mamma."

"Mamma says, Bessie, that you are going to be a grand lady, and then perhaps you'll never come back again."

A gleam of colour crossed Bessie's face.

"When I am a grand lady, Willie dear, I shall never forget any of you!"

The ready tears filled her eyes again as a group of children on the doorstep shouted in chorus: "Good-bye, Bessie!"

A young man with a close-cut beard and clear, bright eyes, who had been a silent spectator of this little farewell scene, now interfered.

"We must be off," he said, "it is getting late."

Once more Bessie pressed her lips to the little boy's cheek, once more she waved her hand, then she retired to the farther corner of the cab, feeling very desolate, and buried her face in her handkerchief.

In another moment Edmund Ravensdale had given directions to the driver and had jumped into the cab. He felt very sorry for his cousin, and yet he hardly knew what to say to comfort her. Yesterday, when in obedience to his father's instructions he had called to beg her to be ready to travel down to Templebury on the following day, she had received him with a smiling face, and said that she should be very glad to go. And now, when the moment of departure had arrived, she had completely broken down in this unaccountable manner.

"I feel like a regular ogre out of a fairy tale," thought Edmund, and he racked his brains to find a remark which would be safe to make under the circumstances. "Shall I talk to her about London? Shall I ask her if she likes the country? Shall I—?"

At this point in his meditation she dropped her handkerchief and looked up suddenly. She had large, brown eyes, with that kind of far-away expression that is more often seen in young children than in girls of her age.

"Do you think that they will be good to me?" she asked.

"Do you mean my father and mother?"

She nodded assent timidly.

"I am sure that they will!" he answered eagerly. "My father is most anxious to welcome you, and you must not mind if he seems just a little stiff at first. Do you know that he and your father were schoolfellows as well as cousins? As for my mother, she is so good and kind you won't be able to help loving her."

Bessie heaved a sigh of relief.

"I'm very glad," she said. "Poor papa talked about cousin Alfred when he was ill, just at the last. But I shall feel so strange."

"Never mind; when you have once seen my mother it will be all right. You will soon be so thoroughly at home at Yew Lodge that you will feel like the daughter of the house."

She blushed and smiled.

"Do tell me what Hazelton is like? Is it a small village? Is there a garden at Yew Lodge?"

Only too pleased to have gained her interest in her future home so easily, Edmund plunged into an animated description of Hazelton, the lawn-tennis ground, the river, the village street, his mother's flower garden, and above all, the old yew hedge which was the admiration of the neighbourhood.

By the time the train started she had completely regained her spirits, and was chatting as easily as if she had known her cousin for years instead of days. After a while she grew weary, and fell asleep over a book with which he had presented her, and so the hours passed by, and the dingy London street and the clamouring children were left a hundred miles behind.

Elizabeth Stanhope was the daughter of a struggling musician, a man full of talent and great ideas, who had managed, one way and the other, to miss his chances in life, and had gone down the steps of the great social ladder until he had become a teacher of music in a town in the extreme North of England; there he had lived for the last ten years with his motherless child, growing poorer and poorer as his pupils fell off, and people grew weary of patronising a genius who would not be punctual or methodical; and there he had died, after a short illness, about a month ago.

Poor Bessie, bewildered and scared by her sorrow, had been taken to London by some friends of very humble station, whom her father had assisted in his more prosperous days. The Bridges were kind-hearted people, and they did what they could to make their visitor happy, but the girl drooped and pined in London. Many a day she sat by the open window in her little attic room, pretending to sew, and secretly fretting over the hardships of her position. At home she had been her father's pet; now she was but one of a large family, all striving perpetually to make two ends meet.

When a letter arrived from Mr. Ravensdale, of Hazelton, inviting his young kinswoman to make her home at Yew Lodge, the invitation had been regarded by Mr. and Mrs. Bridges as the solution of all difficulties, and even Bessie had gladly consented to go to her new relations for a while; anything would be better than remaining in the melancholy London lodging, where she could not but know that she was sadly in the way. Not that she meant to pass her life in a remote country village; no, by-and-by she intended to become a successful authoress. Then, with her fortune made and the world before her, she would go where she chose and do as she listed.

The Bridges would not be forgotten—Willie should have the best toys that money could buy; the children should be sent to school, and she, the young and talented benefactress, would go abroad and visit the beautiful countries that her father had loved to describe. After this fashion our heroine had kept up bravely until the moment of departure came, and then she realised the truth all at once. She was going to live amongst strangers, alone, and her courage failed her utterly and entirely.

It was lucky for Bessie that she had so kindly and considerate a travelling companion as Edmund Ravensdale. Indeed, had she known it, it was owing to his advice that she was invited to Hazelton. Old Mr. Ravensdale's original plan had been to send his young cousin to a first-rate boarding school for a year at least. How was he to know what she was like? What kind of an education had she received as the spoilt daughter of a man who had so thrown away his opportunities as poor Owen Stanhope? Nevertheless, the master of Yew Lodge was just and upright of heart; he was sincerely anxious to act fairly by Owen Stanhope's orphan daughter; eventually he put aside his own wishes, and listened to the counsels of his wife and son. Elizabeth should come to Yew Lodge, and be treated, not as a guest, but as a dear child of the house.

It was growing late in the afternoon when the train at last stopped at Templebury station.

"The trap is waiting for you, sir," said a civil porter, as he threw open the door.

Bessie rubbed her eyes and looked out of the window.

"What a pretty station!" she cried, enthusiastically.

The porter touched his hat, well pleased that his handiwork should be admired; for had he not planted every flower and shrub along the gay border with his own hand?

"Are you fond of flowers, Bessie?" asked Edmund, as he nodded to a couple of farmers, who wished him in return a hearty good-day. "My mother will be delighted to hear that. Look, here's the trap. Let me help you to your seat. We shall be home in an hour."

A boy in livery was standing at the horse's head.

"All well at home, Brown?"

"Yes, sir. Master has sent the carrier's cart for the luggage—"

"Good. Jump in."

Edmund took the reins, and the white horse set off at a sharp trot. Bessie gazed around delighted. How beautiful the trees and hedges were, clothed in their fresh young green! She liked driving, and a thrill of gratification ran through her. She really was on the high road to becoming a grand lady! Willie was quite right. Cousin Alfred must be very rich to keep a carriage, and all the people at the station were so polite and respectful. She had never travelled in this manner before.

As she sat bolt upright in her seat, she wished that her hat was not so shabby. This morning, when she dressed, she had not cared in the least about her appearance, but now, with everybody looking at her, she did not like to feel untidy.

However, "everybody" turned out to be a man mending a gate and a few school-children, who stood in a row and curtsied as the carriage passed. You see Bessie had still the lesson to learn that she was not, after all, a person of much importance in the eyes of the world at large. Even Edmund, who was so affectionately considerate for her comfort, had not the slightest idea that the dreamy-eyed girl by his side was busily employed in building castles in the air, in which she, Elizabeth Stanhope, was to reign as a princess, meting out favours with a generous hand to those whom she might choose to befriend.

Up hill and down they went. Bessie was getting anxious to catch the first glimpse of Yew Lodge; she hoped that it would be a large and stately building. She had resolved to be very dignified in her behaviour, and impress her surroundings with the idea that she had always been accustomed to splendour. Would there be a lady's-maid to unpack her box? That was an important question. The recollection that her best black dress was torn at the gathers rather damped her joy in thinking that for the future she would never wait upon herself again. How she hated darning and patching, and she had had so much of that to do lately! The lady's-maid might consider her wardrobe inefficient; never mind, girls in story-books always had their sewing done for them, while they amused themselves in the company of admiring friends, or drove about in elegant carriages. The carriage was here already—admiring and appreciative friends would follow as a matter of course.

"Here we are!" cried Edmund; "there's the house behind the hedges."

The boy jumped down and opened a white-painted gate; there was a gravel drive neatly rolled, a small lawn, and a low cottage with heavy chimney stacks and a red tiled roof.

Bessie felt a pang of disappointment. The hall door stood wide open, the step was snowy white, roses were climbing round the porch; a little terrier ran out, wagging his tail. It was all so pretty and homely, but Yew Lodge was not a grand mansion by any manner of means; she had imagined something very different.

"My father and mother are in. We will go and look for them," said Edmund. He took her hand and led her into the hall. They had not far to go; at the drawing-room door a white-haired elderly man came forward.

"How do you do, my dear?" he said, gravely, as he kissed Bessie's forehead. "Come in, come in, and let me look at you. Here is Mrs. Ravensdale—cousin Edith—waiting to make your acquaintance."

On a sofa near the open window was a lady with a sweet face and a smile that was frank and kindly, like Edmund's.

"Well, my boy," she said—and Bessie liked the sound of her voice—"have you brought her home safely? I am sorry, dear Bessie, that I was not well enough to come and meet you. Edmund, bring a chair that she may sit close to the sofa. Give me a kiss, my dear child; you must be tired out after your long journey."

A sudden fit of shyness had taken possession of Bessie. Where was the dignified young lady who had proposed patronising her new relations and behaving with such extraordinary self-possession? Faded into thin air, and in her place a speechless maiden, who coloured to the roots of her hair and glanced appealingly in the direction of Edmund.

"I hope that you will like the country," said Mrs. Ravensdale, gently, in order to give her visitor time to recover from her embarrassment.

"Yes, thank you. I mean, I daresay I shall. Papa liked the town better, and we were obliged to live there because of his pupils."

Mr. Ravensdale, who had been standing by the sofa, put his hand on Bessie's shoulder.

"You are not at all like your poor father," he remarked, shortly.

"No, papa always said that I reminded him of my mother."

Bessie lifted her eyes to Mr. Ravensdale's face; she was not quite sure if she approved of him: there were furrows on his forehead, and his voice was odd and cold.

"I did not know your mother; and your poor father and I had not met for many years; it has been a source of grief to me. But you are too young to remember—There"—patting her shoulder—"be a good girl, my dear, and we will do our best for you at Yew Lodge."

He walked away to the other end of the room and took up a book.

"I don't like him; I don't like him a bit!" was Bessie's mental verdict. "And why do they talk to me as if I were a little girl? Why did he never come to see us? I believe he was unkind to poor papa, and he is ashamed to say so. I shall never like him!" So, knowing nothing of the circumstances which had led to the breach between the cousins long years ago, she hardened her heart against cousin Alfred, and regarded him from the first as a relentless enemy. After tea she was conducted to her room, not by a magnificent lady's-maid in rustling silk, but by a rosy-cheeked girl, who was not in the least alarming.

The room prepared for the visitor overlooked the garden; white muslin curtains waved in the soft breeze; there was a bright-coloured carpet, a writing-table, and an easy chair draped in pink chintz. It was prettier and cosier than anything Bessie had imagined in her most vivid day-dream.

"Your luggage will come presently, miss," explained the girl, with a cheerful smile; "and the dinner bell rings at seven o'clock."

She presently withdrew, and Bessie was left to meditate on her new surroundings. On the whole, she was satisfied with her reception at Yew Lodge; at any rate, she could amuse herself very well here during the coming summer; what with lawn tennis, river parties, and visiting, the time would soon pass; and besides there was her own special work to occupy her time.

In that box which had been so rashly entrusted to the care of a common carrier, was a velvet-bound volume with a clasp and lock, the key of which was hanging round Bessie's neck, securely tied on to a ribbon. The MS. poems contained in this book were very dear to the author. She looked round for an inspiration; this was the right moment for a new idea. Yes, there beyond the hedge she caught a glimpse of the gleaming river. Here was the idea at last—an orphan girl, cruelly treated by wealthy relatives, whose proud spirit could ill brook the chains of despotism. She rested her head against the heavy shutter, and murmured—

"Rivulet, flowing to the sea,
Gently, swiftly, silently,
Far away from tyranny,
On thy waves, oh bear me,
Bear me!"

The sentiment was not strikingly original perhaps, the metre verged on the eccentric; but our heroine was quite satisfied.

In the meantime Mrs. Ravensdale and her son were talking together.

"I hope it will answer, mother. I hope she will be a companion to you."

"If we can only make her content, Edmund. She does not look very happy; and she must have had many disadvantages, poor child."

"Why did Owen Stanhope and father fall out?"

"I don't quite know. Your father does not like speaking about it. It was something about letters which Owen read and kept back to suit his own purpose. I am afraid that he was not a man of high character."

"Well," exclaimed Edmund, "Bessie interests me very much; I think she is charming. And as for her being contented here, of course she will be when she is with you."

CHAPTER II.

BESSIE awoke the following morning to find the sun streaming into the window, and the birds outside singing their loudest. She was wonderfully refreshed by a long night's rest, and, strange to say, she had forgotten most of her gloomy forebodings. She hummed a little tune to herself as she dressed: her eyes fell on the locked book: there was pen and ink handy, but she was in no mood for tyranny and ill-used maidens. Surely that was the breakfast bell, and there was no mistaking the fact that she was exceedingly hungry.

She was late. Mr. Ravensdale and his son were waiting in the parlour, and breakfast was ready.

"Good morning, Elizabeth," said Mr. Ravensdale. "I hope that you have slept well. Another morning try and be punctual; prayers are over."

Elizabeth looked at him doubtfully. Did he mean to begin by scolding her? It was a comfort that Edmund was there, ready and willing to take her part, and show her where she was to sit and pour out the tea, as his mother never came down to breakfast.

She liked presiding at the head of the long table, with its dainty silver, and red and white china. She could see the reflection of the room in a pier-glass that hung in a corner. How well she looked bending over the urn, with the mother of pearl tea-caddy by her side, the white tablecloth, and—just then Edmund asked for some more tea, and her day-dream came to an abrupt termination.

Mr. Ravensdale was very silent; he read his paper, leaving the conversation to the young people; but just as Bessie was about to leave the room, he called her back.

"I should like to show you my study; it is open to you whenever you would like to come and sit there. Have you been there yet?"

"No, cousin Alfred," answered Bessie, coldly.

He walked across the hall. The invitation had been intended as a special proof of favour, and he was just a little hurt that it was not more graciously received.

"Here are the English books," he said, hurrying through his explanation. "You can take any volume you please, on condition that you put it back in the same place. There are novels in that corner; you had better not read them without permission, but anything else is at your service."

"Papa always allowed me to read what I liked, and we had books from a lending library. I am quite old enough to read novels!"

Mr. Ravensdale looked over the top of his spectacles; this was the first deliberate opinion that he had heard her pronounce.

"I think, my dear," he said, slowly but decidedly, "that it will be as well for you to take advice on the subject; some of these books are not fit reading for you."

Bessie did not dare to contradict him a second time, but she stood there, reddening, and half-crying with vexation after he had left her. It was just because her father had never interfered with her that cousin Alfred was bent upon making these absurd regulations!

Silly girl! she little guessed how true a friend Alfred Ravensdale, with his abrupt fashion of speech and grim manner, had been to her and hers; how he, and he alone of all her father's relations, had constantly stood his friend, and helped him time after time out of difficulties innumerable.

Bessie soon recovered from her fit of depression, and later in the day she returned from a boating expedition with Edmund to throw herself on her knees before Mrs.

Ravensdale's chair and pour out an account of all that she had seen and done.

"And Edmund says that I can manage the punt alone; and it will be a splendid place for me to sit when I want to be by myself and write!"

"What are you going to write, Bessie?"

"Poetry," answered the young authoress in a whisper; "or perhaps a story. Oh, you don't know how I long to be very great, to do something really first-rate!"

Cousin Edith took this announcement quite gravely—

"There is plenty of time before you, little woman; but you will have to make up your mind to work hard if you want to be 'really first-rate.'"

"Yes, yes, of course!" replied Bessie, but she thought to herself, "Papa always said how clever I was, and cousin Edith cannot know how easily I can write poetry!"

"We were talking about you last night," continued Mrs. Ravensdale. "We must see how we can best arrange for you to have some good lessons in English and French."

"Cousin Edith!" interrupted Bessie, in horrified accents, "I left off going to school nearly a year ago. Do you know that I am sixteen?"

"There need be no hurry about it, my dear; but my husband is most anxious that you should be thoroughly educated."

Cousin Alfred again! he was bent upon thwarting her at every turn. She turned aside with a sigh.

"Come, dear child," said the kind invalid, "I don't like to see you fret. Will you help me this afternoon, and be my secretary? Look, there are three notes to answer."

Bessie had many faults, but she was always quick to hold out a helping hand when she could. She ran to the writing-table, eager to be of assistance, and the labour of love occupied her attention for some time. Note-writing was not her strong point, and it must be confessed that for a young lady who aspired to step immediately into literary celebrity, she made a good many mistakes.

The days passed by and Edmund Ravensdale was about to return to London, where he was engaged in a City house of business. The last evening the cousins walked together under the shelter of the yew hedge; the sun had set, and a few bright clouds were visible in the western sky. Bessie had no hat on, and the evening breeze touched her wavy hair. There was a great change in her appearance since she had become an inhabitant of Yew Lodge; she looked stronger and had more colour; the simple black dress with which Mrs. Ravensdale had provided her set off her pretty figure to advantage. Just now her face, turned slightly upwards, was full of earnest feeling. For the moment she had forgotten her little vanities and desire of praise; her brown eyes rested on Edmund's.

"I am so sorry that you are going away!"

There was a ring of pain in her voice that touched him to the quick.

"I shall come home again in the autumn, dear Bessie; and I shall look forward——" He hesitated a moment. "I shall expect to find that you have grown quite accustomed to our ways at Yew Lodge."

Bessie stood still in the narrow path and faced him.

"I love your mother!" she cried, "but——"

"Well, what is it?"

She hesitated.

"Won't you tell me?" asked Edmund.

"Yes, I will tell you, because I knew you first, and you were very patient and kind, Edmund." He put out his hand as if to stop her, but she would not heed. "I don't think that I shall ever get accustomed to the ways of Yew Lodge."

He, too, had begun to have his doubts on the subject; but he was shocked to hear her say so. Every now and then this little cousin, with the wistful, brown eyes, surprised him by her decided opinions on people and things.

"Your father does not like me."

"How can you say so? It is a mistake."

"Very well," replied Bessie, shifting her ground. "I do not please him. He finds fault with me. I had better go away."

Edmund listened aghast. In these few weeks she had become very dear to him; it distressed him beyond measure to hear her speak in this manner, and all the more because there was a foundation of truth in her statement. His father was good and true as gold, but he could upon occasion speak in a stern, hard fashion. And the girl, who talked in her ignorance of "going away," was entirely unfitted to earn her own livelihood, and, moreover, was absolutely penniless. She was his father's ward; she had been treated with every consideration. A sense of wounded pride caused him to say, quietly—

"I am very sorry."

"There!" exclaimed Bessie, "now you are angry with me too!"

"No, don't think that, but I am so disappointed."

She drew a deep breath; it had not occurred to her that he would receive her confidence in this way; she had expected that he would make light of her grievance, and he was distressed and hurt.

In the whole world there breathed no human being for whom she cared so much as Edmund Ravensdale; with a pang of deep remorse she perceived how ungrateful her speech must appear to him.

"I did not mean it," she said, softly, desirous to make amends, no matter at what sacrifice; "do forgive me, Edmund. I know it was wrong."

Edmund had recovered himself.

"There is nothing to forgive," he said, cheerily; "only my little cousin is even more foolish sometimes in her fancies than I had supposed. We mean well by you, Bessie, all of us; perhaps our ways are not quite like yours, but you must give and take. And remember, whatever you may think, my father loves you; I know he does. Why are you so nervous and unlike yourself when he speaks to you? Try and trust him a little more——"

"Edmund, Bessie," cried a voice from the drawing-room window, "it is time to come in."

The young people walked slowly towards the house.

"I will try and remember what you have said," faltered Bessie, "and promise me just one thing, please, Edmund."

"I will promise you everything!"

She put her hand on his arm.

"Whatever happens, whatever you may hear of me, do recollect what I tell you. I will try to do as you wish—don't think worse of me than you can help."

"I think a great deal better of you than you have any idea of. Don't indulge in foolish fancies. Look, there is mother at the window."

"But you promise?"

"Yes, I promise faithfully."

Bessie ran into the house, and he followed slowly, wondering to himself how it would all end, and whether the child of the Bohemian man of genius would ever settle down happily under his father's roof.

* * * * *

"She has run wild now for a month," said Mr. Ravensdale to his wife, "and it is high time that she had some definite occupation, if we do not want her to be a complete ignoramus."

"She plays very nicely, Alfred."

"Yes, I do not believe that she is lacking in ability, but she had better begin a regular course of study as soon as possible."

Accordingly, a day or so later, Mr. Ravensdale informed his ward that he had made arrangements for her to spend part of the morning with Miss Williams, the vicar's sister, a clever, highly-educated person, who had kindly agreed to undertake a pupil.

Bessie listened in dismay. She was to be considered a mere schoolgirl—she, who had been her father's constant companion, she, who aspired to fill a high place in the world, was to submit to becoming the pupil of an uninteresting old maid! Had she not seen Miss Williams very often? She was a dreary, melancholy, middle-aged woman, who wore a grey gown trimmed with green ribbons. That fact alone would have been sufficient to cause a discriminating person to regard her with suspicion. So thought our heroine, as her cousin patiently explained to her how anxious he was that she should enjoy every advantage that the neighbourhood afforded. It was his misfortune that while he was sincerely desirous to act rightly by Owen Stanhope's daughter, while his heart was full of tenderness, Mr. Ravensdale's manner was so unsympathetic, that Bessie regarded him merely in the light of a cruel persecutor.

She sat there, silent indeed, but burning with indignation against the hard fate which had doomed her to live at Hazelton, and still more against the stern decree which would force her into having lessons from a Miss Williams. But she had not heard the worst—not yet.

"I daresay, Elizabeth, that you will also be glad to improve yourself in mathematics, so I have asked Mr. Yeatman to come here twice a week. He has had great experience and thoroughly understands how to teach, and I am sure that you have too much sense to object to him because he is the village school-master."

"I do not mind that, not at all," said Bessie, at last, striving her utmost to be calm and collected, "but I want to do other things. I do not see how there will be time for so many lessons."

"You want time for your singing and gardening and sewing? Of course, my wife has told me that already. Well, my dear, she will see that you are not overworked, but remember that this is the golden hour for study now that you are young. However, let me have good accounts of your perseverance and industry, and I shall be well satisfied."

She had said all that she dared; there was no chance of escape, and cousin Edith was against her too. When she left the study she ran to find her precious MS. book. The writing had made but little progress lately, but to-day she longed to pour out her feelings, and seized a pen impatiently. At the end of a quarter of an hour she threw it down again. Her verses about "hate and fate, spurn and stern," seemed very unsatisfactory. She had already become deeply attached to cousin Edith; she had spent many happy hours with her and many more with Edmund. Was it true? Had she been so grievously ill-treated at Yew Lodge?

There was a knock at the door.

"May I come in, love?"

Bessie flung the velvet-bound book on one side, and unbolted the door.

"I am going down the village," said Mrs. Ravensdale. "I should be so glad of your company."

Bessie gulped down her misery and pride; it was hard to be angry with cousin Edith. She would follow Edmund's advice for once.

"Yes," she said, forcing back her tears, "I should like to come with you, cousin Edith."

A HARVEST SABBATH.

By J. HUIE.

BUT yesterday the yellow fields
Were all alive with busy hands;
To-day the quiet sunshine gilds
With lovelier light the silent lands.

God's "peace, be still," has made a calm
From sea to sea, and there is rest;
And man can hear the heavenly psalm
That fills the land from east to west.

The song of rest, the song of peace,
In harmonies from far away,
Come on soft winds, and bring release
Of tranquil, happy, holy day.

The weapons of man's weary toil
Lie still beside the shining corn;
And voices native to the soil
Hail with glad songs the Sabbath morn.

Hard voices of the harsh turmoil
Are hushed across the sunny lea;
The burden of the six days' toil
Is laid aside, and man is free.

Free for the soul to rise and sing
Above the clouds of care and strife
Free to ascend on thoughtful wing,
And view the sunlit heights of life.

Hail, day of rest—the best of earth,
Type of that rest of endless day,
Of brighter dawn and holier birth,
The heaven that waits us far away.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A SAD MAY MORNING ON MAGDALEN TOWER.

AFTER Kitty had made the little effort for friendship's sake, before she had fallen back into her state of depression, she was again summoned by Lady Ottery to take what at the first glance struck Kitty as an absolutely unbecoming and impossible step.

"Kitty," said Dame Tabitha, "it will be but a drear May morning on Magdalen Tower this year to many more than thee. Methinks the ceremony were more honoured by its omission than by its observance in these sad times. It hath been omitted more than once, but as I hear the rite is to be kept this year, I would have thee go and hail the sunrise with the rest. For the summer sun is good though it shine on graves, and God, who is the giver both of the summer and the sun, ought to be praised."

"Madam, I cannot," said Kitty, staring in wonder and with a choke in her utterance. "I'd as lief go a-maying and gather fritillaries in the meadows. I trust I have given my dear brother to One who hath a better right to him than I, until He shall see fit to give my Jackie back to me. But ere I can list to songs even in God's praise, where he lieth low, time must have gone on a little farther. It is scarce a little month since we lost him."

"I know," said the old woman, modulating her deep rough voice to greater gentleness. "I have not forgot, poor maid, but it is for the sake of one who desireth speech with thee and cannot contrive it elsewhere. There is such wrath and suspicion aroused in the town, since the last battle we wot of, which hath cost us dear, that he dare not venture again as far as my lodging under any disguise. It is thy cousin Anthony Walton. He hath somewhat of pressing import concerning his family to tell thee. I see not, considering he is now thy nearest kinsman after thy father, to whom thou canst turn, and was poor Jack's friend, how thou canst refuse upon a scruple of feeling to give him the opportunity. These are days when rules and forms otherwise excellent, ay, and natural feelings must be put on one side, and they who mourn be as though they mourned not. But better days will come, trust me, child, when thou mayst love to stand in Magdalen Tower for the very reason that dear dust lieth below, and when thou mayst have a pensive pleasure in plucking the fritillaries because of the old friends with whom thou pluckedst them when thy heart was light and thou and the world were young together."

"What can ail them at Islip Barnes?" asked Kitty, anxiously. "My poor aunt had always her spring bout of illness—can she be sinking under it this time?"

"It booteth not to inquire where there is no answer forthcoming. Take thy woman Pettit with thee on May morning, and thou wilt learn the truth. All that I was told by a messenger, who durst not bring a letter, was that I must get thee to go with the company to the top of Magdalen Tower on May morning, for thy cousin could mingle with the people, enter, and climb the stair, and tell thee the tidings he was there to convey. Even if he were seen and recognised, he is an old Magdalen man, he hath plenty of friends still, who could put him out of sight and smuggle him out. The gist of the matter is that there is a family affair which he is anxious to communicate to you, and will be there at his proper risk to do it."

"I will tell my father, of course," said Kitty, musing. "I think not that he will prevent me; though strict in some things, he hath always left me and Mrs. Judy very much to our own judgment, and to yours, dear Lady Ottery, in what becometh a maid like me in going out and coming in, and in appearing before the public. He knoweth well now how much our Jack owed to his cousins, the Waltons, when he had no home save Islip Barnes. But I believe father would not yet come face to face with cousin Anthony for the world, even if it were wise and not like to compromise both men, supposing it were ever found out that they had met by appointment at such a place and season. Oh! every little act is a ticklish business in such circumstances. For me I wis not how I am to go with Mrs. Judy to encounter the crowd of merry-makers, for say what you will about an ancient religious ceremony and a Latin hymn sung in honour of the Deity, I have been there in happier days with Jack, and these are merry-makers who assemble on Magdalen Tower on May morning."

"Many a heart will know its own bitterness," said Lady Ottery. "Thou wilt not be singular, Kitty, and thou hast an advantage in one respect, for whereas thy sorrow is open, not a few poor wights will have to hide deadly wounds under smiling exteriors."

"Yes, but ah! me, I am in no humour for merry-making," said Kitty, looking mournfully down at the black dress, against which her little hands and wrists crossing each other looked so white and slender. "If cousin Anthony hath not something past ordinary to tell, I shall not easily forgive him for exposing me to such a trial. It is not like him neither," Kitty took herself back with a softening face, "for ever since he became head of the house and squire of Islip Barnes by uncle Walton's death, when his son was little better than a boy, I can see that now—though I can remember I thought him at the time a great dictating, teasing fellow—he hath been well accustomed to think and care for others. Nay, if he had not thought of me and come to my aid in the fire, I should not be standing here now. You read his letter which father hath concerning Jack's death, madam? He had seen himself compelled to bide at home during the war, though he was more of a fighter at heart than his friend was, because of the women folk in trouble and jeopardy."

"When I think the message over again," said Lady Ottery, suddenly, "I misdoubt me I have been remiss in speaking of your woman Pettit as sufficient escort for thee. I considered but my own stiffness of joints, and that I had not been at the top of Magdalen Tower for a good score years. But I am an old campaigner," remarked Dame Tabitha, with a grim smile. "My joints may be stiff, but my sinews are tough and can stand some strain. If the worst come to the worst people can but carry me; I'm long but I'm gaunt; I'll not stop up the way to the summit of the tower."

It was between three and four o'clock on a summer morning, when the grey dawn had a dimness and haziness of blue and white sky and clouds which befitted the fresh, chilly air, that Kitty and Lady Ottery, with one of her ladyship's men in attendance in case of night revellers and any disorders in the streets, traversed a sleeping Oxford. For though a venerable ceremonial was about to be celebrated, which had been wont to attract many of the citizens even at so early an hour, only those belonging to the college or having some interest in it, with the dwellers in the immediate neighbourhood of the East Gate, and a sprinkling of people from the country without, were sufficiently disengaged to join in the performance in this year of warfare.

By a singular exemption, in part due to the strong site of the water-girdled city, in part to an invariable reluctance in general after general of the Parliamentary army to level to the ground the ancient seats of learning, and destroy the institutions which the beneficence of the men's ancestors had founded for the enlightenment of England and the world, Oxford was very little injured materially by the camps which had so long encompassed it. It was the moral disorganisation, the deserted air of the colleges, or their abandonment to other uses than those for which they were designed; the sentries and their captains in place of the proctors and their bulldogs; the hosteleries doing a brisk business even before cock-crowing; the change-houses still lit up and swarming with soldiers, among whom were a few debauched students, that marked what Oxford had suffered.

Kitty Dacre and Lady Ottery walked slowly because of the dame's infirmities, and looked around them on account of the novelty of their presence there at such an hour, like people in a dream, or like strangers in a place they had never passed through before.

In the distance could be seen the low tower of St. Martin's Church, the bells of which had rung in rivalry with those of St. Mary on the winter day which helped to decide John Dacre's fate, and the old Bocardo Prison above the north gate, with its two round towers. In Bocardo some of the martyrs had lain on their way to their fiery martyrdom. In the same quarter rose the oldest tower in Oxford—Robert d'Oilgi's tower of St. Michael's, dating from the days of Henry I. The beautiful street—beautiful then as now—took Lady Ottery and Kitty past the churches of All Hallows and St. Mary the Virgin, with its porch containing the mutilated statues of the Virgin and Child, which William Laud, now sleeping in his bloody grave, caused to be reared in his time of power. Another archbishop's memory is linked with St. Mary's. There Thomas Cranmer sat and listened to the sermon preached at him before his execution, and when he was called on to recant his false doctrines in the face of the congregation, recanted his recantation instead, and was hustled forth to be chained to the stake among the faggots in the city ditch, and to plunge his right hand in the flames, that the guilty member which had writ his recantation might bear its punishment and perish first. The colleges of All Souls and Queen's came in their turn, and at last the East Gate, which was open for the occasion, so that the ladies passed out unchallenged.

Some little distance beyond, rising up by the Cherwell, the tall grey tower of Magdalen stirred Kitty's heart. On the other side of the road lay the Physic Gardens, where the old Jews' burying-ground had been. The land had been presented to the town by Lord Danby fifteen years before. It had been the delight of Kitty's childhood to be taken to walk among its vegetable monsters—Hercules with his club and Achilles with his shield in yew, and in box lions and peacocks innumerable. There was a considerable crowd in point of number, seeing that there was no longer leisure for gracious ceremonies, assembled round the college. All the boys and lads in the gathering were provided, as they had taken the precaution to be for fully a week before May-day, with horns or tin trumpets, large and small, which were to figure in the proceedings. One might have thought May was September, and that the fairs of St. Giles' and Clement's were in full operation.

It was likely, from the look of the sky in which the morning star was fading, and the feeling of the air, which had a balmy breath in its chilliness, to be as sweet a Mayday as had ever ushered in the summer before Magdalen was built, when Oxford was still but a few "religious houses," with Beaumont Palace and Osney Abbey to lend them strength and state, surrounded by forest; when there was no civil war devastating the land or hostile camps at the gates. But already for many a long year the rite in connection with Magdalen had preluded the maying by the Cherwell and the Isis, so that the pairs of young lovers and happy family groups of holiday-makers, with their arms full of kingcups, marsh-marigolds, and lady's-smocks, as well as may and fritillaries, were not yet set out on their quest. They had no trophy of may to show save the dew with which they had taken care to wash their faces. It was hanging thick on the shoes and skirts of those pedestrians who had brushed along the field paths and through the woods to keep their early appointment.

It was a proof how inveterate were old customs and traditions, to find, under every discouragement and difficulty, so many at the old rendezvous. To be sure it was a kind of neutral ground on which former neighbours and friends could meet and exchange words of truce. For this purpose, keeping well in the background and taking up their posts in out-of-the-way corners, there were more than two or three of Fairfax's soldiers approaching thus near to the stronghold of the enemy without the direct knowledge or express permission of their officers.

Lady Ottery and Kitty, by virtue of her ladyship's rank and a certain authoritative dignity which never forsook her in her homeliness, made their way through the throng to the foot of the tower. Looking up, they could see that the summit was already crowned with the white or black figures of choristers, and members of the college, and with visitors waiting till the golden ball of the sun should rise above the eastern horizon. Kitty knew where to go; but Lady Ottery, though she was staunch and indefatigable, and gallantly faced the stair without having herself carried up, as she had threatened, was so long in her progress that the sun rose before she had reached the top, and the Magdalen May-morning matins burst forth,

*"Thee, God our Father, we confess;
To Thee alone our lauds are given."*

in Latin phrase, greeted the sun from the sweet-throated choristers, as it may be he was greeted with other words, not as God's creature, but as God himself, by pagan worshippers.

The hymn would be followed, according to a fashion which has fallen into disuse, by a collection of secular glees and madrigals; but in the meantime its solemn rolling cadences were sadly marred to those in the road below by the hideous discord which, after old use and wont, the boys and youths among the citizens made by sounding the horns and the trumpets. The origin of the privileged but unseemly interruption was variously stated. Some said it began at the Reformation, when, enraged by the Latin hymn, which they regarded as a relic of popery, the irate Reformers adopted this method of drowning the performance. Others held that the instruments of torture were in remembrance by the horns which had called the citizens whom the bells of St. Martin's failed to summon to the frays between town and gown, and that it was in rivalry with the bells of Magdalen, as representing for the moment the bells of St. Mary, and not in competition with the Latin hymn, that the braying arose. As a matter of fact, when the hymn closed with the noble

*"O Triune God, most glorious,
From whom our souls' salvation sprang,
We hail the boundless mystery
With joyous and triumphant tongue,"*

the bells of Magdalen clashed with such a powerful appeal, that a strange effect was produced. For the old tower rocked to its foundation, as it does to this day, on May morning, like a ship on a stormy sea.

It was amidst the swaying and vibrating of the tower, giddy and dazzled with the glitter of the first long rays of the sun succeeding the twilight of the stair, that Kitty stepped out after Lady Ottery on the platform. There they were immediately received by Anthony Walton, wearing no other disguise than his old college gown and cap, in which certainly he was more indistinguishable among the groups of college men similarly attired than he could have been in any other dress. He had been on the watch for his cousin, fearing that she was not coming, and sprang forward at the first sight of her.

"This is kind, cousin Kitty. This is more than kind, Lady Ottery," he said, fervently.

Kitty, in her heavy black dress, was trembling perceptibly. She was deeply moved, and could only control herself by a violent effort. It seemed as with Anthony Jack must appear—Jack, who would never more on earth gladden his sister's loving eyes; Jack, who in his comely young body was lying beneath the chapel pavement, unrecking of all that passed in the world around him.

Anthony Walton in his turn was so agitated and looked so haggard and worn, that Lady Ottery, trusting him fully, thought it kinder to him and to Kitty to leave him to tell her his errand, the two standing apart half hidden by a buttress, while she, Lady Ottery, spoke to some acquaintances whom she discovered among the select company.

At first Kitty thought it was about Jack that Anthony was so troubled, and her heart went out to him in warm gratitude for his kind kinsmanly sympathy. Instinctively she put out her hands to him in mute acknowledgment. He took them and grasped them tightly, but the next words he said showed her that though he had not forgotten her loss, his face was darkening and working with further tribulation.

"I would not have brought thee here, dear heart; I have not forgot what stood between; but there is no remedy. Your cousin Prissy is in sore distress. Colonel Windebank has been taken up for the surrender of Bletchington House to General Cromwell and his dragoons; he is lying in the castle here, and is to be tried by court-martial."

"Oh, dear!" cried Kitty. "I had not heard, nor I think had father. He hath mixed less in such matters since—since you know when, cousin. I am much concerned for my dear Prissy and Colonel Windebank; but it will be but a term of imprisonment, shorter or longer; bad as that is, it will come to an end. They can do nought else, and he one of their own officers of the best repute. He was overpowered by numbers; even if he could depend on his garrison, it would have been a criminal waste of life to hold out."

Anthony shook his head.

"They are mad with rage at the loss of the battle, and the failure of the plan for the King to co-operate with Rupert. Things are going badly with them, as even their friends must confess, and they seek a scapegoat. They say Windebank surrendered without striking a blow; as if a thousand blows would have kept the place against its assailants. Resistance would only have swelled the lists of the slain. But what care they if they can put out their disappointment and fury plausibly on an unfortunate victim? It is the way of the world," he ended, bitterly.

"But what think you, Anthony?" she questioned him breathlessly. "Could Colonel Windebank have stood out with any chance of saving the place for the King? And if there was no chance, would the governor have been warranted in spilling blood like water for the mere name of a defence? I have heard tell he was a very reasonable and humane man; sure he only acted in keeping with common sense and common humanity. Why, even in the King's interest, he spared his Majesty's servants to fight for him another day."

"They will not think or heed that," said Anthony, slowly and sadly; "when their blood is up and they are thirsting for reprisals to wipe out what they hold a dire disgrace, they are in no mood for such considerations. I cannot tell whether Windebank might not have been deceived, whether it is not just possible that he might have successfully defied the enemy, as the Governor of Farrington hath done. Windebank acted for the best, I make no doubt of that; but in justice to his accusers, one must remember that prestige goeth for much in war. They say he knew three-fourths of his garrison had no heart for the fight; but what matters that when everybody knows that though he strove to be faithful to his commission, his own heart inclined the other way? Would to heaven he had been not three-fourths, but out and out with the Parliament, then he would have thrown up that accursed commission. I shock you, cousin Kitty; but my heart waxes hot within me over the thought of many more officers in Windebank's plight, though God forbid that any of them should pay so dear for it. Would that he had sailed for America with poor Prissy, as I have often turned over in my mind whether they had not better do. Said I not that there was cause for thankfulness as well as for mourning in your Jack's death—that it was what many of us might court before all was done?"

"But it is not so bad as that?" cried Kitty, under her breath, with eyes opening wider and wider in horror and dismay. "Can nothing be done to save Colonel Windebank? Will his superior officers, who knew his worth, and how greatly he did distinguish himself in foreign campaigns of which Prissy and Alice used to talk long ago, not intercede powerfully for him? Will the King, who is so good and so grievously tried himself, not interpose on Colonel Windebank's behalf?"

Anthony made a gesture of despair.

"It will go hard with him," he groaned. "The least suspicion of having failed in his trust, though it might be but by an error of judgment, is enough in the circumstances. Martial law admits of no excuses; it is as stern as any Roman code. Dost not see, child, that to have distinguished himself in foreign service and left his sword in the sheath when his King's cause called for it only renders the business a thousand times worse? No, Jack is gone, and now it is poor Windebank's turn, and I alone am left to tell it."

"It was no fault of thine, cousin Anthony," whispered Kitty, pressing closer to him. "I grieve for thee to have lost thy friends."

"It is sweet of thee to spare grief for me; but a truce to my selfish repinings. Windebank must be made an example of. Who of his old comrades among the Royalists, who have not turned against him, will venture to plead for mercy when the pleading will compromise the pleader and may well ruin him? The King hath been a good master—ay, an over-indulgent, over-generous master—but he cannot forgive when he hath been brought to admit an injury; when once he is offended, he is implacable. No, I fear me there is no hope—not a grain. I am come to bespeak your kindness for Prissy. My hands are tied. I am in no great peril here, but if I were seen within the gates I should be laid hold of and dragged to give evidence against Colonel Windebank. His connection with our family is well known, and such suspicion and rage have been aroused that I begin to think 'twere well if I were out of these parts. My presence hath ceased to do good, and commences to do harm."

Kitty's countenance fell and her heart sank also, if Anthony could have seen that too, but she dared not, even if she had possessed the right, make any opposition.

"You know best," she said, meekly, "but thou wilt do nought in a hurry."

"No, sweet heart, but all the same I believe my work here is done. 'Twere better that I joined a branch of the army and dealt one stout stroke for the cause I have espoused. Neither King nor Council can have up harmless women and imprison them, even if they harry them of their goods, and there are always some honest men to stand up for them. Yet Prissy durst not, for his sake, enter Oxford till sentence be given to-day or to-morrow, when my mind misgiveth me that short shrift will be granted him. But when it cometh to the last she will not be denied the miserable consolation of bidding him farewell. Hearts of stone could not deny her that, any more than if she were his wedded wife. Thou wilt look after my poor girl, my dearest sister, when none of her own can be with her, in the dark hours before her. Kitty, I trust and pray that no harm will come to thee for the charitable act. As far as I can judge, Dr. Dacre's principles are too well known for doubt or blame to attach to thee or him. Alice may not leave our mother for any length of time. In good sooth she is not fit to be left for an hour, her nerves are in so sorry a state, and the thought of any negligence, where she was concerned, Prissy could not away with; it would add double to her tribulation."

"Trust me, Anthony," said Kitty, with her heart on her lips. "I'll do all I can. Oh, what would I not do for my dear Prissy! I'll speak to father. I think—nay, I know, he will be deeply grieved, and will do all in his power for poor Jack's cousin. I hope, I feel sure, he will put his rooms at her service; but as there is no time to tarry she will go straight to Lady Ottery's lodging, where all the desolate and oppressed are welcome, and where she will be right welcome for her own precious sake as well as for her misfortunes. I will go to her there; father cannot seek to prevent that, and stay by my own kind cousin, who kissed Jackie in his coffin for me; I will stay with her day and night till I can give her back to thee again. Trust me, cousin Anthony."

"I do trust thee, cousin Kitty, and God for ever bless thee for a loyal, tender soul."

Anthony and Kitty were arrested in their conversation by the commencement of the glees and madrigals, which were little in keeping with the couple's frame of mind. They missed the last characteristic act of the May morning's performance, when the choristers—demys and freshmen—stripped off their white and black gowns, rolled them up in so many bundles, and hurled them, with the accompanying trencher hats, at the braying crowd below, as a traditional typical specimen of the abiding strife between town and gown. But who had eyes for the farce when the tragedy was at the door? Not Anthony Walton and Kitty Dacre.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MUSIC.

N. C.—Of the Guildhall School of Music, the secretary is Mr. Charles P. Smith, Victoria Embankment, London, S.W. There are four or five students' homes in town, one of which is the Russell House, Tavistock Square, W.C.—principal Miss Cail; and another is the Royal Alexandra Home for Art and Music Students, South Kensington, S.W. Also 4 and 5, Brunswick Square, W.C., an Art Students' Home, of which the president is the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. The charge for board and residence is one guinea weekly, but some reduction is made in a few special cases. Applications to be made to "the lady resident," who is at home on Thursdays from twelve to four o'clock, or on any other day by appointment. We hope that one of these may suit you.

SNOWDROP.—Mandolines are to be had at any musical instrument shop.

LABURNUM.—The Royal College of Music is at Kensington Gore, S.W., and the Royal Academy of Music is at 4, Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, W. These two institutions have no connection one with the other. The hon. sec. of the former is Charles Morley, Esq., and the principal of the latter is Dr. A. C. Mackenzie.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A SISTER OF CHARITY.—We do not see any defects worth a criticism on our part in your letter, excepting that you should unite all the letters of each word respectively together.

ONE OF—DAUGHTERS.—There are no faults in spelling in your letter, but the writing is very illegible. We cannot read the name of your respected parent. Your "r's" are made like "y's," and most of the letters are given long tails, which look as if the ink had run, and are very confusing. It is a point of good breeding to spare your reader all trouble in deciphering your writing.

CURIOUS MEG.—The word "Hypnotism," of which we have recently heard so much, is derived from the Greek name ὑπνός, that of the god of sleep. But the description of sleep artificially produced by mesmerists is an unnatural cataleptic condition, which tends to weaken the brain and the will powers, and reduces the subject to a state of slavish submission to the will of the operator.

NINA.—It is not natural to some people to have a colour. Keep early hours, get as much outdoor air as you can, wash your face in cold water, and eat wholesome food in moderation. If you still have no colour, be satisfied without it; if not, we can only tell you that the method adopted by certain dandies and vain women, at a very frivolous period, was to sleep at night with slices of raw beefsteaks tied upon each cheek, which was thought to produce in time a similar hue in the cheeks. Remember, we do not recommend this charming prescription, but only relate the circumstance as a historical fact.

HAZELNUTS (Paris).—Your English is fairly good, and with a little practice you would write very well. Of course there is such a thing as a romantic friendship between persons of the same sex (but this is not what is meant by "falling in love"). If a nice, well-conducted girl, and of your own position in life, why not let the lady to whom you refer know that you entertain so kind a feeling towards her? It may gratify her much.

CARMEN B. (Paris).—We sympathise much with you in your lonely position. But the more lonely the more careful you should be of forming friendships with "boys" and men, and of admitting them as visitors. You should always have a lady friend with you, older than yourself, should they pay you a visit; and never admit any man when alone, more especially of "an evening." This would be very indiscreet. Having no mother, and in the absence of your father, you need a chaperone or companion; and should any man or "boy" call on you, even were a lady friend with you, you should name the fact to your father. Have no clandestine interviews if you regard your fair name and peace (at least) between you and your father. However neglectful of his duty towards you, never violate yours towards him; and pray for help and guidance from above. Had your mother no intimate friends whom you could visit?

FERINDA, AGNES, MAY.—Common sense might suggest the obvious reasons why the wearing of a cap is specially desirable for a domestic servant. A woman who has to sweep and dust and make beds would get her hair full of feathers and dust; and as she is exposed to draughts, her hair gets blown about; while she has little time for hair-dressing and cleaning. A nice clean cap guarantees a certain degree of cleanliness and tidiness, and thus is very desirable. As to a cook, it is indeed essential that loose hairs should not fall into the soups and other dishes over which she is occupied. Even men cooks, with short hair, acknowledge the propriety of keeping the head covered, for they always wear a white paper or linen cap. No respectable maid who wished to look well would be without one; only a poor lodging-house servant (and very few of them) would wear the narrow strap, called a "flag," almost useless as it is; only the "odd girl" would wear nothing. A lady's maid is often permitted to go bareheaded, simply because the nature of her work dispenses with the necessity for wearing that pretty and becoming white covering.

NIGHTSHADE.—The round patches on the windows of new houses mean that the house is finished and the workmen (masons, etc.) have left.

L. E. L.—There have been several endings to "Edwin Drood," the best being that of the late R. A. Proctor, called "Watched by the Dead." Another was by an anonymous hand, but said to be by Wilkie Collins, and is called "John Jasper's Secret." Proctor's is the best theory on the solution of the subject of the mystery.

WATTER WISE.—Oorali, spoken of by Tennyson, is also called woorali, urati, and ourara. It is the fearful Indian poison in which the natives of South America dip their arrows, prepared from the juice of strychnos crevazui. It is used by the vivisectionist in his fiendish cruelty, for when injected under the skin of an animal it produces complete paralysis, and though suffering the most dreadful agonies it can neither move nor cry; nor can the experimenter be hindered in his task by the least opposition from his poor victim.

PERPLEXED AND TROUBLED GIRL.—The disparity is but trifling, though "on the wrong side." The trouble consists in the youth of your lover. He is not yet "of age," and cannot know his own mind beyond the present moment; nor has he had all the opportunity for seeing other girls and making a choice amongst several. However, you might accept his addresses conditionally, that at the end of two or three years he remain of the same mind. This is all you can do; it is due to him as a minor, and essential for your own future happiness.

GRATEFUL GLADYS.—We fancy the toothache and swelling have to do with health, probably the state of your stomach. Why not consult a doctor?

MY LIFE IN JERUSALEM.

By CONSTANCE M. FINN.

PART II.

ONE of our other encampments was a valley surrounded by high hills seven miles off—beyond Bethlehem and near Solomon's Pools. This place was highly cultivated as a farm, and we had there fruit and vegetables in abundance. There were cows kept too, so that we got their milk and butter, which was a rare treat; and plenty of honey, some of which was got out of the rocks where the wild bees had placed it. Peach-trees grew to a large size as standards, and had to be propped up to support the weight of fruit with which they were loaded. There were also pears, apples, figs, grapes, sweet lemons, greengages, and apricots. Of vegetables we had a variety, including tomatoes, and a great deal of Indian corn, of which we were very fond.

There was a spring of fresh water at the top of the valley, which watered all the garden plots, and kept them very fresh and green. At its source quantities of maidenhair grew, and we saw hundreds of goats and sheep taken there in the middle of the day to have their drink and rest. And in the evening the girls of the village gathered round, chattering and laughing, to fill their small jars with fresh spring water for the family supper.

I used to think it great fun when our nurse took us to the spring, lower in the valley, to have our morning bath; and I remember often watching my brother seated in the middle of the stream on the smooth round pebbles, while nurse poured the water out of a jug over him, and then came my turn.

They kept dogs at this farm, to protect the crops from the wild beasts who came to devour them, and sometimes there were most exciting chases. At night it would be after jackals, who came to eat the grapes; or badgers, who got up on their hind legs and devoured the Indian corn. Porcupines also attacked the fruit, and we could hear the barking of the dogs as they pursued them down the valley. Once, however, they were regularly puzzled, for they chose to run after a hedgehog one day, and we could not help laughing to see them, for as soon as they came up to it, it rolled itself quickly up into a ball, pricks outside, so that when they tried to grab at it with their teeth, they had to retire instead with bleeding noses.

Hyenas prowled about the tents at night, not to attack us, for they do not attack man unless they are famished, and prefer donkey flesh to almost anything else; but I often lay awake with fear, hearing them jumping and running over our tent ropes, and uttering most unearthly sounds, like someone in great pain; but the dogs soon chased them away. One night, when our nurse had tucked us up in bed, she closed the tent and went back to the house for her supper; soon the hyenas began to dance about outside, and I remember counting the seconds till she returned. Though we heard them so near, I do not think I ever saw one till I went to the Zoological Gardens in London. Once our nursery tent was pitched close to a wall made of loose stones, and in the middle of the night we heard a great noise of some creature getting on the wall, and the stones tumbling down, and next morning we found the leg-bone of a white donkey on the wall, and our neighbour sent to ask if we had seen his favourite donkey, which was missing. We had little doubt that a hyena had made his supper off it, and was disturbed when finishing the last pickings on our wall. We always knew if a hyena was near the stable, by the donkeys shivering with fear, and getting very restless.

I shall never forget the happy times spent in this lovely spot, and shutting my eyes can see it all before me in bright sunny colours, and can recall very vividly the smell of the fig-trees, and hear the gurgling of the stream over the pebbles, dancing with sweet music to the valley below, and goldfinches singing in the trees. Our last experience of tent life was about a mile further off, above the Pools, on the top of a high hill. The tents were pitched as usual round the stone cottage on the next ledge, and down to the plain below the hill was one succession of terraces draped with hanging vines. We children rose before the sun, about half-past four, and having made a cup of coffee with the help of the servants, carried it to my mother's tent, and called her to get up. Each time we did this, she gave us each a coin worth the fifth part of a farthing, called "para," and these we saved up carefully to buy peppermints with when we got back to Jerusalem. Then we scampered off to get some fresh fruit, with the dew on it, for breakfast, or to a field at the back of the house, where quantities of tall thistles grew with rich clusters of blossoms like purple balls, and these we switched off with sticks, and called it cutting off our enemies' heads.

Then came breakfast and lessons, and in the afternoon we played about and took a ride or walk. Some of our rides were very interesting. At the back of the hill was a wild stretch of country, high hills and valleys, covered with wild thyme of every shade of purple, lilac, and white, and brushwood growing up from the roots of the old forest trees—oak, pine, terebinth, and arbutus trees; on the latter we found rich, red, sweet berries, larger than a wild strawberry, which we ate.

We could see from here the Valley of Elah, where David and Goliath met, and beyond it the vast tract of country stretching to the Philistine country, covered with golden corn. When my father was once riding through this district the wheat was so tall that it was sometimes over his head as he rode through it on horseback, and he had to steer by the distant hills, as there were no paths in that sea of corn.

On one of the hills near we found beautiful fossils of shells in flint, some very perfect. A little way off was another high hill, where the air was so fresh and delicious that we used to stand sometimes for a few minutes with our mouths open, and then, without speaking, shut them tight and rush home to take my mother some fresh air, as we said; but we generally laughed before we got home, and there was an end of our plan!

A STREET IN JERUSALEM.

My eldest brother was old enough to be trusted with a gun, and my little brother and I were very proud of being allowed to accompany him on his shooting expeditions, one to carry the powder and shot, and the other to carry home the game. The latter never made our arms ache with its weight, for he seldom killed any but small birds; sometimes they were the many-coloured bright bee catchers which flitted about among the fig-trees, or the tiny "bee-figures." Once he fired at a hare, with the only result of shooting off its tail, which it ran away without; and once at a bird on a fig-tree, and when we ran forward to pick up what came tumbling down, we found only the head, the poor bird's body remaining firmly on the branch where it had been. Once my brother and I went for a ride—he on my father's high-spirited grey mare, and I on Jerry. Presently among the rocks we saw a white owl, and, dismounting, my brother gave me the reins to hold, and creeping cautiously forward, shot the owl. The loud report startled the mare and made Jerry almost unmanageable. When we got home, carrying our prize in triumph, and thinking we had done a very grand thing, my father said we were wrong to shoot the beautiful creature, especially as owls were on our coat of arms!

Once my father and I went out riding, and I had been singing as we went along on a wild hill-side, when we noticed a hare running as if for its life, dodging among the bushes, dreadfully frightened, and as if pursued by something which we could not see. Something, however, made us look up suddenly, and there high up in the far distance was a large eagle hovering in the sky. It did not seem to be moving, but yet was always just over the hare, till in one moment, like a flash of lightning, down it came and seized its prey. We often picked up porcupine quills on these hill-sides, and once saw a heron.

On the hill of our encampment, below the house, was a stone watch-tower, and this we were allowed to play in sometimes; we swept it out clean, and invited friends to come to a fruit feast of grapes, growing just outside the door, and figs which we ran on to the roof to pick off the fig-tree which overshadowed it. In the plain below were the pools cut out of the live rock by Solomon, as reservoirs of water, supplied by a spring close by. There are three of these pools; the top one was always full of blue water, the second was about half full, and the third nearly always empty. Once when it was quite dry, I walked down into it by means of the steps cut in the rock. The bottom floor was covered with soft, dry weed-like hay, and the walls of the pool were covered with the transparent skeletons of thousands of locusts, which seemed to have rested in their flight, and had been suddenly killed on the walls in some mysterious manner. It was a most curious sight.

The plain round the pools was bright in autumn with millions of crocuses—purple, white, and golden. Sometimes we collected acorns and had sham fights, retiring into our tents from the enemy when they came thick and fast. Once we made some acorn coffee, which someone had told us was very good, but the experiment was not repeated, for we agreed that we had seldom, if ever, tasted anything so nasty before. Often when my father and mother had ridden into Jerusalem, we collected quantities of dry brushwood, and when it got dark we and the servants made a huge bonfire to show them the way home. Darkness came on very soon after the sun had set, and there was very little twilight. The view from the front of the house was a very beautiful one. On the left, at the top of a hill, lay the town of Bethlehem, and in it we could see the long roof of the Church of the Nativity, built by the Empress Helena 1,500 years ago, supposing it to be the place where our Saviour was born.

On the right was the remarkable volcanic mountain on which Herod the Great was buried. The whole Eastern background is taken up by the range of Moab mountains, the colours of which were our wonder and admiration.

In autumn, before the sun set, they reflected its rays from the west, and glowed with the most splendid colours—crimson, rose, all shades of pink and blue, gold and purple, till the shadows crept up and it became dark. Across the plain below us ran the high road to Hebron, and we watched pilgrims going there, or lines of camels tied together and laden with charcoal and roots of trees, which were being taken to the Jerusalem market for fuel. Once the Turkish Governor of Jerusalem, on his way to Hebron, pitched his tents in front of the pools, and it was a pretty sight to see the white tents dotted about the plain.

After supper we left the house with lanterns in our hands if dark, and if not, by moonlight, to go and sleep in the tents, walking across the terraces with the smell of the rich brown earth all round us. And when inside, the tent door closed, and we were tucked up in our little iron camp-bedsteads, the soft breeze would sometimes flap open the frill which ran round the tent, and we could see the bright stars beyond, or sometimes the moonlight, almost like daylight, and we went to sleep amidst country sounds and smells such as you have no idea of. The dews fell so heavily at night that sometimes, if the ropes were not pegged rather slack, they contracted with the wet and were apt to snap off with a crack like a pistol shot towards morning.

I went three times to the seaside at Jaffa; the first time with my cousin, and rode nearly all the way on Jerry. It is only thirty-five miles from Jerusalem, but the first part of the road is so hilly and so rough that we took nearly two days over the journey. The first night we stopped at a pretty village on a hill, and were entertained by the chief of the village at his house. We slept in the part of the house belonging to the ladies—his wives and their slaves—and found that we were to sleep in one large bedroom where they slept, on mattresses laid on the floor. A huge lantern on a stand burned all night in the midst of us, and I remember thinking myself very grand because I had a crimson-quilted silk counterpane put over me. The next day our journey was easier; we soon came to the Plain of Sharon and level road. On one part of the plain I thought I saw huge cannon-balls rolling about in a field, but they turned out to be enormous green water melons, which grew close down on the sand. The sun had withered their green leaves, and they were only attached to the earth by a bit of yellowish stalk like a bit of rope, which we could not see in the distance. We used to buy these melons in Jerusalem, sometimes only half a one, as a whole one was too much for us; and I have seen a man roll a melon on the ground before him, because he could not carry it! Some of the fields were divided, not by green hedges such as we have here, or even stone walls such as we had at Jerusalem, but by hedges of the cactus or prickly pear, with large fleshy leaves covered with fine thorns, which are very painful and difficult to get out of the skin if once they get in. The fruit, too, is protected with a sort of skin, covered also with thorns; and the natives, when they gather it, knock it down with a stick and roll it in the sand before they attempt to peel it. They call the fruit "Subbur," or "Patience," because it requires so much in dealing with them. I found some at Covent Garden this year, and was greatly surprised to see them there, for we never thought them fit to eat except with the dew on them, gathered before the sun rose.

When we arrived at Jaffa we went to stay at a house in one of the beautiful orange groves that surround the town; and I remember when I was in bed being frightened at the sound of the sea waves, which I heard for the first time; and when I got used to that I was startled by a strange noise, which turned out to be the croaking of thousands of frogs in a pool close by. I was allowed to go into the orange grove and eat as many oranges as I liked. The trees grew so close together, and the leaves were so thick, that sometimes I could not see the sun through the branches. The fruit and blossom were in profusion on the trees, as well as fallen on the ground, and the smell of these and of the lemons, besides jasmine flowers, was something of which you have no idea. Banana plants, with their great glossy leaves, were planted about, and a stream of water was running through the grove.

My second journey to Jaffa was not so comfortably performed as the first. My youngest brother was one of the party, and he and I travelled in basket paniers on each side of a mule, which I found wretched work. We rested once for lunch on the way, under an olive-tree, and ate pickled olives and native bread, with buttermilk to drink. Some of the buttermilk we put on our faces to cool them, when we got sunburnt. The second day we stopped, after a very hot and sandy ride of some hours, to give our thirsty animals water to drink at a well. Our mule was in a tremendous hurry, and rushed at it, and when refreshed, tried to roll in the sand, to rid himself of the flies that were teasing him; we had just time to jump out and save ourselves from being crushed.

One thing puzzled us a good deal. As we rode along we saw for miles in the sand a very pretty pattern evenly traced. At last we found out that it was done by a beetle's legs as he walked along.

My third journey to Jaffa was my last, on our way to England, and though I was then looking forward eagerly to seeing my relations and friends, and the wonderful country I had heard of all my life, I now wish I could go back and see these things, which I remember so vividly, but meanwhile am glad to try and interest other girls, and make them wish to go too.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK MAKES SWEET DISHES (ENTREMETS SUCRES, ETC.).

Gâteau aux Pommes.—Take one pound of apples, weighed without skins or cores, cut them in thin slices, put two ounces of butter in a stewpan, add the apples, half cook them over a quick fire, shake the stewpan as they cook (do not break the pieces of apple), sift half an ounce of pounded sugar over, and leave them to get cold. Beat five eggs (yolks and whites), stir into them two ounces of flour and rather less than half a pint of milk, strain, add a little salt, grated lemon peel, an ounce of pounded sugar, and then the apples. Butter a pie-dish, put the mixture in it, bake fifty minutes in a moderate oven, sift pounded sugar over the top, and serve.

Gâteau de Semoule.—Boil a quart of milk with a tablespoonful of loaf sugar, a little salt, and a piece of lemon peel, stir in six ounces of semolina, letting it fall slowly from the hand so that it does not get into lumps; boil up twice, then stand at the side of the fire until it is rather thick; add more sugar to taste, leave five minutes longer, then take from the fire and turn into a basin; remove the lemon peel, add four eggs, one at a time. Butter and sprinkle breadcrumbs over the inside of a dish, put in the mixture, and bake forty minutes.

Pouding de Semoule au Bain Marie (steamed semolina pudding).—Boil a pint of milk with a small piece of butter, two or three tablespoonfuls of white sugar, a little salt, and some lemon peel; shake in sufficient semolina to make it rather thick; boil five minutes; if it becomes too thick, thin it with a little cream, take from the fire and let it get cool; remove the lemon peel, and mix with the semolina two tablespoonfuls of chopped almonds and four or five yolks of eggs one after the other; beat four whites of eggs, add a little sugar to them, and stir lightly to the other ingredients; butter a round mould, put in the mixture, cover the top with buttered paper, and stand in a saucepan with boiling water (the water should come half-way up the mould); put the lid on the saucepan, and steam the pudding for forty-five minutes; when done turn out of the mould, and serve with "sabayon," or crème liée.

Crème Liée.—Boil one pint of milk with half a pod of vanilla and half a pound of loaf sugar, cover, and leave to infuse for fifteen minutes; put seven yolks of eggs in a pan, stir them, pour the milk to them, strain and put the vanilla back in the liquid; cook over a moderate fire until thick, but not boiled; take from the stove, and stir until cool; remove vanilla and serve.

Sabayon.—Put six yolks of eggs in a stewpan, measure six half egg-shells of powdered sugar, stir into the eggs, add six half egg-shells of light white wine and a small piece of lemon peel; whip all together over a slow fire until it is thick and frothy, draw to the side of the fire, but continue to whip, and let it get hot enough to cook the eggs, but do not let it boil; use as pudding sauce, or serve in custard cups with little cakes or biscuits.

Gâteau de Pommes de Terre.—Steam five or six moderate sized potatoes, pound them in a mortar with a small piece of butter, add milk until they are moderately thick; then put in two tablespoonfuls of pounded sugar, and the grated rind of a lemon; cook for a few minutes, then let it cool; mix a little milk with the yolks of three eggs, add to the potato, and beat together; whip the whites of the eggs to a froth, mix them lightly with the other ingredients; butter a dish, put in the mixture, and bake in a hot oven.

Gâteau d'Amandes (almond pudding).—Blanch and soak a quarter of a pound of almonds in cold water, then pound them in a mortar, add the grated rind of a lemon, and a pinch of salt; when well pounded, put in a quarter of a pound of white sugar, a quarter of a pound of butter, and a quarter of a pound of potato that has been passed through a sieve after cooking; pound all together, and mix with three or four eggs (according to size), yolks and whites; when a smooth paste, put in a buttered mould, and cook in a moderate oven; when done, cover with pounded sugar, and glaze with hot shovell.

Gâteau de Riz aux Raisins (rice pudding with raisins).—Wash six ounces of rice, put it in cold water; boil five or six minutes; drain it. Boil a pint and a half of milk, mix the rice with it, and cook until quite tender; sweeten and let it stand on the stove for ten minutes covered, then let it cool, and mix in four eggs, one at a time, a little grated orange peel, and a handful of sultana raisins or dried currants. Put the whole into a dish or mould that you have previously buttered and covered with dry crumbs; bake for three-quarters of an hour in a moderate oven; turn on to a dish, put powdered sugar over, and serve.

Pain Perdu.—Boil one pint of milk with a piece of lemon peel, a tablespoonful of orange flower water, and a little sugar and salt until the milk is a little reduced; cut some pieces of crumb of bread into lozenge shapes; soak them in the milk, then drain. Beat some eggs until quite frothy; dip the pieces of soaked bread in and fry immediately; sift sugar over, and serve.

Frangipane.—Put three eggs in a stewpan and stir into them as much flour as they will absorb, then moisten with milk (about a pint); stir all the time and cook fifteen minutes; add a pinch of salt, sugar, three or four crushed macaroons, or two tablespoonfuls of pounded almonds, a little grated lemon peel, and some preserved orange flowers that have been pounded in a mortar. Frangipane should be moderately thick; it is used in various dishes, such as some creams and omelettes. It is eaten hot or cold, and is very good with preserved or stewed fruits. I often put a layer of macaroons, with a layer of greengage jam over, in a dish, and cover all with frangipane. I find it much liked as a cold sweet.

Crème à la Frangipane.—Put a pint of cream in a stewpan with a quarter of a pound of sifted sugar, three eggs (yolks and whites), pinch of salt, two tablespoonfuls of fine flour, a little grated lemon peel, and a few pounded preserved orange flowers; stir over the fire until quite thick. Use in tartlets, with fruit, etc.

Omelette Soufflée.—Mix a teaspoonful of ground rice (Groult's cream of rice is far the best for this purpose) with rather less than half a pint of milk; stir and boil; when cooked add a small lump of butter, little salt, some sugar, and the yolks of three eggs; stir over the fire for a few minutes, then take from the stove, beat the yolks of four eggs and add them, also two macaroons, pounded with a little chopped candied peel; beat the seven whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, add and beat all well together, put in a well buttered soufflée dish, and bake.

Omelette Soufflée (another way).—Take six very fresh eggs, separate the yolks and whites, mix four tablespoonfuls of pounded sugar with the former. Work the sugar and the yolks of eggs together with a spoon for ten minutes, add two or three bitter almonds grated, and three pounded macaroons. Mix a few grains of salt with the whites of eggs, and beat to a firm froth; when quite stiff add a little of the whites to the yolks, then all the yolks to the whites, but stir very lightly so as to keep the mixture frothy. Put in a well buttered dish, smooth the top with the blade of a knife, and put in a moderate oven. As soon as there is a skin on the top of the omelet, with a knife make a cut from end to end of it, cutting to the bottom of the dish; put it back in the oven, cook eighteen minutes, shake sugar over the top, and bake five minutes longer; serve immediately. Omelettes Soufflées are also made with bread boiled in cream and passed through a sieve, with potato flour, coffee, chocolate, etc., or they are sometimes flavoured with vanilla, cinnamon, orange flower water, etc. Bread or potato flour is used in the same way as rice.

Omelette au Sucre.—Beat the yolks of six or eight eggs with one tablespoonful of cream, two tablespoonfuls of pounded sugar, and a little salt. Beat the whites of the eggs to a froth, add to the yolks with a few drops of lemon-juice. Make three ounces of good butter hot in an omelet pan, pour in the mixture, stir lightly with a fork until it begins to set, then move the pan a little, first to shake the omelet a little from the back, then a little from the front of the pan, so as to give it a long shape; when done turn it on to a dish, sift pounded sugar over it, and glaze with a hot shovel, touching it here and there with the shovel to make a pattern on it.

Or break six eggs, add a little salt, nearly three tablespoonfuls of sugar; beat well for two minutes, and proceed as above.

Omelette aux Confitures (with preserve).—Take five yolks of eggs, work a quarter of a pound of sifted sugar with them for twelve minutes, put in a pinch of salt and a little grated lemon peel; then add the whites of the eggs beaten to a froth, and sift in four ounces of fine flour; add last half a pint of whipped cream. Melt a quarter of a pound of butter, pour it into an omelet-pan, taking care not to put in any sediment there may be, make it hot, put in the omelet, after two minutes draw the pan a little back to let the omelet cook slowly; when it is firm slip it on to a sheet of paper without turning it, cover the top with any kind of preserve or marmalade. With the help of the paper roll the omelet, place it on a long dish, withdrawing the paper, sift pounded sugar over it, put it in the oven for ten minutes, then serve.

Omelette aux Pommes (with apples).—Put two tablespoonfuls of flour in a basin with a pinch of salt and a little sugar, moisten it with four yolks and two whites of eggs, four ounces of warmed butter, and one third of a pint of milk. Take four large cooking apples, peel, core, and chop them, put them in an omelet pan with some butter, cook over a quick fire; as soon as they are quite hot, put them into the mixture, then turn all into the omelet pan, and put over the fire; prick the mixture here and there with a fork to let the liquid part run through, pour a little melted butter round the edges, and shake the pan well to detach the omelet; as soon as it is loose, sift moist sugar over the top, and turn it on to a warm plate as large as the pan; butter the pan again, and slip the omelet into it, sugar side down, move the pan while over the fire sufficiently to prevent the sugar burning, but it should brown; when done, shake a little more brown sugar over it, turn on to a hot dish, and serve.

Pommes à l'Abriçot.—Peel and core six or eight apples, leaving them whole, put them in a stewpan with sufficient water to nearly cover them, the juice of a lemon, and a tablespoonful of white sugar, cover with buttered paper, let them boil once, then cook without boiling; when done arrange them on a dish, add some apricot marmalade to the syrup, and simmer a few minutes to thicken it, pour over the apples; put in the oven a few minutes, and baste the apples with the syrup. Serve hot or cold.

Pommes au Beurre.—Peel and core the apples, leaving them whole, arrange them in a buttered dish, pound some sugar with cinnamon or with vanilla pod, sift it, fill the centres of the apples with it, pour a little oiled butter over each, and bake in a slow oven; send to table in the dish in which they are cooked.

Pommes au Riz (apples with rice).—Prepare the apples by peeling and coring without dividing. Make a syrup with sugar, water, and the juice of a lemon, simmer the apples in it. Wash a quarter of a pound of rice, boil it in milk, with a little salt, the rind of a lemon, and a little sugar (it must not be too moist). When done arrange nearly all of it in a flat cake on a dish, put the apples on it, fill the spaces between them with the remainder of the rice, and pour a little of the syrup over, put into the oven to colour slightly. Serve with a few spoonfuls of currant, gooseberry, or other fruit jelly on the top.

Apples for stewing are generally trimmed so as to be uniform in size and shape.

Emincé de Pommes aux Croutons.—Peel, core, and cut eight apples in slices, put them in a stewpan with a lump of butter, melted, sift sugar over them, and cook until they begin to dry, finish with a little cinnamon, sugar, and a tablespoonful of rum (the rum can be omitted; the writer thinks it spoils the apples), put on a dish, surround with pieces of bread, cut in triangles, fried in butter, covered with pounded sugar and stood up against the apples.

Emincé de Poires aux Croutons (pears).—The same as above; but more butter is required for pears than for apples.

Baked Apples.—Choose apples of even size, core, but do not peel them, make a slight cut in the skin round each apple, place them on a buttered dish, fill the centres where the core was with good brown sugar, and put a small lump of butter on the top, pour a tablespoonful of water into the dish, and bake.

Pommes en Croquettes.—Prepare apples as for an apple charlotte, but keep them as dry as possible, add a little well-beaten white of egg, form into balls, dip in fine breadcrumbs, then in beaten up egg, and again in breadcrumbs; fry in butter, sift pounded sugar over, and serve.

Poires au Riz.—Take six pears, peel and cut them in halves, boil them in water; when they are done, pour off nearly all the water, add two handfuls of sugar, and boil them for five minutes longer. Boil six ounces of rice in water for five minutes, drain it, then cook it in milk with a little sugar until done, keeping it as dry as possible; when tender, add three dessertspoonfuls of sugar on to which the rind of an orange has been grated, a lump of butter, and three or four tablespoonfuls of cream. Arrange the rice on a dish with the half pears round it.

Groseilles Vertes à la Crème (green gooseberries and cream).—Boil green gooseberries in water until they are tender, drain, and rub them through a sieve; mix a little sugar with them, then boil again to marmalade (it should not be too sweet, but should be moderately thick); let it get cold, heap it on a dish, cover with whipped cream, sweetened, and slightly flavoured with orange.

Croquettes de Pommes de Terre au Sucre.—Bake a dozen potatoes in their skins, empty them with a spoon, and put the pulp through a sieve, mix with it four ounces of powdered sugar, some grated lemon peel, three ounces of butter or three or four tablespoonfuls of cream, and four eggs; beat the whole well, form into balls, roll on a floured table, then egg and crumb, and fry. Serve with powdered sugar over.

Croquettes de Riz.—Take a quarter of a pound of rice, boil five minutes in water; drain, then boil it in milk, adding milk as required, so as to have the rice as dry as possible; when tender, flavour it with five or six crushed macaroons or some finely-chopped almonds; add a quarter of a pound of sugar on to which a little lemon rind has been grated, a little salt, an ounce of butter, and four yolks of eggs; stir over the fire one minute, but do not let it boil, turn the rice out, let it get cold, divide into pieces, make into the shape of corks or balls, dip in beaten egg, roll in breadcrumbs, fry in moderately hot butter or fat; when a nice colour, drain, roll in pounded sugar, and serve.

Croquettes de Riz au Fruits.—Prepare in the same way as above, but instead of macaroons or almonds, use preserved fruits cut in dice.

Flan.—Mix a tablespoonful of flour with a tablespoonful of orange flower water, eight yolks of eggs, and a little salt; when quite smooth, add a quart of boiling milk, in which you have dissolved four ounces of white sugar; pour slowly to the eggs while stirring; put in a dish, and bake half an hour; just before serving, sift sugar over the top and put back in the oven for a few minutes to colour.

Flan à la Frangipane.—Line a tart tin with remains of puff or sweet pastry, fill it with frangipane, and bake in a moderate oven; when done, let it get cool, and cover it with white of egg, beaten to a stiff froth, and heaped on it; sift powdered sugar over as you put on the egg, and let the top have sugar sifted over it; put in the oven to colour slightly, and serve.

Flan de Cerises (cherries).—Line a tart tin with remains of puff or sweet pastry, prick it slightly over the bottom, sift sugar over it, then fill it with stoned uncooked cherries; bake thirty-five minutes in moderate oven; take it out, sift sugar over the top, and serve.

Flan aux Poires.—Peel and cut six pears in halves, cook them in sugar and water with some of their peel, and few drops of carmine; when they are tender put them in a tart tin lined with paste, and bake in a quick oven; boil the syrup the pears were cooked in until it is quite thick; when the paste is done take the tart from the oven, pour the syrup over the pears, and serve.

Beignets (fritters) are made with almost any kind of fruit; most cooks soak it in rum, brandy, or some liqueur, and sugar before using; as, for instance, with apples they use brandy and sugar; with bananas, rum and sugar; with peaches, maraschino, etc.

Beignets de Pommes (apple fritters).—Peel some apples, cut each in five or six slices, take out the pips; let the apples soak for a few minutes in lemon-juice and sugar, then dip in batter (see fritter batter, page 215), and fry.

Beignets de Bananes.—Peel and cut bananas in rather thick slices, and proceed as above.

Beignets d'Oranges.—Peel and remove the white skin from the oranges, cut them in slices or quarters; make a syrup of sugar and water, put the oranges in and boil to nearly caramel; let them get cold, then dip them in batter and fry.

Beignets de Fraises (of strawberries).—Pick the strawberries; add an extra white of egg beaten to a froth, and a little grated lemon peel to the fritter batter; dip the strawberries in, taking three or four for each fritter, unless they are very large, when one is sufficient; fry, sift sugar over, and serve.

Raspberry fritters are made in the same way.

Peaches, apricots, and nectarines are also used for fritters; they are divided in quarters, and covered with powdered sugar, and one may substitute lemon-juice for the rum or liqueur generally used to soak them in; then roll the quarters in pounded macaroons, dip in batter, and fry.

Beignets de Feuilles de Vigne (vine leaf fritters).—Take some tender young vine leaves, cut them in rounds all the same size; cover one side of half of them with "crème pâtissière," or with any similar preparation, or with fruit marmalade; cover with the remaining leaves, dip in frying batter, and fry in very hot fat; when done, drain, sift powdered sugar over, and serve.

Pets de Nonnes.—Put two ounces of butter in a stewpan, with a quarter of a pound of sugar, half a pint of water, a pinch of salt, and some grated lemon peel; boil all together, then take from the fire, and sift in flour enough to make it a rather stiff paste, stir all the time; put back on the fire, and cook (still stirring) until the paste leaves the sides of the saucepan, then take from the stove; two minutes after, add three eggs, one at a time, stirring them well in, turn the whole on to a plate, take up small pieces of the paste on the end of a spoon, drop them into moderately hot fat, and boil; when done, drain in a linen cloth, and serve hot.

Choux à la Crème.—Boil one-third of a pint of water with three ounces of sugar, three ounces of butter, a little salt, and lemon peel; take from the fire, and dredge in sufficient flour to make a moderately thick paste; cook as above, then add four eggs, one at a time. With a spoon place small equal-sized pieces of the paste (round or long-shaped) on a buttered baking sheet, sift sugar over, and bake for twenty minutes in a moderate oven; when they are cold open and fill with whipped cream, sweetened and flavoured, or with crème frangipane. The choux may be sprinkled with chopped pistachio kernels or almonds before they are cooked. The lightness of these and of "pets de nonnes" depends on the flour being well cooked.

Pains à la Duchesse.—Same as "choux," but made oblong and filled with preserve.

Meringues.—Take the whites of six very fresh eggs, beat them to a froth, mix half a pound of sifted sugar with them, then with a spoon form half meringues, sift sugar on strips of paper, put the half meringues on them, as they are made, sift sugar over the outsides, a minute after turn the strips over to shake off the surplus sugar, put the papers on a damp board, and bake in rather a cool oven. When the meringues are set and begin to colour, take them off the papers, scoop out the soft from the insides, and let them dry on the stove for some hours. When cold fill with whipped cream or crème pâtissière.

The following is a simple way in which strawberry, raspberry, apricot, peach, or other fruit creams are made. To a pint of thick cream add nearly six ounces of sifted sugar, a good teaspoonful of finely-pounded gum arabic, and a tumblerful of fruit pulp that has been put through a sieve; whip the whole to a firm froth, then stand in ice.

Crème au Bain-Marie au Citron.—Boil a pint of milk, take it from the fire, and put in the thin rind of a lemon and half a pound of white sugar; let it get a little cool. Take ten yolks and five whites of eggs, add a little salt, beat them well, and pour in the sweetened milk by degrees; strain, and put in a buttered mould. Stand the mould in a saucepan containing sufficient water to half cover it, let the water boil, then leave at the side of the fire to poach gently for an hour without the water boiling or a lid on the saucepan; the cream should by that time be set. When cold, turn out to a dish.

Crème au Bain-Marie au Café.—Boil a pint of milk, take three ounces of whole, freshly-roasted coffee, bruise it slightly in a mortar, and throw it into the milk; let it infuse thirty-five minutes, then strain through a muslin, sweeten to taste, take eggs, and proceed as for "crème au citron." Steam, and turn out when cold.

Little Coffee Creams.—Take a pint of milk and a pint of cream, boil so as to reduce a little, then throw in three ounces of freshly roasted coffee berries, cover, and let them steep half an hour, then strain, add two whites of eggs beaten to a froth, and six yolks, put in cups or small moulds, and poach as above, when cold turn out and put a little caramel on each.

Small Chocolate, Tea, or Vanilla Creams are made in the same way; but chocolate creams are made with three-parts milk and one-part cream, instead of equal portions.

Crème aux Pistache.—Boil together a pint of milk and a pint of cream, in which you have put a lemon rind and some sugar, take from the fire, leave a minute, then add eight yolks of eggs and strain. Chop and pound a quarter of a pound of pistachio kernels, add them to the cream, steam, and serve cold.

Some cooks put less eggs in Bain-Marie creams, and use a little gelatine.

Crème Glacée aux Fraises (strawberry cream).—Mix six tablespoonfuls of syrup with nine sheets of clarified (or merely soaked) gelatine. Pass half a pound of strawberries through a sieve, mix half a pound of sifted sugar with them, and two tablespoonfuls of orange sugar, add by degrees the gelatine and syrup, cold but liquid, stand the pan in ice, and stir until it begins to set, then take from the ice, add one pint of good whipped cream, put all in a mould, surround with ice. Should be ready to turn out in an hour.

Any kind of fruit passed through a sieve can be used in this way.

Mousse au Thé.—Take a third of a pint or good tea (a good kind of tea made strong but only allowed to infuse a few minutes); add an equal quantity of thick syrup, put eight yolks of eggs in a pan, stir the syrup slowly to them, put the pan over the fire in a saucepan of hot water, and whip the mixture until it is quite thick and frothy; take from the fire without ceasing to whip, which must be continued until it is cold, then (when cold) add a pint and a half of whipped cream. Place a covered mould in ice and salt for six minutes, then put the "mousse" in it, put the cover on, and put a paste of flour and water round where the cover joins, and leave with ice and salt round and on the top of the mould for an hour and a half, wash the outside of the mould in cold water, turn out on a very cold dish, and serve immediately.

Mousse au Chocolat.—Put three tablets of chocolate in a stewpan, let them soften; add half a pint of hot water, a piece of vanilla, and half a pound of sugar; boil, stirring all the time; it must be thick and smooth; let it get cold, and mix a pint and a half of whipped cream with it, put a mould in ice, and proceed as above.

Crème Fouettée aux Marrons (whipped cream with chestnuts).—Take three dozen raw chestnuts, remove all skin and shell from them, and boil slowly in a little milk and sugar; when done, pass through a sieve, put in a stewpan, add of sifted sugar half the weight of the purée; stir over the fire until dry, then let it get cold. When cold moisten with a little syrup, and mix with a pint of whipped cream that has been drained and is firm (two tablespoonfuls of maraschino are generally added with the cream, but some vanilla essence does very well); arrange on a dish in a pyramid, surround with half meringues, or small sponge biscuits, and serve.

Fruit Jellies are made by preparing a pint and a half of ordinary lemon jelly without wine in it, but with gelatine and sugar for a quart; then while it is liquid but cold, add half a pint of carefully-strained fruit juice, and put in the mould. The juice must be perfectly clear, so care must be taken in extracting it from the fruit. Red gooseberries, currants, or raspberries make nice jellies in this way.

Œufs Brouillés aux Confitures.—The best of butter and eggs are needed for this. Melt a lump of butter in a stewpan, beat up four or more eggs, add a tablespoonful of cream, with a few grains only of salt and sugar; put them into the butter, stir over the fire with a wire spoon or two forks; when they are just set add some apricot or plum marmalade, and serve.

Œufs Pochés à la Crème.—Instead of water, poach the eggs in sweetened milk; when they are done take them out and arrange on a dish. Mix with the milk two tablespoonfuls of flour moistened first with a little cold milk, boil it a minute, then add a tablespoonful of orange-flower water, a few drops of good salad oil, and two yolks of eggs; let it thicken, but not boil, pour over the poached eggs, and serve.

Œufs à la Neige.—Boil a pint of milk with two tablespoonfuls of orange-flower water and two ounces of sugar; beat up the whites of five or six eggs to a stiff froth, poach in the milk, turn with a skimmer, so that they are evenly cooked; when set take them out of the milk; stir the milk into the yolks of eggs, pour back into the stewpan, and stir until thick; then put in a dish with the whites on the top, and serve cold.

THE HILL OF ANGELS

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," et

CHAPTER XIX.

At these tête-à-tête meals, and indeed the contents of Evelyn's letter were so engrossing that she might have been pardoned for her absorption. It was from Dottie, and contained the news of Algy's engagement to Miss Thorne. We may omit the mass of his sister's commentaries on this event, and quote a few sentences that had especial bearing on Evelyn's life.

"Now, darling, there is no reason why you should not come back to your proper home with us. But mother thinks perhaps it will be better on all accounts for you to wait till Algy's marriage, which will be in the autumn. He is not going to live at The Elms with his wife, as we had proposed under other circumstances. I don't know if you will think it best to wait; I only know that I want you back as soon as possible. I have been wretched ever since you left us."

"Poor, true-hearted Dottie!" thought Evelyn, with a sigh, as she folded the letter. The tone gave evidence to very mingled feelings on the part of the writer; vexation at her brother's lack of constancy, grief for her own share of harshness (small as this had been) towards Evelyn, a little jealousy of the prospective sister-in-law; but, above all, great delight in the thought of Evelyn's return. And in this the girl could not help sharing. She felt an unspeakable relief in the thought that she would go back to her womankind; though her aunt especially had not treated her with consideration. But Evelyn's love was not destroyed by what had passed. Her path was wonderfully cleared by this turn of events. "All things come to him who can wait," she reflected.

"Mr. Muir is coming to dinner to-night, Evelyn." The words broke in upon her meditation.

"Oh, uncle!" cried Evelyn, with dismay. A vision of her parting with Mr. Muir in the gardens rose before her.

"But I don't think I shall be at home," she hastened to add, "I am going to see Miss Wentworth off at Euston for Liverpool."

"And at what time does her train start?"

"Four o'clock," owned Evelyn, reluctantly.

"Then," replied Mr. Hope, putting up his pince-nez and regarding his niece fixedly, "may I inquire what reason there will be for your non-appearance at dinner at half-past seven?"

A confused scheme that had arisen in Evelyn's mind of wandering about town and taking refuge in a confectioner's shop or some picture exhibition, was put to flight—and very properly so!

"Don't you like Mr. Muir?" continued Mr. Hope, observant of his niece's heightened colour.

"Not at all."

"I wonder at your taste. He is a very fine fellow indeed; he has a rising practice at the Bar, and has reviewing work on the staff of some of our best papers. By the way, perhaps he has reviewed something of yours, and that is why you don't like him!"

This shaft, sent entirely at random, struck home, and Mr. Hope saw that it had done so. He was highly entertained.

"It wasn't that poetry book, was it—'Day-dreams'—that you would publish against my advice?"

"Pray don't, uncle!" pleaded Evelyn. Mr. Hope refrained from pursuing the conversation, but kept on laughing to himself in a way that infuriated her more than tongue can tell. "I am thankful I shall not have to spend many more months with you," she undutifully thought, as she proceeded to turn the conversation by imparting to him the information in Dottie's letter. And it must be acknowledged that Mr. Hope was quite as much relieved as Evelyn by the proposed change in her prospects. He showered derision on the head of the unfortunate Algy.

"I thought that idle young scapegrace was going to the Bar," he said; "this doesn't look much like it."

"He has ample means to marry, without any profession."

"Well, no solicitor—unless he were an absolute maniac—would entrust a brief to such a feather-brained young fellow; so on the whole I daresay it's money saved," meditated Mr. Hope.

Discomfort at the thought of the evening dwelt in Evelyn's mind all day. Her interview with Miss Wentworth was something of a relief—and yet a sad one too. The little lady was shortly to sail for America, and bid Evelyn farewell with much affection. Evelyn thanked her warmly for all she had done.

"And now mind, my dear, I shall be disappointed in you if you do not write something worth reading," were her last words. "That first book was not worthy of you. I never said so before, but you must 'rise on stepping stones'

Of your dead self to higher things.' Don't be discouraged."

"I do write: it is my only resource;

but publishing is another matter," said Evelyn, despondently.

"Oh, that will come in time. Now I must say good-bye, my child; but mind that on the other side of the globe Aurelia Wentworth's heart will be always ready to beat with joy at your success."

The train steamed out of the station, and Evelyn was left to make her way back to Kensington, and fortify herself as best she might for the prospect of the evening's ordeal.

It did not seem as though it were to be much of an ordeal after all, when Mr. Muir came. Evelyn had arrayed herself outwardly in a pretty gown of cream Indian silk, and panoplied herself inwardly with pride and disdain, but he greeted her as though they had parted on the best of terms, and appeared determined quietly to ignore all cause of quarrel between them. Evelyn was obliged to accept his arm into the dining-room, and she could not help observing with what gentleness and courtesy he continually directed the conversation so as to include herself. Mr. Hope was rather apt to talk on and on to a congenial friend, in utter disregard of anyone else who did not come up to exactly the same standard of knowledge and intelligence, and this was dreadfully tantalising to Evelyn, who had assisted at many such dinners, in the exasperating conviction that if the speakers would only make themselves a little more intelligible, she would be able to enjoy what they said, and contribute her own mite to the discussion. Mr. Muir, without obviously stooping to her level, drew her into the talk at every point, and she found herself now and again making remarks that were listened to with attention and interest by one at least of the two men.

"Really, Evelyn has plenty of brains," thought Mr. Hope. "I wonder why she does not talk on these subjects with me." They were speaking of the influence of climate on character, a topic that greatly interested Mr. Hope just then, and Evelyn had made a very sensible observation about the general lack of poetic fire among the Swiss.

The dinner passed off most pleasantly. "Not," thought Evelyn, "that I forgive him in the least for that hateful review, but it would be discourteous to show it now."

"No, I will never forgive him," she thought again, when she had made her solitary exit, and had escaped to her own little study. A dreadful fascination made her take the hated number of the Critic from a drawer, and scan the contemptuous lines again.

"Mr. Hope wishes to know, Miss, if you will join him and Mr. Muir in the library," was the message brought by Stevens, and Evelyn had no resource but to comply. She was not often admitted into this delightful room, though her uncle was willing to lend her any book she liked. She intensely enjoyed roaming from shelf to shelf, standing before the books, taking one and another down, and glancing over a page here and there; what someone has called "browsing" among books. In spite of her animosity, she could not help feeling it was especially pleasant on this evening, with a sympathetic companion, who was ready and anxious to exchange ideas and give information.

They were all three standing before the shelves that contained the priceless first editions of Ruskin, and Mr. Muir was waxing enthusiastic over certain passages of "Modern Painters," when Mr. Hope was called downstairs.

"Now for a return of hostilities," thought Evelyn, and she felt her cheeks flush; but Mr. Muir had taken down a book, and was looking through its pages.

"Here are some lines that would do as a motto for your story, 'The Hill of Angels,'" said he, offering "The Epic of Hades"; Evelyn took it, half against her will, and read where he pointed—

"Those who hear

Some fair faint echoes, though the crowd be deaf,
And see the white gods' garments on
the hills,
Which the crowd sees not, though they may not find Fit music for their visions; they are blest,
Not pitiable. . . More it is than ease,
Palace and pomp, honours and luxuries,
To have seen white Presences upon
the hills,
To have heard the voices of the Eternal Gods."

The lines were from the story of "Marsyas," which shows the joy of artistic effort, even though it be a failure. "High failure overleaps the bound of low successes," says the poet, and the lesson is beautifully taught. Evelyn glanced with new interest through the poem.

"Have you finished the sketch of which you spoke?" he asked.

"I have," she replied, a little distantly.

"I have been thinking it over," continued Mr. Muir, "and I am sure your best plan will be to send it to the editor of the International Magazine. I happen to know he wants bright, fresh, short stories; and from what you told me of the plot of yours, I imagine it may suit him. If you once get on the staff, you will have plenty of occupation of the sort you like best."

"I wonder you should advise me to publish again." Evelyn felt the words were small and spiteful as soon as they were spoken.

"And I wonder you should be so unjust as to harp upon that string," rejoined Mr. Muir; "but let that pass; I don't ask you to forgive me for what is in reality the veriest trifle, but what I can see is an irreparable wrong in your eyes. You do not like being civil to me to-night, but as I am your uncle's guest you feel obliged to hide your feelings. Is it not so? Ah, you are too honest to contradict it."

Evelyn, who had imagined she was playing her part perfectly, felt greatly confused at this sudden home-thrust.

"I should not have supposed you capable of such childish resentment," he went on, speaking as if he were greatly moved. "Some women may be slight-natured and unreasonable, but not you; you were meant for better things. However, whether you are offended with me or not, I should advise you to do what I say about the magazine. If you were disposed to accept my help, I would glance at the sketch and bring it before the editor's notice; but as that, probably, would not fall in with your present mood, you had better send it to him. Everything sent is read, and it will have a fair chance. After all, introductions are of little value."

What to reply Evelyn did not know. She had a very distinct sense that she had been scolded, and she was at a loss how to make a suitable rejoinder. Should she refuse the proffered suggestion in scorn? She was conscious that she was grateful for it. Should she throw away her weapons, and own that she was silly and petulant? No, certainly not! What right had he over her—this stranger whom she had scarcely seen half a dozen times? She was indignant at being transformed from an injured woman into a silly child in his estimation, and yet she could see there was a certain remorseful tenderness over her, which, in spite of herself, moved her greatly. She was glad, yet sorry, that her uncle came in at this moment, and the rest of the evening passed in general conversation, in which, after a little while, Evelyn recovered herself sufficiently to join. Mr. Muir would not have her sent away, and pleaded against the cigar proposed by Mr. Hope.

Was it some wild illusion which made her feel, when she fled upstairs, that the evening had been the most delightful she had ever spent? And yet, was she not very angry with him? That contemptuous review—it still made her utter an exclamation, and turn hot all over, whenever she peeped at her copy of the Critic for August 20! And he would not apologise for it either!

Was it really resentment for what she knew to be a just criticism, that was affecting the usually sensible Evelyn? It was not altogether so silly and childish a feeling as Mr. Muir supposed it to be, but something much more involved.

When a friendship has made some way, and you see your new friend is interested in you, cares for you, admires you, it is a terrible shock to find that, as it were in some previous stage of existence, all unknown the one to the other, his mind has been in contact with yours, condemning, despising, ridiculing! It was this shock that Evelyn felt so keenly. Had she liked Mr. Muir less, the shock would have been less. But she was unable to account for her own apparently contradictory feelings, and still less for the agitation that kept her tossing on her pillow for hours before she fell asleep.

"JUDGE NOT ACCORDING TO THE APPEARANCE."

By THE REV. WILLIAM COWAN, M.A.

SCOFF not, dear girl, at homely worth,
Thy praise let not mere tinsel win;
A rough exterior often hides
The brave heart of a heroine.

Ugly the form and coarse the stalk
Of many a plant that meets the eye,
Whose scent is sweet and flower more fair
Than rainbow painted on the sky.

She whom thy pride would scorn to place
In the charmed circle of thy friends,
May be an angel in her home,
Whom God for blessing thither sends.

Unightly, dull, and useless seems
The bulb we bury 'neath the clay;
But thence the lovely tulip flames,
Like Hope upon the pilgrim's way.

Wealth, beauty, charm of manner, dress,
Though much, yet these are not the whole;
Faith, goodness, honour, purity
(The nobler virtues of the soul)—

The vision clear, the simple trust,
The tender conscience, and the love
That haunts the scenes of wretchedness,
And points the dying eye above—

I know no better things than these;
Who has them is a friend to gain;
For God is nigh where'er they dwell,
And blessings follow in their train.

"SCOFF NOT, DEAR GIRL, AT HOMELY WORTH."

A YOUNG OXFORD MAID.

(IN THE DAYS OF THE KING AND THE PARLIAMENT.)

By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Papers for Thoughtful Girls," etc.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WHAT CAME TO PASS IN THE CASTLE YARD AT OXFORD
ON THE 3RD OF MAY, 1545.

WHEN Dr. Peter Dacre was apprised of the fate of Colonel Windebank—condemned to be shot, for betrayal of trust, in the Castle Yard on the 3rd of May—the news of the outer world, which had struck on dull, unreceptive ears since his son was slain a month before,* awoke in him something of his old regard for his kindred, the Waltons.

"Bring the unhappy girl here. Where ought she to find shelter in her misery save with her kindred? Besides, we owe her and hers a debt we never can repay; however they may have erred and led others to err in the past, they did not fail at the last. They did what we were not suffered to do. Be blamed for harbouring her, doth anybody say? What care I an I were? I am an old man now, Kitty; my day is over; it died, what was left of it, with my son. I will serve my King to the end of my days, it is true, and never own another authority in England; but as for scathe befalling me for so far taking the part of a condemned traitor as to house and help his plighted wife, what matter? The scathe will not touch a young maid like thee; my Lady Ottery will see to that. Not receive my own niece, my dear wife's sister's daughter! I say this is her place, and if I could do more for her to ward off the blow that is about to fall on her, i' faith I'd be tempted to do it. I know nought of this miserable fellow Windebank, except that he should have kept aloof from all who held pestilent opinions. These men and women were not his near kindred. There was no call for him to ally himself with them, howsoever they might be good and fair in all respects but one. The political heresy is so deadly and infectious, that it hath sapped the faith and suborned the service of nobler souls than his, I wot. But he hath met with a terrible punishment which might crave pity from justice itself."

"Oh, is it not so, father?" chimed in Kitty.

"Child," he answered, "let us be thankful that Jack died in battle with his face to the enemy, lamented alike by friend and foe, with no stain of cowardice or reproach of double-dealing upon him."

Kitty could depend on her father's not breathing such sentiments to Prissy, because the girl felt beforehand that Prissy's presence would be sufficient to shut every mouth and touch every heart.

Kitty saw her cousin Alice first. It had been arranged that the moment the sentence of the court-martial was known—if it was death—Alice Walton should come with her sister to Oxford and leave her there, while Alice returned to Islip Barnes to do her duty by their mother. But some relations of Colonel Windebank were bold enough to appear on the scene, and it was finally settled that two of them, who were old and infirm, should ride the whole way with Prissy; while Alice—who could not fail to see her poor sister settled in her temporary quarters—came on before with the younger members of the party by the aid of a horse and pillion, which they passed from one to the other, as the travellers had need.

Actually, Alice had walked the most part of the rough road, for her companions happened to be town-bred, and were overcome both in mind and body before they started.

"Oh, cousin Alice, how tired you must be!" cried Kitty, in dismay, bustling about the new arrival, seeking to comfort and refresh her. "And you have to go back to-night, dear heart. Oh, I hope you will be none the worse, you who are so easily upset and worn out!"

"Kitty, say not another word," said Alice, turning upon her cousin a face which had wept so much lately that it was habitually swollen and tear-stained, while Alice did not seem to mind her marred beauty. "Never hint that I am not as strong as a horse, for I am in essentials. All my little, miserable ailments, which I whimpered and whined over and made so much of, were but as many flea-bites. Methinks I'll never be sensible of their presence again. I have lived to see such calamity."

"You could hardly foresee it, dear," said Kitty, quietly. "We have all to learn by experience; though I pretend not that we ought not to be as brave as we can, and give as little trouble as we may from the beginning. But how doth cousin Prissy bear this cruel sentence? That is more to the purpose."

"Like one of God's saints, cousin Kitty. She thinks first of everybody else to this hour. Oh! to believe that she was remembering my trumpety cough and mother's drops this very morning."

"It is well that she is so good," said Kitty, wisely, from her late experience. "It will take her out of herself and him for so long as her spirit can get time to breathe; it will keep her mind from reeling and her heart from breaking. It is the next thing to lying still before the throne of God and saying, 'though Thou shouldst slay me, yet will I trust in Thee.' I can understand a little, Alice, for, you know, I have lost Jackie."

"Ah, yes! Kitty," cried Alice, clasping and kissing her; "Master Jackie, too! our gallant, scholarly, fine gentleman of a cousin. For he was a true fine gentleman; not an unkind laugh, not a rude word from him, though he could deal a swinging blow like another, and fell in the thick of the fight, as Tony boasted. But Jack's death, though I cried till I was well-nigh blind, and thought I should never hold up my head again, was nought to this. And she has loved him all these years. Yes, and only last month they were to have had one of their rare meetings, which were getting more and more difficult, on which she counted so much, and I let her stay at home with me because mother had one of her bad turns, and I fancied I was too frightened to remain with her without Prissy. I persuaded myself I had such a buzzing and singing in my head that I was going to be seized with the falling sickness. And just so I have detained and plagued her many a time—my own dear, good Prissy. Oh! Kitty, is it not wonderful that she doth not hate me?"

"No, no, you did not mean it; she knows you did not; it will only hurt her worse if you go on reproaching yourself."

"Then I won't," vowed Alice, "but nobody is ever to breathe a word of my health again—dost take me, cousin Kitty?—not till the doctor giveth me up for fair dying."

It was true that when Prissy Walton came she was still full of concern for troubling her uncle. She could even consider such trifles as whether her presence at Oriel might not cause offence, whether she was not inconveniencing Kitty, and giving Mrs. Judy too much to do in the slender accommodation which was all the Dacres commanded in the college. By dint of this division in Prissy's mind, from her inveterate habit of thinking of others before herself, Kitty could not say at first that she saw much change in her, or realise that the iron had entered into the gentle soul. Alice looked far more changed than Prissy, whose naturally pale complexion, mild, thoughtful eyes, and quiet, unaffected manner suited themselves to any circumstances. Kitty was certain that for a whole half-hour after their reunion Prissy was nearly as much occupied with them—the Dacres and their recent loss, and with tender wiles to express her sympathy and impart to them consolation—as with herself or even with Colonel Windebank, who had grown part of herself, and their terrible position.

The first alteration which Kitty detected in her cousin was when she became conscious that Prissy's paleness was no longer the ordinary healthy paleness which belonged to her and her brother

* The battle of Islip Bridge took place at a slightly different date from that implied to suit the exigencies of the story. Colonel Windebank was executed within three days of the battle.

Anthony alike, but had increased to absolute wanness, while the poor bloodless lips had acquired a trick of quivering, even when they were essaying to smile piteously. Other signs were the long deep sighs which Prissy seemed to draw without being aware of what she was doing, and the constant watch which she kept on the timepiece, either because a poor prisoner's hours were numbered, or because she was at once longing for and dreading the hour appointed for their last meeting and parting.

Kitty did not think that it was Prissy who declined to speak on the subject which was engrossing them all, while it was so much her affair; she was calm and patient, like a little child in its final illness, or an honest old man and woman in their last pathetic extremity of poverty. She did not resent her neighbours' exemption from such a trial as that which she was passing through. She did not refuse their sympathy; she did not rave recklessly and fruitlessly against the authors of the trial. It was not Prissy who refused to speak, it was other people who, in their awkwardness and distress, their awe at being brought face to face with such a sufferer, shrank from all save the most hasty, clumsy allusions as to what had brought her to Oxford. Prissy looked at these bunglers with only the faintest surprise and pain at their reticence; she was ready to make allowance for them, to guess that they did not speak more definitely lest they should wound her, as if she were not wounded to the quick already beyond farther pang.

Colonel Windebank's old half-brother and sister and his young cousins were merely to see him for a few minutes on the following morning; only one pass was granted for an hour's interview on the eve of the execution, and that was to "Mrs. Priscilla Walton, of Islip Barnes, and a woman friend." The grace was vouchsafed from no favour to the Waltons, or even to their kinsman, Dr. Peter Dacre; but simply for the reason assigned in the paper—"the said Mrs. Priscilla Walton being the plighted wife of Francis Windebank, ci-devant Governor of Bletchington House, and Colonel in His Majesty's second troop of Light Horse."

Oxford Castle, built by the Norman knight, Robert d'Oilgi, to whom William the Conqueror had entrusted Oxford, stood on the great mound which had been the Saxon defence against the Dane. It was already largely shorn of its dignity, since the days when it figured as the huge fortress, with the massive keep and six towers, in which the Empress Maud was closely besieged by Stephen, then occupying Beaumont Palace. Provisions failing, Maud, as is well known, accomplished a daring escape. She fled, dressed in white, on a snowy night, attended only by three knights, crossed the frozen Thames, and succeeded in reaching Abingdon. The castle had suffered many vicissitudes, and been allowed to fall into disrepair as a castle, though used as one of the gaols of the town, till, at the commencement of the Civil War, Charles had its sole surviving tower, that of St.

George, restored, and the old fortifications put in working order. Of the two girls who came to it on this day in May, even Kitty felt heavily oppressed by the dismal nature of their errand, and had not much attention to spare to the bridge opening into Titmouse Lane, which crossed the moat, and led by a long entry, furnished with embattled walls, to the chief gate. She could but glance timidly at the "passages" above, from one side to the other, with open spaces between, through which, "in time of storm, when any enemy had broken through the first gates of the bridge, and was gotten into the entry, scalding water and stones might be thrown among them." But it was on gaining the castle yard, with its grim military aspect, pacing sentinels going to and fro on duty, glancing at the women curiously as they passed, that her heart sank very low, and she clung to Prissy's arm and tried to drag her forward, faster even than the footsteps of the warder warranted. For she knew, and poor Prissy must know also, what woeful scene would be enacted there within the next twenty-four hours.

The little party had to cross a guard-room, where their pass was examined afresh, and toil up a steep rough stair to that room, high in the tower, where the prisoners of war as well as the common criminals lay in the neglect and misery which Kitty had already heard of and wept and prayed over. But the ghastly reality exceeded the quaking expectation. Imagination, unassisted by experience, could not, happily for itself, call up the stench, the squalor, the horrid indifference, insolence, and bacchanalian shouting and singing which the true gaol-birds poured forth, in brutal bravado, to greet the entrance of strangers. For the first time Kitty's heart, following the example of other tried hearts, leapt up in thankfulness because of Jack lying at rest in Magdalen Chapel; better a thousand times there than here confronting the ordeal in the courtyard to-morrow. Anthony was right; Kitty's Jackie had been spared the full bitterness of death.

Kitty could almost be glad for Prissy that from the moment the prison door was opened she saw and heard nothing save the face and the voice of the man who was watching for her. Her eyes were shining when they met his, though they were dim with fast falling tears the next instant. It was something to fall on his breast once again, and to hear and speak such words of steadfast faith and undying love as would long survive the moment in which they were spoken, would last even through the endless ages of eternity.

Kitty had seen Colonel Windebank once or twice long before, and heard him often spoken of. She had no difficulty in recognising the pale, middle-sized man, considerably Prissy's senior, of whom his young bride had said, with modest maidenly pride, that he was just the proper age for inspiring reverence. His face had always been a little grave and set in expression, and it looked older and sterner from the sprinkling of grey in his fair hair. He was in his uniform, and though it had seen service and was faded and even stained in places, he still looked strangely trim and smart in his soldier's guise in this abode of slovenliness, disorder, and dirt. He was like a being from another sphere. He had been seated in a window which commanded the courtyard, looking out for them, and beguiling the time of which so little was left to him by reading from a small MS. volume. He started forward on their approach, and the unfortunate pair forgot Kitty's very existence as they tenderly embraced, drew apart, and talked eagerly together.

Kitty stood sorrowfully and reverently watching them, answering mechanically the civil observations made to her at intervals by the warder. He was an honest old soldier, neither harsh nor inhuman. His drawing near to her was probably caused quite as much by the wish to be at hand to defend her from any rudeness on the part of the more riotous prisoners, as from any design of thrusting himself on her notice and extorting from her such a gratuity as the friends of prisoners were only too willing to pay, in order to secure for them some indulgence at the hands of their frequently greedy and tyrannical keepers.

When the interview drew to a close, and the couple advanced slowly towards her, Kitty heard Colonel Windebank say solemnly to Prissy, "You know I did it for the best, my life, to prevent useless carnage, to rescue human lives which are precious in the sight of their Maker. I was not playing into the hands of General Cromwell. He and I may hold certain opinions which are not very dissimilar, but I know not that we agree in much, unquestionably not in all. For I am told that he, like the rest, condemned the surrender of Bletchington, said it was due merely to a handful of dragons and a fierce countenance. I could not have held out with an insubordinate garrison for twelve hours, though we had barricaded ourselves with the bodies of the slain. But Cromwell's judgment, or the extent to which we differ, is nought, since we fought under different colours. To those who were entitled to judge me, I say again, as I have said already, that so far as I can see I did the best which was left to me to do, not only for humanity's sake, but in the honourable giving up of His Majesty's colours, when there was no way of retaining them except by spilling blood like water for no available end. I should have condemned the house—Bletchington House—which was to have been our happy home, and the adjacent hamlet, which represented the result of much patient industry and creditable rule, to be burnt and levelled to the ground. An earthly tribunal hath sentenced me, but I do not fear to carry my plea to a heavenly tribunal."

"I know, sir, I know," Prissy answered him earnestly, "and others will know in that day, your name and fame will be cleared to the whole universe. Oh, my love, what doth it signify though they should suffer a brief eclipse, and though you and I should be roughly parted for a little while, when we are to meet and be together with our dear Lord, in the long deathless life of heaven?"

It was not possible for Prissy to continue to forget others, even in her own nearest concerns and in the tribulation of him who was to have been her husband.

"See, Colonel Windebank," she said, leading him forward by the hand, which he still clasped, "this is my little cousin Kitty, of whom you have heard so much, with whom you were to have been better acquainted if God had so willed. She hath grown up a sweet maiden, as you can tell for yourself, and she hath had the goodness to come with me to-day to visit you."

"I am much beholden to you," madam," he answered, turning courteously to Kitty, the formality of his words being tempered by the pleasant smile which lit up his grave face as he spoke. Then his eye caught her mourning dress, and beamed upon her still more gently.

"I ask your pardon, Mrs. Dacre," he said, "for forgetting to speak my condolence on your recent loss; but in truth, they may be changed into congratulations. I knew thy brother, a good youth and a gracious, early called to receive his reward. Who would grudge it to him, or wish to detain him in a world of such misconception and misadventure, though God ruleth over all? Yet I grieve for thee, sweet mistress, who wert his only sister as he was thine only brother."

Kitty could not keep back her tears at hearing him grieving for her in his and Prissy's extremity.

"It irks me to think that I can furnish you with no better reception than this," he was saying, "in especial as I am to lose that boon of your friendship I was promised. But we will say it is deferred, not lost, and place it among those blessed friendships which my author is fain to think will ripen in heaven." He glanced at the manuscript book he had been reading which lay near. "I should like to keep him with me to the last. Master Baxter is—after his master and mine and yours too, my Prissy, God be praised, else this hour would be a mighty deal drearier than it is—a brave companion in adversity. I have directed that when I am gone thou shalt have his account of the Rest, which I shall then have entered upon, dearest Prissy, that thou mayst know beforehand, by a good man's second-sight, what it is like."

Men had branded Colonel Windebank as a coward and traitor, but there was no sign either of cowardice or treachery in the manner in which he took leave of the person dearest to him on earth, or in his bearing in the castle yard when the muskets of his fellow-soldiers were pointed at his breast. In the end it was he who, when the time was up, hurried Prissy and Kitty away with one long kiss on Prissy's lips, and another on Kitty's hand. Kitty hardly knew how she got Prissy out of that loathsome room, or through that haunted castle yard, save that Prissy had always hated giving trouble and pain to others. She had been accustomed to save her neighbours from suffering, and to show her gratitude to them for every act of kindness towards herself. She had always striven to restrain her feelings, and to behave with meek submission and sweet reasonableness. Even as it was, Prissy fainted right away before they reached the end of the bridge, where their chairs were waiting for them. And Kitty was well-nigh glad because of the temporary unconsciousness which dulled both mind and senses for a space, and gave her some little distraction in fearing that she had been a great burden and annoyance to her cousin by her culpable weakness. Prissy had been so used to minister to others that it was a surprise, and for a time a distress to her, to find them ministering to her.

If it had been possible to veil the changes of light and darkness, and dull the striking of clocks and ringing of bells, Prissy's friends would fain have turned day into night, and hidden from her the hour when Colonel Windebank suffered the sentence of the court-martial. But such oblivion could not be; and perhaps it was better in the end that she knew all, and as it were entered the Valley of the Shadow of Death with her lover. It was plain that she saw the whole scene as she sat very still in the parlour at Oriel; while a great awe and silence suddenly fell on the friends who had been trying till that moment to draw away her thoughts, and engross her attention—not with frivolous, unbecoming subjects, but with those cares for her mother and family, and that constant consideration of the poor and needy, which had hitherto formed so large a part of Prissy's life.

Prissy sat with closed eyes, hands clasped, lips moving in silent prayer. It was clear she was not there in spirit, she was in the castle yard, where a file of soldiers were drawn out, and a solitary man, their old comrade and leader in many a fight, was brought forth to be the aim of the marksmen. She saw the stern and angry faces all around, and his fixed abstracted look. She heard his sentence—every word of which was a grievous insult to a soldier and man of honour—read for the last time. She was aware that he tried to reply, and was indignantly stopped in the attempt. She listened to the chaplain's short prayer, she prayed with the man who knelt alone, and then rose and stood at his full height, a target for the bullets. She might have heard the report of the volley, for she flung up her arms with a sharp cry—

"He hath fallen! half a dozen balls are in his heart—there is blood, blood all around him! His dear lips will never speak word or draw breath more. He is beyond them and their reprisals; he hath crossed the river, he is safe in the Father's house at last!"

She did not faint again, she sank back in her chair, with such a look of relief and peace on her wan face that Kitty dared not speak lest she should break the spell.

There was no sound in the room except those unconscious heartrending sighs of Prissy's for an interval, and then it was she herself who spoke again, soft and low.

"We need not weep for him, but for ourselves. Yet why should we weep, when it is but a short parting, to be followed by a speedy meeting and an everlasting reunion? He was always distrustful of the happiness of earth, but the bliss of heaven cannot fade. In the meantime there is much for all of us to do, much he will like to hear of when I see him again."

A WONDERFUL PUMP.

MANY of my girl-readers will recollect that when I told them in "The Microscope and Ourselves" about the structure of blood-vessels and also that of the heart, I hinted that the function conjointly subserved by these structures was worthy a separate and, as far as possible, full consideration. What I am going to describe may be aptly likened to the water supply of a town or village. Most of you have seen, no doubt, in or near the town in which you reside the waterworks which supply that town with water, in many instances by means of large and powerful pumps. The pump I shall describe is the heart which beats in our bodies. Our bodies represent the little towns or villages, and the supply is not water, but the nutrient fluid of the body, the blood.

Now, the heart, the minute structure of which you already know, is a muscular pump situated in the chest or thorax, whose function it is to propel blood throughout the body. The heart propels this blood through a series of tubes called arteries; these tubes are largest near the heart, and branching up freely like a tree, give off and split up into many smaller arteries; you have already learnt the structure of these arteries. The smallest arteries are called "arterioles," and they lead to a perfect labyrinth or network of very thin-walled vessels, called "capillaries;" the capillaries join together and go to form larger vessels called "venules," which in their turn go to form "veins," gradually increasing in size and coalescing till they terminate again at the heart.

Now, to understand the mechanism of this pump, like that of any other machine, we must look at its construction. Let us do so.

Our hearts are double pumps, and you will see the reason why presently. There are in our hearts four chambers which are concerned in the propulsion of blood—two upper ones and two lower ones. You know that the heart is somewhat conical in shape, with its base more or less upwards as we stand. The two cavities of the heart, situate at the base, are called "auricles," right and left respectively; the two cavities situate near the apex are called "ventricles," right and left. The right auricle and ventricle are frequently spoken of as the "right heart," and the left auricle and ventricle as the "left heart." These two "hearts" are separated from one another by a thick partition wall, and are like two one-storey houses set side by side. Let us look now more minutely at the left side. The ventricle is separated from the auricle by a valve which opens towards the ventricle and shuts towards the auricle, so that fluid can flow from auricle to ventricle but not from ventricle to auricle. This valve is made up of two segments or "cusps," as they have been called, and when stretched out these segments are said to resemble a bishop's mitre, and hence the valve is called the "bicuspid," or, more commonly, the "mitral valve." A similar arrangement to this is seen in the right side, with this difference, that the valve between the right auricle and ventricle, instead of being made up of two segments, is made up of three, and hence is called the "tricuspid" valve.

FIG. 1.

(C) }

Now, in connection with these four cavities are certain main pipes or vessels, as they are termed, which serve to carry the blood to and from the heart. We will take notice of these main pipes as we follow the course of the blood in its circulation through the body. The general body receives the blood from the left heart, whilst the lungs depend on the right heart for their supply, and in the circulation the auricles are the receptive antechambers of the heart and the ventricles the expulsion chambers.

Let us now see where the heart pumps its blood to and how it does it, and in doing it we will start on a journey from the left ventricle. Now, the vessel into which the left ventricle pumps is called the "aorta;" it is the largest artery in the body. We will imagine the left ventricle to be full, and now it begins to pump by squeezing on the blood which it contains. You remember that I spoke of a valve between the left ventricle and the left auricle, called the bicuspid or mitral valve, and that this valve would permit of the flow of fluid from auricle to ventricle, but not from ventricle to auricle. Now, when the left ventricle squeezes on its blood, the mitral valve, which till now was open to permit of the filling of the ventricle, closes and so prevents exit by that path.

The only other opening out of the left ventricle is into that large artery, the aorta, and this being wide open the blood easily rushes through it. Here at this so-called "aortic orifice," or opening of the aorta in the left ventricle, is a wonderful arrangement of valves. Round the orifice are three little semilunar flaps, which are in shape like old-fashioned tobacco pouches such as you may have seen. These semilunar flaps during the forcing of the blood from the ventricle into the aorta lie quite flat against the sides of the aorta, with their free edge pointing away from the heart. By the time the ventricle has finished contracting, the aorta, which of course was not empty from the first, is over-distended, and if there were no provision against it, all the blood would come back into the left ventricle again. Fortunately, the tendency to return is counteracted by the flapping-out and junction of these three little tobacco-pouch valve-segments, and the blood, foiled in its intention to return to the left ventricle, must go on. Let us follow it. It passes down this large artery and through its various branches, and so to the various parts of the body. The channels through which it must flow grow narrower and narrower, till at last it arrives at the "capillaries," those fine, thin vessels formed only of epithelium which go to make so wonderful a meshwork. After wandering through this meshwork, it returns by the venous radials to the veins, and now is on its way to the heart. Having done its work, it comes back leisurely, so leisurely that valves are necessary to prevent it lagging back, and so veins, unlike arteries, are provided with valves. And now the blood has got into the two last veins before it must enter the heart; these are called the "superior vena cava" and the "inferior vena cava"; from these it will enter the heart on the opposite side from whence it started and into the receptive chamber or auricle, so that it enters the right auricle. When sufficiently full, it will be the duty of the right auricle to empty itself. Where will the blood go? You remember that not only is there a valve between the left auricle and ventricle called the mitral valve, but also there is one between the right auricle and ventricle called the tricuspid valve.

I told you that the mitral valve admitted only of blood passing from the auricle to the ventricle, and not the reverse way; well, so it is with the tricuspid. Thus when the right auricle begins to contract the blood is forced on into the right ventricle through the open tricuspid valve. By this means the right ventricle is filled; it in turn must force the blood onwards; the tricuspid valve closes to the minute that ventricle begins to contract, so blood cannot pass by that way; the only way out is by a large artery which has its opening in the right ventricle, like that of the aorta into the left ventricle. This artery which leads to the lungs is called the "pulmonary artery." The right ventricle in contracting sends its contained fluid into this pulmonary artery, just as the left ventricle did into the aorta. A similar mechanism of three pocket-like valve-segments prevents the blood from returning from the artery into the right ventricle. The blood then flows along a series of vessels known as pulmonary vessels, arranged on the same plan as the aorta and its many branches, and having capillaries and veins. There is this difference, however, that the pulmonary veins have no valves. The pulmonary veins lead to large terminal vessels which open into the recipient chamber of the left heart, the left auricle. The left auricle when full enough contracts on its contents and forces them through the ventricle, through the orifice left by the open mitral valve. Thus the blood arrives at the place whence it started, i.e., the left ventricle, and the cycle is completed.

Now, when we had a talk about the minute construction of arteries, capillaries, and veins, I told you that, roughly speaking, the large arteries had more elastic tissue in their coats, whereas the smaller ones had more muscle fibres. You will now see the wants which these provisions meet. The aorta is the artery which must bear the greatest sudden strain; it is pre-eminently elastic; this allows it to be over-filled, and then by its elastic recoil to help force on the blood through the circulation. The muscle element in the smaller arteries will, of course, exercise by contraction an important influence in the amount of blood reaching the capillaries. In the capillaries the interchanges between blood and tissues take place; the tissues taking their nourishment from the blood and returning to it such matters as they no longer require. It follows, then, that the blood returning from the tissues by the veins is much less pure than that arriving at the tissues by the arteries, and the means of purifying it is arrived at by the right heart pumping it through the lungs before it again arrives at the left ventricle. Which of you, then, will deny that this is the most wonderful pump, this heart of ours, in the world, and the work it does? Your heart does as much work in twenty-four hours as would be necessary to raise your body in the air ten times as high as the top of St. Paul's Cathedral!

CHAPTER III.

account as much as she could, was obliged to own to Mr. and Mrs. Ravensdale that their cousin's education had been woefully neglected. She was quick and clever, but she had never been accustomed to diligent study. She could play dance music charmingly; she could read French, and write a good hand; and here the list of her acquirements came to an abrupt termination. In grammar, geography, arithmetic, she was far below the standard, while many a girl of twelve had a much better knowledge of history and languages.

Patience and careful teaching, these were the only remedies, said Miss Williams, and Mr. Ravensdale cordially agreed with her.

Consequently, Bessie was put through a stiff course of learning, and there is no denying the fact that she proved a very idle pupil. She was secretly rebelling against her superiors, and though by fits and starts she exerted herself, on the whole she only learnt as much (or as little) as she was absolutely obliged.

Towards the end of July Mrs. Ravensdale fell ill and was confined to her room. Just at that time Miss Williams went away to the seaside, and Bessie found herself free to occupy her holiday as she chose. It is true that Mr. Ravensdale required her to read with him in the morning, but that ordeal once over, she could retire to her room or the garden, or sometimes to the riverside, and think out the details of her forthcoming book. Yes, the MS. volume was fast filling up; in addition to the shorter poems, there was now a longer work, entitled "Lucille, a Love Lay," the composition of which had frequently interfered with the young author's progress in more ordinary subjects. Day by day she spent hours poring over the closely-written pages; she waited till the house was still at night, then she lighted a candle, and flung herself headlong into the troubles and adventures of Lucille. This gifted young person had already gone through trials enough to have shattered the nerves of any ordinary female, but still she remained the same—

"Ever beauteous, though with dishevelled locks—
Untamed, undaunted by the tempest's shocks,
Tossed and buffeted on life's grim rocks."

Alack! Just as the final stanzas were on the high-road to completion, Miss Williams returned invigorated by the change, and more bent than heretofore on the necessity of being systematic and thorough. Bessie was forced to tear herself away from "Lucille," and waste precious time on French and German irregular verbs.

So the weeks went on. One evening, soon after Miss Williams's return, Mr. Ravensdale had gone out to dinner at Templebury, and Bessie wandered restlessly from room to room. It was pouring with rain, and she could not go out; she could not practise for fear of disturbing the invalid. She did not wish to prepare her translation; she did not care to go on with her knitting, and the MS. book failed to attract her to-night.

"How I wish I had an exciting story-book!" she sighed; "that would pass away the time beautifully."

She strolled round the drawing-room, but did not succeed in finding anything to her taste.

"The best books are in the study; I will go there and look," was the conclusion to which she arrived.

The forbidden shelf was in the corner book-case, as Bessie well knew; nevertheless she went straight up to it, and took down a yellow-backed novel. There was a picture of a girl on a runaway horse: it looked exciting.

"If cousin Edith were well enough, I'm sure she would say that I might read it," thought Bessie; "but I don't mean to, of course not!"

Yet she hurried over the opening pages; she read a little bit of the middle; she forgot where she was. The hours passed by, a servant brought lights; she took no notice of her; she read on, all absorbed, until the sound of wheels on the drive startled her.

She dropped the novel, horrified. Cousin Alfred had returned; what would he say if he found her there, in direct disobedience to his commands?

There was no time to replace the book; she heard his voice in the hall; she hid it under her arm, and slipped out of the study unperceived. Once in her own room, she locked the novel safely into a drawer, congratulating herself on her escape. To-morrow would be time enough to return it, and now that she had read so much she might as well finish it.

From that time forward Bessie watched her opportunity, and helped herself as she chose from the forbidden shelf. Luckily for her, there was no such thing as a bad book in the house, but some of the novels which she devoured in secret were totally unsuited for a girl of her age and excitable disposition. She threw herself vehemently into the pleasures of story reading; she neglected all the little duties that she had hitherto performed in the house; the flower vases were unfilled, the china cabinet was white with dust, the newspapers lay about in untidy heaps. Every moment that she could spare from "Lucille" was devoted to reading.

Under these circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the lessons suffered. Even Miss Williams began to lose patience, and after a while serious complaints reached the ears of Mr. Ravensdale. In a few short words he gave Bessie to understand that if he did not receive better accounts of her progress in future he should send her to school.

This would indeed be a calamity! Bessie had been accustomed to hear strange stories of boarding-schools, the strict hours and bad food. She had always deeply sympathised with the girls at the ladies' establishment where her father occasionally gave lessons, and now it was to be her lot to walk two and two down a dreary street. In despair she betook herself to her old haunt by the river. She must not confide in cousin Edith, and even the thought of the last page of the "Love Lay" did not tend to comfort her.

There was but one course open to her: she must take or send her MS. to London, and when an eager publisher sent a cheque by return of post, she would hand it over to cousin Alfred, meekly (she would scorn to reproach him in her hour of triumph), and say, "Accept the earnings of the poor girl in whose genius you did not believe, and be happy."

But how to set about it? She did not even know the names of the great London publishers. Should she consult Edmund? No, somehow or other the thought of Edmund made her feel uncomfortable. Perhaps he would not quite understand the circumstances, and it would be much pleasanter to take him by surprise when the volume, bound in scarlet morocco, with gilt edges, was published.

Would the Bridges help her? Mr. Bridges was a hard-working musician, who played in second-rate orchestras; Mrs. Bridges was immersed in household occupations; they neither of them had leisure to undertake so precious a commission as this. Was there no other friend to whom she could apply?

Suddenly she recollected that her father long ago had done some work (the editing of a collection of songs) for a London publisher. He had been well paid, and had invariably spoken of Mr. Tatlock with respect. Bessie had once been taken to the wholesale house in King William Street, and had faint recollections of being made to play the piano to a kind old gentleman who had patted her on the head and said that she was very talented. Mr. Francis Tatlock—that was his name; to him she would appeal in this emergency. No time was to be lost; with the dread of a boarding-school hanging over her, she would write to him immediately.

To tell the honest truth, the composition of this epistle cost our heroine infinite pains. The first draft was written off without hesitation, but when she came to read it over, she shrank from sending such a description of her life at Yew Lodge to an utter stranger. For, spite of her many affectations, Bessie had a warm, loving heart; how could she lead Mr. Tatlock to imagine that cousin Edith, for instance, was a cruel tyrant?

Dear cousin Edith! How pleased she had been that morning when Bessie had brought a few flowers into her room.

That letter must be sacrificed. She began again, and this time the pen slipped from her fingers, and behold! there was an unsightly blot. Before she had finished the next attempt she was called downstairs to see a visitor, and it was not until the following day that she finally succeeded in writing a letter to her mind.

"My dear Sir" (ran the letter),—"You were once very kind to my dear father, and I remember coming to see you when I was a little girl. I am residing far away in the country with distant relations. I have written a book of poems which I should like to have published at once; a second volume will be ready very soon. I do not know how to dispose of it, and I hoped that you would perhaps assist me for my father's sake, as I particularly desire to be an author."

"Awaiting your reply most anxiously, I beg leave to remain, dear Sir, your most obedient servant,

"ELIZABETH STANHOPE.

"P.S.—Shall I send you the poems? Please let me know."

It was not quite as dignified as she could wish; the postscript spoilt the ending, but she could not write it again.

The letters at Yew Lodge were put in a box with a glass lid, which was cleared every afternoon. As Bessie approached the post-box with the precious document, she could not refrain from looking round. No one was in sight. It would have been rather awkward if cousin Alfred had happened to come by and ask her who Mr. Tatlock was. She pushed the letter through the slit with a jerk, so that it lay direction downwards. Quite safe; no one could touch the box until the postman came.

For the next few days Bessie went about almost as if she were in a dream; she began to look pale and ill. Every afternoon she was in a perfect fever of anxiety. Had the postman come? Was there a letter from Mr. Tatlock? No; and she had been so confident that he would write to her by return of post.

Towards the end of the week she came in from her walk to find Mr. Ravensdale standing at the hall door with an envelope in his hand.

"My dear Elizabeth," he said, "here is a letter for you. It appears to have travelled half over England; but better late than never. It has reached its destination at last."

"Oh, cousin Alfred! Give it to me: please give it to me."

Her cheeks were scarlet with expectation.

"Certainly; here it is."

Bessie took the letter and put it hurriedly into her pocket; she would have turned away, but he detained her.

"Elizabeth," he said quietly, "do you know who your correspondent is?"

"Yes. At least, I think so," stammered Bessie; "there is no harm."

"I do not ask to see the letter unless you wish to show it to me, but—"

"I cannot show it to you!" she exclaimed aghast; "it is a matter of business, cousin Alfred. It is a secret."

"My dear," said Mr. Ravensdale, "you are too young and inexperienced to receive business letters which are to be kept secret from your best friends. I do not approve of it. You had better inform your correspondent that your guardian has forbidden you to continue the correspondence, or if you should prefer me to do so, I will write for you."

"No. No, thank you; please don't. I will write whatever you like."

"Very good. Do not distress yourself. I quite trust you to respect my wishes in the matter. Do you understand?"

"Yes, cousin Alfred," said Bessie, hanging her head, conscious that "Lucille" under similar circumstances would have made an affecting speech.

As soon as she could get away, she retreated to the farther end of the garden under the shadow of the hedge. She took her precious letter from her pocket. The envelope was covered with postmarks; she had evidently omitted to put the name of the post town. If it had not been for that stupid mistake her cousin would not have noticed it.

"He never inquired about my correspondence before," thought Bessie; "how unfortunate I am!"

With eager hands she tore open the envelope and read the letter which she supposed would decide her future fate.

"Dear Madam,—In the absence of Mr. Francis Tatlock, who is travelling abroad, I beg to inform you that your letter of 28th inst. has been forwarded to him."

That was all; a mere business acknowledgment from a clerk.

For a moment Bessie sat hopelessly miserable, with the letter on her lap. She had promised to put an end to the correspondence. Why, it had only just began; the thing was impossible. Mr. Tatlock would surely answer her letter directly he received it—how could she deliver her guardian's message?

And yet she had promised to do so. Her own words came back to her: "I will write whatever you like." And cousin Alfred had said that he quite trusted her. Bessie felt very uncomfortable; if only he had not used that expression, she would have gone her own way with a peaceful conscience. Yet she knew that she had disobeyed him before in the matter of the novel-reading; he had never found her out. Day by day, when she had finished one volume she had replaced it and taken another, and he had never been a whit the wiser. It was very easy to deceive him, and having once begun to do so, why not go on in the same fashion? It was not her fault, she was sure that it was not her fault; why did he treat her like a child? Little by little she persuaded herself into thinking that wrong was right. Little by little she made her plans.

The note before her did not require a reply; she would not write again; she would wait until she heard from Mr. Tatlock himself, and then it would be time enough to decide what she would do next. Some manœuvring would be necessary to get the letter from Mr. Tatlock without her cousin's knowledge.

"I will manage it," said Bessie to herself, "and afterwards cousin Alfred will say that I have acted very rightly. He will be sorry that he made himself so disagreeable, and apologise."

In her secret heart she was not quite sure of this, but she had made up her mind to be disobedient; she would have the letter at any price. For so many weeks she had lived in constant fear of being found out, that now she was beginning to get accustomed to it. She leant back against the towering hedge, and looked up into the bright blue sky. Then it occurred to her to wonder what Edmund would say if he knew what she proposed doing. For the first time since his departure she felt glad that he was far away in London.

HOW THOUGHTLESS MEN ARE!

AT eleven o'clock precisely a note from my husband saying he was bringing two friends back to lunch. This under ordinary circumstances would be no trouble, but on this particular day my cook was absent, and a charwoman taking her place.

For a moment I was in despair; then seeing no help for it, I determined to be cook myself. I inspected the larder, and found there some cold salmon and some cold mutton. I decided to warm the mutton and mayonnaise the salmon.

MAYONNAISE RECIPE.

Place the cold salmon on a dish, removing the black skin; throw over it the following mixture:—

Place in a basin the yolk of an egg, add to it one teaspoonful of flour of mustard, half a teaspoonful of salt, and some pepper; mix all this smoothly with half a pint of cream, then add two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, and mix well; finally with a whisk beat this till it is stiff, then throw it over the salmon. Have ready three hard-boiled eggs, cut each into four pieces, and place round the dish, with a sprig of parsley to each piece.

This dish is very easy to make, and is so pretty when finished. I was not quite satisfied when mine was done, as I fancied it wanted some red colour to improve it, and, of course, pieces of lobster would have been the correct thing; however, a few blossoms of scarlet geranium had almost the same effect, and I was quite content.

Now for the mutton—

I found there was some nice soup left from last evening's dinner, so I put two teacupfuls into a saucepan, adding two small onions finely minced, and a little good gravy; when this got hot I shook in some flour till it was nicely thickened. I cut some slices of mutton, which I also floured, and then put into the saucepan with the gravy; the whole I put on the fire long enough to make thoroughly hot before serving.

Next I made a tart, but as nearly everyone knows how to make pastry, I need not say how I did it; but I think some girls may care to know the way I make a pretty dish, which I call—

BISCUITS GLACÉS.

Place half a pint of cream in a basin, and whisk it till thick, then add a third of an ordinary sized pot of apricot jam, and (if required) a tablespoonful of sifted sugar, but this depends entirely on taste. Whisk this together till it is thoroughly mixed and stiff, then fill some ramakin papers, and on the top of each put one preserved cherry, and some strips of angelica. I was also to get all this ready some time before my husband and his friends arrived, so I had plenty of time to see to my floral decorations.

There is the bunch of flowers, and with plenty of good material it is not difficult to realise a good result. An old china bowl filled with syringa and guelder roses looked well in the centre of the table.

How I love syringa, beautiful flower! with its cream-coloured petals, its golden stamens, and exquisite perfume. It reminds me—but ah! I must not stray from cooking to sentiment. In six small white glass vases I placed pansies. Unless one has seen it, it is difficult to believe how well pansies look when arranged without any green, and with only one colour in each vase; thus dark purple in one, white in another, yellow, pale mauve, and so on. Whilst I am speaking of flowers, has anyone noticed what beautiful vases and bowls can be arranged in the early spring with buttercups, and the flower of the wild parsley! I had no other flowers on the dinner-table for one month. Before I finish I will give the recipe for a savoury omelette, which is very easy to make.

SAVOURY OMELETTE.

One large, heaped-up tablespoonful of flour, a little salt and pepper to taste; mix this with half a pint of milk; add the yolks of three eggs well beaten, also two tablespoonfuls of finely-chopped parsley, and two spring onions, also finely chopped; then stir in the whites of the three eggs, which must be beaten to a stiff froth, and to do this, place them on a plate, add a pinch of salt, and beat with a knife. Now the omelette is ready to fry; place some butter in an omelette pan and let it boil, then pour in the mixture, and let it brown; more butter must be added if it seems likely to stick. When it is nicely brown (and to ascertain this a corner must be turned up with a knife to see), hold the pan in the oven for two or three minutes, and then turn it out into a dish; the dish must not be covered when taken into the dining-room.

HOUSEKEEPER.

EDUCATIONAL.

STAR OF THE SEA.—The "Great Marquis" is in Scotland James Graham, Marquis of Montrose, 1612-1650.

"I've told thee how we swept Dundee,
And tamed the Lindsay's pride;
But never have I told thee yet
How the Great Marquis died."

Aytoun.

In Portugal, the "Great Marquis" is Don Sebastião José de Carvalho, Marquis de Pombal, greatest of all Portuguese statesmen, 1699-1782.

MINETTE.—Virgil, the greatest of Roman poets, was born 15th October, 70 B.C.; died 21st September, 19 B.C. Although Virgil never saw the Star of Bethlehem, his writings have appealed to Christians of every age, from St. Augustine to Keble. His influence has been immense on education in every age.

MARGUERITE.—1. The estimated population of England and Wales in 1483 was 4,689,000; in 1377, 2,092,978. 2. The quotation—

"To live in hearts we leave behind,
Is not to die."

is from Campbell's "Hallowed Ground."

ELEINE.—The ordinary speed of a carrier pigeon was put down in July, 1872, at one mile in ninety seconds. Thirty-two pigeons were liberated in London on November 22, 1819, at 7 A.M.; one of them arrived at Antwerp at noon, another a quarter of an hour after. During the siege of Paris there was a pigeon post between London and Tours, 48 day mails being sent, and 1,186 night mails.

GWENDOLIN.—We could not say how long you would take to prepare for the examination, for we do not know how far you are advanced nor what are your capabilities.

INEXPERIENCE.—We should think a situation as visiting or daily governess would be better than a nursing governess-ship.

I. F. SNOWDROP can have no better guide for books to read for improvement than to follow the "Girls' Year," which came out month by month in vol. ix. "G.O.P.," written by James Mason.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER must go herself and inquire for all such things, or answer advertisements.

POWYS will find the "Home Naturalist," published by the Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row, E.C., a useful book. 2. The leaves enclosed appear to be those of the beech-tree.

L. S. P.—The Maria Grey Kindergarten Training College, Miss Ward, 5, Fitzroy Street, W. Miss James, Northfield House, Stamford Hill, N., seems the nearest to you.

MARIE.—The globular form of the earth, the opacity of the moon, and the true causes of lunar eclipses were all taught by Thales of Miletus about 640 B.C.

CORONA.—We could not give the value of the coins unless they are better described than in your brief note.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MELLEN.—The "Great Moralist of Fleet Street" was Dr. Johnson, 1709-1784.

ONE EAGER TO LEARN.—Horseshoes were at one time nailed up over doors as a protection against witches. The idea of luck connected with picking up a horseshoe is derived from the notion of its being a protection from witches. For the same reason our forefathers nailed a horseshoe on the masts of their ships, one being nailed on the mast of the Victory by Lord Nelson, which was there during the Battle of Trafalgar. This old superstition appears to be dying out.

NITA.—The correspondence rules are always the same. 2. We are always glad to hear from our girls, and we think your drawings are very spirited.

M. J. (Hungary). The subscription to the Child's Companion is 1d. monthly; yearly volume 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d., according to binding.

ELIZABETH B.—As a general rule it is found that by fixing the thoughts at night on the hour you wish to rise, you will awake at or near the hour. By leaving the window blinds partly up the morning light will generally awaken most people.

RED DRAGON was the ensign of Cadwallader, the last of the British kings from whom the Tudors were descended. It was adopted as a device by Henry VII., and used on his standard on Bosworth Field. The word "dragon" in Celtic means a "chief," hence "Pen-dragon" was a sort of dictator created in times of danger. The origin of many legends of knights slaying "dragons" is found in the Celtic use of the word for "chief."

ONTARIO.—There is a paper published in London called the Nursing Record, by Sampson Low & Co., Limited. The term "Classic" is of Latin origin, and is derived from the social economy of Rome. One man was said to be of the second class, another was in the third; but he who was in the highest class was said emphatically to be of the class, classicus; and as we say, "Men of rank," meaning men of the highest rank, so by an obvious analogy the best writers are termed classic, the best music classical. The term classical is also applied to the works of Greek and Latin authors, which would be called classical studies.

ARS LONGA VITA BREVIS will find exercises given on page 516, vol. v., "Physical Education of Girls."

M. D. must send the dish covers to have them re-plated; she could not do them herself.

HAT-PIN had better write to the paper which published the poem in 1887.

BERTHA EVELYN.—April 28th, 1871, was a Friday. To clean a straw hat, if black, paint it with Berlin black, or any such gloss; but if white, send it to a cleaner and get it re-blocked.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER.—What we understand by the term "Protestantism" dates back some seven hundred years; for in France the "Albigenses" protested about the year 1177, and under Farel, before 1512, the Huguenots also, in 1529. In Italy, Savonarola protested, and was martyred for disseminating the Holy Scriptures amongst the people (or advocating the principle) about the year 1498. In Bohemia, Huss protested A.D. 1405; in Germany, as you know, Luther did the same, 1517; Zwingli in Switzerland, 1519; in Denmark, Andreas Bodenstein followed suit in 1521; Petri, in Sweden, A.D. 1539; Knox, in Scotland, 1560; and in the Netherlands, 1562. Most of these protests took place in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; but that of the Albigenses led the van in the twelfth.

POLLIE (Harrow Hill).—The 13th October, 1854, was a Friday; 25th March, 1864, was a Friday; the 27th October, 1865, was a Friday; and 3rd May, 1866, was a Thursday.

LITHUANIAN MAID (Cracow).—We are pleased to hear that you like our magazine, and we congratulate you on your good progress in writing our difficult language. To take spots out of ordinary marble:—A strong ley of soap and quicklime mixed together to the consistency of milk, laid on the stone for twenty-four hours and then washed off, and a rubbing with fine putty-powder mixed with olive-oil afterwards, is a good recipe. Whether it would be effectual in taking ink out of alabaster we could scarcely say, not having tried it; and yours appears to be a delicate fancy article. We hope we may hear from you again. 2. The light upward strokes in your writing are rather too delicate, which makes it difficult to read by those who have not strong, clear sight.

AN ANXIOUS ONE.—Watering plants with soapsuds is useful in many cases of insect pests. For woodlice, water flower beds or boxes with a mixture of one part of vinegar and nine parts of water. For a worm in the pot, take the plant from the pot, knock the soil from the ball, and extract the worm.

NEMMIE'S DARLING has our best thanks for her picture and account of Roche Rocks. We do not think the leaves would be of any service.

GRANNY.—One of the great secrets in rearing turkeys as well as chickens seems to be to keep them off the wet grass. See "Poultry Keeping," in present volume, page 252, for feeding.

TWENTY-ONE.—1. Liberty silks are much used for draperies, and also the various art muslins. A brass pole would be best for the curtains of a folding door, as they would require to be used. Many people take the fenders away in summer and draw the hearthrug up to the fireplace, placing a large jar in front, with a growing plant or a bouquet of grasses in it. 2. Put your name below your mother's on the visiting card. It is not at all needful to make any distinction of the kind, as young girls are not supposed to pay visits without their mothers.

SOMEBODY'S JESS (Australia).—1. We fear all the numbers you mention are out of print, and we should not know how to get them for you. 2. Change of climate is often a cure for asthma.

MINNIE P.—You should consult a good dentist as well as a doctor; your general health and digestion must be affected.

E. M. W., ADA B.—Both show some poetic feeling, but the so-called poems are incorrect in many ways.

WORK HEARTILY.

By MARY ROWLES JARVIS.

Is your life-work mean and humble,
All its outlook cramped and grey?
Do not stoop to fret and grumble;
Discontented pilgrims stumble
When no hindrance bars the way!

Though your task may seem a fetter
That would hands and heart control,
To your own lot you are debtor,
Day by day to make it better,
In undaunted strength of soul.

Though the humble "now" may prove you,
Higher service waits afar;
Courage! angels watch above you,
And the Father bends to love you,
And to bless you where you are.

Let that love your aims embolden,
With a smile your duties meet,
And the joy from none withholden
Soon shall make the dull life golden,
And the bitter task-work sweet!

CHAPTER XXV.
CHANGES.

PRISSY would have risen up and returned to Islip Barnes next day to do her share of the work; to begin again, with the faltering step and the far-away look in her eyes, to wait on her mother and Alice, help Anthony, take heed for the household, and solace the bereaved and indigent whom the war had left stranded, if the others would have let her, exactly as heretofore.

But the power failed her. When she rose to her feet she could not stand; when she lifted her hand it fell again by her side. It seemed as if her bodily forces were smitten and withered at their source by the trial she had undergone and by the very faith and courage with which she had gone forth to meet it, refusing to flinch or do anything save stand by a doomed man in the hour of need.

The doctor who was called in spoke gravely of a tremendous shock to the system, and did not deny that there were heavy obstacles to her rallying from it. But Prissy herself had no faithless, self-indulgent wish to slip out of the world and leave her friends in the lurch. Life might have lost its zest for her. The burden and heat of the day might be harder to contemplate in prospect and to endure in fact without the friend who was to have shared them with her, and in sharing deprived them of half their crushing weight. Still, her constant, feeble cry was how much there was to do in the world, and the part in it she was to take before she could rejoin her lover. Prissy would make an effort, and a gallant one, to recall her sinking powers and fight a brave fight against the enemy.

As for Kitty, there was nothing she would not have done, by God's permission, to keep Prissy with them, to give her back to Anthony, who had looked so harassed and heart-broken when Kitty saw him last.

Prissy did recover, but her recovery was a matter of time and patience, and was so long protracted, that much had happened before she was restored even to an approach to her former health and strength.

Anthony Walton had joined the Parliamentary army; his presence at home, under the suspicion which had fallen upon him in consequence of Colonel Windebank's surrender of Bletchington, having grown to be rather a detriment than a benefit to his family. He fought in the battle of Naseby on the 14th of June while Prissy was still hovering between life and death, and came out of it unhurt, after having earned much credit among his fellows for his coolness and resolution.

Cromwell's greatest victory was the death-blow to King Charles' fortunes; nevertheless, he lingered at Oxford till the spring of 1646.

Kitty in her mourning, waiting assiduously on Prissy, who was so bent on not being a trouble to her friends, and yet could make so small progress in ridding them of the burden, heard and saw little of what was going on abroad. In truth, when her mind went beyond the household at Oriel she was principally concerned with the news from Islip Barnes.

It was reported that Madam Walton was better than might have been expected after the misfortunes in her family, and that Mrs. Alice, with the help of a good steward, was managing the home-farm famously for her absent brother. The idea of Alice's managing—not to say a house but a farm, and that so as to awaken the respectful admiration of her country neighbours—was a marvel, which drew from Prissy her first happy laugh and eager explanation that she always knew it was in Alice to make a good and useful woman in spite of her girlish freaks and fancies. In corroboration of Prissy's words, Alice found time to write cheerful accounts of her doings in the middle of her many serious engagements. Her letters were full of field husbandry as well as domestic economy; she was taking the greatest interest in the operations of sowing and weeding and mowing and reaping, in the transactions at the mill, and the fattening and selling of cattle and sheep, so that what was left of Anthony's impoverished estate might not come to ruin; she was so busy that she had no time to feel out of sorts—indeed, much work must agree with her, and be the very thing she had wanted, for she was perfectly well and strong. Her mother, too, was better than usual, so that Prissy must not fret about them. They would give a great deal to have her back among them. Of course she knew that, but it was good for her to stay where she was; she might be easy in her mind about those at home, and about Anthony, who was doing finely, and greatly interested in his new trade of war, while he sent them news of his welfare whenever he could manage it.

After Alice's earlier letters there was no more allusion to the improvement in her health, as if its satisfactory condition was a mere matter of course, while there was much of the yield from the thirty acre field, the chances of the pasture, and the repairing of the cottages on Islip Barnes, of which her brother had written. Clearly Alice had turned over a new leaf, and the capacity to do it must have been in her, as Prissy said, all the time.

But though Kitty had heard of chronic invalids rising from their beds of sickness and becoming the stays of their families at certain crises, the idea of cousin Alice's developing into a Lady Ottery always made her cousin smile at this date. She wondered if Alice would grow skilled in the drawing out of leases, the detection of flaws in farming accounts. Would she wax lean and gaunt with much exercise? Would her fine colour deepen into a permanent crimson from exposure to the weather, and her voice strengthen and deepen like a man's with speaking words of authority? But what did it matter if Alice took up the task imposed upon her when her turn came, and discharged it to the satisfaction of her friends—ay, and of the Master who might yet say, "Well done, good and faithful servant," to the idle girl with her foolish airs and graces?

Alas! a faithful servant and a helper of many was on the eve of her departure. Lady Ottery's strength suddenly gave way, and with scarcely an interval between her active exertions for the benefit of her neighbours, unremitted under her weight of years, she went quietly and calmly to receive her wages. While she was still alive, and Kitty was keenly reproaching herself for not having sooner seen what she might have known was inevitable, grudging, as it were, that she had not been permitted to repay to her godmother a tithe of her kindness and care, by lavishing on her such long cherishing and nursing as Kitty had been bestowing on Prissy, the old independent-minded, hardy nature of the woman spoke up once more.

"No, no, my dear, better as it is, though I thank you for your goodwill; I always prayed my Lord that I might die in harness; and He hath granted my prayer."

Her only utterances of regret were for Kitty herself.

"I could have liked to have lived to see thee committed to younger hands than those of thy father and thy woman Pettit, little Kitty, but He knoweth best. I could have wished just to have had thee safely settled—not a great ambitious settlement, what is far better, something modestly bountiful befitting thy birth and breeding among thine own people. I had a dream, and I would I could have seen whether it were to come true. But what matters the idle satisfaction here of a silly old body like me, when I may know yonder? and whether I know or not, all is in good hands."

The bulk of Lady Ottery's savings had gone with many another goodly store to relieve the King's wants, and she would not have wished to recall the money. But by dint of continuous effort and rigorous self-denial she had still managed to secure a small provision for her godchild—over which Kitty's loving tears fell, as at the last mark of her dear Lady Ottery's goodness to her.

Under these circumstances Kitty had little attention to spare to public events, but she did hear how Basing House, surnamed "Loyalty," had been taken, and its owner, the gallant old Marquis of Winchester, had not left it till it was blazing behind him, when he stoutly asserted that if the King had no more ground in England than Basing House, its master would adventure it as he did, and so maintain it to the uttermost. She knew, too, as all Oxford knew, how, when Fairfax was ready to descend on the town, Charles and his escort rode out of it for the last time on a bleak February day. After various journeys to and fro he gave himself up to the Scotch army at Newark. His mien was as dignified, his handsome high-bred face little sadder in its abstraction than it had been during all these ten years since the child Kitty Dacre had been bidden gaze on her sovereign. The brief, passionate despair with which on Naseby field, after the battle was lost, he had called in vain for "one charge more" had passed away, and he was again planning and hoping from treaties and stratagems, from playing the Presbyterians against the Independents, the Scotch against the English, that he should yet win the day. Even the Queen Henrietta Maria, writing from across the seas, from her rooms in the Louvre, with all the councillors who had been most daring and reckless of old, urged him to make terms with his Parliament to no purpose.

Bristol, under Prince Rupert, had surrendered. The white dog, which had walked so constantly at the Prince's heels when he was at Oxford that the Puritans said it was his familiar spirit, had played him false. The King's house at Woodstock, the town of Abingdon—all was in the hands of the Parliamentary army.

At last, by Charles's command, his loyal city of Oxford surrendered on the 24th of June, Midsummer day, 1646, to Sir Thomas Fairfax, the garrison quitting the castle with flags flying and all the honours of voluntary submission. If town rejoiced over gown at the triumph of the Parliament and people, it was still in a subdued and modified manner, for when Parliament sent down a commission for the reform of the University, together with a deputation of eminent Presbyterian preachers to bring the whole inhabitants to a right frame of mind, though some who had been in opposition submitted and listened, there were as many Royalist caricatures and pasquinades issued, and as much contumaciousness and opposition shown to the work of the commission, as if gown had been in full enjoyment of its old aristocratic privileges.

It was clear, however, that greater obedience would be exacted, and that as Dr. Dacre put it, Oxford was no longer a University for the King's honest servants. Dr. Peter therefore made up his mind to anticipate the second visitation from the Parliamentary commissioners, with the question put plainly to every member of the defiant colleges—head or servant, rector or student. The challenge was whether he acknowledged the authority of the Parliament in the visitation; and though the greater part of the members gave an extorted "yes," four hundred resisted, and answered "no," when they were forthwith ejected from their respective offices.

Dr. Peter Dacre preferred to resign, quit Oriel and Oxford, and repair to the Dutch University of Leyden, where he had correspondents, and believed he could get work.

Lady Ottery's small provision for Kitty helped him in making this decision, for her modest income, shared as it would be by the whole household, would go some way in enabling them to live very quietly and cheaply in a foreign town.

Kitty was now a gracious, sensible maiden, in her twentieth year; and Mrs. Judy was not too old to make the move; indeed, she was loudly proclaiming the excellent chance which had come to her in being enabled to see the world at her years. Besides Kitty and Mrs. Judy, Prissy was to accompany her uncle; she had stayed so long an invalid with the Dacres that she had become like one of themselves.

Anthony Walton had strongly enjoined on his sister to accept her uncle and cousin's pressing invitation, for he had two motives working in his mind.

Both Dr. Dacre and Mrs. Judy were well up in years, and Kitty, with all her sweet wisdom, was hardly able to cope alone with what might be in store for them. In fact, she was considerably dazzled and mystified already with the difficulties of foreign travel and a foreign residence under the circumstances.

In addition, Prissy, in spite of reverent meekness and readiness to take up the dropped threads of her life's work, shrank from returning now to Islip Barnes in the face of its association with Bletchington House, of which in happier days she had looked forward to being the Governor's lady. So soon as she was convinced that her mother and Alice could still do without her, and were happy in each other's company, Prissy was well content to go abroad with Dr. Dacre, Kitty, and Mrs. Judy, and give them all the support and assistance she owed to them.

Before the party could start, a new and excellent reason why there was no necessity for Prissy's returning to Islip Barnes was unexpectedly supplied.

Alice's timely blossoming into an energetic house-mistress and deputy-manageress of her brother's estate, together with her comely person, had made so lively an impression on the judgment and affections of a neighbouring squire, one Master William Dorset, of Wood Dorset, a modest, worthy, God-fearing young man, that he besought her to take his manor-house also under her safe keeping, and to help him to accomplish a judicious control and disposal of his belongings. Alice did not say him nay, so that as the war was ended for the present, and nobody was quite sure when it might not be resumed, there was a speedily quiet, pretty wedding in Oxford for the convenience of all concerned. The chief difference it made was that young Madam Dorset and her mother removed to Wood Dorset instead of continuing at Islip Barnes, while Master William Dorset was ready and willing to play the part of a son to Madam Walton, and jointly with Alice to take care of Anthony's house and property in his absence.

For Anthony did not return to reign alone at Islip Barnes; he had not even been spared from his work to be present at his sister Alice's wedding, and to give her away, though she had his hearty consent to the deed. There were great doings up in London, great interests at stake, great struggles between General Cromwell and his army, representing the Independents on the one hand, and the Parliament and the Presbyterians on the other. No good patriot who believed that his voice and example could be of any avail would be absent. Peace was granted to the war-worn country, but civil and religious liberty was yet hanging in the balance.

The night before the Dacres started for London and Flushing, Kitty was summoned by her father to help him in the discharge of an obligation to his college, to which he desired as few witnesses as possible. Oriel, like the other colleges, was a house divided against itself at present, with what strength remained to it shattered by the Parliamentary visitation. It was feared, in spite of solemn pledges, that darker days were coming, when the colleges would be despoiled of what treasures were left to them.

It was bad enough to have for a chancellor my Lord Pembroke (had my Lady filled his shoes she might have daunted and posed the most intrepid and learned doctor among them), but as it was, the authority was vested in the man of horses and hounds and strange oaths, in which he was said to be proficient beyond all the men of his time. He had railed at the Vice-Chancellor, and sworn that he should be "whipped, nay hanged," because he threw obstacles in the way of the commissioners. But at least Lord Pembroke, though a Puritan in politics, was a great nobleman. What would be the condition of the University, and what might it not be required to give up, if, as was currently reported, General Cromwell were the next Chancellor?*

* Oliver Cromwell during his Chancellorship was, like William Laud, a liberal friend to the University.

Oriel's chief treasure in old plate was its founder's cup in silver gilt, nine feet in height, with six lips and the letter E, for King Edward II. (by whom the cup was presented in the fourteenth century), engraved in different compartments. Here would be a fine prize for the Philistines, with Hall Royal stripped of its crowning distinction. Perhaps Master Oliver, though he was said to have some regard for books, might confiscate it to serve for his own beaker.

Neither the provost nor the college butler could venture to act in the matter; but they could connive at the desperate deed of Dr. Peter Dacre, who was going forth from England across the high seas, and would be beyond the reach of general or Parliament to call him to account for this night's proceeding.

When the college, with two exceptions, was sound asleep, as the depredators trusted, Kitty, trembling a little at the long shadows which all but swallowed up the little light of the lamp she held, stood by while her father, with the butler's key, unlocked the college plate chest, abstracted what he wanted, and bore it to the Dacres' parlour. There behind a panel, loosened for the purpose, was hid the beautiful cup which was found after many days.

Kitty and Dr. Peter were not the only treasure-hiders in Oxford in those troublous times. Many a valued heirloom which had survived the King's requisitions, and a good deal of college property, were thus disposed of.

(To be concluded.)

we were asked to state the most impossible thing to happen in a civilised country, we should probably, without hesitation, say, cruelty to little children.

Cruelty to the little ones, who are of all creatures the most utterly helpless, who have no voice to complain, no strength to yield in their own defence, whose only refuge is in the parents' love and devotion—cruelty to these surely would be quite impossible.

Evidently this has been the firm belief of legislators in all parts of the world, for there is no law in existence for the punishment of such a crime. No one would believe that any members of the human family, however savage or uncontrolled, would be found wantonly to inflict torture upon their own babes.

It is for this favoured land, this highly civilised age, to prove the fallacy of such a belief, and to show, moreover, that a woman can forget her sucking child and be wanting in compassion to the son of her womb; and even beyond this, that parents exist who have cast out their fatherhood and motherhood, and supplied the place with fiendish ferocity.

The intense cruelty which some of our babes and little children have suffered of late years at the hands of the parents would have disgraced savages and even wild beasts; and but for the efforts of a small band of philanthropists, headed and directed by one who has an enthusiastic love and reverence for little children, this cruelty might have continued till it had stained England's escutcheon, and lowered her in the eyes of all civilised countries.

If some of these acts of cruelty could be related here, the first impulse of the tender-hearted reader would be to utterly disbelieve them, and the next, on being convinced, to hide the face and sob like a child that such things could be done in our midst.

When once our eyes are opened to the existence of these most sorrowful scenes, we dare not shut them again, for knowledge has made us responsible. If we take no step to prevent the maiming and torturing of these little ones, we tacitly give our sanction to it.

We dare not for a day be negligent, in the hope that things will right themselves; we would not if we could, for God has implanted in our hearts a tender love for the little ones among us, and we are rightly stern and indignant with those who wrong them.

Is it not past belief that a father would take an infant of fifteen months and twice in one night cane it because it cried with the pain of teething; or that he would in a fit of temper strike his little boy to the earth with a fist that would fell an ox, and because the child cried with pain, thrust three of his huge fingers down its throat to stop it? Would any wild beast be so cruel to its young? Yet these are deeds done in the midst of Christian London, and by a civilised and educated people.

This is not the place to recapitulate the horrors brought to light by "The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." Everything can be learned by going to the shelter in Harpur Street, not only of the evil existing, but also of the beneficent work going on to counteract it.

There are certain people connected with this institution who guarantee its genuineness and philanthropy—viz., the Princess Christian, Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Cardinal Manning, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Pym, and the Rev. B. Waugh, who is the life and mainspring of the whole.

It would take a volume to speak in detail of all this institution has done and is doing; indeed, this can only be realised when people's sympathies and interest are thoroughly roused. To those who would gladly learn about the shelter, yet have not the time to see it for themselves, let me tell what we saw at our visit there last week.

As we drove up to the building there was no mistaking its character, for a double row of gold letters across the front and a red lamp hanging over the door, also lettered, left no doubt possible as to its aim and object.

We were received in a set of bright, clean offices, painted light green, picked out with dark, and red blinds to the windows, which cast a cheerful light over all.

Here we were introduced to Mrs. Brooke, the matron, a kind, motherly woman, who has been at the work from its commencement, who prepared to pilot us over the building.

To start with, she told us that both this and the small adjoining house belonged to the society, one being devoted to ill-treated children only, and the other to bailed-out children, or the Queen's little prisoners, as they are called here.

The previous week forty-three children of both classes were in the building, this week only thirty, fourteen of whom are ill-treated, and are babes from a month old to children of sixteen. At present they have seven little creatures from a baby farm near Swindon, where the woman in charge had had large sums paid her for their maintenance, but which she appropriated to her own use, and systematically starved and ill-treated the poor little things.

First we entered the girls' dormitory, bright and cheerful with red and white quilts on the beds, pleasant pictures on the walls, and the windows all open, letting in fresh air, light and warmth without stint. The playroom came next under our notice, supplied with toys and covered with pretty picture wall-paper, besides other pictures.

In this room were sights to make one's heart ache; a child of six years old hardly able to crawl; another wee thing with black bruises on her face and body, and her little finger nails torn off! A child, too, of a London physician was here, a handsome intelligent girl, who had taken refuge from the brutality of her father, incited thereto by his new young wife. There were half a dozen more in this room, each with its own painful history, each with a look of suffering on its face which seemed habitual to it. A nursing gate before the door of this room locked automatically, thus preventing the possibility of any accident.

We now passed into the babies' room, which is next door to the matron's. She is always at hand, therefore, during the night in case of need.

Miss Brooke, a bright, pretty girl, is the baby superintendent, or, in other words, the "angel of the house." One must be there to see her tending the sick and spreading happiness about, before one can understand what she is to the baby inhabitants, who put out their tiny arms to her, calling "Nannie, Nannie."

When the babies are first brought in they frequently have to be fed with half a teaspoonful of arrowroot and brandy twice in the hour, so faint and emaciated are they.

What a paradise it must seem when they open their eyes in this sunny room, with pretty curtained cots or white beds, and with cheerful pictures and kind faces about them.

They have not so many babies just now, for one little French girl, with wrists no bigger than thumbs, has been taken to Broadstairs, another has gone to Norwich, and a third to Bath.

The boys' bedroom came next, with blue-and-white quilts, good blankets, unbleached sheets, and mattresses. The Lord's Prayer, in large type, hung on the wall, which was adorned with many pictures. Fresh air, cleanliness and cheerfulness pervaded this room, as all other parts of the house.

The babies' playroom next door was in possession of three little mites, and a girl in charge; they were plump, rosy, happy creatures, though when they entered, the matron said, they were perfect skeletons.

We were now admitted by a double door into the "bail-out-house," as it is called, where poor children sent out to beg, or children accused of any violation of the law, may be brought by the police instead of being taken to a lock-up.

These children are called the Queen's little prisoners. They are bailed out at £2 a head, and taken care of here, while the cause and circumstances of their offence are being inquired into.

These poor children often try to escape, therefore the windows have iron bars. One boy really did get away, but was brought back, and when the matron asked him why he had done so, he answered, "If I'd seen you fust, mum, I wouldn't have cut and run; but I seed fust a bobby (the matron's husband in semi-official uniform), and then a parson (Mr. Waugh), and they was too much for me, so I says I'm off."

The boys' dormitory in this house also had blue-and-white quilts on the beds, pictures, and bright, flowery paper on the walls, and wire guards to the gas-jets. Mr. Waugh told us that the most remarkable thing about the children who come in here is their intense love of flowers; that if one offered them cowslips with one hand and buns with the other, the buns would have no chance.

Most of the cruelty seems to be incited by the hope of killing the children and getting the money for which they are insured. One boy, insured for £20, had forty or fifty wounds on his back inflicted by his mother, which gave rise to the remark from Mr. Waugh, that when an angel loses its nature it goes down to the utmost depths, and when a woman loses her womanhood she is utterly degraded.

Two isolated rooms are provided in case of ophthalmia or skin disease; but, wonderful to relate, although in the five years they have been working they have received upwards of four hundred children, they have never had an epidemic. This is a great cause of thankfulness to all who are engaged in the work; it seems as though the loving Father specially cared for these little ones whose lives have been so intensely sad.

The remarks of some of the boys are very touching. A lad of eight or nine climbed out of the window one morning, and, by means of the water-pipe, swung himself on to the roof. The matron, frightened at the danger he was in, called out, "Surely it is not Johnnie up there?" To which he sent answer back, "I shan't hurt, don't you cry." When at last he was safe, she said, "You have grieved me very much, and you have set a bad example to the other boys. I did not think you would have done it, and now, as a lesson to the others, you must go to bed." At this he exclaimed, "Well, I'm sorry I did it, for your face looks just like my mother's before she died, and I never felt so funny in my life." He was a bright, restless little fellow, and often came up to her with the request, "Please, matron, give me something to do, for if you don't I shall be doing something bad." He is in Canada now, getting on well.

Over each boy's bed is a picture of Christ the Healer, and the usual question on first seeing it is, "What's up? Has the little 'un got measles or whooping cough?"

Many of these children are taught here for the first time to say their prayers. There is a spirit of love and gentleness and peace in these two houses which cannot fail to touch the hearts of those who have had no such experience in their lives before.

In an underground room, clean, light, and airy, we saw the bailed-out boys; two of them were sons of a man who used to preach on Islington Green, while his sons, in all sorts of weather, were out selling tracts and pencils. Should they return with any on their hands they were cruelly beaten and starved by this preaching father, who was at length taken in the act and sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

All the boys seemed impressionable, intelligent little fellows, and were eager to express what they would like to be in the future. One holding up a maimed hand said, "They won't take me for a soldier, mum, will they? 'cause father knocked off two of my fingers."

The sanitary arrangements are good throughout both houses, which perhaps accounts for the absence of sickness among the children. We were glad to hear that what has been done in London for these little ones by this institution will probably be extended throughout the country, making it a national rather than a London institution.

There are already branch institutions in Glasgow, Hull, and Liverpool, each of which acts simply for the children of its own city, leaving untouched the outlying lonely farm-houses, where deeds of cruelty may go on without let or hindrance, and this is one reason why Mr. Waugh wishes the work to be a national one, a work which will penetrate into the furthest corners of the kingdom—indeed, wherever there are little children to be cared for.

An instance of brutal cruelty has just been unearthed in a farm in Lancashire, two miles from any other house.

To carry out the plan of a national institution a good deal of help will be required. It takes £80 a year to maintain committee and officers, and as the city populations number 200,000, and the rural 120,000, it would be necessary to have a great many centres.

If the people in various parts of England will find money to maintain the officers, the society in London will find the money to carry on the prosecutions.

The world is gradually coming to an understanding of the work of this society and what it is doing to shield the children of our land from cruelty, which makes the heart bleed only to listen to.

A short time since two children were sent out to Canada by the creatures in charge of them as utterly destitute, while in reality they had £2,000 belonging to them. Such acts will soon be impossible, for Mr. Waugh intends making such children wards of the State.

Peaceful as this shelter seemed to us, and as it certainly must be to the dear little ones within its walls, it is yet a formidable weapon against the cruel parents and baby-farmers, whom it ceases not to harass with its far-seeing and effective working.

Until one actually goes to the shelter and sees with one's own eyes these victims of savagery, it is difficult to realise that the deeds done are possible in such a city as this. If we cannot put our own hands to the plough, we may strengthen the hands of those who do, in any way that presents itself to us. The workers want sympathy, money, clothing, one or the other of which it may be our privilege to supply.

There is no more Christ-like work in the world than that undertaken by this little band of workers; and no matter what our condition in life, what our sex, what our religious principles, if we have but hearts we can join in it, and give a helping hand. It is the one work in which Jews, Protestants, and Catholics have worked together without a shadow of discord; its chief aim and object is to put down and extirpate cruelty to children, and to redress the wrongs done to babes of only a few days old.

Go, if you can, to the shelter, 7, Harpur Street, Theobald's Road, W.C., and see with your own eyes and hear with your own ears the pathetic stories.

As many as forty children in six weeks are frequently fitted out from head to foot, so that clothing is greatly needed, most of all shoes, boots, and stockings.

Would it be out of place here to mention that many girls have leisure during the summer, and that those servants left behind in town with little or nothing to do during July, August, and September, might send stockings and socks, and make under-garments for the children of the shelter during this leisure time. I am sure it will make them happy to do this, and be an immense boon to the dear children of the shelter.

THE ROMANCE OF NATURE;

OR,

THE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS, PLANTS, EARTH, AIR, SEA, AND SKY.

By JAMES MASON.

VI.—SUPERSTITIONS OF THE SEA.

THE sea is a fertile field for all who take an interest in old superstitions, and no wonder. There is an air of mystery about its limitless expanse, its wild winds, its rolling billows, and its unseen depths; whilst the finny race to which it affords a home look as if almost anything told of them might be true.

First of all, why is the sea salt? Of this there is an original explanation in a legend told by the Norse Skalds. The "bountiful Frodi," whose mythical reign was a golden age, possessed a quern, or handmill, which ground anything the persons chose in whose hands it happened to be. For a long time it ground nothing but gold and peace.

But in an evil day a sea rover came, slew Frodi, and carried off the quern and two giant maidens who had been kept in occupation grinding it. When he got to the high seas he bade the maidens grind salt. They did as they were told, and at midnight asked if he had salt enough.

"No," said he; and ordered them to stick to their work.

So they ground and ground till the ship was full and went to the bottom—sea rover, maidens, quern, and all, and "that's why the sea is salt."

The evil spirit who of old was supposed to preside over the demons of the deep was known to seamen under the familiar name of Davy Jones. Jones is a corruption of Jonah, the prophet who was thrown into the sea, and Davy, it has been suggested, is a form of Duffy, a ghost or spirit among the West Indian negroes.

Davy Jones was often seen in various shapes perching among the rigging on the eve of hurricanes, shipwrecks, and other disasters, to which a seafaring life is exposed, warning the devoted wretch of death and woe. His form was sometimes of gigantic height, he showed three rows of sharp teeth in his enormous mouth, he had eyes as big as saucers, and from his nostrils streamed blue flames.

A Davy Jones of a milder type was the stormy petrel, known to sailors as the Mother Carey's chicken, "and hated by them," says the Rev. J. G. Wood, "after a most illogical manner, because it foretells an approaching storm, and therefore by a curious process of reasoning is taken for its cause. A sailor once told me very frankly, after I had held a short argument with him, that 'they mostly takes things wrong side forrards,' and so it is with the stormy petrel."

When sailors indulge in uncomplimentary language towards this bird, and blame it for raising tempests, they are very unfair. As well, it has been remarked, might they curse the midnight lighthouse that starlike guides them on their watery way, or the buoy that warns them of the sunken rocks below. Mother Carey's chickens are to be relied on as heralds of boisterous weather, and their low, monotonous cry, as they face the blast and breast the billows, conveys a useful warning if interpreted the right way.

Nobody seems to know who Mother Carey was. When it is snowing, sailors say that Mother Carey is plucking her geese, and this is supposed to be a comical variation of a German myth, which represents the snow as feathers falling from the bed of the goddess Holda when she shakes up the pillows after having had a nap.

The best known of all storm legends is that of the Flying Dutchman. This is a spectral ship seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and considered ominous of ill luck. How there came to be a Flying Dutchman was in this way: About three hundred years ago a large Dutch Indianman, commanded by Mynheer Vanderdecken, attempted to double, in the teeth of a strong headwind what is now called the Cape of Good Hope, but was then known as the Cape of Storms. The obstinacy of Dutchmen is proverbial; and although the adverse wind long continued, Vanderdecken doggedly contended against it, and at length impudently declared that he would double the Cape, even if he sailed till the day of doom.

He was taken at his word. As a punishment for his daring impiety, says the legend, the wicked skipper in his doomed ship, manned by his toiling crew, is continually sailing in the latitude of the stormy cape, but never can double it. At midnight, when the wind blows high, the phantom ship is still often seen, with her antique build and rig, and the figure of Mynheer Vanderdecken on the poop giving orders to his men. She is distinguished from earthly vessels by bearing a press of sail when all others are unable, from stress of weather, to show an inch of canvas.

There are other versions of the story. One given by Sir Walter Scott is to the effect that the Flying Dutchman was originally a vessel loaded with great wealth, on board of which a fearful act of murder and piracy had been committed. The plague broke out among the wicked crew who had perpetrated the crime, and they sailed in vain from port to port, offering as the price of shelter the whole of their ill-gotten wealth. They were excluded, however, from every harbour for fear of the malady which was devouring them, and as a punishment of their crimes the apparition of the ship still continues to haunt those seas in which the catastrophe occurred.

In Iceland it is held that a sure way to promote disasters at sea is to stand on the shore and count ships or beckon to those on board. They are certain then to be lost.

Spilling salt is an unlucky proceeding anywhere. At sea special care must be taken not to overturn the salt cellar. According to a Dutch notion an overturned salt cellar means a ship gone to the bottom. Another bad omen for a ship is to lose a water bucket or let a mop slip overboard. An old superstition mentioned by Petronius Arbitrator is to the effect that no person in a ship should pare his nails or cut his hair except in a storm.

Children are said to bring good luck to ships, the same blessing apparently following them on the water that accompanies them on land. Cats, too, are always welcome on board, for puss is held to be influential in bringing about pleasant weather and successful voyages. To throw a cat overboard or to drown one at sea is very unlucky.

When there is a dead calm a universal practice among sailors of all nations is to invite the wind to come by whistling. Whistling, however, is objectionable at sea when there is no need for it; it may make the breeze then blowing to become much stronger than is either safe or agreeable. A Hamburg belief gives a more original way of raising the wind: it consists in scratching with a nail on the foremast, when the irritation of the wood produces the desired effect.

Witches and warlocks in more believing times than ours have pretended to raise tempests at pleasure. An Ayrshire legend tells that one of the ships of the Spanish Armada was destroyed by the power of a noted witch. It had been driven northwards, and was passing the coast of Ayrshire, when the sorceress took her station on Portincross and began to spin. As the thread lengthened a storm arose, and the ill-fated vessel went down.

The magicians of the Fins and Laps were held to possess in the highest perfection the power of raising storms, and they used to give winds in bags for a consideration to believing mariners. Mr. Thorpe, in his "Northern Mythology," tells of a Fin-Lap who once brought a bag to a captain lying at Drontheim, and placed it outside the cabin, saying that he need only take that with him, and he could make any wind blow that he pleased.

When a contrary wind blows, say the Hamburg sailors, throw an old broom before the first ship you meet. The wind will then change; you will get a favourable breeze, and the other vessel just the reverse.

In these days, when there is so much anxiety to discover a remedy for sea-sickness, and when voyagers are divided as to the relative merits of a countless number of cures, it may be worth mentioning that there is a simple means of prevention largely believed in in Iceland. It consists in cutting a piece of green sward in a churchyard and putting it in one's shoes.

Many interesting superstitions are connected with fishing. A lucky day on which to start for fishing-grounds is said in some districts to be Sunday. Inferences as to their success are drawn by fishermen from what they meet when on the way to their boats. A writer in an early volume of Notes and Queries mentioned, speaking of the little village of Prestonpans, that if the fishermen of that place met a pig, they would at once turn back and delay their embarkation. At Flamborough, as late as nine years ago, the fishermen would not put to sea if anyone even mentioned a pig whilst they were baiting their lines.

It was at one time believed by the people of Macleod's country in Skye that an unusually large take of herrings in the numerous lochs which indent the west coast of the island, was sure to follow the return of their chief after a prolonged absence in another part of the kingdom. Another curious belief is mentioned by Pennant. "It is a general observation," he says, "all Scotland over, that if a quarrel happen on the coast where herring is caught, and that blood be drawn violently, then the herring goes away from the coast without returning during that season. This, they say, has been observed in all past ages as well as at present; but this I relate only as a common observation, and submit it to the judgment of the learned."

In Sweden it used to be the custom, with a view to securing good fortune for the fishing, to burn the teeth of large fish. Stolen fishing tackle was also thought lucky; the person robbed, however, lost his luck. Before putting out to sea it was held in the same country that one ought not to communicate his intentions to his neighbours—a piece of policy which might with advantage be imitated in other walks of life.

An Icelandic superstition forbids taking dogs on a fishing expedition; if they are kept in the boats, or even allowed to go near the tackle, they spoil the catch. According to another Icelandic notion, fishermen should not sing at their lines or nets, or when they are dredging up a landing-place for boats; it brings misfortune.

In returning from fishing, they say in Sweden, it is unlucky to tell whether one has caught many or few fish. A stranger also should on no account be permitted to see the number caught.

The influence of women over fishing is peculiar. "In the Isle of Skye," Mr. Phil Robinson mentions, "if a woman crosses the water during the fishing the luck is doomed. At Flamborough, if a woman happens to enter a cottage when the men are preparing their lines, she is not allowed to depart until she has knelt down and repeated the Lord's Prayer. In Lapland the fishermen avoid spreading their captured fish on that part of the shore frequented by women, as the next expedition, if they did so, would be a failure. In many parts of our coast it is most unlucky for a woman to walk over the nets or any of the fishing tackle, although they take a very active part in collecting bait."

Is it due, asks Mr. Robinson, to the grudge, dating back to Paradise, and the day when, as the negro said, "dat woman robbed de orchard," that fishermen consider feminine influence so sinister?

Not many years ago a herring-fisher was brought before the bench on the charge of repeatedly ill-using his wife. He without hesitation pleaded guilty, but said it was no offence at all, because he had done it, not because he hated his wife, but simply to attract the herrings!

The king of the sea is the herring, who seems to have obtained that rank by popular election. When this event came off the flounder was a rival candidate, and naturally felt great disappointment and disgust at the result. The story is given in a Manx legend, quoted by Mr. J. F. Campbell in his "Popular Tales of the West Highlands." "The fish," it records, "all gathered once to choose a king, and the fluke, he who has the red spots on him, stayed at home to make himself pretty, putting on his red spots, to see if he would be king; and he was too late, for when he came the herring was king of the sea. So the fluke curled his mouth on one side, and said—

"A simple fish like the herring king of the sea!"

And his mouth has been on one side ever since."

The haddock has a legendary history of which there are several versions. According to one it is the fish which the Apostle Peter hooked out of the Lake of Tiberias in order to take the tribute money which lay in its mouth. Those who tell this story point out how the haddock still bears the marks of Peter's finger and thumb.

Another version has it that the devil once went fishing, and managed to catch a haddock. The poor fish made a spring for its life and escaped, but not before it had received the marks of Satan's claws, which it has transmitted to its posterity.

Some say that the john dory, and not the haddock, is the fish from whose mouth St. Peter took the tribute money, and point to the dark and conspicuous spots on its sides as the print of the Apostle's finger and thumb. Others, however, contend that the marks on the dory are due not to St. Peter, but to St. Christopher. The odd thing is that both the dory and the haddock are salt-water fish, so they must have been some distance from home if the saint caught either of them in a fresh-water lake.

The ruddy colour of the flesh of the salmon is explained in Scandinavia by the fact that the gods, when heaven was on fire, threw the flames into the sea, when the salmon swallowed them. The slowness of the tail of the salmon is said, in Northern Europe, to date from the time when Loki was pursued by the angry gods, and turned himself into this fish in order to escape. He would have escaped too, had not Thor caught him by the tail, "and this is the reason why salmon have had their tails so fine and thin ever since."

The sucking fish was long a popular character in sea stories. Wild and fabulous stories they were. This little fish was said to adhere to the bottoms of ships and to arrest their progress as suddenly as if they had struck on a rock. The winds might do their best, the sails might fill, and the masts creak, but—"The sucking fish with secret chains Clung to the keel, the swiftest ship detains."

It could hold the ship against everything, and confine her to the same spot just as if she were at anchor.

The dolphin was the sacred fish of the ancient Greeks, and was by them credited with many fabulous attributes. It was supposed to be peculiarly friendly to the human race, and in many old stories appears as saving the lives of favoured heroes.

One of those tales of singular beauty is told in connection with Arion, the celebrated poet and cithara player. According to Herodotus, Arion had made a tour through foreign countries, gaining great fame and amassing a large sum of money by the exhibition of his skill. He embarked at Tarentum for his homeward voyage in a ship hailing from Corinth.

When the sailors saw his wealth they planned to possess themselves of it by putting him to death. In answer to his entreaties that they would spare his life, they gave him the alternative of either dying by his own hand on shipboard, or of casting himself into the sea.

His choice was to jump overboard, but he begged permission to sing a parting song. Leave was given, for the sailors were naturally desirous of hearing such a famous performer. The poet clothed himself in the rich garments in which he ordinarily appeared before the public, and sang a dirge accompanied by his lyre.

He then threw himself overboard, but instead of being drowned, as the sailors intended, he was miraculously borne up by a dolphin which had been attracted by his music. The dolphin conveyed him in safety to Tænarus, whence he proceeded to Corinth, arriving there before the ship from Tarentum.

When he arrived there Arion told his story to Periander, the tyrant of Corinth. Periander summoned the sailors before him, and asked what had become of the poet. To this they replied that he had remained behind at Tarentum; upon which they were suddenly confronted by Arion himself, clad in the robes in which he had leaped into the sea. The sailors then confessed their guilt, and met with well-deserved punishment.

The crab in legends of the sea is conspicuous for shrewdness and ingenuity, in proof of which the following fable may be told. It agreed one day to compete with the fox as to which could run fastest. The fox started, and the crab caught hold of its tail, and held fast till they reached the goal. On getting there the fox turned round to see how far he had outdistanced his opponent and to make fun of him. As he did so the crab slipped quietly down, crossed the winning-line, and surprised the fox with—

"What! come at last, are you? I have been here some time."

Another crab's tale—the "Cruel Crane Outwitted"—is retold by Mr. Robinson in his "Fishes of Fancy." "The crane, finding some fish likely to die in a fast-shrinking puddle, offers to carry them across to a large and pleasant lake of which he knows. After much suspicious demurring, the fishes go with the crane one by one, and are of course eaten up in succession.

"Left last of all, however, is an old crab, and the bird proposes to take it over too, to join its comrades."

"'Very good,' says the crafty crustacean, 'but as you cannot very well hold me in your beak as you did the fishes, suppose I hold you with my pincers.'

"The crane agrees to this, and having arrived at the shambles, announces to the crab that he is now about to be eaten."

"'Not a bit of it,' is the reply. 'On the contrary, if you do not take me to the lake at once, I shall nip your head off your thin neck.'

"So the crane in great alarm takes cancer straight to the lake, but before getting off the bird's back the crab bites its head off."

When on the ocean one should beware of seals. Witches, it is said, have often been known to change themselves into seals, and to follow mariners and fishermen. A singular superstition regarding the seal used to be current in the Farøe islands. It was believed to cast its skin every ninth night, assume a human form, and dance and amuse itself like a human being, until it resumed its skin and became once more a seal. Many tales were told of skins being captured, and the seals being obliged to retain their human shape till they could become repossessed of them. There is an Icelandic superstition too about the seal, that if a man eats of its liver and gives it to his friend, the two will become enemies for life.

Amongst the myths of the sea few are more widespread, or are alluded to more frequently in literature than those which deal with mermaids and mermen, especially those connected with mermaids. They have been stoutly believed in, but upon unsatisfactory evidence, from very early ages. The typical mermaid has the head and body of a woman, usually of surpassing beauty, but below the waist she is fashioned like a fish with scales and fins—the fishy half is sometimes depicted as doubly-tailed. She has long and lovely hair, and is fond of sitting in the moonlight combing it with one hand whilst with the other she holds a looking-glass. To these features she adds a sweet melodious voice.

Notices of mermaids are to be found in abundance in books of bygone times: some rather vague, but others almost photographic in their details. The legends in which these young women of the sea play a part represent them as possessed of considerable powers. Now and then they reveal the future, and enrich people of the human race with supernatural gifts. Often they marry mortals, but afterwards leave them and return to their true home. At other times they fall in love with mortals, and entice them to go and live below the water. Mermen, too, sometimes win the affection and capture the person of earthly maidens.

"In relation to man," says one writer, "the mermaid is usually of evil issue if not of evil intent. She has generally to be bribed or compelled to utter her prophecy or bestow her gifts, and as wife she brings disaster in her train. In itself her sea-life is often represented as one of endless delights, but at other times a mournful mystery and sadness broods over it."

Alluding to mermaids, a Cornish vicar writes: "Uncle Tony, one of my parishioners, said to me, 'Sir, there is one thing I want to ask you if I may be so free, and it is this: why should a mermaid, that will ride about upon the waters in such terrible storms, and toss from sea to sea in such ruckles as there be upon the coast, why should she never lose her looking-glass and comb?'"

"'Well, I suppose,' said I, 'that if there are such creatures, Tony, they must wear their looking-glass and comb fastened on somehow, like fins to a fish.'

"'See,' said Tony, chuckling with delight, 'what a thing it is to know the Scriptures, like your reverence; I should never have found it out. But there's another point, sir, I should like to know, if you please; I've been bothered about it in my mind hundreds of times. Here be I that have gone up and down Holacombe cliffs and streams fifty years come next Christmas, and I've gone and watched the water by moonlight and sunlight, days and nights, on purpose, in rough weather and smooth (even Sundays, too, saving your presence), and my sight as good as most men's, and yet I never could come to see a mermaid in all my life; how's that, sir?'"

"'Are you sure, Tony,' I rejoined, 'that there are such things in existence at all?'"

"'Oh, sir, my old father seen her twice!'" And then he gave particulars of the two: one a mermaid singing away 'so sweet that it was as much as he could do to hold back from plunging into the tide after her;' and the other, 'the bootifullest mermaid that eye could behold, and she was twisting about her long hair, and dressing it, just like one of our girls getting ready for her sweetheart on the Sabbath Day.'

In his interesting "Sea Fables Explained," Mr. Henry Lee gives a reasonable explanation of the belief which has so long prevailed in mermaids and mermen, showing that they are really only aquatic animals, such as seals and the manatee, dugong, and rytna of foreign waters, on which credulity and inaccurate observation have bestowed a false character.

The simplicity of the public has been often imposed on by the exhibition in shows of artificial mermaids. The Japanese are said to be very skilful in their manufacture. One was exhibited early in this century in a glass case, "in a leading street at the West-end of London." It was constructed of "the skin of the head and shoulders of a monkey, which was attached to the dried skin of a fish of the salmon kind with the head cut off, and the whole was stuffed and highly varnished, the better to deceive the eye." It was said to have been "taken by the crew of a Dutch vessel from on board a native Malacca boat, and from the reverence shown to it, it was supposed to be a representation of one of their idol gods."

The sea serpent is a mythical monster that often figures in nautical yarns. The most sensational accounts of its doings are to be found in the early Norse writers, one of whom—after giving its dimensions as two hundred feet long and twenty feet round—describes it as not only eating calves, sheep, and swine, but "disturbing ships, rising up like a mast, and sometimes snapping some of the men from the deck," the narrative being illustrated with a vivid representation of the animal in the very act.

Many tales of the sea serpent are to be reckoned as nothing but articles of folklore, but at the same time there is a natural history side to the subject. Highly respectable witnesses assert that they have seen such monsters of the deep, and ask if they cannot trust their own eyes. "In these cases, however," says Mr. Henry Lee, "it is not the eye which deceives, nor the tongue which is untruthful; but the imagination which is led astray by the association of the thing seen with an erroneous idea. With very few exceptions all the so-called 'sea serpents' can be explained by reference to some well-known animal or other natural object." "At the same time," remarks another observer, "there are still unexplained sea serpents sufficient to prevent modern zoologists from denying the possibility that some such creature may after all exist."

"SURELY THERE WERE FOOTSTEPS COMING THIS WAY."

FORBIDDEN LETTERS.

By MARY E. HULLAH, Author of "Celia and Her Legacy," "No," etc.

CHAPTER IV.

HE following morning, early, Bessie put the final touches to the fair copy of her MS., and tied the pages together with blue riband bows. She had intended embellishing the poem with an original frontispiece, "Lucille bidding farewell to her native isle;" but the waves of the raging ocean had proved so unmanageable in a pen-and-ink drawing that she had given it up in despair. How tidy the MS. looked! They were all there—the minor poems as well as the love lay; she contemplated her handiwork with unclouded pride.

Miss Williams had greater need than ever of patience this morning; it really seemed as if her pupil were not even trying to fix her attention on her studies. At length twelve o'clock struck, and the wearied teacher closed the book with a sigh of relief.

"Does your head ache?" asked Bessie, compassionately.

"It does rather, my dear."

"Oh! I am so sorry. Perhaps it is partly my fault, but I have had so much to do and to think about lately."

"I suppose you have now that Mrs. Ravensdale is so much in her room."

Bessie reddened; it was not waiting on cousin Edith, but her literary labours that had occupied her time and thoughts.

The postman usually came to Yew Lodge about four o'clock in the afternoon, but he was not very punctual. It would never do to miss him. Soon after luncheon Bessie established herself on her favourite seat near the yew hedge, and began to watch. She brought a book and some sewing, but she could not read or work. What a tedious afternoon it was! Every now and then she ran out through the garden gate, and looked down the road to see if Roger the postman was coming; she intended to walk some little way to meet him, as she did not wish the gardener or any passer-by to hear what she had to say.

At last, weary of waiting, she determined to saunter slowly round the kitchen garden, and then go back to the gate. On her way she encountered the cook, who had come out for a handful of parsley, and seemed inclined for a chat. She left Bessie at length, under the impression that the poor young lady seemed sadly out of spirits, though she did look much heartier than when she had come to Hazelton.

Once free, Bessie walked her fastest, past the cabbages, along the path by the hedge, and looked over the gate. She was only just in time. There he was, with a quantity of parcels on his back and the letter-bag hanging round his neck.

"Good afternoon," began Bessie, breathlessly. A second glance showed her that the old man was a total stranger to her. "Where is Roger?" she inquired, tremulously. (Suppose cook should have returned to the garden! Suppose cousin Alfred should be in the neighbourhood!)

"He be ill," was the brief answer.

This was indeed a calamity, but Bessie determined to make the best of it.

"I belong to Yew Lodge," she explained, hastily; "have you any letters for me?"

The postman (how slow he was!) took a letter from the bag and examined it with the deliberation of old age.

"That's mine!" cried Bessie; "that's for me."

"Who be you?" asked the deputy-postman, cautiously.

Bessie drew herself up to her full height (how did he come to doubt her word?)—

"I live at Yew Lodge."

"The housemaid mayhap, come for news of your sweetheart!"

"Ah! why did Roger fall ill to-day of all days?" thought Bessie.

"I am Mr. Ravensdale's cousin," she began, indignantly, but stopped short in a hurry. That is the worst of it, if you begin to play an underhand game you do not always dare to speak the truth—perhaps it might be more convenient for him to think that she was the housemaid.

He still stood there with an immovable countenance, awaiting her explanation. All at once Bessie bethought herself that she had the clerk's letter still in her pocket; she took it out and thrust it into the man's hand.

"That is my name and address. You can see that it is all right, and if you have no other letters you need not trouble to go up to the house to-day. Housemaids must have letters, I suppose, as well as other people."

The postman was hot and tired; it would be a relief certainly to be spared an extra walk. He compared the two envelopes carefully; the name and address were the same.

During this process Bessie waited with a beating heart. Surely there were footsteps coming this way! She held out her hand and glanced down the path—the footsteps were coming nearer.

At last, satisfied that he had done his duty, the postman surrendered the letter. She hardly stopped to thank him, but ran back to the garden with a strange feeling of triumph that she had been successful in getting her own way, mingled with anger that the old man should have mistaken her for one of the servants. Before she reached a safe hiding-place she almost ran into the arms of Mr. Williams, the vicar, who was taking a short cut to the house across the kitchen garden. He it was whose footsteps she had heard on the path.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Williams," she panted.

"Good afternoon. Why, Miss Bessie, what a hurry you are in!"

"Yes, I am—I mean, not at all, Mr. Williams; I beg your pardon. Is cousin Alfred here? have you seen him?"

"No, I hope to find him in the house; is there anything the matter?"

"Nothing; what made you think so? Ah! there is someone at the study window."

"It is Mr. Ravensdale. I am glad to have caught him."

Mr. Williams wished Bessie a kindly goodbye and went up to the house, thinking no more about her flushed face and startled eyes.

And she, eager to be alone, sought the quietest corner of the garden and sat down to meditate on what she had done. Now that she had the coveted treasure in her possession, she dreaded opening it. The envelope was exactly the same as the last one; it bore a London postmark, but the handwriting was different.

Trembling, she opened it. In a few polite words Mr. Tatlock informed his correspondent that he remembered her father perfectly well. If she would be so kind as to forward the MS. he would himself place it in the hands of a publisher of great reputation with whom he was personally acquainted. But he thought it right to tell the young author that the chances of success for a volume of poems were very slight; he also warned her not to expect an immediate reply.

In her joy and her pride the poetess paid but little attention to the last few lines. Mr. Tatlock had promised to take her book to a publisher; she had put her foot on the first step of the ladder of fame; in the future she had nothing to do but to post her MSS. and to hear her praise sounded on all sides. The newspapers would speak highly of the rising poet, and money would come pouring in. "I will send Willie a new suit of clothes next week," thought Bessie, descending from the clouds to more mundane affairs; "and he will see that I have not forgotten him, though I am such a grand lady." There were tears in her eyes as she pictured to herself how pleased Mrs. Bridges would be when she helped Willie to open the parcel which contained the new suit: it should be black velvet, the very best that could be got.

By this time she had left off thinking of her disobedience and deceit. Alas, poor Bessie!

On her way to the Vicarage the following morning, Elizabeth Stanhope posted "Lucille" to Mr. Tatlock, with a note saying how grateful she was to her kind patron. She felt rather uneasy; it would be awkward if anyone noticed her at the post office, and happened to mention the fact at Yew Lodge. However, no one did notice her; she stamped her packet, and the postmistress slipped it into the letter-box as unconcerned as if the departure of "Lucille" had been an everyday occurrence, instead of the turning-point in the life of a talented authoress.

The next fortnight passed, and at the expiration of that time Bessie began to look forward to an answer. Day by day she loitered by the garden gate, on the watch for the postman. He knew her perfectly well by this time, and was very civil, but the reply was always the same: "Nothing for you to-day, miss."

Under these circumstances she began to feel ill and restless, and there were moments when she bitterly regretted having opposed her cousin's orders. Try as she would, she could not always persuade herself that she was acting uprightly, and conscience made her very miserable at times. She began to hate the mystery, and to weary of the constant dread of being found out. By way of making some amends, she applied herself industriously to her lessons, and Miss Williams could hardly believe her senses, so great was the improvement in her idle pupil's preparations.

"We are so pleased with you, dear Bessie," said Mrs. Ravensdale one day, when she was at last able to sit up and talk; "you don't know how happy it makes us both to hear such good reports of our child." Bessie reddened to the roots of her hair. She made no answer; if she had spoken a word, the whole truth must have come out, and gladly as she would have confessed to Mrs. Ravensdale, she dared not face the consequences. She must go on as she had begun; it was too late to draw back.

It was rainy and cold that afternoon; nevertheless she was at her post by the gate as usual. The postman was very wet and very cross, but he had a bundle for Yew Lodge, and after much fumbling and grumbling, he produced a letter directed to Miss Elizabeth Stanhope. An hour later she sat in her own room,—both arms resting on the table—with pale lips and an aching head. The letter, to obtain which she had so dishonourably schemed and plotted, was there before her.

"Dear Miss Stanhope" (so it ran), "My friend, Mr. Chatwood, has now given his most mature consideration to the MS. entitled 'Lucille, a Love Lay,' which you were so kind as to forward me. I regret to say that he does not find himself in a position to undertake its publication, except at your own expense, the sale of volumes of poems being extremely uncertain. I now quote from Mr. Chatwood's letter:—The reader's report is decidedly unsatisfactory; there are here and there graceful passages, but the style is unformed, the grammar occasionally defective, and the meaning of many lines very obscure. Our advice to the young author in whom you are interested is to read more, especially the works of the greater poets, and to write less for some time to come.' If at any future period I can be of any service to you, pray rely upon my assisting you to the best of my power. I return the MS., and remain, dear Miss Stanhope, yours very faithfully,—FRANCIS TATLOCK."

Never was there such a downfall! All her hopes were destroyed at one blow; she would never be able to write another line. Her precious poems, that had cost so many hours' labour, were rejected, and rejected after this humiliating and unceremonious fashion! She could not bear it; the disappointment was too much; and as for the reader's advice, it was simply a fresh insult. If she had known that old Tatlock was connected with such people she would never have written to him or sent him the poems. How fervently she wished that she had never done so!

After a restless night, Elizabeth woke with a bad headache; only too glad to put off encountering the master of the house for the present, she begged Ellen, the housemaid, to bring her a cup of tea upstairs. She did not want any other breakfast. She was too ill to go to the Vicarage as usual, and she spent the morning in her room, brooding over her disappointment. When the luncheon bell rang she was obliged to go down, trembling at the thought of meeting Mr. Ravensdale. "I will never deceive him again as long as I live," she said to herself. "I will never take another book without leave. I don't believe that I shall ever care to read again. It does not matter now what becomes of me or what I do."

She imagined, as she opened the dining-room door, that she had reached the very depth of misery; but one glance at Mr. Ravensdale's face showed her that there was more trouble to come.

"Elizabeth," he said, briefly, "I have a few questions to ask you. Did you or did you not keep the promise that you made me a few weeks ago?"

"I don't know. What promise?"

Mr. Ravensdale eyed her sternly; he was in no mood to be put off with shallow excuses.

"I forbade your receiving letters without my knowledge. You must know perfectly well what I mean. Did you write to your correspondent and say so?"

Bessie clasped her hands together in an agony of fright; there was no help for her now—her courage failed her in this dire extremity.

"Yes, I wrote," she faltered.

Mr. Ravensdale's set face relapsed. "Don't be alarmed," he said, in a gentler voice, "I was sure that I could trust you, but circumstances have come to my knowledge which oblige me to put these questions. I am told that a young lady has been in the habit of receiving letters from Barnes, the postman, secretly, just outside my gate. Did you do this?"

Retreat was impossible now. Bessie looked straight in front of her and answered "No!"

"You have not seen or spoken to the deputy postman?"

"I have met him in the road sometimes," said Bessie, grasping at a mere shred of truth, yet shuddering as she spoke: for "a lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies."

"But you did not ask him for letters?" Every moment Mr. Ravensdale's stern manner grew softer. "I beg your pardon, Elizabeth, for appearing to doubt your word, but your evidence is of the utmost importance."

"No, my letters are always brought up to the house; I did not speak to Barnes."

"Just as I thought. I am sorry to have disturbed you, my dear; and do not mention what I have said to your cousin Edith when you go to her room; she would be distressed. Do not wait luncheon for me; I must go and consult Mr. Williams."

He turned to leave the room with a nod of farewell. She could not let him go like that. What had happened? He was a magistrate, she knew; what did he mean by talking of evidence? "What is it, cousin Alfred?" she gasped.

He placed a hand on her shoulder. "You will hear about it sooner or later, Elizabeth. There has been a robbery at the post office at Templebury, and the man who is taking Roger's place is suspected of having a hand in it. I hope that it is a mistake, although letters have been missing in the village, it seems; amongst others one of mine which contained a cheque. Barnes' own account is that a young lady, he says the housemaid, came and fetched the only letters that he did not deliver; they were directed to Miss Elizabeth Stanhope, Yew Lodge. But do not distress yourself, we shall get to the truth in time. You see now why I was obliged to question you."

She did see, indeed, and she understood the postman's defence far, far better than did the magistrate. She could not eat her luncheon, but she had to sit still and pretend that she had as good an appetite as usual, in case cousin Alfred should return and question her. If she had only confessed the truth, it would have been easy enough at first (she thought); but now, what had she done? Would cousin Alfred and Mr. Williams put the postman into prison for stealing the letters which she had insisted upon having? It was a horrible idea. Would she have to appear in court as a witness against him? Half distracted, she rose from the table and went towards the drawing-room. If she only might speak to cousin Edith, or if Edmund were but here to help her! In the passage she met Ellen with her pocket-handkerchief to her eyes. Full as she was of her own trouble, Bessie would have passed her unobservant, but the girl, sure of sympathy, burst out with, "Oh, Miss Bessie! what is to become of us? Have you heard?"

"What is it, Ellen?"

"Cook says," continued Ellen, in a scared whisper, "that the master has lost upwards of £50 by it, and Barnes is accused of stealing; and they say down in the village, they say that I waited about at the garden gate of an afternoon, and took the master's letters from him. And I didn't. I never did; no, never!"

Ellen burst into tears. The floor seemed to sink away under Bessie's feet, who clutched Ellen's arm nervously. "It is not true. I do not believe it!"

"No, miss, I never told a lie in my life. I knew that you would believe me; and cook she does too."

Ellen dried her eyes and went her way comforted, but there was no comfort for our heroine; on every side she saw misery and despair; through her own disobedience, through her cowardice, she was dragging two innocent people into disgrace. For the first time she perceived clearly the full effect of her misdoings. What would she have given if she could have said, like Ellen, "I never told a lie in my life"? "It is too late," she reflected, "cousin Alfred would never forgive me. I cannot stay and meet him again. I must go!"

She retraced her steps and went into the study; with a thrill of pain she recollected how kindly he had invited her to come there whenever she chose; she turned from the corner bookcase with a feeling of horror. On the writing table was a sheet of notepaper. She took up a pen, and wrote with a shaking hand—"Do not send Barnes to prison; he is innocent, and Ellen too. I disobeyed you about the letters; it was all my fault. I read the books that you told me not to touch. I am going away, and you will never see me again. You will never forgive me, I know.—ELIZABETH." Then there was a smudge and another scrawl. "Tell cousin Edith that I do love her—I always shall."

She left the sheet of paper where she had found it, directed to Mr. Ravensdale. He could not fail to see it directly he came into the room. Now she would go at once. She snatched her hat off the peg in the hall, fancying that she heard voices outside. She would run out at the back door, and no one would notice her, or ask where she was going. As she passed the hall-table she saw a brown paper parcel, directed to Miss Elizabeth Stanhope; that was her returned poem; she had forgotten all about it in the unhappiness that had come upon her; she did not care. She went on all the quicker, and ran into the flower garden.

It had been a wet morning, but now a ray of sunlight fell on to the house, straight on to the window of Mrs. Ravensdale's sick room. Bessie paused a moment—would cousin Edith miss her? Would she be sorry? She crept a little closer to the house, she leant her aching head against the wall; the leaves of the Virginian creeperrustled in the wind. "Good-bye, dear," she whispered; "good-bye, my dear cousin Edith; God bless you!"

At the end of the yew hedge was a gate leading into a wood. This was the quickest way of getting into the open country. Bessie had no very definite plans as to where she meant to go; even if she had possessed sufficient money to pay her fare, she shrank from throwing herself upon the hospitality of the Bridges; she could not endure the humiliation of having to tell the whole story of her life at Yew Lodge; she had intended to return to London as a generous benefactress, heaping favours in all directions. Now that she was homeless and friendless it was a very different matter.

She took her way towards the river, and following its course she would eventually come to the sea; perhaps she might be able to find some work to do amongst the fisher people of whom she had often heard, and at any rate it would be better to walk away from the railway station, where there was a likelihood of meeting someone who would recognise her. By-and-by, when she was a couple of miles from home, she stopped to count her money—half a sovereign (it had been a present from cousin Alfred), six shillings, and some pence. She knew better than most girls in her position and of her age the value of money. Many a time, when her father lived, she had managed to keep house for a week on a smaller sum than this. Supposing that it lasted for a fortnight, what was she to do at the end of that time?

"I shall go from place to place till I find some work," she said to herself; "perhaps I could teach very little children, or do plain sewing." In the old days Bessie would have entertained much higher notions of her own capabilities, but her pride had been sorely humbled during the last few hours. She went on walking as fast as she could, heedless of fatigue; but by degrees her highly-strung nerves began to give way; she felt very tired and faint for want of food. She looked at her watch—this too had been a present from the Ravensdales—it was not yet four o'clock, and it seemed to her as if she had been wandering about for a whole long day. About this time she generally went into the invalid's room and poured out the tea; they would miss her soon, and then they would find the letter, and all blame would be taken off Ellen, and they would know that the postman had spoken the truth.

She had now reached a point in the river which went by the name of Ash Ford. A man who lived in the cottage on the farther bank ferried passengers across for a penny a head. Bessie came close to the water's edge and looked across; there was the punt just pushing off; and who was that? Not Joseph, the ferryman—no, with a gasp of surprise she recognised Edmund Ravensdale.

He had told her once that occasionally he got out of the train at the junction, and walked home by way of Ash Ford, instead of waiting for the branch line train. Without stopping to consider how great the distance was from Hazelton to London, she jumped at the conclusion that Mr. Ravensdale had telegraphed to his son, and that he knew already what was happening at home. "He will be very angry with me too," said Bessie, half aloud. "Ah!" as she watched him coming nearer, "I don't care how he reproaches me, I deserve it all; I wish he would come to me—Edmund, Edmund!"

It was a very weak cry for help, but no sooner had she uttered it than, scared at the sound of her own voice, she hid herself behind a group of willow trees. He had heard her though; she saw him turn round and look in her direction. The river was not very wide; in a few minutes he would land a few yards below the willows.

"I daren't meet him," said poor Bessie, and for the second time that day she turned and fled.

(To be concluded.)

BIRD LIFE IN OCTOBER.

By A NATURALIST.

"'Mid the blossoming trees, there

We builded our nest;

By the wing of the breeze, there

Were rocked into rest;

Now, now we must follow an unknown behest."

THE swallow tribe are still on the wing; the common martin, and, later still, the least of swallows, the sand-martins, take flight, as the wind comes in fitful gusts over the hills and dales, causing the leaves to fly in showers from the trees. Stares begin to congregate in hosts in the salt marshlands and fen countries, which the wild geese quit to go up to the ryelands, where they feed on the young corn.

On waste grounds covered with stones and thistles the goldfinches flit; now and again settling on the thistle-heads, busily climbing and feeding on the seeds, flitting and pecking restlessly; whilst the down flies in all directions from those giant thistles which only thrive in rough ground. Beautiful creatures they are in their livery of scarlet, black, brown, yellow, and white; but they are becoming scarce; bird catchers find a ready sale for them, as they, with other members of the finch family, are highly prized as pets. A greater love for wild creatures has sprung up of late, and many a man will make companions of even such little things as these. Whether it is selfish to deprive a wild creature of its liberty, and to change the natural conditions of its life and happiness for one's personal gratification, is a question for each one to settle with his or her own conscience. I have learned what I know about birds, indoors as well as out, from personal acquaintance with them in friendly companionship.

As the month draws to a close, more migrants may be seen making their way through the thick morning mists to their winter quarters. That chattering chuck-chuck! proceeds from a flock of fieldfares passing overhead. Another sound follows, a feeble clicking chack! hardly to be noticed by any but a lover and close observer of bird life. It comes from the redwings, that have come once more to their southern winter homes.

As evening draws near, if your path leads you by the woodside bordering low-lying meadows, you may see the large-eyed, long-billed woodcock flit with owl-like flight, his bill pointing downwards to his feeding grounds. His flight is very different when he is put up by the sportsman. Then he darts, twists, and doubles like some hawk through the twigs and branches. There is one peculiarity about the woodcock: if he feeds, as a rule, in moist places and swamp ground, he has a dry place to shelter and rest in. They breed with us in a dry spot, and they carry their young, one at a time, from their dry nesting-place to the moist grounds where they feed them, and then carry them back again. One hen bird was shot by a keeper, who, thinking that it was a hawk with a bird in its talons, fired on it and killed mother and chick, to his great regret.*

Plovers move here and there, the green as well as the golden. You may hear them call in the night as they fly from one low-lying district to another. Sure foretellers of changes in the weather are the plovers.

October brings in pheasant shooting. A splendid fellow—good to look at and also to eat—is the pheasant. The day is well on for afternoon, and the shooters draw near to the larchwood, where most of the old, full-plumaged cocks have taken sanctuary. The wood is intersected here and there by narrow green lanes, a few feet in width; these are called drives. Here at certain points the shooters are stationed. The spaniels are told to "go," and go it they do with a will. You can hear the tap, tap, tap of the beaters' sticks striking the trunks of the trees as they pass through the cover. A rattling cry sounds, and up gets the first bird with outspread tail and rushing wings, his breast and head flashing like jewels in the light. High up he springs, clear of the tree-tops; on he comes at top speed, well meriting his title of "Rocketeer," for like a rocket he comes swishing on. One shooter, a young one, fires and misses him, as he flies over the small opening in the trees, above that part of the drive where this man is stationed. Yon other grey-headed fellow, with eye as keen as a hawk's, and nerves like iron, is not so easily flustered; and he swings his gun up and fires, when the rocketeer comes swishing over his open space in the trees. Down crashes the bird, falling many yards behind him, on the green turf of the drive.

If the locality is at all favourable, hardly a day passes, when pheasant shooting is going on, without the ringing cry of "Mark, cock!" being heard. It is the warning that a woodcock has been put up. Grand in all his glorious plumage as the pheasant is, he may fly by the shooter unheeded if he thinks there is the least possible chance of pulling at the sober-plumaged, large-eyed, long-billed woodcock.

* I have a picture of this bird carrying her chick, painted by our naturalist. The alert watchful solicitude in the mother's eye, and the perfectly restful expression in the eye and the posture of the young bird, is given most faithfully.—J. A. OWEN.

MY WORK BASKET.

FIG. 1.

FIG. 1.—COVER FOR SMALL TABLE IN IVORY NEEDLEWORK.

THIS work, which is very elegant, is not difficult to execute, and needs only simple materials. Medium fine linen, Spanish silk, and linen thread are required.

After drawing the design on a piece of linen the size chosen, it must be stretched in a frame. The ornament itself is the ground material, only relieved here and there by stitches or fillings. A greenish-yellow Spanish silk is used for the entire grounding, and worked over a thread a third of the thickness. The under stitches are worked loosely; the over ones drawn tight. The lattice work, circles, and inside stitches of the pattern are worked with a finer silk, and the edges are overcast with fine linen thread. The straight borders round the outer band are worked in the same style.

When taken out of the frame, it is interlined with flannel or swansdown, and lined with green gold surah or merveilleuse. A gold silk cord is sewn round the edge, from which massive passementerie tassels are suspended, or the corners are ornamented with full silk pompons.

FIG. 2.—CROCHET ROSETTE.

The larger rosette is worked in 7 rows, and is begun with a ring of 5 chain stitches.

1st Row.—9 chain stitches, the first 4 to serve as a double treble; 5 chain 1 double treble, 7 times; 5 chain; join with a single crochet in the 4th of the 9 chain stitches.

2nd Row.—7 long stitches in each space.

3rd Row.—1 long in the 2nd and 3rd stitches; 5 long in the 4th; 1 long in the 5th and 6th; repeat.

4th Row.—3 single in the first 3 long of the preceding row; 1 double crochet in the 4th, 3 chain; 1 double in the 5th; 3 chain; 1 double in the 6th; 17 chain; 1 single in the 10th, 11th, 12th stitches of the 17 chain, counting back; then work into the ring thus made, holding it between the thread and the needle; 2 long; 4 chain;

1 single into the 2nd long stitch; 3 long; 4 chain; 1 single in the last long, as before; repeat from * 5 times; 2 long; 1 single in the 1st of the 3 single which united the ring; 5 chain; repeat from first *.

5th Row.—11 chain, commencing between the 2 picots which were worked on the long stitches of the 3rd row; 1 double treble in the centre long of the 3 after the 2 picots of the ring; 7 chain; 1 double treble in the 2nd of the next 3 long stitches; 7 chain; 1 double treble in the centre of the next 3 long; 7 chain; 1 treble in the centre of the 3 after the 5th picot; 3 chain; 1 treble long stitch (thread 6 times round the needle, drawn through 2 loops at a time) in the double crochet between the 2 picots; 3 chain; repeat from *; finish with a single stitch in the 8th of the commencing chain, which serves as a treble long.

6th Row.—2 double crochet in the space formed by the 3 chain; 9 long stitches in each 7 chain; 2 double crochet in each 3 chain; repeat from *.

7th Row.—1 double crochet in the 2nd, another in the 4th double crochet; 5 chain; 1 long in the 5th long stitch; 1 picot formed of 3 chain; 1 long and 1 picot alternately in each 2nd stitch; for 3 times; 1 long; 1 picot in each of the 2 next long stitches; 1 long; 1 picot in every 2nd stitch 3 times; 5 chain; repeat from commencement of row.

SMALL ROSETTE.

Make 2 chain stitches, and work 8 double crochet in the 2nd chain stitch, joining them into a ring.

2nd Row.—3 long stitches in every chain stitch.

3rd Row.—Entirely double crochet, making 2 stitches in every 3rd one of preceding row.

4th Row.—1 double crochet; 5 chain in every other stitch.

5th Row.—1 double in first space formed by the 5 chain; 3 chain; 1 long in next space; 3 picots, each made with 5 chain; 1 long in the same space; 3 chain; 1 double crochet in the following 5 chain; repeat from *.

The rosettes are joined by picots, as indicated in illustration.

FIG. 3.—SKATING CAP FOR YOUNG GIRL.

This warm and comfortable cap is made in crochet, with double Berlin wool of two colours.

The model before us is in soft grey and white, the crown being worked in both colours alternately. The broad flap or brim is in white, edged with grey wool.

Commence with 2 chain stitches, and work 8 double crochet stitches in the second of these, joining them into a foundation ring by a single stitch.

1st Row.—1 chain; 1 knotted stitch in next double crochet. (The knotted stitch is worked in the following manner: pass the wool round the needle, draw a loop through the next double crochet; repeat this 3 times, so that there will be 6 loops and the chain stitch on the needle; draw the wool through all these, make a chain stitch, fastening them together at the top.) 1 single in the same double crochet with the knotted stitch; repeat 7 times, making in all 8 knotted stitches, 1 in each double.

2nd Row.—Fasten on the grey wool with 1 single in knotted stitch; 1 chain; 1 knotted stitch in the single stitch between 2 knotted stitches of previous row; 1 chain; 1 single in next knotted stitch; repeat from * 7 times.

3rd Row.—White wool; 1 single in 1 knotted stitch; 1 chain; 1 knotted stitch, 1 chain, 1 single, 1 chain, 1 knotted stitch, and in the next single stitch; 1 chain and 1 single in the following knotted stitch; repeat from * 7 times.

In this row there will be 16 knotted stitches.

4th Row.—Grey wool.

5th.—White wool. Both these rows are worked like the 2nd row, so that there will still be 16 knotted stitches.

6th Row.—Grey wool, worked in the same manner, excepting that in every fourth single stitch there are 2 knotted stitches as in the 3rd row. This increases the number to 20.

7th to 14th Rows.—Alternately white and grey wool, but not increased, still keeping to 20 knotted stitches. A row of double crochet in white wool completes the crown.

To render the edge firmer, a cord may be laid round and worked over by a long stitch in each knotted stitch, and double crochet into each chain and single stitch.

To commence the brim, turn the crown wrong side outwards, and work a row of double crochet in white wool. The stitch now used differs from the knotted stitch of the crown.

1st Row.—4 chain; draw the wool through each of the first 2 of these, 3 through the double crochet stitch from which they start, and 1 through each of the 2 following double crochet, making thus 5 loops and a chain stitch on the needle; draw the wool through 3 of these, and fasten at the top by a chain stitch; then in a similar manner through the remaining 3; 1 chain; draw a loop through the last made stitch; then 1 through the previous stitch, taking this time the back of the fastening chain stitch; a third loop through the double crochet in which the last of the 5 loops was made, and a fourth through the following double crochet; draw the wool through these last 2 loops as before; then through the remaining 3 loops, fastening each as before with a chain stitch at the top; again draw a loop through the last stitch, a second through the next, a third through the double crochet, through which the last 4 loops were drawn, and a fifth and sixth through the 2 following double crochet stitches; work these off as before in two groups of 3 stitches; repeat from * to end of row.

Two more rows are worked in this way, additional loops being made in alternate double crochet stitches to allow for the increase of width necessary. The illustration gives a clear idea of the detail of this stitch. When the 3rd row is finished, one of double crochet is worked round, taking the back of the stitches of the former row, and working 2 into each of the clusters of loops, and 1 into each chain stitch.

For the edge, in grey wool, a row of double crochet, taking the front of the stitch in the usual manner; then turn the work, and make another row of double crochet in the back of the stitches, so that the two rows face outward, and form a groove in which a cord can be placed; then join them together by simple stitch taken through the back of each stitch. The brim is turned up and fastened in three places to the crown by rosettes. These are made in grey wool.

Make a chain stitch; twist the wool loosely 12 times round the needle, and draw the wool evenly through the loops just made, and fasten off with a chain stitch. Work 5 small leaves in this way.

A larger rosette in white of the same make is placed in the centre of the crown.

THE HILL OF ANGELS.

By LILY WATSON, Author of "Within Sight of the Snow," etc.

CHAPTER XX.

IS a far cry," as Mr. Muir might have said, from Kensington to Engelberg. And yet the reader is privileged to flit in thought with instantaneous rapidity from the one to the other. The journey, too, in these days is swiftly accomplished. Mr. Hope was not accustomed to discuss and deliberate long before he made up his mind as to his movements.

One July evening he said to Evelyn, struck, perhaps, by the additional paleness of her face, and the weariness with which she vainly tried to toil through course after course at dinner—

"You're not looking well, child. There's no doubt Kensington is hot in the summer. What do you say to trying your favourite Engelberg again?"

"Oh, uncle!" was all Evelyn could ejaculate, as a sudden vision of the Titlis snows and the breezy upland pastures came before her.

"Pack up your things then, and we'll be off on Tuesday."

At "The Elms" Mrs. Lancaster and Dottie would have deliberated for weeks or months before they made up their minds where to go for a summer holiday, and several more weeks would have been necessary to accustom themselves to the prospect of so complete a change of scene. But the ways of man and woman are different in this respect. Evelyn could scarcely believe her good fortune.

Mr. Hope, however, had already ascertained that Engelberg was a spot likely to agree with him, that it offered whey, milk, and air-cures, if he had required any of them, which he did not; that the cooking in the hotels was good, and that there was sure to be plenty of pleasant society. No wooden chalets on a mountain top for him! He was curious, also, to see the monastery and the church. So it came to pass that in less than a week from the date of this conversation he and his niece were driving into the Alpine valley and up the road that led to the Abergölüh hotel.

There was the familiar scene once more, and there were many familiar faces, too; for Engelberg is a spot that people revisit year after year. Evelyn found with delight that the beauty and glory of the place came upon her with fresh intensity. She had feared lest the impression should outrun the reality, and lest the dreams that had haunted her should be found too lovely for fact. But the mountains with their varying outline, the pure brilliance of the Titlis snows, the mystic spell cast by the huge monastery brooding over the valley of which in ancient times it was the sovereign lord—all these renewed their empire over the heart of the girl.

There was another link that bound her to the place, but this was a secret as yet.

Mr. Hope deigned to express himself as pleased with the scenery, contented with the hotel. He was only much chagrined that he was not allowed to inspect the manuscripts in the library of the abbey, but he hoped by perseverance to win his point.

Evelyn roamed about, day after day, not attempting long excursions, such as the walk to the Engstlen Alp, or to the Surenen Pass, for she had no young companion to join her; but exploring the pine woods anew and rambling along the terrace walks opposite the snow world. She visited the Arnitobel, and thought, with a mixture of compassion and amusement, of poor Algy and his bold simile of the torrents uniting in one. Only a short year! and it was not her life, but another's, that was to flow in the same channel as his own.

"Have you seen the International Magazine for August?" asked Mr. Hope of his niece, one day. "There is a story about this place with an illustration—and an uncommonly pretty story too. It is called 'The Hill of Angels.'"

"I thought you never read magazine stories, uncle," replied Evelyn, her eyes dancing with delight.

"No more I do, as a rule," replied her unsuspecting relative; "but the local interest made me begin this, and the freshness of the whole thing drew me on. It's very pretty indeed."

Evelyn said nothing. By-and-by one and another began to talk about "The Hill of Angels." The magazine lay in the reading-room, and soon was in general request. There was a charming picture of Engelberg; and this of course, together with the fact that the readers could verify the descriptions for themselves, proved the attraction in the first place.

"Have you read the 'Hill of Angels?'" came to be a frequent question addressed to a new arrival by those who wished to be friendly and sociable. People wrote home for fresh copies of the magazine, as the original one quickly became worn out. It even divided popular attention with the arrival of Mrs. Allingham West. Evelyn knew that her brilliant friend would probably come here for a second visit, which might, so Mrs. West had told her, become an annual thing.

That first visit to Mrs. Allingham West's house at Chelsea had been followed by two or three, and on each occasion Evelyn had met Mr. Muir. She had talked with him for hours, avoiding, as though by a tacit consent, the topic of the review, and guarding herself in a sort of armed reserve; yet they always seemed attracted together, and she had also ceased to feel that the authoress was far, far aloof from her. It took time to win Mrs. West's regard, but the girl's adoration, her intelligence, her growing modesty as to her own powers, her loveliness, had achieved the possession of that friendship. It was, therefore, with intense delight that Evelyn anticipated her arrival. Mr. Hope, too, in spite of his cynicism, was gratified that his niece should receive an early invitation to Mrs. Allingham West's private sitting-room.

"You naughty child!" cried the lady, shaking her head at Evelyn, with a merry laugh as they sat together. "So you are keeping the secret. No one in the hotel knows the story is yours. What a success it is!"

"Do you really think so?" Evelyn's heart gave a great bound of delight.

"Decidedly I do. It is fresh, it is interesting; above all, it is true. Of course you will do far better work than this in time to come. But for a beginning it is admirable. I don't live much in public here, as you know; still I have made it my business to ascertain something about it, and everyone is talking of the story. I have heard enough to turn your little head with vanity."

"People have not much to read or talk about, in holiday life like this," said Evelyn, modestly.

"True; but even discounting that, a considerable amount of real, genuine popularity remains. I congratulate you, my child. And now, tell me—how long are you going to keep up a grudge against Gerard Muir?"

A tide of colour rushed to Evelyn's cheeks, and ebbed again, leaving them deadly pale.

"A grudge against him!" she faltered.

"Yes, for that review. I feel an interest in the matter, for I first told him who you were. I could see how troubled he was to see he had given you pain. My dear, he has the noblest and truest heart that ever was. In my bitter trouble, in my husband's death, in all my struggles, he was like a younger brother, helping, advising, comforting. I cannot tell you what I think of him. Surely you will not let this absurd trifle prejudice you. Why, you agree yourself with what he said! You had outlived 'Day-dreams' a month after you published it!"

"I am not prejudiced against him," was all Evelyn could say.

"Well, he thinks you are, at any rate, and I told him I was quite sure you were too sensible to keep up any annoyance for such a cause. It would show a very silly vanity, which I am quite sure you do not possess," concluded Mrs. West, a little severely. "Was it not he who advised you about this story?"

"Yes; I sent it to the International Magazine on his advice."

"Ah, he had a hand, if not in its acceptance, at least in its being published so quickly," thought Mrs. West.

Much conversation followed about the girl's literary aims: but through it all Evelyn felt a strange impatience. Did Mr. Muir really think she was still angry about that review? No; she had never been really angry with him—it was mortification, wounded pride, annoyance at being lowered in his sight, vexation with herself—she could not tell what. She felt she must see him and explain. From what Mrs. West said he evidently still thought her harbouring a ridiculous resentment.

"Isn't there a torrent that springs out of the hill side in full volume somewhere here?" inquired her uncle at breakfast next morning.

"Yes, uncle; don't you remember I describe it in 'The Hill'?"—She stopped, covered with confusion.

"You describe it in what?" demanded Mr. Hope, putting up his pince-nez.

But Evelyn had no answer ready.

"It is described in 'The Hill of Angels,' I know. Why have you such a colour, child? Good gracious! you don't mean to say that's your production!"

Mr. Hope, quickly adding two and two together, had no doubt he was right, even before Evelyn acknowledged her authorship.

"Good gracious!" was all he could ejaculate, staring at his niece as if she had suddenly developed a pair of wings. "So that was what you were so busy about at home upstairs! I do believe the child has her father's literary gift in her after all."

It was October, and Mr. Hope and Evelyn were back at Kensington. On the morrow she was to return to her old life at The Elms. Her uncle had purposely prolonged their wanderings on the Continent until after the date of Algy's wedding, at which festivity he thought Evelyn's presence was not deserved by her relatives; and now they had come back just in time for her to pack up and depart. With mingled feelings Evelyn looked forward to this change. Her stay under her uncle's roof had not been altogether happy; she could never forget her desolate chilliness of heart as she first entered the bedroom where she was now busied in collecting her possessions. And yet there was something she should miss in the distant suburban home. After all, she was nearer here to the heart of the world, and felt its pulsations more strongly. A tap at the door interrupted her reverie.

"Mr. Hope wishes you to go down to the library, Miss, please," observed Stevens, with the patronising severity she had never relaxed since Evelyn's arrival.

"I wonder why he sends for me at such an inconvenient time," thought Evelyn, just pausing to arrange her toilet from the disorder incident to packing. As she entered the library she started, for instead of Mr. Hope, there stood Mr. Muir. He had a troubled look in his face, and she instinctively felt that something of importance was to follow. Yet his first words were ordinary enough.

"I have come to say good-bye to you, Miss Hope," he said, advancing to take her offered hand. "I hear you leave Kensington to-morrow."

"Yes; I am returning to live with my aunt."

"I hope you will be happier for the change."

"Thank you very much."

A pause followed.

"Life has been rather hard for you sometimes, I know, of late," began Mr. Muir; "but you will not be the worse of it in the end. And you have made a success. I want to congratulate you on your story."

Evelyn expressed her thanks, with eyes cast down.

"You would perhaps not have written so well if everything had gone quite smoothly with you," continued her friend. "The discipline of life has many uses, and one can write with more sympathy even in the brighter aspects of experience, if one has known disappointment and sorrow. Mrs. Allingham West could tell you that—"

"Ah, do not mention her name near mine!" broke out Evelyn.

"And why not? You must go on. You will not rest on this one story.

You will have fresh efforts, fresh successes, in time to come."

"I don't know," sighed Evelyn. "Sometimes I feel so weak and powerless to do what I would, I grow despairing."

"You must let the title of your first story be an allegory to you," said Mr. Muir. "Remember it is the 'Hill of Angels' you want to climb. The heights of literary success are difficult to win; but they are near the skies. Keep your ideal high, work steadily, and you will achieve success. You do not know how glad I will always be to hear of it."

Why did he speak so mournfully, as if they were on the brink of an eternal separation?

"I would have liked," he continued, "if we could have been friends and have met now and then—but it cannot be."

"And why not?" Evelyn found breath to utter.

"Because I would not be able to be satisfied with that," he replied, steadily, and as if trying to master his voice. "And I see that anything beyond is hopeless. I offended you almost before I knew you—and—and—I have come to bid you good-bye."

Oh Reviewer, wise in book-lore, but ignorant of the human heart!

"Mr. Muir," cried Evelyn, "you do not—you cannot—think I am so vain and silly as still to resent what you wrote long ago. Every word was true. How badly I must have behaved to make you think so poorly of me!"

She turned upon him in generous warmth, and their eyes met.

The promised good-bye had not been said when, an hour later, Mr. Hope came in to ascertain the result of the private interview with Evelyn for which his friend had begged. Nor will it ever be said until the hour of the last parting.

"Heaven lies about us," not only in our infancy, but in all the supreme hours of earthly happiness. And to those among the favoured of this life who have the heart to enjoy celestial gifts, the insight to perceive celestial visitants, the "Hill of Angels" is never very far away.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DONOVAN.—You take an extreme view of the word and its application. You were not made an automaton, but a reasoning, free, and responsible being. You were elected to enjoy greater church privileges than thousands of your fellow creatures; and you are free and perfectly able to pray for Divine grace and help for a "new heart and a right spirit;" and "they that seek find;" and "to them that knock" the gate of eternal life is "opened" through the merits and death of their Divine Redeemer. Do not seek to unravel difficulties and mysteries. Much is not revealed. Enough for you that "the Spirit and the bride say, Come!" Obey the Divine call at once, and take on faith what you believe to be revealed, yet cannot understand. So you will "enter into the kingdom of heaven as a little child," and realise the full significance of your Saviour's promise, "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

GITANA.—There are many homes for inebriates. One for ladies is at 37, Berwick Street, Pimlico; address Miss Dring; terms from two guineas weekly. Also at Buxton House, Earl's Colne, Essex, Miss Pudney; and Colman Hill House Retreat; address H. R. Ker, Esq., M.R.C.S. For women of the middle class write to Mrs. Law, 9, Norfolk Crescent, Hyde Park, W. We believe her home is inexpensive, only 10s. 6d. a week. At The Tor, Silverdale, Sydenham, S.E., ladies can be received from one guinea a week; address Mrs. Bonsfield, Alpha Villa, Bedford; and at West Holme, Hounslow, Middlesex, ladies (of the upper rank) are received for £1 10s. per week and upwards; hon. sec., Miss H. S. Pollock, Woodlawn, Hanworth, Feltham.

A VERY ANXIOUS ONE.—We should think it quite needless to tell anyone at that early age you were quite ignorant and unconscious of wrong-doing. Your sorrow and repentance are apparently very sincere. Try to forget about it now.

CONNERY.—No; orange-blossoms are not universally worn for bridal wreaths. The Germans wear myrtle, as did the ancient Romans, and so do the Jews; that is, if the Jewess be neither a widow nor a divorced woman. The Tuscans wear jasmine, the ancient Athenians wore hawthorn gathered by themselves; that is to say, when in blossom at the time of their nuptials. You will see some mention of bridal wreaths in our series of "Flowers in History."

VIOLET A.—You might inquire for your friends at the local police station and the post office. Send the dates of your numbers of the "G.O.P." to Mr. Tarn, our publisher.

QUEEN DIDD.—Perhaps if you sprinkled your gloves inside with violet-powder, as they often do in shops, to make them go on easily in hot weather, your hands, when you remove the gloves for playing, would not "stick to the keys of the piano." Leave your music with your mantle in the cloak-room; your hostess will send for it if required.

ANXIOUS.—There may be reasons for the morbid melancholy of which you complain, with which we are unacquainted; and in giving advice in such a case this should not be, as the difficulties are insuperable. You should consult a doctor, who can inquire fully into your circumstances and surroundings, and the sooner the better. But we see no ground for apprehending insanity. Put such an idea quite away from your mind, and seek help and peace in prayer and faith.

MANNINGHAM.—There is a Hospital for Epilepsy and Paralysis in Portland Terrace, Regent's Park (near St. John's Wood Road Station), London, N.W. Free patients, as well as those who can pay, more or less, according to their means, are received in this institution. Apply to Mr. H. Howgrave Graham, secretary.

LANCASHIRE WITCH.—We never heard of "green teeth," though we have of teeth dyed black. Use powdered chalk in the morning and Castile soap at night. Do not walk far alone when you have no grown person with you; take air and exercise in the garden.

UNA.—Judging from your writing, we suppose you to be a little schoolgirl, and much too young to find your recreation in reading novels, however correct in their teaching and unobjectionable for older people.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

WHAT is called the "divided skirt" has met with a further improvement in America, and it is pointed out that this improvement would be particularly useful to working women, or to those who have to be much on their feet. The divided skirt, as most of my readers know, is simply a narrow skirt for each leg, instead of one skirt for two, and it is nearly shapeless, being cut straight and long, and only formed so that there may not be too much fulness at the waist, where it is put into a yoked band in front and a straight band at the back. Nothing could be more simple in its construction, and nothing more comfortable to wear; so say its many advocates. It seems to be far warmer, as well as lighter, than several petticoats, and this of itself is a very great recommendation. The American improvement is an addition, not an alteration, in the shape, and consists in making it the upper and over skirt, instead of the under, by means of flounces put on so as to look like a full dress skirt. The divided skirt proper, and as we know it, is made wide and full, and reaches to the ankles, where it ends with a deep hem. Then a full kilted flounce is put on round each leg, reaching to the knee, from the edge of the hem. At the hips another deep flounce is added, which falls about two inches over the lower one; and at the waist a wide scarf-like drapery is put on, falling over the top of the flounce; the effect of which is said to be that of an ordinary skirt only. If put on for out of doors, they are worn with one of the long and large cloaks of the present fashion, so that they are not visible. I have chronicled this new idea, but I do not know how far any of my readers will find it of value. One thing is quite evident, that working women are beginning to think out the subject of a suitable working dress for themselves, which seems a good sign. A rainy day, with muddy streets, makes one quite low-spirited, in London especially, for the number of draggletailed, dirty skirts, fully four or five inches longer than need be, is a dreadful exhibition; the only excuse for wearing them at such length being that they are perhaps designed to hide worn-out boots and undarned, untidy stockings. The effect is so bad one wonders that so many women cannot see it.

The fashion of wearing watches on the wrist has spread gradually from bracelets to walking-sticks, till at last the French ladies have watches in their hairpins, and in the rosettes on their evening shoes. Surely folly could no further go!

The "Four-in-hand capes," which made their appearance late in the season, have certainly had a great success, for they are so light and useful; just, in short, the very ideal wrap needed for the summer weather. The lower cape reaches to the waist, and there are sometimes as many as six capes above it; but the general number is three. They are plainly cut round the edge, and are generally lined with silk. They are, in fact, a copy of the capes on the cloaks worn by the Horse Guards. They are made in red, drab, peach, and white and black. The light hues are, of course, intended to be worn with light coloured costumes, and have turned-over collars of velvet or embroidery, tied with bows and long ribbon ends of a colour to match. These form a pleasant change from the too constantly seen fur cape, which has been clung to for so long; and still better, will give us rest from the everlasting fur and feather boas, which have been worn to weariness; this last fashion also being one likely to induce sore throat and colds, by its tendency to overheat the neck.

The new pointed guipure trimming has been so popular that the dressmakers have begun to extend it from the cotton and foulard dress to those of serge and tweed. It is put on round the skirt, the ends turned upwards; and also a band of it is arranged round the waist, with the points also turned up. The same on the wrists as cuffs. Another method is to put it on at the throat and waist, with the points turned downwards; and at the waist they reach to the hips. It is also used on bodices, with the points turned towards the front, so as to form a kind of jacket.

In navy blue serge some very pretty dresses for autumn wear are being got ready, with full plain or folded vests of white delaine, having white panels and white cuffs. Others have white delaine skirts, over which the blue serge skirts open at the sides or in front, and at the back as well. The bodice may be a blouse of white delaine, or one of blue serge, tucked or stitched with white to match. Blue serge has had quite a return to fashion this autumn, and a more useful gown never was devised.

Under-petticoats of coloured alpaca and cotton rep have been much trimmed with coarse washing lace to wear under light gowns. Alpaca makes a very good under-petticoat; it is light to carry, does not harbour dust, and does not tumble; so it makes an excellent travelling petticoat in grey, dust-colour, or black. Time would quite fail me to describe the exquisitely beautiful silk petticoats that have been worn, trimmed with the most delicate and costly laces, and flounced up half their length.

It will be seen by the illustrations that bonnets are becoming smaller and smaller each month. Now there are some bonnets that consist of nothing but one flower, or a bunch or spray of flowers, lightly resting on the top of the head. The foundations of many of them are made of twigs entwined, and for the autumn, red and white currants, honeysuckle, and poppies are being prepared. Few bonnets have any strings at all; indeed, there seems to be no place to attach them. Veils are more of plain tulle in black or white than in anything else, and they do not appear to cover the face any more than they did in the winter.

While bonnets are so small, hats are certainly growing larger, and prettier too, as the year grows apace. I saw a very pretty one the other day, prepared for a serge costume. It was of blue straw, wide, trimmed in front and turned up at the back, lined with velvet, with a large bow of blue velvet in front, and over that one of embroidered lisse in white. This was a very elegant mixture, and looked simple and easy to copy.

The various styles of trimming and making-up dresses are seen in "By the sad sea waves." Each and all are exactly as worn at present. The first figure on the right wears a flannel costume turned over with dark blue silk and a dark blue sash. The next figure wears a tailor-made gown of summer grey tweed; the next figure has a grey alpaca with "accordion pleating" to the skirt, the bodice with a white guipure trimming, and a frill of white muslin. The next figure wears a dress of soft silk, with an embroidered yoked bodice; and the figure on the extreme left a dress of nun's veiling with a narrow stripe, and a trimming of gold braid put on in imitation of a Greek costume of the days of Homer.

In the Picture Gallery we have first, on the right, a tailor-made dress with a white waistcoat. Next a "Directoire" of velvet or plush, and an under-dress of soft white silk. In the centre in front a dress of voile de nonne, with a wide collar of lace, and trimmings of deep red. The hat is of white lace, with bows of red. The two girls in the left-hand corner wear a dress of white embroidery over a coloured skirt and bodice, and a white flannel with a silk front and sash.

I have mentioned the use of "baby ribbon" in millinery, and now it has spread to the dressmaker; and the way in which she uses it is shown in the illustration, "New trimmings of narrow ribbon." The sleeves are very pretty and new, and are composed of a full puff put into the arm, and gathered together under a bow. The other dress is of an embroidered silk with full sleeves, and front sashes put on in a new way, i.e., from the waist-belt, each of them being tied at the end with a bow of ribbon.

The "New way of using drapery" shows the way of putting on silk trimming, or any other that will answer on a plain bodice. This new method is very becoming, and will answer for the doing-up and brightening of an old bodice.

The hair just now is worn much on top of the head, as no doubt my readers will have seen on looking at the pictures of the Princess Louise of Wales.

The small "Sultana jackets," now so much seen in the Park, and worn over an ordinary bodice, are really the old "Zouave jacket" cut much smaller. They are very short, and reach hardly below the shoulder-blades, and are rounded in front, and just meet. They are made in velvet or in cloth, in embroidered silk or muslin, and are sometimes richly spangled in gold or silver. They will be found useful in adding a little warmth on a cold day.

I have illustrated one of the most useful little jackets of the day, and have selected it for the paper pattern of the month, price one shilling. It may be made in any material, and can be worn over one of the cotton skirts so much liked, or over a blouse-bodice. It is usually lined with a colour, and has revers of velvet to contrast with the material. It is in eight pieces—two sleeve-pieces, cuff, collar, revers, back, back side-piece, front side-piece, and front. The under-bodice represented in our sketch is not part of it, but we have already included it in our pattern list, as the "Garibaldi with loose front," price one shilling.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker," care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C., price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county, and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, "The Lady Dressmaker" selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and remaking at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns, for children as well as adults, so that the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under-bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under-bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke; blouse polonaise, princess dress (or dressing-gown), Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle, polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American bodice instead of stays, new Corday skirt with pleats, new jacket-bodice with waistcoat, princess dress, jacket and waistcoat, "Little Lord Fauntleroy" suit, braided bodice and revers, Directoire jacket with folded front, Empire bodice, men's pyjama, a mantle without sleeves, and a plain gored princess chemise.

CHAPTER XXVI.

LEYDEN—OLD ACQUAINTANCES—RECONCILIATION.

IN the country of greenness and cleanliness, with its sleepy canals and its bright painted houses, its stirring history, quaint costumes, wealthy burghers and learned professors, the Dacres pitched their tent, and abode long enough in the friendly shelter to learn to look upon it as a second home. To Dr. Dacre, to whom Greek and Latin were as familiar as his native tongue, and afforded a shibboleth common to all universities, there was soon nothing strange in Leyden's dykes and Dutch elms, gardens and summer-houses, long glasses for the drinkers, and long pipes for the smokers. He found work, he met cronies, his wound was healed, and he was content.

To the women, who knew neither Greek nor Latin, nor could speak a word of Dutch to begin with, life was very quiet and circumscribed in these first years. Had not Mrs. Judy been a cheery soul, comical in her attempts to invent a language of signs and to master a little broken Dutch, in which to accomplish an instalment of comfortable gossip with the most affable of the Dutch housewives around her; had not Prissy been fain to rest, and in the new atmosphere regain the use of the pinions which the whirlwind of adversity had broken; and had not Kitty been young, brave, and kind, devoted to the others, with a bright intelligence for a new landscape, and for the fresh habits and customs of a foreign people, the women might have drooped and sickened of home sickness. That would have been in their early experience of the banishment, before the roots of their hearts had struck downwards, and the tendrils spread abroad till they took Holland for another England.

Naturally, news from England, and occasional encounters with political exiles like themselves, were the welcome springs which watered and refreshed the spirit in the social desert. One day Kitty had the great delight of a visit from Mrs. Margaret Lucas, of Colchester—Mrs. Margaret Lucas no longer!

In the middle of the troubles which had submerged many families, Mrs. Margaret had risen to great honour, dignity, and happiness. Her fortunes were as exalted as her deserts, and as her friends in their fondest dreams could have anticipated for her. In faithfully following the fortunes of her Queen, even at the heavy cost of parting from her beloved family, Mrs. Margaret had gone to Paris, and there, the year after she left England, she met her fate in the person of one of the noblest and most accomplished Englishmen of the century—William Cavendish, the princely Marquis of Newcastle. He overcame her distaste to men and matrimony; she became his second wife, and they took up their residence in Antwerp.

"My lord loved me because I was bashful and timid," she told Kitty, "and I could not refuse him because he was my only love, and I gloried in my lover. I joy at the fame of his worth, am pleased with delight in his wit, proud of the respect he useth to me, and I triumph in the affection he professeth for me. Though my lord hath lost his estate and is banished out of his country for his loyalty, yet neither despised poverty nor pinching necessity can make him break the bonds of friendship or weaken his loyal duty."

It was a small matter to her that his vast estates were for the present forfeited, and that though the combined influence of his virtues, accomplishments, and rank, caused even the thrifty Flemish traders to grant him credit, the husband and wife were sometimes in straits. The pair were occasionally so destitute of necessities that they had been compelled to pawn their clothes, his rich suits and those fantastically devised garments of hers, in which she took so much pleasure, on which there was no longer the restriction of a maid-of-honour standard of costume.

To tell the truth, while she was as fair and nobly comely in person and mind as ever, she was at this moment so eccentrically clad, in flying furbelows and towering headgear, that all the phlegm of a Dutch street populace was wanted to keep my lady from being mobbed in Leyden, as she was many a time in days to come in London. Yet Kitty could not doubt of Mrs. Margaret's worth and splendid happiness with her splendid cavalier, even if what was said of him was correct, that he was better of mounting Pegasus than of climbing Parnassus, since while he was reckoned the finest equestrian in Europe, he was not more than a halting poet in his verses. Nevertheless, the pair who held each other in such high esteem that he could afford to say jestingly, "A very wise woman is a very foolish thing," read and wrote together, she to the extent of "thirteen printed tomes, and much happily not printed," kept high state when they could, and when they could not, lived on the memory and in the hope of it, and were known and respected far and wide by all the most honourable and excellent of their contemporaries. The Newcastle's whims and oddities were put out of sight for the sake of their piety, charity, and generosity, and what was their peculiar possession—a most excellent courtesy. Let the common criers of the future proclaim her "the mad Duchess of Newcastle," when his marquissate had been raised to a dukedom, and he had recovered his vast possessions, it was simply because, as Kitty frequently took pains to explain to those who did not understand, that she yielded to that unfortunate passion "for singularity even in accoutrements." Her chronicler could still record of her, that in the guidance of her great household—an exercise which ordinarily strains the powers of wisdom, in place of being easily accomplished by the tricks of folly—she was renowned for her discreet and kind management.

Lady Newcastle, when she saw Kitty, had just returned from an errand to London, where she had gone, after the example of so many ladies similarly situated, to try to procure for Lord Newcastle's wife, who had committed no offence against Parliament, such an allowance as would supplement the ninety pounds, which was all that remained to him out of his once great income. Her right to a maintenance had been denied, because when she had married my lord, he was already under sentence of outlawry. She was less fortunate than Madam Fanshawe, who had crossed from Jersey on the same errand, and had succeeded in raising three hundred pounds on her husband's claims. Kitty learnt news of the Fanshawes from Lady Newcastle; what extremes of exposure and privation Ann Fanshawe had endured when she fled with Dick Fanshawe and the Prince of Wales to the extremity of Cornwall, and then to the Scilly Isles; how, after losing her first child in Oxford, she had been forced to leave her second behind in Jersey; for both husband and wife had ventured back to England. They had an interview with the poor King at Hampton Court, when his majesty, though detained prisoner, was still able to send Fanshawe on a mission to Madrid to crave the intervention of the Spanish Government on the King's behalf. It was then that, in answer to Ann Fanshawe's impetuous burst of weeping for his sad plight, and her passionate prayer that Charles might yet see long life and happy days, he said, gently stroking her cheek as her father might have done, "Child, if God pleaseth, it shall be so; but both you and I must submit to God's will, and you know in what hands I am."

Of the King, whose daughter Mary was Princess of Orange at the head of the Stadtholder's Court in this kingdom of Holland, the Dacres and the other English in Holland heard without much difficulty, with breathless interest and anxiety, and at last with a very anguish of wrath and pity. As he could not be taken into Scotland by the Scotch army, on account of his refusal to sign the Solemn League and Covenant, he was at his own request handed over to the representatives of the English Parliament. These forthwith paid to the Scotch generals the arrears of pay due from the Parliament to their men, a proceeding which originated the mocking couplet—

"Traitor Scot,
Sold thy King for a groat."

The King was first brought to Holmby House, in Northamptonshire, and then carried to London and lodged in his palace of Hampton Court, where the Fanshawes saw him. Then, as always, he refused to come to any terms with the Parliament, which did not include the acknowledgment of his supreme authority by Divine right. He continued to trust to delay and to secret plots and treaties. He escaped so far as to flee to the Isle of Wight, where the governor detained him a prisoner at Carisbrooke Castle. He was brought a second time to London, to be impeached and tried before a high court of justice, consisting of the chief officers of the army and the leaders of the extreme republican party, presided over by the lawyer Bradshaw. On the first day of the sitting of the commissioners in Westminster Hall for the trial of the King, among the crowd of spectators one box in the hall was filled with ladies wearing masks. When the names of the commissioners were read out and the crier called "Thomas, Lord Fairfax," a voice from the group of ladies made answer, "He has more wit than to be here." When the arraignment of the King was made, at the words "by the authority of the Parliament and of all the good people of England," the same voice protested loudly, "No, nor the hundredth part of them."

In the confusion which followed it was said the command was given by the Captain of the Guard to fire upon the box, when one lady detached herself from the others, quitted their company, and walked slowly out of the hall. No one ventured to oppose her departure, for she was believed to be the wife—by birth a Vere—of the Parliamentary General Fairfax, and the divisions of the time had driven her mad.

The King was brought up on three occasions from St. James's to Westminster Hall, and was grossly insulted by the rabble and the soldiers on the way, without the abatement of one jot of his self-respect and dignity. Never had he looked more kingly than when he sat in the crimson velvet chair provided for him, the halberdiers at his back, confronting his self-constituted judges, to whom he did not raise his hat on his entrance into the court, while they on their part retained their hats and cloaks. He declined to plead or defend himself, simply repeating his statement that he did not acknowledge the authority of those who professed to judge him, now and then smiling sternly at their proceedings. His tongue had lost all its hesitation and his eyes their drooping introversion. He spoke boldly and readily. He looked on the strange scene steadfastly and fearlessly.

After the King's condemnation he said farewell to his two young children, Princess Elizabeth and Prince Henry, the only members of his family left in England, and spent the last hours of his last night on earth in prayer with Bishop Juxon. On the bitterly cold morning of the 31st January, 1649, the King went forth to die, walking the short distance from St. James' to Whitehall in the centre of a group of gentlemen surrounded by musketeers. Before the banquetting hall of his palace, the street, lined with soldiers, was filled with one dense mass of human beings; not only the windows, but the roofs of the houses were set with faces.

Charles came out still king-like on the scaffold, where his faithful bishop stood by his side, and two masked headsmen waited by the block. His rich doublet and the diamond star on his breast were not wanted to show this was no mean man. He spoke once more to his people, but finding that his voice could not reach them, he turned and addressed those around him, asserting his innocence, save in permitting Lord Strafford's death, and in not seeking to punish those who had impeached and condemned him. He spoke a few words to the bishop and to the principal headsmen.

With his own hands Charles put his long locks beneath the satin cap which was provided for him, removed his cloak and his diamond George, giving the last to the bishop, bidding him "remember," laid his head on the block, and putting out his hand as the sign agreed upon, the executioner struck, and the soul returned to God who gave it. When the second headsmen held up the head with the usual words, "This is the head of a traitor," the multitude received the announcement with a deep groan, which echoed through England and through Europe.

The Parliament at once granted the request made by the remnant of the King's suite for his body. It was removed without farther indignity, like that of any private gentleman, in one hearse, attended by four mourning coaches, to Windsor. As the coffin was borne to the vault where it was laid a heavy snowstorm began to fall, changing the black of the velvet pall to a spotless white.

Of the group of loyal gentlemen who gathered around, there were several who had not basked in the royal favour in the happier days of the monarchy, or supported the King in the measures which had proved fatal to him, but who had rallied round him in Oxford, willing to cast in their lots with his failing fortunes.

When Henrietta Maria was told of her husband's fate, she stood as if turned to stone, till her attendants feared for her reason or her life. They were thankful at last when she broke out into the weeping and wailing which resounded for many days through the palace rooms of the Louvre.

The winter had given place to the spring; the ice on the Dutch canals bore no more milkmaids skating with their pails to market; the ice itself was gone; the storks were beginning to build, there was a rustling as of a summer wind among the reeds and rushes; in the house gardens at Leyden there was a gay show of tulips and lilies.

"Dost remember, cousin," said Kitty, softly, as she and Prissy walked out beneath the trees by the canal, "gathering fritillaries on a day like this in the Merton Meadows, and pointing out to me, ignorant child that I was, the doleful signs of the times? Shall we ever gather snakesheads again, think you, and fling them away before they show their fangs and shoot out their forked tongues at us?"

While she spoke she looked up and saw a stranger coming towards them. He was a traveller, who had but lately alighted at a hostelry in Leyden, and after repairing to Dr. Dacre's house on the outskirts, had set forth in search of the young women. As he drew nearer they could see that his air and bearing were English, not Dutch. He had a soldier's step, he wore his dark hair cut short, the face with its irregular features was not old, but already so lined with thought and care, that the glad smile with which it was irradiated at this minute, lit up while it could not conceal the lines.

"Anthony!" cried his sister and cousin, running to him, and hanging upon him.

"Yes, I am come out of England," he said, when they gave him time to speak; "it is less than ever the place for a man who must speak his mind and take the consequences, whether he is on a parade ground or in a Parliament House. No, Alice is not with me; she must bide with the mother; besides, she hath her babies and Will Dorset to look after. Ay, Will, though I'll back him for an honest fellow, can hold his tongue as neither I nor poor Jack could do, cousin Kitty. You two are not sorry to have me, but the question is will uncle Dacre suffer me to remain here?"

It hardly seemed likely when Dr. Peter, coming in from college, hailed the new comer before he had touched his hand with the grim challenge—

"Art content with what thou hast made of it, nephew Anthony?"

"So little, sir," answered Anthony, sadly, "that I would give my right hand, and so would many another Parliamentary soldier, as well as such Royalists as are left in England, to undo that savage blow which was dealt before Whitehall on yonder freezing morning in January. That blow took a princely life without warrant; yea, I say without warrant, even though King Charles had held the doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings twice as stoutly as he did, and reckoned himself justifiable in deceiving his enemies on all hands. The deed hath undone our work for many a day. It will all have to be done over again in another generation. As for me, I could bide in England under King Charles if he would suffer it, though we were not agreed on all points, but I cannot strike hands with his slayers, I cannot consent to a new tyrannous order of things—the arresting of members of the House, the removal of the mace, the closing the door, and carrying off the key. The violence may be well meant and in the name of right, but the offence against liberty out-reacheth the offences of the old rule. I will not deceive you, Dr. Dacre; I have served under General Cromwell, and am bound to tell you that I count him not only a noble fighter, but an honest man so far as he seeth, ay, and a God-fearing man like his cousin, John Hampden, whom I did call my friend with pride."

"Go on, sir," said Dr. Peter, ironically.

"Nay, I have little more to say. All Cromwell's merits do not prevent him from being self-deceived—wretched, fallible mortals that we are—and I for one cannot stomach a King Oliver in all save the title."

Dr. Peter let himself be propitiated by the confession, yearning as his heart was in his exile over one who was in a sort his own flesh and blood, who had been his son's dearest friend. To the immense relief and gratitude of the young people, Kitty's father not only consented to admit Anthony Walton into his household, the old man exerted himself to procure for the young scholar work as he could undertake, and to establish him as his, Dr. Dacre's, assistant in his functions in the Dutch University.

In good time, the love which had long ago sprung up between Anthony and Kitty blossomed into beautiful maturity, was owned and crowned by her father's blessing, and the pair were wedded, to the great increase of the little household's confidence, strength, and cheerfulness.

Two years later the defeat of Charles II. in the Battle of Worcester once more crushed the hopes of the Royalists. In the rout, Mr. Richard Fanshawe and the Earl of Derby were both taken prisoners. Dick Fanshawe was removed to London, where his faithful wife went each morning to his prison, from which he was eventually liberated. He lived in retirement till the Restoration, when he went again to Madrid as English ambassador with the title of Sir Richard Fanshawe, accompanied by Lady Fanshawe, an accomplished and charming ambassador. Sir Richard died after a time in Spain. His widow brought back his body, and buried it in England, where she settled among her numerous sons and daughters.

James Stanley, Earl of Derby, was taken to Bolton-le-Moors, near his own house of Latham, which his brave wife had held for a year and a day for the King, and there on the very spot where Lord Derby had defeated the Parliamentary general, and forced him to raise the siege, he was beheaded as a traitor. The Lady of Latham was far away.

Dr. Dacre and the Waltons tarried eight years longer in Holland, so long that Kitty's children spoke Dutch like the children around them, and one valued member of the family was laid in Dutch earth. Mrs. Judy had ended her long and loyal service, content to die as she had been content to live, pleased that she had been spared to see her little Mrs. Kitty with a good husband and fine children of her own, and never tired of acknowledging the kindness and care which had solaced the weakness of the aged woman's last days. It was a pang to Kitty to think of leaving that dust behind her; besides her father was so old, bent, and withered with age that it seemed a mockery to speak of transplanting him once more. Was he not well with his books wherever he was? Had he not learnt to love the plain living and high thinking, the quiet and the thrift of the homely Dutch town, with the friendly bluff faces and portly persons of his learned colleagues? Was it not well with all the little group in this haven, where they had been at peace and happy? What did they ask more?

But Anthony, Kitty, and Prissy—not to speak of the children—had still much of their lives before them, and there were English home duties calling on them to recross the German Ocean.

Indeed, when in 1659 the Restoration was in everybody's mouth, and there was a great reflux of Englishmen and their families from Holland, France, and Germany to the land of their birth, Dr. Peter Dacre began to bestir himself. He talked with glistening eyes and a red spot on each ashen cheek of Isis and the Cherwell, of the city of many towers, where he had wedded his young wife, and his boy and girl had been born, of the great Bodleian Library, of who occupied his rooms in Oriel, and whether the choristers' songs did not rise sweet as angels' voices in Magdalen Chapel.

Happily for Anthony Walton the fact that he had stood aloof from all the acts in connection with the late King's death, and had even laid down his commission in protest against it, enabled him to return with the multitude without any risk of suffering from his opinions. As he said ruefully, they were even less in fashion then than before, when the second Charles came back to outrage all principles of honour and morality, and to reign ultimately without the ceremony of summoning a Parliament.

Oxford had escaped wonderfully, and was found mirroring itself in its girdle of waters as if nothing had happened to disturb its serenity. The bells of St. Mary's and St. Martin's were ringing in concord. The very butterwomen sat on the Penniless Bench as of old, only the dismantled Castle bore testimony to its surrender. Prissy could look upon it, as Kitty looked on Islip Bridge with tender pensiveness, but no longer with a storm of anguish.

Madam Walton was still alive to embrace her children, and Alice and her husband were right well pleased to resign their suzerainship of Islip Barnes to its master and mistress, Anthony and Kitty. Alice was so stout, rosy, and active a matron, with her big sons and daughters taking after her in her later development, that if anybody had whispered a word of the days when she was a fanciful, delicate damsel, nobody would have believed it; everybody would have laughed it to scorn.

Prissy had become like another daughter to Dr. Dacre, and was quite content to take up her abode with him in rooms as near as they could find to Oriel, and to represent Kitty in ministering to him and his infirmities, till such time as his earthly course should be finished. Then she would join her brother and sister as their cherished lifelong guest at Islip Barnes, when Alice did not eagerly claim a share of her sister's company at Wood Dorset.

Out at Islip Barnes were the healthful bustle and pleasant seasonable occupations of country life. And there was the young life, that was so ardent and joyous, to keep, by God's grace, mature and aging hearts fresh and sound to the last. When Anthony and Kitty came into Oxford, as they often did, to pay loving duty to the old man, their father, they would snatch spare moments to pay sundry pilgrimages. They would stroll into Holywell Churchyard, stand by Lady Ottery's grave, and speak of her virtues and her kindness to Kitty. They would walk as far as the gardens of St. John's, and recall that good Bishop Juxon's body had been brought to lie in the chapel of his old college, where the Bible out of which he had read the last words of consolation and hope to him whom men were beginning to call "King Charles the Martyr" was thenceforth to be treasured. They would turn into the gate at Magdalen, and pause in the cloisters where Anthony Walton and John Dacre had sauntered and dreamt of old. A quiet gravity would steal into the husband and wife's conversation at such times, but there was no gloom either in their faces or their hearts.

HOW WORKING GIRLS LIVE IN LONDON.

By NANETTE MASON.

PART IV.

WE all crave for companionship, and a working girl must have friends and acquaintances. What is the use of a woman's tongue unless she have someone to talk to? This craving, being common to everybody, is easily satisfied; indeed, the only difficulty is to have the companionship of the right sort.

Girls often club together in lodgings, finding that not only an aid to economy, but a more cheerful arrangement than solitude. The proverb is not always right which says that two women together make cold weather, though it may be hard for girls of a certain temperament to avoid petty jealousies and get on with each other like philosophers. We have met some beautiful examples of working girl friendships, in which, without any claims other than those of kindly feeling and womanly sympathy, girls have gone for many years like Rosalind and Celia in the play, "coupled and inseparable," aiding each other in trouble, and loyal to each other in all the ups and downs of London life.

As a rule, however—explain it in what way you please—girls hang loosely together, and their most lasting intimacies are with those of the opposite sex. Into such intimacies working girls plunge with careless ease. Emily going to business every morning frequently passes a young man also bound for business. Looks of recognition quickly grow to words; then he says, "If you are disengaged such an evening, and will meet me at the lions in Trafalgar Square, I shall take you to a concert, or to anything else you please." She agrees, and they meet, though she knows no more about him, his position, or his family than what he has chosen to tell her himself, which is probably nothing.

No doubt this often comes of pure thoughtlessness and ignorance of the pitfalls of life. A girl does not know that for one good-natured and well-meaning man she may encounter, she has a chance of meeting with a hundred designing characters from whose companionship she can get nothing but harm. London is no worse than other great cities, but unfortunately it does not seem to be any better.

If a girl wants to find a husband, he is not to be picked up in the street. We have, it is true, known several instances in which men have married girls whose acquaintance they made in this way, but without exception the matches have proved unfortunate. Either something was afterwards discovered that had been carefully concealed, or there was a screw loose somewhere, and the result was lifelong unhappiness.

We remember the case of a girl who ultimately married a young man who lodged on the opposite side of the street, and whose only introduction was that they both happened to look out of the window at the same time. The young man deceived her as to his expectations as much as Claude Melnotte did Pauline, about his palace by the Lake of Como, and when that deception was seen through the music of their married life came to an end.

Chance and dangerous acquaintances would not be so readily made if working girls were not often deficient in self-respect. They make themselves too cheap, and forget that as things go the world usually takes people at their own valuation. Nobody sets a high value on a girl who acts as if she did not estimate herself as worth much.

"Ah, wasteful woman! she who may
On her sweet self set her own price,
Knowing he cannot choose but pay—
How has she cheapened Paradise!
How given for naught her precious gift,
How spoiled the bread and spilled the wine,
Which, spent with due respective thrift,
Had made brutes men, and men Divine!"

What leads girls astray is not their good qualities run wild, as Goethe suggests when he says—

"Poor things! poor things! the best and kindest
Fall soonest, for their heart is blindest,
And feels, and loves, and does not reason,
And they are lost—poor things! poor things!"

Now and then it may be so, but the real cause is their insatiable vanity. It does not need very close watching to see that there are grounds for the reproach of another poet who said that woman would be satisfied if one only gave her a looking glass and a few sugar plums.

Working girls have, as a rule, two or three hours every evening to themselves in which to seek for relaxation. From morning till evening they are human machines, but when turned at closing time into the street they take up again the part of human beings. What, then, becomes of them, and how many make a profitable and praiseworthy use of these leisure hours?

The need for amusement everyone acknowledges, and to none is it more necessary than to the thousands of girls who make their living in the great metropolis. Their spirits must find vent somehow, and into their lives some variety must be introduced or, with to-day like yesterday and to-morrow like to-day, existence would be unbearable. The trouble is how to provide excitement without its being unwholesome and pleasure without its unfitting for subsequent labour.

The amusements, even the pranks, of girls are of a more colourless nature than those of young men. However great their vivacity, you never hear, for example, of working girls who have been out to tea climbing up the lamp-posts and putting out all the lamps for half a mile. But for all that they abhor anything slow, and you must take them as you find them. They may not want their entertainment boisterous, but it must be at least lively, for London life, in their way of thinking, is dreary enough without introducing the funereal into hours of leisure.

For want of training, girls are, as a rule, without resources in themselves. Those, therefore, who are under no sort of supervision, and can do just as they please, are gad-about at night and find distraction in ways of which people with no temptation to leave their comfortable firesides little dream. Some of them frequent theatres, with their "young men," if they have them; if not, with girl-companions, or maybe alone; but alone is not common; fortunately, for it is a bad sign. Others go to music-halls, to feast there on comic vocalists, conjurers, ventriloquists, performing dogs, and clog dancers.

Dancing-rooms present a great attraction to the more light-headed, and many a girl has gone astray through the associates found in them, and to the sound of their music has entered on a reckless and dissipated life. A girl may think that after she has had her fling at this kind of evening amusement, she will settle down to be a good and quiet house-keeper if any young man gives her the chance; but it is extremely unlikely that she will ever do anything of the kind.

Of late years the rational recreation of the toiling population of London has received a great deal of attention; the well-to-do have wakened up to their duty, and are giving both money and time to brighten the lives of those who work as hard but are less fortunate than themselves. It is an age of people's palaces, polytechnic institutes, public libraries, and concerts for the million, and it is not too much to say that the means of passing her spare time in a pleasant and profitable way will soon be, if it is not already, at the command of every working girl.

Amongst these praiseworthy agencies, one which may be quoted, by way of illustration, is the Young Women's Help Society. This society has over eighty branches scattered throughout England, including some of the largest towns—Devonport, Manchester, Newcastle, North Shields, etc.—and over two dozen branches in London alone, where it works among the poorest women and girls engaged in all kinds of employment.

The greater part of the work in towns is carried on by means of evening clubs. These offer an evening enlivened with music, singing, and sewing-classes, sometimes with a dance, always with a pleasant chat, besides supplying coffee, lemonade, and such-like beverages. There is also a lavatory. Last, but not least, the girls are treated to an occasional day in the country.

These clubs are superintended by a matron and by ladies, who take so many evenings a week. They have in some cases an average attendance of between thirty and forty, and the hold thus obtained over the rough girls is invaluable.

In appealing to the public for subscriptions, about a year ago, the Duke of Newcastle, speaking of the benefit of these evening meetings to working girls during the summer season—let alone the dreary winter—put it in a way which it is to be hoped secured a ready response from all who could afford to give. "Let anyone," he said, "try and realise what it must be to return home after a day's work in a jam factory, with the thermometer between 70 deg. and 80 deg., to a room 9 ft. by 12 ft., with no fresh air attainable except through the tiny window from the narrow, stifling street, shared probably with two other girls, each wearing an old gown rendered loathsome by the heat and work of the day, unrelieved too often by any underclothing. Is it to be wondered at if the girls prefer the streets with their attendant temptations—the public-houses, and others still worse?"

Some girls of course fill up their leisure with reading, but the literature that finds acceptance with a large class is nothing to be proud of. The penny dreadful, with its sensational incidents, has a fascination for the half-educated, who know nothing of the world, and are unable to detect the monstrous improbabilities of this class of fiction. Working girls everywhere are great supporters of the press that issues its highly-spiced stories in pennyworths. By means of these they are able to transport themselves from their poor abodes and the companionship of Tom and Sally, to West-end mansions and the society of dukes, not to speak of sometimes princes. It is so nice, too, to think that there may be some streak of resemblance between themselves and the poor but lovely girl who comes to London from a thatched cottage in the country, and who is called by her friends Blanche Somebody, but who is really Lady Charlotte Somebody else, and the heiress of three million sterling, though she does not know it. There is all the excitement of following her fortunes as she dodges the villain, who is in the secret of her wealth and station, but who in the end is utterly discomfited, and welcomes the advances of the titled admirer, whom she ultimately weds at Hanover Square, and who is all good looks, honesty, and devotion.

It would be well if their reading stopped short at sensationalism of this romantic type, but to a good deal of the printed matter that falls into the hands of these young people the objections are serious; it is nothing short of demoralising. Great efforts, however, have been made to supply healthy, innocent, and attractive reading, by means of which girls engaged in providing for their bread and butter might brighten their monotonous lives. THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, if we may be permitted to allude to ourselves, has by general acknowledgment taken the foremost place in this useful work, and many interesting and encouraging instances, we are informed, have come to the knowledge of those concerned in its management, showing that it has been a real boon to the class under consideration.

Before dismissing the subject of the recreations of working girls, it may be remarked that employers often err in thinking that they have nothing to do with how the girls under them pass their time when the day's work is over. True enough, it is their own affair, and the instinct of girls is to reject supervision, but kindly feeling dictates that employers should frequently step in to save girls from the effects of their own ignorance.

"It is the duty," says Cobbett, in words which should be taken to heart by all who have to do with the young—"it is the duty, and ought to be the pleasure of age and experience, to warn and instruct youth, and to come to the aid of inexperience. When sailors have discovered rocks or breakers, and have had the good luck to escape with life from amidst them, they, unless they be pirates or barbarians as well as sailors, point out the spots for the placing of buoys and of lights, in order that others may not be exposed to the danger which they have so narrowly escaped. What man of common humanity, having by good luck missed being engulfed in a quagmire or quicksand, will withhold from his neighbours a knowledge of the peril without which the dangerous spots are not to be approached?"

People may think that working girls should spend the evenings in improving their minds by attending classes of which there are many now open in the metropolis for their benefit. Some do, but the majority—without taking taste into account—have little energy left for study after their work is done. Watching them going home of an evening, one would think that nineteen out of every twenty would be the better of having an Act of Parliament passed compelling them to turn into bed and sleep for a month, they look so listless and jaded. The culture of the mind is hardly possible when the body is exhausted.

Those who have the necessary vitality left pursue mental culture in such institutions as the College for Working Women, which was founded to enable those who are at work during the day to spend the evening in the development of their minds by careful intellectual training and also by friendly social intercourse, an important point in the development of the mind being human fellowship. The only darkness, as Shakespeare says, is ignorance, and it is well for a girl, so long as she does not overtask herself, to be a seeker after knowledge, especially in things which she can make available in the line of her work. Information pays, if it is of the right sort, and London, together with shorter hours of labour, wants educational centres for working girls, not by the half dozen, but by the hundred, so that they may be brought within easy reach of those who have little time for going to and fro. If working girls were better educated they would be in less danger than now of spending their time foolishly.

It is the want of culture of any kind that makes the girls attending shops and factories all as like each other as peas. One only need overhear the conversation of two of them to see that they have a very limited intellectual horizon, bounded generally on the one side by a new ribbon and on the other by a young man.

Many measures for the improvement of working girls suggest themselves, which it would be impossible to carry out. Kindly feelings towards a class and the interest of the community at large do not always recommend the same things in this topsy-turvy world. But wise efforts, within the bounds of possibility, are being made, and in this direction the well-to-do have an opportunity of distinguishing themselves, both by giving generously of their means, and by making a liberal sacrifice of their time.

The great difficulty is the difficulty of wages. Miss Edith Simcox, writing on this subject in a contemporary about two years ago, mentions that there are perhaps a million of respectable, self-supporting, self-respecting, fairly-skilled female operatives whose clear average earnings with a long day's labour are more often under than over ten shillings a week.

"We believe," adds Miss Simcox, "that there are still well-to-do people who say and think that ten shillings a week are very good wages for a single woman; but that opinion is seldom supported by a detailed budget.

"Let us see for ourselves how much spending there is in such a sum. The rations allowed to the old people in Whitechapel Workhouse cost, according to Mrs. Barnett, 3s. 11d. a head per week. In quantity they are scarcely equal to the amount physiologists consider necessary for the healthy maintenance of an able-bodied adult, and a lone woman can hardly buy as cheaply as contractors. Still we will suppose our working woman to be content with the same diet as the aged paupers, and to spend only 4s. a week in food, 3s. is an ordinary rent to pay in London for such a small back room as she will occupy; light, firing, and washing can hardly cost her less than another shilling, and if she belongs, as we will hope, to a trade union, her necessary weekly expenses are brought up to 8s. 2d. without any provision for clothes, holidays, amusements, or saving; for all these and other purposes she has a balance available varying, let us say, from 4d. to 1s. 10d. a week, or from 17s. 4d. to £4 15s. 9d. a year.

"And yet there are ladies whose cheapest dress costs as much as the whole year's pocket-money of an industrious book-finder, who have the audacity to talk about thrift to these passed mistresses in the art of 'going without!'"

Were wages raised many good results would follow. We cannot certainly have everything—wages, education, leisure, and recreation—put straight at once; but the present progress of things is in the right direction, and we are confident that a better day than was ever seen before has, in our time, dawned, though it may not yet shine brightly, on our sisters, the working girls of this country.

FORBIDDEN LETTERS.

By MARY E. HULLAH, Author of "Celia and Her Legacy," "No," etc.

CHAPTER V.

EDMUND RAVENSDALE knew nothing whatever of the events that were taking place at Yew Lodge; business was slack, and he had come down to Hazelton for a day or so to see his mother and enjoy a breath of country air. He did not recognise the voice calling for help, though he happened just at that moment to be thinking of Bessie, and wondering whether she would be pleased with the copy of Tennyson's poems which he had brought for her from London.

On arriving at the farther side of the river he shouted two or three times, but there was no answer, and he landed thinking that some child must have been calling "Edmund, Edmund." Yet it had sounded very much as if the child had been in great trouble; he got into the punt again, and pushed off a little way along the bank, in order to convince himself that no accident had occurred; the river was deep in some places.

"Anything wrong?" called Edmund, in ringing tones; the echoes brought back his own words dimly; he waited a little while, and then, satisfied that all was well, he went his way homewards slowly. It was past six o'clock when he arrived at Yew Lodge. Anything wrong? Surely much that was wrong. Edmund Ravensdale had never had such a home-coming as this. At the study door he met his father, and there was that in his face which caused the young man to ask breathlessly, "Is my mother worse?"

"No, no, thank God! I have not told her yet, we must keep it from her as long as we can. Come in, my boy; here is sad news—look" (he put Bessie's ill-written confession into Edmund's hand); "she has run away, the child I said I would cherish and guard as my own daughter. She has been missing since luncheon. I have sent to Templebury station and to the Junction; I have telegraphed to the Bridges—no one has seen her."

"What is it all about? I don't understand why she went!" exclaimed Edmund.

A very few moments more and he was in full possession of all the facts, as far as Mr. Ravensdale knew them. He drew a long breath. "I hope it is not so bad as you think, father," he said kindly; "she cannot have gone very far in this time, and I will go at once and look for her; she has acted very foolishly, and I expect that she is frightened, and hiding somewhere close by. I will bring her back."

He spoke with calm decision, thinking to comfort and cheer his father, but his heart was sore within him. The little cousin whom he dearly loved had lied and deceived his old father; this was bad enough; but what she might do in her despair he shuddered to think. He guessed how she must have suffered before she made up her mind to run away; he grew wrathful as he wondered who the correspondent might be, for whose sake Bessie had dared to fly in the face of his father's commands; perhaps the stranger had persuaded her to leave Yew Lodge.

Then he recollected the voice that he had heard calling "Edmund, Edmund!" by the ferry, and he turned pale at the thought.

"I will go at once," he said, "and order the dog-cart to come round as soon as possible; but there cannot be any cause for real anxiety, not yet. Don't distress yourself, father; she may come back when she has got over her fright."

"Owen Stanhope was not to be trusted. I ought perhaps to have made more allowances for her defective education. May God forgive me if I have been harsh to his orphan child!"

"Father," said Edmund, "poor Bessie has been sadly to blame, as you know. You have nothing to reproach yourself with."

The touch of his hand was almost a caress, and the old man was comforted.

"Mr. Williams has driven into Templebury," he said, after a pause, quite in his usual manner, "to communicate with the police authorities; we will not leave a stone unturned to find her before dark. Discoveries have been made, you will be glad to hear, which appear likely to exonerate the deputy-postman from participation in the robbery. As for his account of meeting a young lady by our gate, it will be time enough to sift that matter when Elizabeth returns."

Edmund went round to the stables to hasten the putting in of the horse; he had very little doubt as to who the young lady was.

"Ah!" he thought bitterly, "why didn't she write and tell me her trouble if she is afraid of my father. Bessie, you might have trusted me."

* * * *

A fine, sleeting rain had begun to fall. Elizabeth was very cold; she had no jacket or wrap with her, and her dress was thin. She had run and walked a great many miles since she had heard Edmund calling by the ferry. In her hurry she had left the river far behind her, and so missed the easiest way to the sea-coast; she did not know where to turn or what to do next.

She had left off feeling hungry, but the pain in her head was getting steadily worse. She longed to find some quiet place where she could lie down and rest. It was growing very dark; she had passed several cottages, and the children had stared at her so oddly that she had not ventured to tap at a door and ask for a night's lodging; earning her own living and being alone in the world was much, much harder than she had thought when she sat writing in her pretty little room at Yew Lodge. There was nothing to be done now but to press onwards, and try again for shelter at the next village, where perhaps the children would not be so curious. How high the hedges were in this part of the country! These deep lanes had been made by smugglers, Edmund had told her; and how black the trees looked in the waning light! Bessie trembled as she wondered whether there were any smugglers or robbers left; the darkness and the silence were rapidly becoming terrible to her. If she could only meet a friend now, how gladly would she return to Yew Lodge. But would they receive her again? She did not think that they would; she had proved herself to be unworthy of her cousin's kindness. Why should they wish to take her back again?

Just then a troop of young men and boys came shouting and laughing down the lane. One of them saw Bessie and called out to her. She could not distinguish the words, but a great dread seized her; she sprang through a gap in the hedge, tearing her dress as she went, and ran across a field in her fright, never stopping until she was well out of sight and hearing of her pursuers.

Some few yards further on she saw lights; if that were a village, she would go on boldly and ask for assistance. She smoothed her rumpled hair and pushed her hat straight. Experience had taught her that she must try and look like other people, and now that it was getting so dark she hoped that no one would notice that her dress was torn and her boots were muddy. At any rate she could pay for her supper and lodging. She put her hand into her pocket to find her purse. Alas! it was not there. In vain she searched. She must have dropped it; perhaps by the riverside, and it would be vain to return and look for it. Even if there had been the remotest chance of finding it, she did not dare to run the risk of encountering those laughing, yelling boys again. All at once her last shred of courage failed her, and she sank down on a big stone by the side of a stile and began to cry.

"Are you in trouble, my girl?"

Bessie looked up and discerned a woman in a shawl, of homely appearance, who carried a bag and a heavily-laden basket, while a little child was clinging to the skirt of her dress.

"I—I have lost my purse. I have no where to go."

The woman came a little nearer; her speech was very friendly.

"Don't fret! Did they turn you off at a moment's notice? Won't they give you a character?"

"I beg your pardon," faltered Bessie, failing to understand that the woman had mistaken her for a farm servant dismissed by her cross-grained mistress in a fit of temper.

"The maid's daft with trouble," said the woman, as she stood with one foot a little in advance, patting her sleeping baby; the little girl meanwhile at her mother's side pointed towards the stranger, and said, in reproachful tones, "Her's a bad girl!"

"Hush, hush!" exclaimed the mother; and she turned again to Bessie, and this time she looked at her more narrowly. "Maybe you have run away?"

Bessie gave a sign of assent.

"Go back, my maid; there's them at home you've grieved sorely. Where do you come from?"

Bessie got up from the stone. "From Hazelton," she said wearily.

"'Tis a matter of nine miles," replied the woman, "and my man is expecting me." "Look 'ee here," she put a firm hand on the girl's, "do you see the light yonder? That's the 'Green Man.' Go down the hill, and tell the master I have sent you—Mrs. Simpson, of Barrows Farm. He'll give you a lift in his cart, maybe, and the mistress 'll take care of you. Go straight home to Hazelton, my maid, and the Lord be with you!"

Bessie turned her face in the direction of the twinkling lights. "I will go," she gasped, "and thank you so much!"

"You're heartily welcome," was the courteous answer. "Good-night to you."

So Mrs. Simpson trudged on through the mud, wondering over the ways of girls, and soon disappeared in the gloaming.

Bessie needed all her strength of mind to face the coming ordeal; she was horribly afraid of the master of the "Green Man," in spite of Mrs. Simpson's recommendation. However, the road before her was not quite so dark and dreary as the one that she had just left. She had only walked a little way down the hill, when she heard the rumbling of wheels. Was that the cart? If so, should she dare to stop it, and ask to be taken to Hazelton?

She came out of the shadow of the hedge and gazed eagerly towards the approaching vehicle; it was a light dog-cart; the horse was advancing at a fast trot; the driver sat well forward; his cap was pushed off his forehead; his lips were set as if he was in pain, his eyes glanced anxiously ahead. In her anxiety not to miss this last chance, Bessie ran forward and held up her hand, half bewildered by the noise of the dog-cart and the flashing lamps. In a second the horse was pulled up with a jerk; the driver had thrown the reins over a rail and jumped to her side.

"Bessie!" he cried, "I have found you at last; I have traced you all the way from Ford's Ferry. We have been searching for you for hours; thank God I have found you!"

To the end of her life Elizabeth Stanhope never forgot the tone of Edmund's voice and the expression on his face of thankfulness and relief as he put both hands on hers and said again, "Thank God!"

It dawned upon her dimly how he must have suffered through her disobedience and untruth-fulness; she stood there in bitter humiliation, hanging her head.

"I was coming home, Edmund."

"You are wet and cold," he answered quickly; "get into the cart at once. I have brought you a warm shawl. We must make haste. We are trying to keep your absence from my mother, but she has asked for you several times, and father is very unhappy about you."

That was all. He spoke no farther word of reproach. Very tenderly he helped her into the front seat of the dog-cart, and folded the shawl round her. She was shivering with fatigue and cold. It seemed to her as if the whole scene—yea, even Edmund's kind care—were part of a dream, from which she would awake presently to find herself lost in those dark, weird lanes. With a violent effort she sat upright and began to relate her experiences, forcing herself into telling every detail, but Edmund stopped her.

"You are not fit to talk, Bessie; try to go to sleep or rest if you can, and we will get home as fast as possible. I have got you safely, and that is the great point."

She roused herself from a fitful slumber, as the dog-cart turned in at the white garden gate. She had lost all count of time, and the dreamy sensation grew stronger and stronger. When the horse stopped at the familiar door, she hardly recognised Ellen, who was waiting with a scared face. She could not stand upright, and Edmund lifted her from her seat and carried her into the house. Here she looked round. "Did you say that your father was unhappy about me?" she asked, vaguely conscious that Ellen was gazing at her torn, untidy dress and gloveless hands with eyes of disapproval.

Edmund glanced towards the study door. "There he is!"

For the second time in those few months the master of Yew Lodge came forward to meet his cousin's orphan child. His heart was full of tenderness now, as it had been then, but his reserved nature would not allow him to speak; he stood there apparently stern and unrelenting.

Dazed by the light and warmth, trembling with excitement and illness, Bessie moved slowly towards him. She had thrown off her hat; she gazed at him with wistful longing as she had never done before.

"Cousin Alfred," she murmured, "forgive me—only try and forgive me!"

For all answer the old man held out his arms, and she fell sobbing on his neck.

* * * *

The fact of her young kinswoman's flight had been successfully kept from Mrs. Ravensdale's knowledge; for her no evil effects were to be feared. It was Bessie herself who was the sufferer; the exposure to damp and cold had brought on a sharp attack of congestion of the lungs. The morning after her return to Yew Lodge she became seriously ill, and for many weeks she was confined to a sick room, where she was most devotedly tended and nursed by Ellen, who had suffered so much on "Miss Bessie's" account.

Our heroine's first thought, when she was able to get about again, was to entreat Mr. Ravensdale to tell the whole truth and clear Ellen's character in the eyes of all the neighbours; this at least was one step in the right direction, and showed that her repentance was sincere. However, by this time every inhabitant of the village knew of Miss Ravensdale's running away, and was perfectly well aware that it was the young lady herself who, in direct defiance of her guardian's orders, had received letters secretly, and helped to get Barnes into such grievous trouble, although in the long run the deputy-postman was proved to be entirely innocent of any implication in the Templebury robbery.

So when Bessie, having recovered slowly from her illness, was able to go about again, she had to endure the consequences of her wrong-doing, inasmuch as every child in Hazelton had heard the story from beginning to end.

Gradually, however, the talk and slander died away, and she strove earnestly to be straightforward and trustworthy. Month by month her life at Yew Lodge became happier and happier, and there was no talk now of her being sent to school.

Later on, Bessie discovered, to her great amazement, that Mr. Ravensdale was willing to take a deep interest in her writing, and to sympathise cordially with her wish to assist the Bridges. In the course of time her literary work grew to be a fresh bond of union between them. Under cousin Alfred's wise direction, she learnt slowly but surely to study to good purpose, and to train her talents and her love for all things high and beautiful until her gift of fancy and her vivid imagination became a blessing instead of a curse.

Six years later. It was a fair spring morning, and Elizabeth Stanhope was sitting under the shelter of the yew hedge. Spring flowers were blooming at her feet, and the kitchen garden was gay with flowering fruit trees. Lovely as it all was, her thoughts and her eyes were turned in another direction, for Edmund was coming rapidly towards her.

"Father wants you, Bessie, dear; will you go into the house?"

She rose from her seat, and greeted him with a happy smile.

"You have grown to be father's right hand," said the young man, earnestly, as he walked by her side. "I don't know how he will get on when I come to take you away for good, or mother either. Well, I have promised that we will run down to the old place as often as we can. I have just been telling them that even if I could give up work, a rising authoress ought to be in London."

Bessie blushed, looking at him and touching his hand with the little gesture of confidence that so clearly reminded him of her schoolgirl days. She had grown tall and stately; the roses bloomed in her cheeks, and her hair was arranged in smooth plaits, but in her soft brown eyes he still saw the little Bessie of old.

"Do you remember 'Lucille,' Edmund?"

"Yes, to be sure I do; I came upon your early MS. the other day. Some of it is very funny. We didn't think in those days that you would have got on so fast; father is simply delighted with your success."

"I am very glad," said Bessie, humbly; "so many good things have happened to me lately."

"To me too," replied Edmund, "and the best of them all is, my darling, that you have promised to be my wife."

[THE END.]

CORRESPONDENCE.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A PERPLEXED DAUGHTER OF EVE seems to have been a very foolish one too, and to have forgotten the express command of our Saviour—Matt. v. 31. An oath should not be taken, save in matters of importance, not rashly and unwisely, and about puerile things. We hope you will leave off the practice, as you seem to have entangled yourself in a perfect labyrinth of promises and vows, and to be anything but a comfort to your mother. Turn to your daily duties, obey and love your father and mother, and avoid excitement on all religious subjects. Do not think of yourself, and avoid all pride and self-conceit.

A. M. C. has evidently been dwelling too much on religious subjects, until her mind has become quite upset. Endeavour to get change of air and scene, with some interesting books to read; be much in the open air, and with the trees and flowers, and strive to realise that God is your Father, and loves you. "Consider the lilies," said our Lord; and we must strive to live as peacefully as they, knowing "He careth for us." We have answered the question about the "unpardonable sin" many times; you will find it in our correspondence columns. The very sorrow you are suffering proves that God and His Son Jesus Christ are calling you to salvation.

B. R. P.—We think so long as such things are not abused, we must allow others liberty to follow their inclinations in matters of small importance. You are young, and seem extreme in your opinions; you would have greater influence if you tried to see a little more with the eyes of others. Everyone must learn for themselves to use and not abuse God's gifts, and good habits can be formed as easily as bad ones, when we are young.

A MUSIC TEACHER.—You had better inquire at T. C. L. what letters would be right.

ALPHA.—Why do you wish to give a present? If it be really needful, a book would be as good as anything.

JOAN had better go and look her class up, and find out what has become of them; she will get no good by sitting still and doing nothing.

B. E. C.—A correspondent sends us the information that the name of the new secretary of the Christian Blind Relief Society is the Rev. J. Pullen, Thompson Street, St. Stephen's Vicarage, North Bow, E. We are much obliged for the information.

A NEW SOUTH WALES WELSH GIRL.—We thank you for your kind letter and your exertions on our behalf.

A RUSSIAN BLONDINE.—Miss Charlotte Yonge is alive, and still writes and edits the "Monthly Packet." Elizabeth Wetherell is the pseudonym of Miss Susan Warner, an American authoress. She has written many books since "The Wide, Wide World" and "Queechy," and is still alive, we believe. Many thanks for your kind words about the G.O.P. We are glad to welcome our Russian girls' letters at all times.

B. F. (Dulwich).—Why not try Bath or Buxton? Inquire of the doctor which would be best for your mother.

M. B., CONSTANCE.—1. The lines are rhymed prose only. 2. Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I., called Henrietta of England, born June 16, 1644, married to Philippe, Duc d'Orleans, March 31, 1661, quarrelled with her husband, died June 30, 1670; poison being suspected. She was very pretty, peculiarly lively in disposition, and brilliant in her manner and conversation.

SNOWDROP's aphorisms are excellent, and we hope she keeps a book in which to inscribe them.

SUMMERS has sent us a very good schoolgirl's "Essay on the Mind," which we decline with thanks. Articles intended for the press should only be written on one side of the paper, and should be occasionally broken up into paragraphs.

PERPLEXED.—We do not understand your letter, nor the sad state of things it portrays in your home. We see no harm in your telling your minister of your troubles, as he may be able to give you advice how to improve what seems to be a very miserable state of affairs.

TOPSY.—We should not think the accident had anything to do with your hair falling out. Try the old-fashioned rosemary tea, well rubbed into the roots.

CHILDREN'S NURSE.—1. Louisa is the feminine of Louis or Lewis, an old German name meaning "bold warrior." 2. The new idea is that too much washing is very bad for the hair and is the cause of baldness in men. This may not be true, but careful brushing, long continued, is the best thing to render it healthy, glossy, and clean.

TRITONITE.—1. The 12th December, 1871, was a Tuesday. 2. You should be well rubbed with hot bath sheet and hot towels if there is any trouble of the kind; do not bathe in cold water, but tepid.

PILOX.—The 18th of May, 1872, was a Saturday. THANKFUL.—We regret your trouble, but the subject is one on which we should never dream of giving advice, for we think you would do more harm than good. Try to make up your mind to bear the affliction, and give your mind less to your own worries and more to those of others.

PEACOCK.—The Bachelor of Arts hood is black, trimmed with white fur, the London University having instead an edging inside of russet brown silk. The B.A. of Oxford is black corded silk, with white fur border. The B.A. of Cambridge is a more ample hood of black stuff, with a wider border of fur. Purple is generally the sign of a Durham degree.

J. BROW.—The date, 1575, fixes it as a silver coin of Elizabeth. We suppose it is a shilling; you do not mention whether milled or hammered.

INCOME TAX.—We suppose the only way would be to pay, and then recover it. You can go to the office nearest you and see the commissioners. The address will be given on your paper.

K. T. means the order of the Thistle or of St. Andrew, an ancient Scottish order of knighthood, instituted by James VII. of Scotland and II. of England, May 29, 1687. It fell into abeyance in the Reigns of William and Mary, but was revived by Queen Anne 31st December, 1703. The ribbon is green. Many historians believe the order was first instituted by Acharus I. of Scotland, 809, when that monarch made an alliance with Charlemagne, and then took for his device the thistle. James V. was probably the real founder in 1540, and when he died in 1542, the order was discontinued about the time of the Reformation. It then consisted of the king and twelve knights, in imitation of Christ and His apostles; it now consists of sixteen knights.

ADELIN E.—You could make inquiries at the War Office. Every soldier can be traced there, of course.

G.O.P. IN CO. CORK.—1. "Joaquin" Miller is right; he was born in 1841, and is still living. 2. We fear we cannot help you to obtain originality of thought.

H. A. P.—Decoration Day, May 30th, in the United States, means that on that day the graves of those who fell in the Civil War are decorated, whether known or unknown graves, and of both parties.

OCTAVIA.—We see no reason why your friend should not go with you and stay in the same lodgings; you are the chaperone in that case, of course.

AUTUMN IVY.—Your writing is good enough for any such employment. You would have to advertise or answer an advertisement in some daily paper.

OLIVE.—If they give you pleasure to write, let that be enough. Poetry, like all other things worth doing, needs study, and also genius.

TUNBRIDGE.—The subject of age does not seem to need consideration. At thirty you certainly know your own mind, and your own temper also, and if your lover be a good-tempered, kind and religious man, we do not see why you should decline.

SWEET VIOLET.

A SISTER'S TRIBUTE TO A SISTER.

SHE was so shy! No stranger saw
Her baby fun, her witching gaze;
In mother's gown she hid her eyes
When she detailed her "pretty ways."

A quiet child in company,
Not swift to talk, nor laugh, nor sing;
She shrank from notice or display,
And fonder still to home did cling.

So modest she that none has guessed
The treasure of this maiden's mind—
That she is sunshine of the house,
Glad, gentle, thoughtful, constant, kind.

Her influence sweet is rich perfume,
As that her lowly name-flowers give;
It calms, delights old age and youth,
That in her presence daily live.

Her smile, how bright! We think one morn,
While she looked up in trustful prayer,
A loving seraph kissed her face,
And left a heavenly radiance there.

She shines at home, a heroine,
In duty always to the fore;
Leading us to our home in heaven,
Where love increases evermore.

HOUSEHOLD HARMONY.

*"— by notes of household harmony,
They quite forget their loss of liberty."*

Come then, December, blustering and defiant,
Let thy north-easter sweep o'er hill and plain,
Crashing the limbs of many a woodland giant,
Or driving sleet against the window pane.
We do not heed thy ravings when they reach us
Safe in the shelter kindred hearts provide:
Dear home, where HOUSEHOLD HARMONY shall teach us
To find contentment by the ingle side.

Wondrous the charm when love hath full dominion,
True keynote whence the melody is wrought,
Whether we rise on fancy's airy pinion,
Or rest upon some good and bracing thought.
Stir up the fire! these sunless hours of leisure
May leave most sweet remembrance on their way;
No need to pine for summer's vagrant pleasure
While HOUSEHOLD HARMONY makes winter gay.

HOUSEHOLD HARMONY.

By JAMES AND NANETTE MASON.

HOWEVER much people may dispute about some things, we can hardly imagine anybody calling in question the beauty of a happy home. It does not matter about its being wealthy or aristocratic, so long as it is a sunny spot where one hears for music what Shakespeare calls the "notes of household harmony."

For those who live with that pleasant music in their ears, "East or west, home is best," and there is no smoke like that which goes curling out of their own chimneys. They find by the fireside a haven of refuge against the storms and worries of the world; and when they go out to fight in the battle of life it is with a brave heart, knowing they have such a peaceful nook to which to return. In such a home, too, what a pleasure it is to visit.

"Cheerful looks make every dish a feast,
And 'tis that crowns a welcome."

Such is home as it should be; but it frequently falls out that it is something quite different. To sing "Home, sweet home" in some chimney corners would be nothing but mockery, and in as bad taste as speaking of a rope in the house of a man whose father was hanged. Some homes are simply unbearable. Immediately on entering them you feel you have entered an atmosphere of all that is sulky and sour, discontented and ill-humoured, and that every note struck is a note of discord. The children delight in taking each other down a peg, and as for the father and mother, they are all day long at sixes and sevens, the former perhaps in his own person illustrating the proverb that "He fasts enough whose wife scolds all dinner time."

Of course in many cases an attempt is made to conceal the real state of affairs, just as in "Happy Arcadia," when the cry was raised "Here's a stranger coming!" they used to pick up their pipes and hug their sheep, and pretend to be very contented, when they were all the time yawning their heads off with weariness and vexation. But such make-believe can only impose on the unobserving. Love and a cough, they say, won't hide, and neither will domestic disagreement. A thousand little signs betray it and show that love is absent, and without love, girls, home is little better than a wild beast's den—a place to sleep and eat in.

A home of discord may be visited by acquaintances, but its doors are never likely to be knocked at by friends. Sensible people will give it a wide berth, and prefer friendship and intimacy with those who live at peace. Nobody finds a wise young man courting a girl in a family who get on ill among themselves. He wants a bird out of a good nest, and has no wish to be drawn in by marriage to take one side or other of a lifelong fireside feud. It is hard on a girl, you say. Sometimes. But about the young man's sagacity there can be no question whatever.

If all homes were happy what a pleasant world it would be; and there is no reason why happiness should not reign everywhere, if people would only make wisdom, and not stupidity, the guide of their lives. When people are miserable it is in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred nobody's fault but their own.

An Emperor of China was once travelling through his realm, and he came upon a family in which the grandfather, with his wives—he had several of them—his children, grandchildren, sons-in-law, daughters-in-law, and servants, all lived under the same roof in perfect peace and harmony. The Emperor was so struck with this, that he asked the old man by what means he contrived to avoid quarrels and disputes, and to have his large family live together so pleasantly. Taking out a pencil he wrote in reply these words—"Patience and Common Sense." That was the whole secret. An easy one to remember, but hard, especially with some natures, to put in practice.

What strikes one as an odd thing is that many are able to exercise patience and common sense abroad, but find it a next to impossible task at home. With them everything is done for the benefit of society at large, and at the expense of their own little circle. In other people's houses they have a face like a benediction, whilst in their own it is disfigured with frowns. Of all follies, this is one of the greatest. As if it were not their interest, let alone their duty, to do exactly the reverse. If anyone has a mind to be cross, snappish, and disagreeable, let her choose a field for giving vent to ill-humour as far removed from home as possible. Our best side should be turned not to strangers but to those with whom we dwell, and whilst it is right to wish for the good opinion of everybody, we should be anxious most of all about the favourable impression we make on our own folks at home. Of the whole tribe of girls give us her whose brothers and sisters call, and with good reason, an angel.

We have duties to perform abroad, but we can never do these rightly if we start by neglecting what we owe to our own relations, and acting as if we believed that good works, kindness, gentleness, and good humour ought to begin at any place rather than at home. This is inverting the natural order of things, and is a proceeding to be looked for only from foolish people.

If there is to be household harmony, an important point is to cultivate a sweet temper. We cannot do without that. Some tempers are like violin strings out of tune; with them, who can expect either melody or harmony from the family orchestra? This is specially a young woman's subject; indeed, if our girls are not amiable, nobody else can be expected to be. It is to their kind and gentle words that we must look for an antidote to fretting and ill-humour. At home the keynote of the day's music is often struck by the first word we hear in the morning, and happy is that house where it is always uttered by the smiling lips of good-tempered girls.

Amiable daughters make estimable wives. Speaking of married women, a well-known author says, "No trait of character is more valuable in a woman than sweet temper. Home can never be happy without it. It is like the flowers that spring up in our pathway, reviving and cheering us. Let a man go home at night, wearied and worn by the toils of the day, and how soothing is a word dictated by a good disposition. It is sunshine falling on his heart. He is happy, and the cares of life are forgotten."

Even the worst of husbands are to be won over by proper management to promote harmony at home. In fact, one might almost go so far as to say, that when discord reigns in any house, the blame of it is to be traced in most instances to the conduct of the spindle side of the family. The art of managing a husband was neatly put by an English divine many years ago. A woman came one day and told him, with an air of secrecy, that her husband was unkind to her, and she added, "I know you to be a wise man, and am sure you can tell me what will cure him." "The remedy is simple," said the divine. "Always treat your husband with a smile."

The woman thanked him, dropped a curtsy, and went away. A few months after she came again, bringing a couple of fine fowls, which she asked the minister to accept, "because," said she, "the recipe you gave me has completely cured my husband."

Another hint for wives is contained in an answer made by a lady to one who asked her by what secret she had always had such a happy home, and preserved the attention and affection of her husband. "It is," she answered, "in doing everything that pleases him, and by bearing patiently everything that does not please me." Like the other, hers was the smiling system.

It always takes two to make a quarrel, and this plain truth should be kept in mind by those who wish to promote household harmony. Resist the temptation to speak back and there will be no quarrelling. "The good wife," says Fuller, "never crosseth her husband in the spring tide of his anger, but stays till it be ebbing water." And what Fuller says of wives and their husbands is equally applicable to sisters and brothers.

Nothing comes easier than quarrelling. Only utter a few proud, domineering, unreasonable, or angry words, and the thing is done. What is really difficult is the reconciliation. Even when both parties are willing to be friends again, pride makes it a hard matter, and unthought-of accidents will sometimes occur to convert one misunderstanding into a thousand. A wise father when on his deathbed made his children promise that if ever they quarrelled among themselves they would always do so in a whisper, and ever after no one could quarrel in that family for laughing. A whisper is the proper tone in which to make disputes ridiculous.

Besides cultivating sweet tempers, if people are to get on well together in one house, they must be loyal to each other. Looking too much after number one is the cause of countless disagreements. Relations have many interests in common, and they can by no possibility get on together unless they recognise that fact, and in all their dealings treat each other's affairs as their own. There must be mutual confidence or a family very soon falls to pieces; indeed, without it, strangers are to be preferred to relations. When people are selfish, jealous, and grasping, the smaller the household the better; but when they are the reverse, then the more the merrier and the better every way.

Household harmony is often marred by members of the family having a fling at each other's trifling faults and peculiarities. When people are imperfect themselves this is a common way of airing their ill-nature. Now we ought to make kindly allowance for others, and especially for those with whom we live. There is no getting on pleasantly without that, and even in presence of very aggravating ways it is best to shut our eyes and be struck with convenient blindness.

One of the worst foes to household harmony is a mania for arguing. Where this is present farewell to concord. Take the subject of politics for example, and would that that were the only one. How often even have discussions on religious dogma by those who gladly profess themselves the servants of the Prince of Peace disturbed the peace of the fireside! The more bitter the controversy the more the parties should be ashamed of themselves. In many instances they will be found squabbling merely for the support of a set of opinions they have adopted from whim or accident, and not from conviction following inquiry. They utter, perhaps, the most extravagant reproaches on each other's want of fairness and common sense in words hard to forgive and impossible to forget, as if sound judgment were the monopoly of any set of persons whatever. It is a sensible maxim that disputes which are likely never to end, had better have no beginning, and another saying we may well carry with us if we have any inclination for argument is, that hearts may well agree though heads differ.

Idleness is as objectionable as argument. Relations, however near and however nice, may be too much together, and it is a wise plan for promoting harmony to have everyone so fully occupied that no time is left for worrying others under the same roof. As an example of a busy, happy, domestic circle, no one we ever read of is more charming than that of Sir Thomas More, the famous Chancellor. He lived at Chelsea, surrounded by a numerous family, including his wife, his son, and his son's wife, his three daughters and their husbands with eleven grandchildren. In his house, says Erasmus, "there is none, man or woman, but readeth or studieth the liberal arts, yet is their chief care of piety. There is never any seen idle; the head of the house governs it not by a lofty carriage, and oft rebukes, but by gentleness and amiable manners. Every member is busy in his place performing his duty with alacrity; nor is sober mirth wanting."

Pounds, shillings, and pence enter into most questions, so it is not surprising to find that there is a financial aspect to household harmony. Life that is a continual fight with poverty is often wanting in fireside enjoyment, for few people have a fancy for dancing to the tune of little in the cupboard and nothing in the savings bank. This is as good as a hint to be provident and live within our income, whatever that may be, so that we may never have any reasonable cause for anxiety about making both ends meet. Wise economy produces fine social music everywhere, and girls may well think of this when tempted to be extravagant and squeeze money out of their father's purse when times are bad and profits small.

A number of other points might be mentioned, but there is no need for making a short story long, and expanding to weariness the old Chinaman's rule of patience and common sense. One more point, however, ought to be mentioned. There can be no household harmony without good domestic management. Home must be made comfortable, and the fireside bright and attractive, or people cannot enjoy themselves there. In fact, if wives and daughters do not bestir themselves to make their woman's empire all it should be, husbands and brothers will be found to promote household silence by staying away as much as possible.

Of all branches of domestic management nothing assists harmony like cookery. To promote cheerfulness and a festival spirit, just try the music of the tea-kettle and frying-pan. An old woman once told a married lady that to manage her husband she had but to feed him well, and that home happiness would be only found to rest securely on the solid basis of roast beef and Yorkshire pudding. This is a material view of things, but we must not overlook it, even whilst doing our best to promote household harmony by nobler means.

ONLY A SERVANT.

By RUTH LAMB.

CHAPTER I. COLD COMFORT.

ON'T fret so, Miss Joyce. It grieves me to see you, and crying never yet cured heart-ache. When things are at the worst they mend; and if so, better days must be at hand for you."

The speaker, Sarah Keene, was a homely-looking, rather hard-featured woman of fifty, evidently a servant, for she was busily engaged in ironing some dainty laces and muslin. But while her features were rugged, they were expressive of good sense and full of affectionate sympathy.

The Miss Joyce to whom she spoke had just entered the laundry and thrown herself on an old chair, where she was weeping bitterly. She was a girl of nearly twenty-one years of age, above the middle height, slender and graceful, and with one of those faces which attract even amongst many with far greater pretensions to beauty.

Joyce's features were not faultless, or her complexion of alabaster fairness, which last would be very unpleasant were it possible in a healthy girl. But her large, dark eyes were richly fringed with long lashes, whilst her broad, clear brow was framed by chestnut hair, which lay in soft, wavy masses on her shapely head. The expression of her face, though sad, was singularly sweet and winsome.

That Joyce Mirlees was a thorough lady could be told by a glance, though her gown was of coarse, common, black stuff, and its scanty crape trimmings were of the poorest description. It was unrelieved even by a simple linen collar. Only a band of the crape edged the throat, and ornaments she had none.

Yet the house in which the girl lived was the dwelling of wealthy people. The great rooms teemed with costly furniture and all the exquisite accessories which money could supply. The grounds were extensive and tastefully laid out, the stables were well filled, and luxurious vehicles of many kinds were at the command of the master and mistress of The Chase, as the place was named.

In the drawing-room three ladies were seated. They wore mourning dresses, but these differed widely from the poor garment which was thought good enough for Joyce Mirlees. Everything that could make mourning rich, tasteful, and handsome had been done to set off the portly person of Mrs.

Walter Evans and the slenderer figures of her two handsome daughters. A few moments later, however, have shown to any stranger that only the semblance of refinement existed in Mrs. Evans. Wealth she had in abundance. She was the daughter of a successful speculator, and for her wealth alone had Walter Evans sought her as his wife. He gained this, but paid dearly for it.

Though he was a man of birth and education, he had bound himself to a woman who possessed neither, and who was equally deficient in the amiability and goodness of disposition which might have done much to make amends for a lack of the rest.

Mrs. Evans was equally vulgar and purse-proud. She did not hesitate to put her husband in mind of his indebtedness to her wealth, or even to hint that she might have bestowed it and herself better than upon him.

Brought up under such a mother, it was scarcely likely that the girls, Adelaide and Augusta, would be noted for refinement or delicacy of feeling. Taught to pride themselves on wealth, they owned no excellence if unaccompanied by it. Consequently they only bestowed a contemptuous pity on their cousin, Joyce Mirlees, who, through adverse circumstances, had been driven to accept the temporary shelter of The Chase.

It had been grudgingly granted by Mrs. Evans "until something could be done with the girl," because there was absolutely nowhere else for her to go.

Joyce, though the only daughter of Mr. Evans' only sister, was not likely to be welcomed by a lady who owned that there was "nothing she detested like poor relations."

True the girl came from a comparatively poor home, a little country vicarage, of which and of her father she had been the light and joy, until death called him and left her alone.

Mrs. Evans said bitter things on the occasion.

"It is monstrous for people of small means to marry when there is no prospect of their providing for a family. I call it wicked, and one sees the most of this improvidence where we ought to look for a better example, amongst the poor clergy. But I suppose your brother-in-law reckoned on his daughter being provided for here."

Mrs. Evans said this to her husband, and his reply did not improve her temper.

"You are mistaken, my dear. Poor Mirlees had saved a few hundreds, and having noted how rapidly some people managed to turn hundreds into thousands, he unfortunately invested them in a bubble company and lost every penny. Some of the shareholders were more fortunate. You will remember the company," and Mr. Evans named one of which his wife's father had been a director and by which he had netted a large sum.

Mrs. Evans' face flushed, but she answered—

"It requires business men to deal with business matters, and clergymen ought to content themselves with what they understand."

"True; poor Mirlees paid with his life for his meddling. But after all, it is by these poor, foolish, unbusiness-like men that the clever ones make their money."

"At any rate we shall be expected to do something for this girl, though why prudent people should pay for the folly and rashness of others is more than I can understand. My children shall not be impoverished for such a purpose. It would not be scriptural to encourage improvidence, and in a clergyman, too. I thought that sermon last Sunday on the text, 'If any provide not for his own house he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel,' was thoroughly to the purpose. I never heard one that touched me more. It was so appropriate to present circumstances."

Mrs. Evans was like many others who, when wishing to justify what conscience tells them is wrong, fly to the Bible to see if they can find a text to justify the course they are taking.

She wanted to cheat conscience into expressing approval, and thought she had succeeded when she shook her head in pious horror over Mr. Mirlees' misdoings. She would not see, or at any rate own, that in the man's very anxiety to do what she blamed him for not having done, he had lost the poor pittance hoarded by years of close economy, and his life as well.

When Mr. Evans named these facts, his wife interrupted him by asking—

"Where was the use of saving and pinching if the man must throw it all away at last?"

"His was an error of judgment," replied Mr. Evans.

"An error of judgment! If my poor papa had committed such errors, I wonder where I should be now."

Mrs. Evans said "I," but the look at her husband meant "you," and was intended to remind him of his indebtedness.

Mr. Evans' face flushed. Often as he had heard similar words, he could never become indifferent to such, and winced at each repetition. Sometimes there would be a scene, or he occasionally retorted sharply, but Mrs. Evans conquered by her persistent ill temper, and after days of discomfort, sullenness, and either taunts or silence, peace would be made and last for a little while.

"LOOKING AS GLAD AND HAPPY AS POSSIBLE."

On this occasion, Mr. Evans felt the need for diplomacy. Joyce Mirlees must come to The Chase with the consent of its mistress; so he was fain to assent to his wife's praise of her father's business qualities, to pass over her taunts without notice, and thus he gained his end—after a fashion. Joyce was to come until work of some kind could be found for her under another roof.

The Misses Evans expressed their opinion that Joyce would be fit for nothing.

"She will not suit for a governess," said Augusta, who was a brilliant pianist. "Music is an essential, and Joyce can neither play nor sing fit to be heard."

Adelaide enumerated a number of other accomplishments which her cousin did not possess, and concluded with, "I suspect if she once gets a footing here we shall have her on our hands altogether."

Mrs. Evans only looked a reply, but it expressed a very emphatic dissent to this last remark.

"Must we wear mourning? Mr. Mirlees, as papa's brother-in-law, could hardly be called a relation."

"I fear we must, Augusta. It is very provoking, but society will demand this of us," said the mother.

"And we have chosen all our spring things."

"This year's fashions are too lovely," sighed Adelaide.

These girls had shed no tears for Mr. Mirlees, none in sympathy with the young creature whom death had left desolate. But their tears flowed freely at the thought of the cruel exigencies of society which demanded the sacrifice of becoming gowns and bonnets, since their shapes and styles would be too old-fashioned for such devotees of the latest modes to wear again when they would be able to put off "that odious mourning."

Such were the people and the home to whom and which Joyce Mirlees came after her father's death.

The girl knew enough of her aunt and cousins to prevent her from expecting much tenderness or sympathy; but she was pained, and her uncle annoyed, to find that they were all out when she arrived at The Chase, though Mrs. Evans knew well at what time to expect the travellers.

There was, however, one warm heart ready to welcome Joyce. This was Sarah Keene, once her nurse. This woman had gone, widowed and childless, having lost her own husband and babe within a few days of each other, to be foster-mother to the child of Mrs. Mirlees, she being delicate and unable to rear her little one without such help.

All through Joyce's baby days Sarah used to say: "Nobody knows the blessing this child is to me. When I hold her in my arms I almost forget that I have lost my own, or look on her as having been given me for a while instead of my own little Katie, who was only a month older."

Some years later, Mr. Mirlees insisted on obtaining a situation for Sarah at The Chase, Mrs. Evans being willing to give high wages to one so trustworthy.

Sarah always protested that she was turned out of her old home. "I'd rather have served Mr. Mirlees and my darling for nothing. But they turned me out, 'for my good,' they said."

When Joyce arrived at The Chase, Sarah rushed to meet her foster-child, and whispered, as well as her tears would allow her—

"I see now what I could never understand before. I could not believe I was sent here for my good; but I believe it now, darling. I was sent before, in a little way like Joseph was to do good to them that sold him for a slave. And I can be of use to you, though I'm only a servant."

To Joyce the clasp of those loving arms was indescribably comforting, and she found that Sarah was the only person on whom she could rely for open, hearty sympathy.

Her uncle wished to show it, but a mark of affection on his part was sure to call for the opposite on the side of his wife, who seemed resolved that a bare shelter should be all that Joyce should have under her roof.

The orphan girl was soon weary of her position, and, writhing under the slights she had received, would have been thankful to earn her bread by any honest means rather than continue to receive what was so grudgingly bestowed. She wished to please Mrs. Evans and to gain the affection of her cousins, but every effort seemed vain. Had there been young children in the house her time would have been occupied, but there were none. Her cousins desired no such companion as herself, and, as Mr. Evans' niece, she could not very well be entirely ignored. But there was a tacit understanding between mother and daughters that Joyce should be "kept in her place," whilst Joyce herself, with a sore heart and memories of a happy, if comparatively humble, home, vainly wished that she had any definite place to fill and work to do.

CHAPTER II.

MEMORIES AND PLANS.

HAVE not a friend here but you, Sarah. I must leave this miserable place," said Joyce, between her sobs.

"The master is your friend, darling. He loves you."

"What can he do? He is worse off than I am. How can he bear my aunt's taunts about money and all she has brought him? If I were a man I would—"

"If you were a married man with a wife and daughters, you would not find it easy to run away from your home ties, though they may feel a little tight sometimes. And what could you do, dearie, if you left The Chase?"

"That is my trouble, Sarah. I would go as a governess, but they all make game, and sneer at the idea of such a thing. I am not accomplished, and people seem to advertise only for ladies who know everything. Servants with clever fingers like yours are much better off than the half-taught children of gentlemen. They get good wages and are so independent. They generally spend a great deal on clothes, but they are not obliged to do. Do you think anyone would take me as a nursemaid? Not to tiny babies. I could not attend to them, though I should dearly love it, for I have never been amongst them. But I could look after older children, and I can sew well."

"What! go as a servant. Only a servant! Oh, Miss Joyce, if the master could know!"

Sarah lifted her hands in horror, but Joyce said—

"If he could tell me what course to take, knowing all, he would say I was doing right; right to take any honest work whereby I might earn my bread. Right to undertake only what I am qualified to do."

"Well then, darling, say nursery governess."

"Sarah, I have looked the papers through for weeks, and I have read plenty of advertisements of ladies offering to take such places for nothing but a home. They do not always get them, for the advertisements are repeated again and again. Now I cannot go for nothing, for I need clothes and I have not much money. But plenty of people offer good wages for nurses, so I will go as a nurse, if anyone will have me. My clothes will do for a servant, though they are not nearly so good as yours, Sarah."

The girl glanced down at her poor, coarse, black gown and burst into tears. It had been bought only as a makeshift, in the small country town near her old home, and her uncle had said, "Your aunt will see that you are properly provided as soon as we reach The Chase. She would not care for Welton dressmaking or materials."

But this first purchase proved the only one. When Mr. Evans said that Joyce would need other and better dresses, he was answered promptly enough.

"Joyce will not be expected to dress like my daughters. Remember, I have already had double expenses, owing to Mr. Mirlees' death having taken place just after I had bought everything in coloured dresses for the season. So if your niece wants finery, it will not come out of my pocket."

As to Adelaide and Augusta, they were far too eager for admiration to be sorry that their young cousin should appear at a disadvantage even in the matter of dress material. In appearance, accomplishments—in fact, in all that could attract attention—they considered her immeasurably below them.

Thus Joyce was shut out of society by lack of suitable clothing when she had little inclination for it, and when during her first days of sorrow she cared only for quiet and sympathy. Of the former she had enough as the months went by, and for the latter she had to go to Sarah Keene, as on the present occasion.

"Your uncle would never agree to your taking such a place, Miss Joyce."

"I shall be twenty-one in a month, Sarah, and my own mistress. I have money enough to take me to a good distance from The Chase, for I have not spent a penny that I could help. My uncle would have given me more, but I could not take it, since it would have really been out of Mrs. Evans' pocket. I have already advertised, and I have four answers. One seems likely to suit, but I shall need a character."

The girl uttered the last word somewhat scornfully, but Sarah, with her usual good sense, replied—

"Of course you will. What mother would trust her most precious jewels to a stranger without knowing anything about her? The nurse comes next to the mother herself with young children, and she cannot be too particular about the character of one."

"My pride spoke, Sarah. We were so respected at Welton, though we were really poor people," replied Joyce, softly.

"Aye, darling. As Mrs. Evans will not be if she live to a hundred. I can just think I see you, as you went through the snow to church only last Christmas morning. You were looking as glad and happy as possible, for you knew that many a home would be bright that day, and many a table spread with plenty through what you had done."

"I had given very little, Sarah. I had not much to give."

"Not in money, dearie. But gold and silver are not everything. You had put in your little in that way, and a great deal that was more precious still—time and work. You had walked many a mile and pleaded for the poor with the rich, and induced them to give what you could not. And who could withstand you? Not those who had spent your life amongst."

"Sarah, they were all as willing to give as possible."

"Aye. Their giving was pretty easy work in most cases; they went without nothing, and would never miss their guineas because they cost them no self-denial. There are lots of people who put their hands into their pockets and think they do a great deal, when they give a gold piece out of a full purse. But if they had to go without something in order to spare the guinea it would not be given. Catch your aunt or the young ladies going with a pair of gloves the less, to save a poor creature from starvation. Well, the mistress did me a kindness in letting me have my holidays at Welton last Christmas, but then it was because there was no work for me at The Chase, seeing they were wintering abroad."

"She gave you a whole month, Sarah, and it was delightful to have you at our house."

"Yes, and it saved the mistress four weeks' board wages she must have paid me if I had been at The Chase. I can see round a corner, dearie, though you cannot always. Never mind, it was a happy, blessed Christmas, and worth more than a year's wages to be with my own precious nursing."

The tears were streaming down Joyce's cheeks as she thought of that last Christmas in the one true home of her life.

"I little thought," she said; then stopped, unable to continue.

"No more did any of us. Well, your father acted for the best, and you have happy years to look back on—years when you made poor homes brighter, and cheered downcast souls with words of love and hope. Now you must think of this. You are not forgotten at Welton. Everyone loves you there; but they don't know how you are fixed. Depend on it they say, 'What a good thing it was that Miss Joyce had a grand rich uncle to take care of her when her father died.' They pray for you, and look to see you again some day. Better still, God never forgets. Think of this, my darling, you who cared for God's poor to the very outside of your power. He will care for you and repay you. As surely as the harvest follows seed-time, so surely will you in His good time receive full measure back for what you have meted out to others."

"I know, Sarah, I know. I am wrong to doubt; but everything is so different here. There is no love for me."

"Yes, darling, there is God's love, and there is your uncle's, I know, to say nothing of mine. I am only your old nurse, but you have all the best love of my heart, for who have I beside?"

"I am wickedly, horribly unthankful, both to God and the one friend to whom I can open my heart. I might speak to my uncle, but I do not care to make him feel more troubled on my account. About my character there will be no difficulty. Mrs. Caruth of Fernslough will answer all inquiries."

"Is she home, dearie? She was abroad somewhere when your father was taken."

"Yes; but she returned. I heard from her ten days ago. I have told her just enough to show her that The Chase will never be a home for me. She urges me to go to her for a long visit, and says that, being alone, my presence would cheer her greatly."

"Then why not go, darling?"

"Because this invitation is really an offer of a home, very delicately made; but I could not again eat the bread of dependence, Sarah. Beside, fancy my meeting the guests at Fernslough in such attire as this."

"But you can have anything if you will let me get you thirty or fifty pounds of my savings. You may take all I have for that matter, only you would not need that, I know."

Joyce threw her arms round Sarah's neck and kissed her passionately.

"Bless you and thank you a thousand times," she cried. "But I would not rob you of your hard earnings for the world. Do you think when the relations on whom I have a claim care nothing about my clothes, I could bear to spend on myself what you have earned by years of toil?"

Sarah warmly returned the embrace, saying as she did so—

"You can have no such claim on anyone as on the woman who nourished you as a baby. I would give my life for you, and what are a few pounds compared to that?"

"I need no money, Sarah, or I would owe the help to you sooner than to anyone in the world. I have plenty of clothes, neat and simple, and such as I wore at Welton. They will last for a couple of years."

"They are not black, dearie."

"No matter. The one mourning suit will do for Sundays, and light printed gowns will befit a nurse-girl. I have turned one white muslin into aprons, which will do beautifully over my two plain cashmere frocks. As to the outside mourning, what does it mean in many cases? My aunt and cousins are wearing what they call mourning for my father, gowns of costly material laden with crape and jet. Did they put it on because they cared for my father? No, Sarah; and they long to throw it off as soon as they think society would see them do it without remark. One day when my aunt was specially kind, she said: 'These gowns will come in for you, Joyce, when my girls have done with them.' I should not have minded wearing them, if only my aunt had offered them in real kindness. But my mourning is no matter of outside show. Why should I care about externals? My Father in heaven knows."

"But stay a while at Fernslough, darling. Mrs. Caruth was always fond of you."

"Always most kind. But I cannot go there of all places in the world."

These last words were uttered with an emphasis which Sarah could not help noticing. She looked up from her ironing with an inquiring expression, but Joyce had turned away her head. She noted, however, that a crimson flush had spread even over the fair neck of her nursing, and she wondered, but said nothing. Joyce, too, remained silently gazing out of the window; but when she at length turned Sarah noted traces of tears on her cheeks, though she began to speak cheerfully enough and to unfold her plans more fully.

"I have settled about clothes. I have enough money for my journey, and a little to spare. On the strength of Mrs. Caruth's recommendation, Mrs. Ross of Springfield Park is willing to engage me as the personal attendant of her two little girls, aged four and six years. I shall have no menial work, and the mother regards her children's nurse as of a rank above her kitchen maid, and does not insist on caps."

"Oh, Miss Joyce. That I should live to hear you speak like that!" said Sarah, in a tone of deep distress.

"Be comforted, dear old nurse and kindest of friends. Honest labour has with it far more of dignity than dependence with idleness. Earned bread will taste sweet. The dainties here are always bitter, no matter how delicately flavoured. And now I shall tell you no more, and when the time comes for questioning, you can answer truly that you do not know where I am. This much you shall know. Mrs. Caruth's own maid, whom you have seen many a time, will meet me when I leave this house, and accompany me to the station nearest to my place of service. I will not tell you the name of it, or of the town next to Springfield Park, but it will comfort you to feel that the old friend of my parents insists on sending this good woman to travel with me. When I am at my journey's end she will return. Now you know all that I can tell you, and you may trust me that my uncle shall not be long kept in suspense as to my safety and whereabouts. Mrs. Caruth has undertaken to enlighten him. She does blame me for my pride in refusing to go to her, not for finding dependence unbearable or for wishing to earn my own bread. But she cares for me because I am my father's daughter, and is resolved to shield me from the possibility of harsh judgments, by providing me with a temporary attendant."

"I can only say, may God bless and guard you, my darling. And mind, if you want me, I will come to you at any time, night or day, for only a word."

CHAPTER III:

HER OWN MISTRESS.

JOYCE had always plenty of time to herself, for when aunt and cousins were out driving or visiting she had to choose between solitary walks in the grounds or the society of Sarah Keene and a seat beside her ironing-table, her uncle being often from home.

"The carriage is not comfortable with more than three in it," Mrs. Evans would say, when her daughters accompanied her. If only one of these went, and Mr. Evans suggested that Joyce should make a third, he was told, "Your niece has not been used to a carriage. Why spoil her by accustoming her to luxuries she is not likely to possess in future?"

"How do you know? Joyce may marry well. She is sweet-looking and a good girl, who would be a treasure worth the winning to a man who had sense enough to prefer worth to money."

Mr. Evans made this remark without the slightest intention of paining his wife, but it called forth derisive words from his younger daughter in reference to Joyce and an angry response from Mrs. Evans.

"Of course your penniless niece is more charming than my daughters. But Joyce Mirlees shall be taught to know her place, and find something better to do than to idle her time in gossiping with a servant."

"Your niece, my house, my daughters."

Mr. Evans did not say these words, but as he repeated them to himself, a picture came to mind, and words from the most touching of all parables spoke to his heart.

"The forgiving father spoke of the penitent prodigal on his home-coming as, 'my son who was dead and is alive again,' and to the elder who had never strayed as, 'thy brother.' But this last had no thought of tenderness for him who lost all and had returned hungry, penniless, destitute. It was not 'my brother' with him, but 'thy son.' Poor Joyce! Homeless, orphaned, hungering just for love, is nothing to my wife but 'your niece,' when she speaks of her to me. Three days hence will be her twenty-first birthday, too; she came here in March, and this is nearly the end of June. I thought that a girl so sweet in herself must win the goodwill of my wife and girls, but all she has received is a bare shelter, grudgingly permitted rather than given during three weary months."

When Joyce's birthday morning came there were no costly gifts for her such as her cousins were accustomed to receive. Mrs. Evans remarked coldly—

"So it is your birthday, Joyce. Of course, we all wish you many happy returns of it."

Her cousins echoed "Of course" as they seated themselves at the breakfast table, and Joyce replied, "Thank you."

"And you are actually twenty-one," said Mrs. Evans. "I suppose you would expect a present of an ornamental kind, but under the circumstances something useful will be better. The girls are going to leave off mourning entirely now. Three months is quite long enough for a mere connection by marriage, and many people would not wear it more than half the time."

"Many would not wear it at all, unless——" Joyce began a sentence but could not finish it, for her heart was too full to permit her to continue without breaking down utterly.

"Unless the connection had lived quite near them and everyone knew of it. Was that what you were going to say?" asked Mrs. Evans.

"No; I meant something very different, but I will not trouble you with it now. Only please do not think I expected any present. I neither looked nor wished for any."

"But you are going to have one," replied Mrs. Evans, in an unusually gracious tone. "As I said, my girls are leaving off their mourning, and I intend you to have their simpler dresses. Black silks and satins they will not part with. Those are useful always, but their worst are of beautiful material and——"

"Quite too good for me," said Joyce.

"No, no. They will look very nice, but not too handsome. Russell will show you how to alter them and you can sit in her room so as to be near whilst you are at work. Afterwards, I have no doubt you will be glad to render a little assistance in remodelling some of your cousins' gowns which had to be put aside, in a manner, on your account."

Mrs. Evans thought she had managed a somewhat delicate matter with great tact and success. She had planned to turn Joyce's time and good taste to account on behalf of herself and her daughters, from the first day that the girl, pale and worn with watching and weeping, arrived at The Chase.

There was a red spot on each of Joyce's cheeks which told of inward excitement; but she was outwardly calm as she replied—

"Thank you for offering me these dresses, but I cannot take, and I shall not need them.

Beside, however willing my cousins might be to spare them, Russell will expect to have them when done with. When my one black gown is too bad to wear I shall use those I had before me—I mean what I brought with me from Welton."

"But those are coloured. Respect for your relatives and for society demands that you wear black during, at least, a year, for your father. As to your cousins' dresses, they would not go to Russell whilst nearly as good as new; but I presume your pride will not let you be seen in them, though you have never been used to anything so handsome before."

"The dresses are very good," said Joyce; "but you will not see, and society does not know me. Has not my uncle told you that I am going to leave The Chase?"

"Going to leave! And pray where are you going? It is just like your uncle to know of your plans and say nothing, but I consider it disgraceful of you to act in such an under-hand way, especially after having had such a home as this." And Mrs. Evans waved her hand, as if to indicate that all around her had been as much for Joyce's use and comfort as for her own.

"I do not want to seem ungrateful," replied the girl. "I have been sheltered here, and I have had far more dainty food than I needed, and been surrounded with so many more beautiful things than my eye was ever accustomed to before. Yet, forgive me for saying it, I have not been happy. Nobody loves me, nobody wants me here, and I am very lonely. Perhaps if my cousins and I had seen a good deal of each other when we were children, it would have been different; but I was really almost a stranger when I came. I hoped they would have liked me, but being relations, always at a distance from each other, is not like growing up as play-fellows and friends. I suppose people cannot like each other just because they wish to do, and Adelaide and Augusta have so many friends of their own without me. So I thought it would be better for me to try and obtain a situation—and work for my bread. I should like to feel that I have a place to fill and something to do, to know that I am wanted, if only by little children. I have obtained a situation to which I shall go in two days. My uncle knows about it, but he only heard the particulars just before he was called from home so suddenly yesterday, and I suppose he had not time to tell you. He does not blame me for wishing to be independent of help, and owe my livelihood to my own exertion. He has always been very good to me."

The girl's voice trembled a little at this allusion to her uncle, but Mrs. Evans showed no sign of sympathy. She sat and listened with the frigid manner which she deemed dignified and becoming, and Joyce continued—

"I once thought of leaving The Chase unknown even to him, but afterwards I felt sorry and ashamed that I could have entertained such an idea for a moment. I am sure I should never have carried it out, though I was going to ask a friend to tell him at once."

"And pray may I ask how you obtained this situation?"

"By advertising. I had several answers. I needed a recommendation, and the old true friend of my father and mother, Mrs. Caruth, of Fernslough, gave me one, after having urged me to accept a home with her for an indefinite period. No one else has had a finger in my arrangements."

"MRS. ROSS SENT A NOTE A LITTLE LATER."

For the first time Mrs. Evans manifested something like interest in Joyce's explanation, and at the mention of Mrs. Caruth's name, significant glances were exchanged between her and her second daughter, the one who most resembled her in appearance and disposition.

"I should have thought the fact of your being Mr. Evans' niece would have been recommendation enough. Pray what kind of situation have you engaged to fill? I must say, however, that had you wished to be useful to those who have the first claim upon you, I have just indicated a way in which you could be so, and without leaving The Chase."

"I am afraid I should make a poor assistant to your maid, as I have not learned dress-making," replied Joyce, with quivering lips. "I did not mention my uncle's name or yours in applying for the situation I am engaged to fill. I am going to attend on two little children."

"Teach them I presume, you mean?"

"Not exactly. I shall try to teach them, but I shall really be their maid. You always told me that I was not fit for a governess, because I was so different from my cousins. A nursery governess's duties would take in too much, so I resolved to be 'only a servant.'"

Mr. Evans' voice rose to a positive shriek as she replied—

"I am thankful, very thankful, you are no relation of mine, and that though you are my husband's niece you do not bear the same surname. I wash my hands of you." And with a look of combined anger and contempt, Mrs. Evans swept from the room.

She was not wholly sorry in thinking of the decisive step Joyce had taken. It would give her a good excuse for severing all connection with so undesirable a relative. But there was one drawback to her self-gratulation. If any of her fashionable neighbours were to hear that Mr. Evans' niece had taken such a situation, it would be too dreadful. They would not perhaps draw so nice a distinction as she had done, and despite the fact that the connection was only by marriage, Joyce might be regarded as her relative also. There was no getting over the fact that she was first cousin to Adelaide and Augusta.

"If that girl's surname had been the same as ours, I would have taken steps to assume a different one at whatever cost."

"Would you have had us called by your maiden name of Smittles?" asked Augusta, who had followed her mother from the morning room. "I like Evans much better."

Mrs. Evans blushed, for that name was doubly objectionable, and she was most anxious that the fact of her having been Miss Smittles, the daughter of a notoriously unscrupulous speculator, should be forgotten. She said no more about giving up her present surname.

"Do you think," asked Augusta, "that the Mrs. Caruth my cousin spoke of could be the lady whom we met with her son at Mentone last winter? They were delightful people—so refined, and knew everybody that was worth knowing there, and numbers of people we should like to meet here. You remember he had come back invalided from the Soudan, and though he was quite young, about thirty, he had gained great distinction. He was Major Caruth, I think, and his name must have been Alexander, for his mother called him 'Alec.' Everyone liked them both, but we used to think him just a little reserved."

"I thought him extremely polite—quite a model of courtesy, in fact."

"Well, yes, he was, and especially to the elder ladies. But he never showed any marked attention to any of the younger ones. He was the most devoted son possible, and it was quite beautiful to see the manner in which he looked up in his mother's face when she came to his side with that inquiring glance on hers."

"He had nearly died, and he was all she had," replied Mrs. Evans. "Heir to a fine property, I believe. I scarcely think that Mrs. Caruth could be the one Joyce mentioned. Was it likely there would be any intimacy between the daughter of a poor country clergyman and people of position like those Caruths?"

"I do not know. You see clergymen go everywhere."

"But not always their wives and daughters," said Mrs. Evans. "Did you notice the name of the place Joyce's friend lived at? I have the address of those we met at Mentone."

"It was Ferns—something—crag, probably."

"Was it Fernsclough?" said Augusta, eagerly.

"I really believe it was."

"Then the lady is the same. Her place is Fernsclough, Salop."

"Well what of that? Her giving Joyce a character to go out as children's maid puts away the suggestion of intimacy at once. She might do that and never speak to or communicate again with one who was disgracing herself by taking a sort of servant's place."

"Joyce said that Mrs. Caruth wanted her to go to Fernsclough for an indefinite time."

"Perhaps that was an invention, in order to raise herself in our eyes, my dear child. I have seen more of life and character than you have, Augusta."

"I can hardly think that," replied the girl. "I could not imagine Joyce saying an untrue word. She is not that sort of girl. And, mamma, she is my cousin and a lady, though she is not rich. I cannot help feeling sorry for her. If these friends of hers should turn out to be the Caruths we met and at some future time we should see them again, what will they think of us for letting Joyce go?"

"Think, you foolish girl! What can they think? Just that as she was too proud to go to Fernsclough, she was too headstrong to be guided by us, and went her own wilful way. You need not trouble your head about that."

But Augusta was not quite happy in spite of her mother's assurances, and Adelaide was still less so.

CHAPTER IV.

THOUGH ABSENT, NOT FORGOTTEN.

HOUGH Joyce Mirlees' twenty-first birthday brought some clouds and storms, it was not wholly without peace and brightness. More than a dozen letters reached her from various quarters. Her uncle did not forget Joyce; but wrote warmly and lovingly, and promised to be at The Chase before she left it.

Other letters were from old friends at Welton, who did not fail to send birthday greetings and simple gifts to their former pastor's daughter. One packet, containing some beautiful fancy articles, came to her from her Sunday scholars, who had worked them for the dear teacher whose absence they regretted more and more, they said. Yet it was plain that one and all pictured Joyce amongst loving kinsfolk, and amid luxuries of every kind, for they seemed half afraid that their simple tokens of love would look very poor and mean amongst her birthday gifts in her new and splendid home. If those who had bestowed such patient labour on the dainty articles could have seen how Joyce looked at them through gathering tears, but with a glad face, and heard her soft whisper, "Not alone in the world. Not forgotten, though absent, thank God!" they would have been more than repaid.

The very answering of these gave Joyce happy employment during the afternoon. Besides, she had not been without personal greetings. The very servants at The Chase had learned to love their master's orphan niece, who spoke gently and thought of and for them, as they went about their daily duties. They ventured to offer good wishes, and one little country girl begged her to accept a pin-cushion which she had risen earlier to make for Miss Joyce.

There were loving words, too, from Sarah Keene, who alternately rejoiced and wept over her nursing, bewailing her coming departure with one breath, and expressing her firm conviction in the next that it would be overruled for good, and that her darling would be above all of them yet.

There was one more letter not named hitherto, which, though full of kindness, brought some disappointment. The writer, Mrs. Caruth, said all that could be expected from an old and true friend. But there was no other message, though she mentioned casually that her son, being quite well, had rejoined his regiment instead of availing himself of the longer leave at his disposal.

It was still early evening, and Joyce was in her own room, when she heard a light tap at the door, and the words, "May I come in, Cousin Joyce?"

The voice was Adelaide's, but the tone of it was so different from her ordinary one that Joyce could hardly believe her ears. She, however, opened the door and convinced herself that her visitor was indeed Adelaide, the elder and much more beautiful of her two handsome cousins. She also somewhat resembled Mr. Evans in disposition; but, like him, had rarely courage to express her sentiments when they differed from those of her mother and sister.

"May I come in?" she repeated, as she hesitated on the threshold of Joyce's room.

"Certainly. I am glad, very glad, to have you."

"That is kind, cousin Joyce; kinder than I deserve. I am come to make a confession. Joyce, I have been very unkind to you. Will you forgive me?"

"I do not understand. You have done nothing," said Joyce, amazed at the visit, words, and look of her cousin, who had taken her hand, and was holding it between both her own.

"Perhaps I have not done much, after all," she said; "but one has often as much cause to grieve for the not doing what is right and kind as for active unkindness. Cousin Joyce, I have had a revelation to-day. I have had a peep at my own heart and life, and I am dissatisfied with both, especially in connection with yourself. When you spoke to my mother this morning and told her what you were going to do, how you had made up your mind to leave the only relations you have in the world, because under their roof you had a shelter, not a home, I felt so sorry for you, so ashamed for ourselves. It was your birthday morning. You are twenty-one to-day. I was the same four months ago, and then my mother did not know how to lavish enough of costly things upon me. I had cards—works of art that had cost pounds; flowers in profusion, letters, messages, callers, jewellery, finery of all kinds, and a grand evening party given in my honour. And you, cousin Joyce, had nothing but the coldest greeting, and an offer of our second hand and third best clothes. Please let me finish"—for Joyce would have stopped the confession half-way. "I do not know how it was brought about, but I seemed to see everything you had endured under this roof from the day of your coming. No welcome, no sympathy, no home, no friends."

"Yes, my uncle has always been kind, and I have had Sarah Keene. Besides, I was but a stranger who had to win the affection of strangers though they might be relations; and I really believe you care for me after all," cried Joyce, looking up into Adelaide's face and smiling through the tears which her cousin's words had brought to her eyes. "Forgive me, Adelaide. I want forgiveness, too, for I have judged you rather hardly, I am afraid."

"No, you have not. I have never been kind, but I want to be now." And two pairs of arms went out and two girls' lips met for the first time in mutual affection and forgiveness. Then they sat down side by side, each encircling the other with one embracing arm.

"We shall be friends as well as cousins for the future. Until now we have been neither," said Adelaide. "I wish you were not going away, Joyce. If you will stay I will try to make The Chase more of a home to you than it has been. But how can you after what mamma said this morning? I think that proposal about the dresses and your helping to alter ours was too dreadful." And the girl blushed with shame at the recollection.

"I should not have minded about working early and late if you had wanted help and we had worked together," said Joyce. "If anyone here had been ill, I should have thought nothing too much to do for them, night or day. Supposing that my uncle had been poor, and had given me a home with his children, I would have slaved for him and them most cheerfully, and taken care that his kindness should have cost him nothing in the end. But you are all rich and every wish can be gratified; and the thought of being sent to sew under the orders of Russell was—"

"Hush, dear Joyce! I cannot bear it," interposed Adelaide, as she laid her white hand on her cousin's lips. "That alone would have driven you from us, and after what mamma said you cannot stay. Now you must show you have forgiven me by taking this little birthday gift," and drawing a ring case from her pocket, Adelaide tried to place a beautiful ring on Joyce's finger.

"Do not ask me, dear; I cannot take it," said Joyce.

"I bought it myself, and I have so large an allowance that it cost me nothing. I wish it had. The having too much money takes from us the joy of self-sacrifice."

"I cannot take it," repeated Joyce. "How would that diamond look on the hand of a maid to little children? Besides, I have rings that belonged to my mother, if I wished to wear any."

"You have not forgiven me," sighed Adelaide.

"Yes, and I will take a gift, too, and prize it. Spend ten shillings on a little brooch in cut steel, and I will wear it, and never part with it while I live. And give me your likeness; I should like to have it, though I shall always picture your face as it looks to-night."

"You shall have these trifles, Joyce, and I will keep this, no matter how long, until you are willing to wear it." And restoring the ring to its case she put it into her pocket. "Now what else can I do for you?" she asked.

"My uncle breakfasts earlier than you and the rest do. I have been used to pour out his coffee and join him at table. I think he will miss me at first. Will you sometimes breakfast with him?"

"How selfish I have been not to notice this, or care for his loneliness! Rely on me, I will breakfast with him always; unless by some special chance I have been very late up the night before."

"I shall neither be missed nor wanted," said Joyce. "Indeed, I begin to fear I shall soon be forgotten." But she smiled as she said it, for she was glad to think that the father and daughter would be brought together by her own departure.

Then these two girls became more confidential, and Joyce gave her cousin every particular respecting the work she had undertaken, the manner in which she had obtained the situation, and of the fact that Mrs. Caruth was sending her own maid to accompany her on her journey to Springfield Park.

"It seems quite amusing to think that one who is travelling with such an object should be so attended, does it not?" asked Joyce.

Adelaide looked thoughtful, then replied, "Mrs. Caruth must think a great deal about you. Does she understand what you are going to do?"

"I am not sure, but I do know she is my friend. She was almost like a mother to me until I was about seventeen and when I had none of my own. Then—"

"Then what?"

"Her son came home for a time, and she had him, and I became more of a companion to my father."

"I believe I have seen both Mrs. Caruth and her son. Does she call him Alec?"

"Always. He is about thirty-two now. You see I was only nine when he was twenty, and as the child of his old tutor, he made a pet and playfellow of me. It seems strange that we should both be grown up people after a few years."

"He is very fond of his mother, and she of him," said Adelaide. "Indeed, he seems a good, noble-minded man altogether. Augusta thought there was no one like him during the eight weeks we spent at Mentone." A statement which did not appear to give unqualified satisfaction to Joyce, for she paused a moment, then in a constrained voice, though with an attempt at archness, she asked—

"Did Major Caruth think there was no one like Augusta?"

"He neither troubled himself about her nor any other girl. I mean so far as paying special attention went. He was everything that was kind and courteous, but the elder ladies and the children absorbed the larger share of his time, somewhat, I think, to the disgust of the grown-up girls. If I hazarded a guess it would be that he had no heart left to give, and that he was far too noble and true a man to pay unmeaning attentions, which could lead to nothing but regrets and pain for another. I suppose he has no sister, or he would be a model 'brother of girls.'"

"No, but he is a brother of girls for all that. He would be to all such, if circumstances called for his help, what the son of a pure-minded, virtuous Christian mother should be. I know him so well."

Joyce's face was lighted up by a bright, glad look, born of precious memories, but it faded as she said, "I am not likely to meet Major Caruth again. I was Miss Mirlees, and a power at Welton, as the parson's daughter in a country parish always is, you know. Three days hence I shall be 'only a servant.'"

"Joyce, you must give up this plan of yours; I cannot bear to think of it. My father cares for you; I want you at The Chase. Augusta will come over to my side, for she is not nearly so hard as she seems. We have both been carefully educated in selfishness, and even a first step in the right direction costs a great effort. But I can stir her to it, and we will make a combined attack on my mother, who must give in. Say you will stay."

"Not now, dear. But if ever the time should come when I can be sure you all wish for me, or if I am needed by any, I will return."

Adelaide was obliged to be satisfied with this. The girls parted with expressions of affection and pledges of future friendship, and Joyce laid her head on her pillow with a lighter heart than she had done for months past.

Mr. Evans was expected home the evening before his niece was to leave The Chase, but in place of him came a telegram:

"Accident on line. Train delayed, but none injured. Expect me at noon to-morrow."

Joyce was to leave the station at nine, so her uncle would not arrive till after she was gone. Mrs. Evans declined to see her, but sent word that when Joyce came to her senses and was prepared to submit and acknowledge she had done wrong, she might write and say so.

Augusta, doubtless urged thereto by her sister, rose early enough to say farewell to her cousin. Sarah Keene watched her out of sight as well as she could through falling tears, and prayed for a blessing on her head, and Adelaide, bravely mounted beside Joyce in the shabby conveyance which took her and her luggage to the station, whispered cheery words to the very last moment, when, in company with Dobson, Mrs. Caruth's staid waiting woman, she started on her journey.

Moved still further by the new and better feelings just born in her heart, Adelaide declined to drive with Mrs. Evans and Augusta, and went instead to meet her father on his return at noon.

It was a great surprise to Mr. Evans when he saw Adelaide's beautiful face glowing with eager expectation, in search of some traveller whose arrival she anticipated. He did not for a moment associate her presence with his own home coming, until her eyes met his as the train stopped, and stepping forward she exclaimed—

"Papa, I am so glad you are here safe and sound," and lifting her face to his she kissed him lovingly again and again, then slipping her arm through his went with him to the carriage which awaited them.

"That first kiss was poor cousin Joyce's," she said. "She left it for you, and I promised to deliver it."

"Joyce's! She is surely not gone? I thought you would all have joined to keep her until my return. My only sister's only child to leave The Chase in such haste!"

"She could not stay. I tried hard to persuade her, for, papa, I am sorry I have not been kinder to Joyce. We are friends now, dear friends, and I hope we shall always be so. I cannot blame Joyce for going. How could she stay? But you do not know all yet. I trust things will turn out better than they seem to promise. I think I ought to tell you all about Joyce's birthday and what was said, only you must promise to say nothing to mamma: I cannot help thinking she is a little sorry now, and she is more likely to feel regret about Joyce's going if no one speaks of it."

Then Adelaide told her father all that had passed, and Mr. Evans listened, not altogether sadly, for his daughter made the most of all that had been bright for Joyce on her birthday—the loving letters and souvenirs from Welton, Mrs. Caruth's consideration for her cousin's safe convoy, the opening of hearts between themselves, and the new-born friendship, which was to bind them more closely than the ties of relationship had done.

"And," continued Adelaide, "Joyce will never disgrace the name she bears. I only wish I were more like her."

There was much to cheer Mr. Evans in what he heard from his daughter, and acting upon her suggestion, he made no allusion to Joyce's departure. His silence was both a relief and a reproach to his wife, who expected a scene, and was conscious that, in spite of her desire to free herself from a sense of responsibility, she could not even excuse herself for her treatment of Joyce.

On the following morning, when Mr. Evans went down expecting to take his breakfast in solitude, and feeling how much he should miss Joyce's gentle ministry, he found Adelaide already seated at the table. She rose as he entered and lifted her face for a kiss.

"Now another, papa," she said. "That is for Joyce. You must give me one every morning for her, as I am her deputy."

It was such a new thing for Mr. Evans to be greeted thus by his own children, that he could hardly realise that he was awake, but he showered many kisses on the fair, bright face that waited for them.

"I did not expect to see you, my dear," he said.

"No, dear papa, but I must try to be a better daughter. I told you yesterday that I was beginning to learn new lessons. If I become what I wish to be, remember, Joyce was my first teacher. When I asked what I could do for her, she told me what I might do in a little way for you. But for her I should not be here; however, I will not leave you to a lonely meal again."

And Adelaide kept her promise.

CHAPTER V.

THREE MONTHS LATER.

JOYCE reached the station nearest to Springfield Park at three o'clock, having had a change of trains, and a stoppage of an hour and a half on the road. Mrs. Caruth's maid, returning direct to Fernslough, would rejoin her mistress before six.

Her train would not, however, start for twenty minutes, so she was able to tell her mistress that she had seen Miss Mirlees in charge of a grey-haired coachman, who, with two little girls, awaited her arrival.

"Are you the young person for Springfield Park?" asked the man.

Joyce replied in the affirmative.

"I am the coachman. The groom would have brought only a trap, but the little ladies were wild to see their new maid, and Mrs. Ross would only trust the children with me."

The man intended Joyce to understand that to drive any but members of the family and their friends would be beneath the dignity of so old a servant, and that the presence of the little girls explained his own.

"No doubt Mrs. Ross feels that the children are safest with you," said Joyce.

"Just so. She has had time to know what I am, for I drove her when she was no bigger than the least of them, and I was in her father's service. Now you step in next the eldest one, Miss Mary. She should have been a boy by rights, but nobody would like to change her for one now. Your things will be brought by that lad who has a trap close at hand. They are all together I suppose?"

Joyce pointed to her belongings on the platform, said farewell to her escort, and sent messages of thanks and love to Mrs. Caruth. Then she followed the coachman to a little carriage, in which were seated two lovely children in the present charge of the station-master's daughter.

"Come in," cried the elder child. "We wanted to see you, so mamma let Price bring us. I am Mary, 'papa's Molly,' they call me, and that is Alice. She turns her face away because she is shy, but she will be friends soon. Mamma said we must be very good and not make you sorry, because you have no father and mother."

Tears sprang into Joyce's eyes, which the child noted instantly, and her own face grew sorrowful.

"Why do you cry?" she said. "Let me kiss the tears away as mamma does mine, if I am only sorry, not naughty."

The winsome creature pulled Joyce's head down to her own and smiled, until her new attendant was fain to smile in response.

"There, that is right. Now look how pretty the park is, and see the deer under the trees. They feed out of our hands, and they will know you very soon, because you will be with us."

Joyce saw that her new surroundings would be even more beautiful than her uncle's home, and she drank in with delight the loveliness which met her eyes on every side, whilst Mary prattled unceasingly till they reached the house. There she was met by a pleasant, motherly person, who introduced herself as Mrs. Powell, the housekeeper, and led her upstairs to a good-sized cheerful room, very comfortably furnished and opening into a still larger one in which were two little beds. Both rooms again opened into the day nursery, a delightful apartment, in which everything suggested the personal superintendence of a thoughtful, loving mother.

The little girls had been taken charge of by Mrs. Ross's maid, Paterson, and the housekeeper told Joyce that when she was ready she was to come to her own room for refreshment.

"Here are your boxes in good time," said Mrs. Powell; and thus Joyce was able to make the needed change in her dress. She was about to go down, when recollecting her new position, she turned back for one of the aprons, ironed so carefully by Sarah Keene's hands, and over which, as badges of coming servitude for her darling, she had shed many a tear.

"Never mind," thought Joyce. "They are honourable badges, so long as they accompany faithful performance of duty, work done as in God's sight, and depending for its success on His blessing."

So with a bright face, the reflection of a brave heart, she went down, after having occupied a few moments in thanking God for a safe journey and a kind reception.

"I always have an early cup of tea," said Mrs. Powell, "and I thought it would be the best for you along with something more substantial after a journey. Your future meals will be taken upstairs with the children. Mrs. Ross will see you in the morning, but she and the master are away; only for the day. They will be back to-night. My mistress trusted you to me, and I promised to make you comfortable," said Mrs. Powell, with a look of great kindness in her motherly face.

"It was very good of her to leave me in such hands," said Joyce, with an answering smile.

Then Mrs. Powell dropped her voice to a whisper—

"Let me say a word about yourself, my dear. My mistress trusts me, and she said—only to me, mind—that the friend who wrote in answer to her inquiries had told her a little of your history. How that you were a lady, used to be served instead of serving others, and that if you chose to accept a home with her, there was one open to you; but that you preferred service to a life of dependence."

"What did Mrs. Ross say? I hope she did not think I wished to deceive her in any way," said Joyce.

"No, indeed. She honours you for preferring work to dependence, and says that if she finds you what she has been led to expect, you in turn shall find a real home and true friends at Springfield Park. There, my dear, I hope you will sleep the sounder for knowing this; and if it will comfort you to hear it, my heart warms to you, and you have one friend already."

To Joyce this was like having her old friend Sarah Keene by her side, and she thanked the kindly housekeeper most heartily and gratefully for her encouraging words.

But the tea was being neglected, and Mrs. Powell turned Joyce's attention in that direction; so, impelled by a healthy girlish appetite, she made a hearty meal, much to her new friend's satisfaction.

One hour after she spent with the children, of whom, however, she was not to take formal charge until the morning. Then the housekeeper, being at leisure, showed her through the house and a portion of the gardens, and finally left her to indulge in happier thoughts than she could have imagined would be possible to her under her new circumstances.

Joyce rose early and dressed the children, the little one having overcome her shyness and being now willing to make friends. She was sitting telling them a baby story when Mrs. Ross entered the nursery after breakfast, and greeted her with the utmost kindness.

At the sight of their mother the children rushed to her side, and, clasped in her arms, forgot for the time their anxiety to know the end of Joyce's fairy story.

How she sped at Springfield Park may be gathered from a letter written after three months' experience to Sarah Keene. Many shorter letters had been exchanged between Mr. Evans, Adelaide, the old nurse, and Joyce; but she purposely refrained from saying much about her position until a sufficient time had elapsed to allow her to form a fair judgment as to the wisdom of the step she had taken.

"Springfield Park, Sept. 6th.

"After three months, dear old nurse and friend, I can say that I am glad I came here. Every one is good to me; the children are so sweet that it is delightful to work for them; and I do work, Sarah. I try to earn every penny, and I have proof that Mrs. Ross is satisfied. Yesterday she told me how glad she was that the children had learned to love me, and that she was much pleased with my mode of managing them. Then she gave me my quarter's wages, and I found considerable sweetness in receiving my first earnings. I was to have seventeen pounds a year and all found, but Mrs. Ross placed a five-pound note in my hand and would not receive any change.

"You must know I cannot occupy my time in only dressing and attending to the children and their clothes; the former are so docile, the latter so handsome and abundant that they receive little damage, and when at all shabby they are given away; so I began to teach, and turned everything to account in order to benefit my darling charges.

"Mrs. Ross found out what we were doing, and said, 'You are teaching my children to love information by leading them gently and making it attractive. How have you acquired such an excellent method?'

"I taught in our Welton Sunday-schools," I said. "My little scholars were the children of the very poor; but I took more pains with them because their learning time is short and their opportunities are few. If my method has any merit it is owing to my dear father's example which I tried to copy." My eyes filled. I could not keep back my tears when I thought of him and of all I owed to his loving training.

"Mrs. Ross laid a gentle hand on my shoulder and said, 'Do not cry, Joyce. I feel deeply for you. It must be hard to look back and think how things were whilst he lived. I have heard so much of your father's excellences, and how you were both loved by rich and poor.'

"I am not unhappy," I replied. "Service here is not servitude, and I am much better satisfied to earn my bread than to owe it to the charity of another."

"You are right, but I should be wrong to accept the faithful labours of a governess in return for a nursemaid's salary. Henceforth you will receive forty pounds a year, and, Miss Mirlees, I shall look for you with the children in the drawing-room daily, when we have no formal company, and are alone or have only a few friends.'

"I began to wonder if my old Welton frocks would be good enough, but that evening a parcel came to me containing a dress length of good mourning silk with all requisites for making it up. Mrs. Ross sent a note a little later to say that it was a mark of the satisfaction felt by her husband and herself at the improvement in their children.

"I can now wear my dear mother's watch and ornaments without their seeming unsuitable. And I shall once again find myself amongst people of the class I used to mix with as the parson's daughter at Welton. How can I thank God enough for all His goodness?

"I have so long been used to my Christian name only that it seemed quite strange when Mrs. Ross with marked emphasis called me 'Miss Mirlees,' and I subsequently found that the servants were instructed to address me in the same way. They obeyed quite willingly, and the little maid who waits at nursery meals seemed so charmed to apply it that she repeated the 'Miss' as often as possible.

"I wonder the servants are not jealous, but I presume they catch the spirit of their employers. As to dear old Mrs. Powell, she is almost as pleased as you will be, dear Sarah, when you read my good news.

"I know that my uncle, cousins, and Mrs. Evans are away. When they return give Adelaide this letter to read, and she will show it to her father, at any rate.

"In a day or two this house will be full of visitors for the shooting. I have been beset by a cowardly dread that anyone who knew me at Welton should be amongst them. You see I have the old pride to conquer yet, but as the governess, Mrs. Ross will treat me with consideration, I know, and I did not really feel ashamed of being only a servant.

"With more love than I can express,

"Your ever affectionate foster-child,

"JOYCE MIRLEES."

How often Sarah had to wipe her eyes whilst reading the letter, and how she exulted that her darling was working her way upward again and would yet lift her head amongst the best, may be left to the imagination.

CHAPTER VI.

HOME, SWEET HOME.

WHEN Mrs. Caruth invited Joyce Mirlees to stay at Fernslough she was quite in earnest, and yet, whilst anxious to serve the daughter of her old friend, she was hardly sorry that the girl did not accept the invitation. Her only son was absent, but time would bring him back. Joyce had been his pet, and he had made himself her playfellow as a child. But she was a woman now, and the best of mothers are ambitious for their sons. It was perhaps as well that Alec should find a partner for life before he and Joyce met again.

She was a dear girl, undoubtedly. Good, true, and with a sturdy independence of character which Mrs. Caruth respected. But Alec was master of Fernslough, and Joyce the penniless daughter of his old tutor. She had been a little afraid that something might come of that old companionship between the child and the youth, but Alec was every inch a soldier, and duty with him always came first. He had been less at home than he might well have been, but the mother was proud to see her son's name in the honour lists from time to time. He had rejoined his regiment after his recovery, but now it was ordered home, and she was looking forward to having him near or with her for, perhaps, years to come. They would spend next Christmas together, and the mother was planning what friends should be gathered at Fernslough to make the happy season still brighter for her son.

It was November before he arrived, brown, bearded, more erect and strong-looking than before his illness.

Mrs. Caruth must have stood on tiptoe if her son had not bent his tall head to receive her kiss of welcome and return it with interest.

"It is delightful to have just you alone to receive me, mother," he said. "I was half afraid you might have visitors, seeing you could not know quite when to expect me. I might have brought one myself, Captain Tyson, whom I have named in my letters as such a fine fellow and reliable friend. But he would not come straight here with me—I think on your account, that we might be together for a few days first. He is leaving the army for good."

"He will be welcome, Alec, for your sake. But there will be plenty to talk over. Butler, too, is longing to go into business matters with you as soon as possible."

"Dear mother, do not compel me to assume the responsibilities of a landowner until twenty-four hours have been given to inquiries and reminiscences. I have shaken hands with Butler, and promised to talk to him the day after to-morrow. Till then my time is my mother's."

Mrs. Caruth's face showed her pleasure, and after dinner her son said—

"Let us go into your boudoir, cosiest of rooms, and question each other about everything and everybody."

The mother agreed, and the mutual questioning went on for some time.

"Now," said Major Caruth, "I want to know all about my dear old tutor's death.

You told me very little beyond the bare fact when you wrote to me."

Mrs. Caruth gave all the particulars, adding, "I believe the loss of everything broke Mr. Mirlees' heart. But I was not at home when he died. I preferred remaining abroad for some time after you left me to facing home without you."

"But there was his little girl—Joyce. What became of her?"

"You forget, Alec, Joyce is now twenty-one. Her uncle, Mr. Walter Evans, took her to his home."

"Evans! Surely you mean a subdued-looking man with a rich, vulgar wife, and two very handsome daughters, whom we first saw when we were staying with the Clives at The Warren. Mr. Evans had a beautiful place near theirs. We afterwards met the family at Mentone."

"The same people. Mr. Evans was poor before his marriage, but a man of good birth, refined manners, and excellent education. Everyone liked him, but the wife was tolerated for his sake, or by some, perhaps, on account of a full purse."

"So my little Joyce went to live with that vulgar, purse-proud woman; my playmate, whom I petted and protected when she was a child and I a man. Have you heard from her lately? I should like to know how she gets on with Mrs. Evans, seeing that she had a wonderfully tender nature, combined with a fine spirit of her own, which would ill brook a position of dependence on such a woman."

Mrs. Caruth could only answer truly, and she said—

"I fear Joyce was unhappy at The Chase. Mr. Evans was fond of his niece, but he yielded to his wife, and was hardly master in his own house. Joyce grew tired of her position, and wrote to me for a character to enable her to obtain a situation."

"A what? Joyce Mirlees used that word in connection with herself! What could she mean?"

"I use her own word, Alec."

"Then I presume she was falling back on the only resource of a friendless young gentleman, a governess's post."

"No, dear. Joyce did not consider herself sufficiently accomplished to take a situation as governess. People want so much nowadays, and Joyce, though to my mind unusually well educated in all that is most valuable, had none of the more showy qualifications."

"She had those which, showy or not, are most valuable in every-day life, and really show the most too, because they are in hourly exercise for the good of others. Tell me now what were the duties she undertook?"

"She went as attendant to two little children."

"Do you mean as a nursemaid?"

"The children were too old to need nursing. Joyce wrote of them that they were the most winning little creatures imaginable, and quite a comfort to her."

"She needed some comfort, poor child!" said Major Caruth, with a sigh. "And you, mother. What did you do for the daughter of an old friend?"

He spoke quietly, but his face and words expressed deep feeling.

"I wrote to Joyce and offered her a home and a welcome here, Alec. I have a copy of my letter and of Joyce's answer. You will see from these that she had a choice in the matter. I can scarcely be blamed if, in spite of my offer, she yet preferred her own independent course, even to a home at Fernslough. I was grieved to think of Joyce in the position of a mere serving-maid, but I own I did not respect her the less for declining to eat the bread of dependence."

Major Caruth took the letters, read them through, and then returned them without a word of comment to his mother. His face did not express entire satisfaction, and of this she was sensible.

"Do you not think I wrote kindly and did what I could under the circumstances?" she asked, in a somewhat aggrieved tone and after a rather prolonged silence.

"You did well, so far, mother. But do not be hurt at my saying I think you should not have stopped where you did. Joyce was not the girl to accept home and maintenance from anyone on whom she had no claim but that of life-long acquaintance, without doing something in return. She had already tried that sort of existence with relatives and knew what it meant."

"Joyce could never suppose that she would receive anything but the greatest kindness and consideration here, and as my friend. She would never make a mental comparison between me and Mrs. Walter Evans."

"Certainly not, but you must remember Joyce was bound to earn something. Where would her clothes and mere pocket and travelling expenses come from? She had no income from any source. What could the girl do? Come to Fernslough as your guest and friend, without a pound in her pocket? I presume you made no allusion to money matters."

"I assure you, Alec, I did not think of doing so. Had Joyce come here she would have wanted for nothing."

"I believe you meant all that was kind. What you might have done is this: represented to Joyce that, being alone, you wished for a lady companion, and that your old friend's daughter would be so much more agreeable to you than anyone else could be. But that, for her sake and your own, the arrangement must be made on a business basis, the same as with a stranger, and so as to leave you both perfectly free to end it, should either wish to do so."

"I see, dear, and I wish I had done this, but it is too late now."

"Quite too late, mother," said Alec, thoughtfully.

"After all, Joyce has not done so badly. The lady she is with, who must be exceptionally nice, treated Joyce from the first with great consideration, and, finding out how well qualified she was to teach the children, made her their governess at three months' end. She now fills a position that would disgrace no lady."

"I am certain she never did fill one that the idea of disgrace could be associated with. Perhaps her employer thought it would be more economical to promote the capable maid than to engage a governess proper. One has heard of such things before."

"You do not know of whom you speak, my dear Alec, or you would not say so."

"Then tell me the lady's name. If she is on my visiting list I shall be better able to judge."

"Joyce particularly requested that I would tell no one the name of her employer, or communicate her present address. I do not suppose she would mind now, because her position is so entirely satisfactory. Still, I am bound to respect her wishes until I have asked permission to do otherwise. If you like I will write at once."

"You shall violate no confidence for me, mother; and to-night you must talk to me instead of wasting these precious first hours in writing to anyone."

Then, as if wishing to hear no more of Joyce, Major Caruth began to ask after old acquaintances, and the rest of the evening passed without further allusion to her.

When bed time came he remarked—

"According to Tyson's plans when we parted, he will probably be with us on Friday night. This is Tuesday, so before he comes I shall have time to satisfy old Butler, have a run round the place, make myself acquainted with all that has been done during my absence, and be ready for Tyson when he arrives. He will have to settle down now, though he is four years my junior, for he has just succeeded to a fine estate."

"I wish you would settle down, Alec."

"So I shall, mother—for a while at any rate."

"But I mean get married."

"That even is within the verge of possibility. I will look for someone who is worthy to be your daughter, and when I find her—"

He did not say what would follow, but kissed his mother, and disappeared into his own room.

CHAPTER VII. HEART SEARCHINGS.

JOYCE had kept her friends and kinsfolk at The Chase fully acquainted with her improved position and the consideration with which she was treated at Springfield Park.

"You will hardly believe it," she wrote, "but I have the most perfect home here. Mr. and Mrs. Ross treat me as a friend, and it is delightful to feel that I have their confidence and the love of my darling pupils. If I am absent from the children for awhile, they are no sooner within reach of me than little clinging arms are clasping my neck, kisses rain on my face, each child contending which shall love me best; whilst Mrs. Ross, instead of discouraging these marks of affection, smiles with pleasure, and says, 'This is as it should be. No power can compare with the influence of love in training children.' But in this house love reigns supreme. I never thought I could be so happy again as I am now. How sweet it is to be wanted and to have a place to fill and work to do for others."

Joyce had three correspondents at The Chase—Sarah Keene, Mr. Evans, and Adelaide. It was the latter who persisted in making her mother acquainted with Joyce's present happiness and the consideration with which she was treated. "And," continued the daring girl, "I think Joyce ought to spend the Christmas holidays here, if she will. Shall I invite her, and say that we will try to make her happier than she was before?"

"You will do nothing of the kind," replied Mrs. Evans. "She has chosen to leave us, and if she wants to come back she will have to ask, not me."

"We were not kind to her before, mamma. I think we all feel that now," said Adelaide, glancing at her sister, who assented. "If we might have the time over again, I think we should act differently. However, if you will not ask Joyce, I should think her friend Mrs. Caruth will invite her to Fernslough. You know how anxious she was about cousin Joyce, and how wishful for her to stay with her altogether. No fear but Joyce will have friends to think of her at Christmas." And with this parting remark the girl left Mrs. Evans to meditate on her suggestion.

"Really, I think everyone has gone mad about Joyce since she left, though no one cared much for her when she was here. It was no fault of ours that her father died and left her a mere beggar."

"But it was our fault that she was miserable here," said Augusta. "It told against ourselves, I know, for she is our cousin, and her parents were well-born and respected by people who care little enough about us."

This was Augusta's remark, and a certain amount of worldly wisdom which pervaded it had more effect on Mrs. Evans than all Adelaide's regrets for the past neglect and unkindness experienced by Joyce when at The Chase. She began to think that for her own sake it might be politic to extend the shelter of its roof to her husband's niece during the holiday season.

A few days later Mrs. Evans told Adelaide that she might invite "that girl" for Christmas, if she chose. "But send no message from me," she added.

"Too late, mamma. Joyce has already declined an invitation from Mrs. Caruth, and has decided to spend Christmas in what is a true home—Springfield Park. There will be a large gathering of friends, and I hope Joyce will have as happy a season as she deserves. I wish I could look forward to one such as hers promises to be."

It was quite true that Mrs. Caruth had written to invite Joyce to spend Christmas at Fernslough. She did this unknown to her son, and immediately after that first conversation with him on the night of his return home. She was a generous-hearted woman, and his words about Joyce had touched her deeply. She looked back over the years during which the girl's parents had been her own most trusted friends. She recalled the wise advice Mr. Mirlees had given her during her early widowhood, and to the excellent influence he had exercised over her own son.

"But for him Alec would never have been the noble man he is to-day," she owned to herself, and she was anxious to make prompt amends for anything that had been lacking in her own conduct to Joyce. "Mine has been but a poor, half-hearted friendship," she said to herself. "I fear I thought more of consequences than of doing what my better feelings prompted for that dear orphan girl. I may be mistaken in fancying that Alec cares more for her than for other girls, but if he does, what then? He has enough, and can afford to be indifferent about fortune in a wife."

"As his father was before him."

Mrs. Caruth almost thought she heard these last words spoken, but they were only the final echo of her own thoughts. Yet they were true words, for she had been a portionless bride five and thirty years before, and had known the happiness of being loved only for what she was in herself. So her heart went with the invitation to Joyce, and she told the girl of her son's happy return to Fernslough, and his wish to meet again his old pet and playmate.

When Joyce received the letter she had already promised to remain at The Park, for Mrs. Ross had told her how glad they would all be to keep her with them, and to make the season a real bright holiday to her. The prospect of having their darling governess had made the children almost wild with delight. So, when Mrs. Caruth's letter came, Joyce could only send grateful thanks, and tell her what had been already decided upon.

The thought that Major Caruth might probably leave England again without her seeing him was the one cloud in what was otherwise all bright and hopeful. He had been so much to her in those old days, when she owed her chief childish pleasures to his kind thought, and was accustomed to appeal to him in every difficulty and trouble.

Yet Joyce had other memories of nearer date. She recalled that time when Alec Caruth came to Fernslough after a long absence, during which she had changed from the merry, romping schoolgirl into the tall, slender maiden of seventeen, and she could picture his look of surprise and admiration mingled with regret, as he said in his frank fashion—

"I was coming to meet my child friend, and, alas! I have lost her, and find that I have to make acquaintance with a new Joyce Mirlees, who has grown up to young ladyhood in a most objectionable manner, during my absence."

She had laughed at his rueful face, and taken his arm to be led in to dinner, instead of dancing into the room holding by his hand as in former days. She had noticed a little change in Mrs. Caruth's manner from that day—a sort of reserve towards herself and watchfulness over her son, as if she were a little jealous of his attentions to her. And her father had seemed to want her more, and kept her by his side at times, when formerly she had been accustomed to run over to Fernslough and spend hours together with Mrs. Caruth, always receiving from her a motherly welcome.

"She has her son now, Joyce," he would say. "She will not want my little girl from me so much, and I shall be so glad to have more of your company."

Joyce could recall how, at length, the conviction dawned upon her that the old, free intercourse between her and Alec Caruth must be deemed a thing of the past—dead and buried with her childhood. Also that Mrs. Caruth, whilst still as kind and motherly as ever, did not express regret at her absence when she had stayed away longer than usual, or urge her to come more frequently until she was once more left alone by the departure of her son.

Then Joyce's pride took alarm, and she did not respond quite readily to the renewed invitations of Mrs. Caruth, though she was most careful not to allow her feelings to be suspected. On the contrary, her manner was perfectly frank and natural as she replied—

"Thank you so much, dear Mrs. Caruth, but my father really requires my help more than he did. He finds that I can now be of some use to him, and I am quite proud to feel that he misses me when I leave him. I fear I used to leave him too much alone, for Fernslough had so many charms for me, thanks to your great kindness. But there is something else. I am supposed to have finished my education and to be a grown up girl, but really I am only just finding out how ignorant I am, so my father is going to let me read with him, that I may gain more information instead of losing the little already acquired."

Joyce remembered that conversation with Mrs. Caruth, and how, after it, she had gone less to Fernslough until the time of her great trouble came. There her old friend had been constant in her attentions to the dear father, and full of sympathy with herself. Her uncle's arrival had taken her out of Mrs. Caruth's hands, and they had drifted widely apart from each other during the last nine months.

This unexpected invitation to spend Christmas at Fernslough, and with it the direct news of Major Caruth's presence there, seemed to say, "Forget that I raised a barrier between you and ourselves. Come back to Fernslough and take again your old place. Rejoice with me in having my son here once more, and be to us both what you were during those happy years long ago."

Joyce had answered the letter with a somewhat heavy heart, whilst feeling angry with herself that she could be anything but glad at the prospect of staying at Springfield Park for Christmas.

"Before your kind letter came I had promised to remain here," she wrote. "Indeed, I felt only too happy at the thought of being allowed to stay, and did not dream of receiving any other invitation. You will know, dear Mrs. Caruth, that I would rather spend Christmas at Fernslough than in any other place in the world, for, though Welton and its neighbourhood are associated with the greatest sorrows of my life, all its joyful memories are bound up with them also. Thank God these are so many. I should dearly love to go in and out of the cottages and see my old friends there, but it cannot be. I have promised Mrs. Ross; the children count on my staying, I am pledged to help here in everything that I used to have a finger in at Welton. I can only thank you again and again, and wish you every joy that the word Christmas can suggest. The presence of Major Caruth will make amends for the absence of all others. I do rejoice that he will be at Fernslough for Christmas, especially as he has so often been away at that season. Nevertheless, I hope you will both miss me a little, as I have never before been absent from Welton at Christmas. Please give him my kind remembrances and all imaginable good wishes. I think you will be pleased to know that my cousin, Adelaide Evans, has also written to ask me to The Chase, and this, too, with her mother's knowledge and, to some extent, approbation. I am glad of this, and the letter has set me thinking and wondering whether I was as kind and as considerate as I might have been when under my uncle's roof. I went to The Chase almost a stranger, and I fear I was more ready to look for slights than to expect kindness. The very fact that my cousin Adelaide sought me out as she did, met me more than half-way in sympathy and friendship, and has continued ever since my affectionate relative, correspondent, and friend, proves that I was harsh in my judgment and unnecessarily proud. My aunt was not kind and I was very desolate; nevertheless, if I had to live over again those months at The Chase, I believe I should act very differently, and try more to merit and to win the love of those around me. All recent circumstances have been made to work together for my good in a manner that I neither hoped for nor deserved. I trust the memory of mercies received will make me more thankful, trustful, and humble in the future."

The letter contained allusions to old Welton friends and other matters which need not be repeated.

Mrs. Caruth closed it with mingled feelings of pleasure and disappointment. She was glad of all the good that had come to Joyce and of the glimpse of the girl's heart which it gave her. But she was honestly sorry that she could not come to Fernslough, for having made up her mind to ask Joyce, she really wanted her.

Mrs. Caruth told her son what she had done, and had her reward in seeing the lighting up of his face, and in feeling herself drawn to his side by an embracing arm.

"Thanks, little mother," said he, then bent down and kissed her. "You have carried out the thought that came into my own mind after we were talking of Joyce the other evening. It would have brought back old times most delightfully if she could have come to us, but seeing she is obliged to refuse, we must make all the more of each other. One thing, however, I should like to do. You know how Joyce thought of all the poor folk at Christmas-time, and stirred up the richer ones to give of their abundance so that there might be a cheery fireside and a well-spread table in every cottage. You can tell me just how she managed this, and whom she helped. We will do it this year, and tell the people that we act for their old friend and pastor, Mr. Mirlees, and for Joyce. They will miss her face as we shall, little mother, but they shall miss nothing else, and still, as in old times, many a voice will pray, 'May God bless Miss Joyce and give her a happy Christmas and many more to follow it.'"

"It is a happy thought, Alec, and we will carry it out together. I will write and tell Joyce, and that it was your suggestion. Or would you like to write yourself?"

"Thanks, no. You shall write and put in all the kind wishes you can think of on my behalf," which decision perplexed Mrs. Caruth not a little. She had quite expected an eager affirmative response when she proposed that Alec should write to Joyce, and was somewhat disappointed at his matter-of-fact refusal.

Could it be that after all Joyce was only thought of as the child-friend of her son's youthful days? Contradictory as this may seem, Mrs. Caruth was quite prepared to be indignant should this prove to be the case, and to ask what he could want in a wife which he would not find in Joyce? Also, where should she meet one whom she would so gladly welcome as a daughter?

This second letter from Mrs. Caruth delighted Joyce, as may well be imagined. One of her troubles in connection with the coming season had been caused by the thought of her poor friends at Welton. The new clergyman had a delicate wife and a family of young children. He could not take up Joyce's old work, and there was no one else to step into the gap and do it.

Joyce one day accompanied Mrs. Ross in a drive to town, and while she was buying Christmas gifts for her friends and household, the girl strolled through the market, crowded to overflowing with everything suggestive of good cheer. She asked prices, and began to calculate how many dinners the utmost amount she could spare would purchase for some of her poorest friends at Welton. She had already occupied her spare moments in making a number of pretty and useful articles for them.

Joyce sighed as she said to herself—

"The most I can do is so little when compared with their need and my desire to help them; but I must do my best and leave the rest."

Now she knew that all would be remembered, and was thankful on their behalf, whilst again and again the memory of one sentence in Mrs. Caruth's letter brought a bright flush to her cheek.

"Alec bade me tell you that none for whom you cared shall be forgotten, and all will know that they owe their Christmas dinners this year to your loving thought and labour in former seasons. I am sure the good cheer will taste twice as good when it is known that you, dear Joyce, though absent have your full share in its distribution."

"I should be wicked and ungrateful indeed if I could cherish a single discontented thought," she said to herself, and she worked cheerfully on, completing her little presents. To each article she attached a short note and a card painted by her own hand, for Joyce was no mean artist, and could use pencil and brush with considerable skill.

There was something for each friend at Welton, Mrs. Caruth included; something for all at Springfield Park, for though Joyce had not found time to do so much during her residence there, she had brought with her many pretty articles on which she had occupied what would otherwise have been weary days at The Chase.

There was only one friend to whom no Christmas gift was addressed, and that was Major Caruth.

CHAPTER VIII.

ROUND THE CHRISTMAS FIRE.

MAJOR CARUTH was mistaken in supposing that his friend, Captain Tyson, had no visit to pay before joining him at Fernsclough, and the latter did not arrive until a day later than the one originally fixed when they parted.

"I was obliged to run over to my sister's and have a look at her and her belongings, though I did not stay longer than I could help. They will see enough of me when I settle down, as our homes will be near together," said the Captain, in explanation of his tardy arrival.

Mrs. Caruth was charmed with her son's friend, and as the days passed felt how pleasant it would be if Alec could induce him to extend his visit until after the New Year.

"I wish I could stay; many thanks to you for asking me," he replied; "but Kate, my sister, made me promise to go back for the Christmas doings at her house. If only—"

Here Captain Tyson paused and fell into a species of brown study, the purport of which he did not reveal. This was at breakfast, and an hour later he said to his friend—

"Caruth, I wish you would go with me to my sister's for a single night. I have a special reason for asking this, and I think Mrs. Caruth will spare you to me for so long."

"Do you mean to go to-day?" asked the Major.

"Well, yes. It only wants a week to Christmas, and things must be arranged soon, you understand."

Major Caruth did not understand, but was quite willing to take everything for granted, and Captain Tyson, having announced that no one ever came at a wrong time whom he invited to Kate's house, and that he would in any case "wire" from the station, so that she might not be taken by surprise, went off with his friend by the 2.30 train.

It was only after they were gone past recall that Mrs. Caruth remembered that she was quite ignorant as to her son's destination. Captain Tyson had neither mentioned his sister's surname nor the place of her abode; but she said to herself: "It is only for a night. Alec will be home to-morrow." And made herself contented in the meanwhile.

It was growing dusk as Major Caruth and his friend alighted at the door of a beautiful country house. It stood hospitably open, having been flung wide at the sound of approaching wheels. There was a rosy glow from within, which came from a blazing fire in the wide hall, where space, warmth, and comfort were well combined. A tall, graceful woman stood near the doorway, extending welcoming hands to the newly arrived guests.

"Kate," said Captain Tyson, "this is my good friend and wise mentor, Major Caruth, of whom you have heard before. Caruth, this is my sister Kate, otherwise Mrs. Ross; and here come the children to welcome Uncle Jack."

Turning aside from the elders after this introduction, Captain Tyson seized the smaller girl of the two and lifted her for a kiss, then exchanged her for the other, whom he mounted on his shoulder amid a burst of merry laughter from the pair of little people. There was another female figure visible, but in shadow and with the head turned from the door, as the gentlemen entered.

"I am sorry my husband will not be in yet," said Mrs. Ross. "He made an appointment before my brother's telegram came, and was obliged to keep it; but he will be here in good time for dinner. I have, however, a friend and guest whom you, I think, will be glad to see."

Mrs. Ross advanced, the figure turned towards her and her companion, and Major Caruth clasped the extended hand of Joyce Mirlees.

"Joyce!" he exclaimed. "Can it be you? This is indeed an unexpected pleasure. Did Tyson know?"

Joyce's face was radiant, as she looked with frank gladness at her old friend, who still retained her hand in his.

"Yes, it is I, Alec," she said, "and Captain Tyson planned this surprise for you. When he was here lately he talked of you and of his intended visit to Fernsclough. Then naturally it came out that his friend Major Caruth and the friend of my whole life were one and the same person. He had a great deal to say about you, and I—you may imagine how glad I was to tell him that for years you had been my dear father's pupil and my own true friend always."

Joyce looked bravely up as she spoke. Her manner was frank and unrestrained, like that of a sister meeting a dear brother after years of absence.

Perhaps Major Caruth would have liked to see more of self-consciousness about the girl and signs of still deeper feeling.

Outwardly the strong man and brave soldier showed more emotion than Joyce did, for he kept her hand in his, and his voice trembled as he said—

"I little guessed what was before me when I left home to-day, or how much I should owe to my friend Tyson before the close of it."

"I dragged him off here at a moment's notice, Miss Mirlees," said Captain Tyson, pausing from a frantic race round the hall, in which he was already indulging with his small nieces. "You and my sister must explain to him one special object I had in bringing him here."

Major Caruth heard the explanation in due time, but not at that moment, for Mrs. Ross, on hospitable thoughts intent, was offering tea, and afterwards the gentlemen went to their rooms to dress for dinner.

Major Caruth remembered Mrs. Ross's allusion to Joyce as her "friend and guest." "The holidays have begun," he thought, "and the governess is gone for awhile. The friend remains. How few women would have drawn such a distinction as Mrs. Ross did by the use of those words!"

Before bedtime Major Caruth understood his friend's object in bringing him to Springfield Park in such haste. Mrs. Ross explained it on his behalf.

"My brother has told me of your kind wish that he should spend Christmas at Fernsclough. Mrs. Caruth had previously invited Joyce, who was pledged to remain here. Yet I hope and believe we should all be happier if under one roof than we could be if divided. My brother thinks that he and you might persuade Mrs. Caruth to come to us; but if you think it necessary, I will go to Fernsclough and unite my solicitations to yours—that is always supposing you are willing to join our Christmas gathering here."

Major Caruth looked for one instant inquiringly at Joyce. Her answering glance was eloquent enough to satisfy him, and he at once said to Mrs. Ross, "It will give me the greatest possible pleasure, and I do not think you will need to travel to Fernsclough to persuade my mother also to accept your kind invitation."

So Major Caruth returned home on the following day, carrying a pleasant surprise to his mother. He also conveyed a considerable addition to his luggage in the shape of Joyce's Christmas gifts for Welton friends.

One packet she retained.

"This is for Mrs. Caruth; I shall put it on the Christmas tree for her, instead of sending it now."

"And mine, Joyce. Where is it? I see nothing for me."

"People are not supposed to ask beforehand, or to be told what they may expect when the tree is lighted," she answered, with a laugh and a blush.

"I know what I expect, and I shall certainly ask for it," he said; "but I will not be more selfish than others. I will wait till Christmas Day for my present, Joyce. Good-bye for so long, dear Joyce."

"We shall lose Miss Mirlees," said Mr. Ross, oracularly. "Katie, Katie, who would have dreamed that you would develop a taste for match-making?"

This to his wife.

"Nor have I, dear. If a match should come about such as you suggest, it was virtually made before you and I ever heard the names of Alec Caruth and Joyce Mirlees."

Of course Mrs. Caruth accepted the invitation to Springfield Park, and equally of course the gathering there was a most delightful one.

If Alec Caruth did not find a present from his former child-friend beneath the spreading boughs of the lighted Christmas tree, he was not wholly discontented. Whilst others were admiring their gifts he managed to whisper a demand for one which was more precious in his eyes than all beside.

"You know what I want, dear Joyce," he pleaded. "Not a gift, only a fair exchange. One true heart in return for another. You have mine. You have had it for years, and you—" He looked inquiringly.

"I am afraid I have none to give you in return," she whispered.

A great fear filled his heart for a moment, but once more Alec Caruth looked at Joyce's blushing face and read the true answer to his petition.

"I believe you say this because, dear Joyce, it was mine already. Tell me, darling, am I right?"

But Joyce did not speak. Nevertheless, Alec was content, and a little later he told his mother that Joyce had given him the best of Christmas presents, her own sweet self.

So the little Rosses lost their former maid and present governess, but kept always their friend in her who soon became Joyce Caruth.

On the Christmas tree at Springfield that year Joyce found the ring that Adelaide had offered her on her twenty-first birthday. The girl sent it to be placed there, and Joyce gladly accepted what she felt to be a token of true cousinly love, and told her so.

In after days, when the once penniless niece was a happy wife, Mrs. Walter Evans was heard to declare that Joyce had improved wonderfully. But then in her eyes wealth and position were the greatest of all claims to respect. Without these all other excellences were as nothing. No need to tell the names of the many who rejoiced to see the happiness of her who, as Joyce Mirlees, had tried to make others happy, or to say that none of these were forgotten by Joyce Caruth.

Beneath her roof Captain Tyson met his fate in the person of Adelaide Evans, and there, too, Mr. Evans is a frequent guest.

"To think that you should choose one who for awhile was 'only a servant,'" said Joyce to her husband, some time after their marriage.

"Dearest," he answered, "that word servant always brings pleasant thoughts to my mind. As a soldier, I was ever proud to call myself the servant of Queen and country; but I rejoice more when I think of Him who took upon Himself the form of a servant, and came on earth, not to be ministered unto, but to minister. Faithful service to an earthly master is right honourable, but to be the faithful, humble servant of God is far better than to be a king amongst men. May it be your lot and mine, dear Joyce, thus to serve."

And with Christmas bells bringing to mind thoughts of the first Christmas morning, Joyce whispered "Amen."

SOMETHING NEW.

By SOMERVILLE GIBNEY.

Now, girls, a word or two with you respecting Christmas entertainments; for though no doubt papa and mamma are the real givers of the party, yet you probably consider yourselves in a great measure responsible for its success, and this is quite as it should be. Papa finds the needful, mamma sees after the culinary arrangements, and you superintend the preparation of the house and the amusements—a fair division of labour. I have no doubt that many times during this joyous season, when the giving of a party is being discussed, the wish for something new and out of the common in your department will be expressed, something that will provide your guests with pleasant recollections to carry away with them, and that will stamp your party as the party of the season. Now I want to give you a few hints how this wish may be made to end in a triumph at the cost of very little beyond slight trouble and the exercise of good taste. But in order to prevent disappointment, let me inform you at once that I am not going to tell you of any new form of entertainment in one sense of the word. The old ones that have served for so many years have still plenty of life in them, and will serve for many more yet. The standing dish may be the same you have served on many previous occasions. I am going to speak about the trimmings, and you who interest yourselves in these matters will know what value attaches to these. A daintily-arranged lobster salad is much more appetizing than one carelessly thrown together, without any attempt at a picturesque appearance, though the ingredients be just the same in each—and so it is with a party. There are parties and parties. Coming back from one you say, "Oh, it was very nice and pleasant—the usual thing, you know." Coming back from another you exclaim, "It was charming; everything was so pretty and well arranged." And this is what I should wish may be said of yours, and what will be said if you carry out my instructions.

Let me imagine, by way of illustration, that you live in a house that has a small outer hall opening into a more commodious one, and that the drawing-room where the party proper is to be held opens out of this, as also the dining-room, where the supper is laid, while the tea-room and ladies'-room are upstairs. The evening has arrived, and with it your guests. They enter the hall, and are startled and delighted to find they have stepped into the midst of the realms of the Frost Queen, from which, for comfort's sake, the personal presence of Jack Frost has been excluded, although his handiwork is everywhere apparent. They discover the floor is thickly coated with snow. The walls, which they believed to have been covered with some dark wall paper, are now white, with ivy creeping up them, whose leaves glisten and sparkle in the light. Snow lies piled up against the foot of the stairs, as if swept out of the way. The stairs themselves are white and snow-covered, while the balustrades have patches of snow in all their crannies. Fir trees have suddenly sprung up in corners where they certainly gave no promise of growing a few days ago. Robin Redbreasts are perched here and there, as if about to sing, and the whole fairy-like scene is flooded by a crimson glow which does away with any idea of coldness. On going upstairs to the tea-room, you find the snow-storm has raged as violently there as down below, and has produced an equally picturesque effect. And now let me explain how this has been managed, and, remember, I am speaking of what has been done, not what might be done. This is no wild impracticable theory, but an accomplished fact, in which I had a hand, or rather both hands; so do not have any doubt about the result, but follow the directions, and the outcome will be success.

To begin with the floor. The snow we managed with large white dust sheets—very white. It did not matter about them fitting the shape of the hall, because where they were too big we turned them under, and the unevenness gave the idea of the snow lying thicker against the walls. The stairs were treated in the same way, the whole of the steps being covered, and also the landing on which the tea-room opened. For the walls, which were discoloured by a dark colour, we got several rolls of common white paper and fastened these with paste just below the ceiling, and again on the skirting-board against the floor. In this manner we covered the whole of the walls, and when it came to taking the paper down, a little warm water and a sponge removed all marks of the paste in a few moments, and the walls were not damaged in the slightest. Against this paper, which of course hung somewhat loosely, we pinned long creepers of ivy, having previously drawn them through water and dipped them in flour. We carried these creepers up about five or six feet, and, when fixed, ornamented them further with Epsom salts and tufts of cotton wool. The handrail on the stairs had a thick covering of the same, bound on with thin white string, and some was also placed in the corners and angles of the balustrades. In most of the angles of the walls we placed small fir trees in pots, the pots of course being hidden beneath cotton wool, and the trees themselves sprinkled with flour and salts. The doorways, from which the doors had been removed, had looped-up curtains of crimson muslin, and above them were large bunches of ivy and evergreens, in which were seated stuffed birds, as if singing. The gas lamps were not turned up too high, and each of them had a crimson cover, so that all the light that was shed on the scene was of a warm red colour. The gas stove in the hall was treated in the same way, and the gleam of red light lying athwart the mimic snow was most picturesque.

Every one of the guests was loud in his admiration, and declared the experiment a complete success. It was something so new and at the same time so pretty. There was one drawback, and the gentlemen were quick to discover it. If they happened to brush up against or even touch any of the numerous patches of cotton wool with their coats, they carried away some of it on their backs, and it was no easy matter to get rid of it, it adhered so closely to the cloth. But this after all was a minor matter. Finally, when the party was over, and it came to setting the house in order the following day, other advantages of our scheme made themselves apparent. We first of all unpinned and took down the ivy, then the cotton wool was collected, and the white paper from the walls, which was carefully rolled up to serve for another occasion; and lastly, instead of the carpets having to undergo a thorough sweeping, the white dust sheets were gathered together with all the litter in them and carried outside, leaving the floors as neat and tidy as if nothing extraordinary had taken place. That, girls, was our plan, and I would advise you to try it if during this party-giving season you are on the look out for something new.

DUTY.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL K. COWAN, M.A.

THERE speaks to every human heart,
 In tones of beauty,
 A still small voice,
 Saying, when we have played our part
 Of right and duty,
 "Rejoice! rejoice!"

Bidding each restless heart be calm,
 In sure conviction
 God's peace is there;
 It falleth, like the heavenly balm
 Of benediction
 That follows prayer!

Bringing that blessed comfort down,
 With peace, confessing
 His presence near;

The cross of duty is the crown
 Of every blessing
 God sends us here.

Duty is heaven's stair, whereon
 Who walks is gladder
 Than earth can deem!
 A stair where angels tread, as on
 The golden ladder
 Of Jacob's dream.

And that small voice, that sweetly through
 The spirit strayeth—
 Oh, it is none
 But the Great Master's voice, that to His servant sayeth,
 "Well done! well done!"

AN OLD HACKNEY GHOST STORY.

A SCRAP OF FORGOTTEN HISTORY.

By MRS. G. L. BANKS, Author of "God's Providence House," "The Manchester Man," "More than Coronets," etc.

It happened nearly a century ago.

At that time the long, low, unattractive old parish church of St. John yet cumbered the earth, or the parishioners thought so, for they were all agog to sweep it out of existence and set a bright, brand-new temple in its place, where they might worship more at ease if not more devoutly.

It mattered not that their ancestors for countless generations had been baptised, married, buried in or around the old pile, or that it had been built in the days when Christianity was a truth to live and die for; there was a rage for Italian architecture in the land, and the venerable church, because it was wrinkled with age, was denounced as "cramped," "crazy," "dilapidated," "ruinous," "tottering to decay," "utterly unfit to represent the devotion of the parish."

How true were these assertions the stout old buttressed tower remains to show after a century of wear and weather, though ruthless hands were laid on nave and chancel, rending arch and masonry, flinging away the hallowed stones for meaner uses, and hiding away its monumental glories in a darksome tombhouse like a Mahomedan mausoleum; and would have done away with the grey, weather-beaten tower likewise, but for a sapient architectural oversight.

Yet just a century ago the church was still standing, serenely unconscious of the conspiracy on foot against its very existence.

And, overlooking the ancient graveyard—a long, narrow slip, trending towards Homerton, and flanked by field and marsh—stood also a goodly red-brick house, with an embayed front, sobering down into the mellow tint befitting its forty years of age, and the artistic proclivities of its owner's family.

Those proclivities could not then be very strongly developed, for Mr. Varey's eldest son, John, was but a boy of eleven, drawing pictures with ruddle on doors and walls, and on the slabs that lay around so temptingly. His brother, Aurelius, was only just breeched, and the great artist Ready-mul's future wife merely a little girl in white frock and red shoes, who skipped about the familiar churchyard in strange contrast and indifference to the grey stones under her feet or the story they told. But this five year old child had an elder sister of nine, and it is of this Miss Varey I have a historic somewhat to relate.

We must, however, suffer eight years to slip by, and convert the schoolgirl into a sentimental miss of seventeen, whilst the plot against the old church is drawing to a crisis.

Changes have come in the interim. Mr. Varey lies under the shade of a high brick wall in the churchyard. His son Aurelius has gone to live with a scientific uncle; John, brush in hand, is boldly painting landscapes with experimental water-colours; and Elsie, the widowed mother's eldest girl, is going listlessly about her household business, or sitting at her tambour-frame, or her harpsichord, dreaming and shaping her dreams into verse, to the perplexity and anxiety of her domestic mother.

To seek the immediate inspiration of this poetic languor, we must follow the young lady, as slim and genteel as a plain, narrow-skirted, muslin frock, with an apology for a bodice, could make her, on a bright summer day, along the path north of the long-bodied church, and between the iron posts that guarded the entrance into Church Street,* and along the raised footpath, past the lych-gate and the rectory, on an errand to one of the quaint old shops beyond the brook.

This brook, now covered up and lost to sight—and topography—made the circuit of Hackney proper in a sort of horseshoe curve from Clapton to Homerton, crossing Church Street at the depression at the foot of the hill (now overshadowed by a railway arch), where it lay in a broad pool fordable by horsemen and vehicles. For the accommodation of pedestrians there had been provided on the western side a narrow bridge of brick with two absurdly small arches, and on the eastern a wooden footbridge with a handrail supplemented by posts and chains for a distance beyond.

These bridges were long, narrow, and low, merely level with the raised side-walks.

The traffic in the streets was not great, people then were seldom in a hurry, and as Miss Varey reached the rather ricketty wooden footbridge, her eye was attracted to a fine bay horse and a finer rider coming leisurely on towards the ford, then swollen by a thunder-storm the previous day.

The attraction was mutual.

Either the flutter of her thin azure scarf, or the ribbons in her flat straw hat, or the dark locks floating over her shoulders, caught his attention, he could never tell which; but their eyes met as the horse began to splash through the water.

For a moment he lost his self-command, and nearly lost his seat, for the horse stumbled where the stream was deepest, and whilst he was off his guard almost pitched him over its head. Instinctively he drew the animal up with a jerk, settling himself more firmly in his saddle, nowise disconcerted by the involuntary exclamation of alarm that broke from the fair damsel on the footbridge.

In her sudden fright she had changed colour and stood stock-still for the moment, watching horse and rider.

A few paces carried the stranger across the ford. He turned in his saddle, took off his tall, dandified beaver, and bowed low in acknowledgment, then rode up the hill at a canter towards Clapton.

She knew not whether she was more vexed or pleased. She was annoyed to think she had made herself conspicuous by a cry. But again she argued, how could she avoid it when he was so nearly pitched head foremost into the stream? And how could she help wondering who the graceful stranger could be?

At all events she had seen just so much of him as served to impress his form and features on her memory; certainly whenever she trod the old wooden footbridge.

And it was not allowed to pass away from her memory. It so chanced that whether she went shopping for her mother in Church Street, or with her sister by her side for a summer ramble under the trees along the Clapton road, so sure was she to see the mounted stranger at intervals of three or four weeks; and whether he passed or they met, or he stood talking to mine host of the Old King's Head, so surely he took off his hat and bowed in recognition.

It became embarrassing, and ere long her colour rose when thus saluted.

"Who is that gentleman?" asked her sister.

"I don't know, my dear."

"Not know, when he always bows to you?"

This elicited an explanation, and the ejaculation—"Oh, how romantic!" from the younger.

Romantic it had become. Not only did the handsome horseman cross her path, but he haunted her dreams, and filled her poetic mind with vague imaginings and causeless melancholy.

He stole into her verses as "the stranger;" and in her poetic reveries she indulged at once her newly born desire for solitude and moonlight, strolling at eventide on the path before their own bay windows, her feet on the gravel keeping pace with the measured feet of "ode" or "lyric."

At that time an ancient spring of soft water, never frozen in the severest weather, adjoined the churchyard and Morning Lane. It was enclosed within four walls with a doorway entrance, and was in great repute for tea-making and culinary purposes. This caused considerable traffic along the footpath, which ran south of the graveyard between Hackney and Homerton, and was entered from Church Street by three broad, flat steps and the lych-gate.

It so happened that about this time a rumour gained ground that the churchyard was haunted. A spectre all in white was seen to glide to and fro under the very windows of Mr. Varey's abode, and various speculations were afloat concerning the portent.

No maid was found hardy enough to carry her water-can to the church-well after dusk, after one girl had dropped her pail in affright and run shrieking home without it.

Even men, having occasion to take the short cut, would linger at the lych-gate, or the posts at the other end, until they were joined by others, and gained courage to cross by companionship.

At times the spectral figure appeared seated on a low tomb, close to the grave of a woman who had been smitten down as by a judgment whilst adorning God to strike her dead if she told a lie.

Then it was said the perjured woman's soul could not rest, but was condemned to walk the earth in testimony of her great sin.

Some incredulous persons betook themselves to the long walk to satisfy themselves. But the ghost was erratic, and seldom visible except when the moon was shining. And they maintained that the ghost was nothing but moonshine.

The Vareys heard of it, and laughed. They saw nothing but themselves, and were not to be scared by numskulls.

The autumn leaves yellowed and fell in golden showers; winter came with its wind and rain and driving showers of sleet and snow.

And then the stranger was seen by Miss Varey in long drab overcoat and top boots, and still he raised his hat with graceful courtesy.

The ground was white with snow one February day, when the young lady, equipped in a small scarlet cloak with the hood drawn over her head, and with pattens on her feet, left the "London House," opposite to the church gates, carrying a small parcel of drapery she had purchased there.

In order to gain the opposite side, she was compelled to walk down the hill to the steps near the ford, and after crossing the cartway ascend the corresponding steps to the side walk. It was rather risky for pattered feet, especially in snowy or frosty weather, but she went and returned without a slip. She had passed the rectory, and was about to plant her foot on the first step at the lych-gate, when who should come riding noiselessly down hill but the unknown, and put her all in a flutter with the mere wave of his hat.

The slightest step awry was apt to twist pattens, and the feet within them. Elsie, surprised out of her composure, must have set down her foot incautiously. The patten slipped and she with it.

Before she could recover herself, the stranger was off his horse and by her side.

"I trust, madam, you have sustained no injury," he cried in some concern, as he raised her from the slippery ground.

"I—I—fear I have twisted my ankle," she stammered out; adding, "Oh dear, how shall I manage to get home?" as she found that but for his support she would again have fallen.

By this time a lad from the "London House," by dint of jumping into the roadway and scrambling out of it, had reached the spot, and answered the gentleman's solicitous inquiry respecting the young lady's abode.

"Miss Varey only lives at the red house overlooking the churchyard, Mr. Anderson," said he, giving more information than was asked for.

"Well, my lad, just loosen the pattens that have done the mischief, and hold my horse whilst I help Miss Varey home."

The lad knelt down in the snow, and released the girl's small feet, but her supporter felt her wince as the twisted ankle was freed from the hard patten straps.

She tried to be brave, but could not use her foot.

"Pray do not attempt too much, Miss Varey. You must suffer me to bear you up," said Mr. Anderson, using her name as if he had not then learnt it for the first time; and as if only half sorry for the mishap which privileged him to put his strange arm around her as a genuine support, and at the same time gave a long desired introduction.

Mrs. Varey was overwhelmed alike with distress for her daughter's accident (though sprained ankles were almost common as pattens), and with gratitude to the gentleman who had left his horse to bring her home; and who did not leave until he had placed her on a sofa and obtained permission to call again, "for an assurance that the injury was not serious."

He might not have preferred this request so comportedly had not John Varey entered the room, shaken hands with the stranger, and introduced him as a Mr. Anderson whose business brought him into the neighbourhood, and whose acquaintance he had made long before, when sketching the Angler's Rest and other picturesque spots on the River Lea.

But—not serious! The young lady, who had written sentimental verses over the slipping of a stranger's horse at the ford, grew more and more sentimental as weeks went by, now that he was no more a stranger, but a frequent visitor under their roof, bringing books to relieve the monotony of the hours spent on a couch; more especially when he told how from the time they first met at Hackney ford he had carried her image about with him, and had in fact cultivated her brother's acquaintance in hopes to bring about an introduction—a painless one—to her.

It may be she thought their introduction, as it was, a sufficient panacea for its pain. At all events she bore it very patiently, and when later, in the fine spring weather, she was strong enough to resume her moonlight walks in the churchyard, taking her old seat on the elevated slab when tired of strolling, her poetic reveries had a fuller meaning, her verses a warmer tone. Of anything "serious" to others she did not dream.

Once more the slumbering story of the ghost was revived, and silly nursemaids frightened their young charges with tales of its appearance, thus fostering foolish fears and superstitions.

It chanced one evening when the sweet May moon silvered the fresh foliage and shed a weird light on the grey tablets of the dead that Mr. Anderson encountered by the lych-gate a group of shuddering and terrified people, who warned him not to proceed lest he should lose his senses, for the ghost of the perjured woman was sitting there all in white by her grave, and it was not safe to venture.

He listened, asked when and where the dreaded spirit had been seen, laughed, said it was fancy, or that the ghost was warm flesh and blood.

He might as well have argued with the stones. It was in vain he invited any of the crowd to go forward to the haunted spot.

He went on, laughing as he went. The terrific ghost, arrayed in spotless white, advanced to meet him, and in a minute more was clasped in his strong arms, a loving, living woman.

How merrily she laughed at the mystery she had created by her passion for moonlight musings! How readily she accompanied him to the gate to prove her own identity! And how, on her approach, the people fled, all but one or two of the bravest, who themselves were loth to believe the evidence of their eyes and ears.

The scare had become general. The ghost had been seen at intervals by numbers. The contradiction of one or two could not reach the many.

It was not until Miss Varey went away as the wife of Mr. Anderson, and the house of the Vareys was pulled down to make way for the new church, and busy masons destroyed old associations, that confidence was gradually restored and the path to Church-well frequented as of yore.

But the roadway had been levelled, the brook and ford covered up, the wonderful church, for which no steeple had been planned, stood fair to view, the ancient place of worship had been demolished, leaving its time-worn belfry to ring out the old, ring in the new, long years before the Ghost of Hackney Churchyard vanished from the memory of the living.

To me the story was told on the spot by aged lips; no other than those of the ghost-lady's daughter; herself artistic and poetic—a story I repeat as one more proof how such legends may be "well authenticated by eye witnesses," yet be the varied outcomes of ignorance, cowardice, and superstition.

CINDERELLA'S ANCESTOR.

By EMMA BREWER.

IF we desire to trace our well-known fairy tale of Cinderella back to its home and origin, we must turn our steps towards Egypt, that land of wonders, that treasure-house of ancient wisdom and civilisation from which Phœnicians, Greeks, and Romans alike drew their learning and culture.

We must turn back the leaves of the past nearly five thousand years, to a time when Rome and Greece had no existence, when England and Germany were thick tangled forests, the abode of wild beasts, if we would find the great great grandmother of Cinderella.

Even at so early a period of the world's history Egypt was a highly civilised country, and it is not strange that as new nations gradually spread themselves over the face of the earth they should take the ancient Egyptians as models, and become imbued with their learning and romance; and it is not difficult to imagine that Cinderella, who fascinated us when we were children, and who fascinates us even now, should, although under another name, have fascinated an Egyptian prince nearly five thousand years ago.

This is what she is said to have done, and the account of her doings and sayings—in fact, the story of her life—forms part of the history of ancient Egypt.

The story as here given deals only with one part of our Cinderella, viz., that the girl owes her fortune to the slipper or sandal, the unkind sisters forming no part of it.

There is, however, a separate tale in the ancient records, dealing only with the sisters, which no doubt became grafted on to that of Cinderella.

The story goes that more than four thousand years ago there dwelt in the island of Samos a merchant, with his wife and little daughter Nitakert. He had been very unfortunate in business, and resolved to settle in Egypt in order to redeem his position. What his occupation had been in Samos the record does not state, but in Egypt he opened an inn, such a one as we read of in Genesis, partly a caravanserai and partly a wine-shop.

His life in the new country was none too smooth for him, for the Egyptians were not kind to strangers, and as we know from Bible history they would not even take food at the same table with them.

The merchant's only joy amid his incessant cares and troubles was his little daughter Nitakert. She was good and beautiful, and even the Egyptians who came to the shop for their daily portions of wine were charmed out of their reserve.

As the years went on the fame of her beauty spread gradually over the whole town, and customers and travellers came from far and near to behold the rare beauty of the girl. The business increased daily, and he, the poor unknown stranger, was rapidly becoming a rich and respected merchant. His daughter was busy from morning till night, for all the customers desired to be served by her—indeed, the best in the shop gave no pleasure except she handed it.

Thus it happened that Nitakert had very little leisure; she was kept on the alert all day long; but this never made her cross or peevish; on the contrary, she was always kind and amiable. As gay as a lark she flitted hither and thither, and knew how to please everyone.

If there were by chance a quiet morning, she hastened out to the Nile, attended by a maid-servant, and diving into its clear waters acquired new freshness, power, and love of life, doing much the same as Pharaoh's daughter on the morning she found Moses in the cradle of rushes.

Daily baths were necessary to the Egyptians on account of the great heat and their extraordinary love of cleanliness, a love which could be easily satisfied, as all towns were built by the river or on a wide canal. The bath, too, was surrounded by less of ceremony than with us. The dress to be thrown off was but a single light garment, and a yellow striped cloth bound round the head. Sandals were used only by women and the high born. The undressing, therefore, was but the work of a moment, and almost before the bath was over the sun had dried the bather, and the garments were on again.

One morning Nitakert hurried out with her maid to refresh herself in the waters of the Nile. While still delighting in the bath, the servant, who was already out of the water and dressed, was walking up and down the bank, plucking and making up into a posy the magnificent white lotus flowers which grew in masses on the bank.

These flowers were special favourites with the ladies of ancient Egypt. One scarcely ever saw them, whether out walking, or in society, or on a water excursion without a bunch of them in their hands.

Thus employed, the girl was sauntering to and fro, when suddenly she cried in a loud, excited voice, "Nitakert, Nitakert!" and Nitakert looking up from the water beheld a monster vulture making wide circles over her in the air, and coming ever nearer and nearer. Fear took possession of both the girls; they screamed aloud for help, but there was no one near to aid them. The bird was now exactly over them, and it shot down like an arrow. The girls in terror covered both eyes with their hands. A moment later the wings of the mighty vulture rustled again, and mistress and maid, venturing to look up, saw the bird mounting higher and higher, till it vanished from their sight.

Nitakert sprang out of the water, and fell weeping on the neck of her companion. Her great desire was now to get home, and in dressing discovered what the vulture had done—it had robbed her of one of her sandals. This was no great misfortune; she walked home barefoot, and related the adventure, preserving the remaining sandal in memory of it.

Some little time after this it happened that the King of Egypt journeyed out of his capital into the open country, there to sit in judgment, with his council. At the time of which we are speaking affairs were not judged in courts of justice by special judges, according to written laws; that came into force later on; but the king gave judgment publicly before everybody in the open air, aided by the advice of his Ministers.

The petitioners drew near, laid before him their pleas, received judgment and departed, glad or sorry, according to the tenor of the king's decision.

On the occasion of which we speak, the attention of the council and pleaders was disturbed. First one and then another looked up, pointing towards heaven, and giving vent to cries of surprise.

The king himself raised his head, which had been bent in thought, and beheld!—there, high in the air, hovering over the assembled crowd, was a large vulture. The judgments were forgotten, the proceedings interrupted, and everyone's attention was fixed on the stately bird, who cut the air with his wings, describing first larger and then smaller circles, approaching ever nearer to the assembly of people.

All gazed with breathless expectation, for the vulture (although the two girl-bathers did not know it) was in Egypt an omen of victory and happiness.

At this moment it hovered perpendicularly over the king, and opening one of its claws let something fall. A cry of astonishment issued from a thousand throats at once. Swift as an arrow the vulture shot off, and had soon vanished from all eyes; but in the king's lap lay a tiny sandal.

The king sat speechless, amazement appeared on the faces of the assembled multitude, no one knew what to make of the occurrence. At length the king, breaking silence, asked, "Who will interpret this to me?" One and another nodded their heads thoughtfully, without, however, being able to solve the mystery. At length an old experienced priest stepped forward, and bowing low, said, "Thou, Son of the Sun, hast asked, and thy servant answereth. It is the foot covering of a little maiden which the blessed bird has delivered to thee from the heights of heaven. Up, then, and seek her who has been brought to thy notice in such an extraordinary manner. She will be thy consort and our queen."

All had listened to the words of the sage with attention, and there arose a loud storm of applause.

"Up, up," rang from all sides; "search for the queen."

In triumphal procession the king was conducted back to the town amid the sound of trumpets and the joyful acclamations of the people.

In the city the event of the day was known from individuals who had hurried forward, and soon heralds traversed the capital and made known, amidst the noise of trumpets and drums, that the owner of the sandal was invited to come before the king.

For a wonder the day passed and no one announced herself, yet certainly there was no girl but would gladly have accepted the invitation of the Son of the Sun.

What was to be done? The king had carefully preserved the sandal, and whoever claimed it must not only exactly describe it, but be able to produce its fellow and show that they fitted her feet. No deception was therefore possible, however gladly the Egyptian girls would have attempted it.

In the palace the surprise was great that no one should have come forward to claim it, the belief being that the vulture had not brought it from far. Again the heralds traversed the town and proclaimed a large reward for him through whose aid the unknown maiden should be discovered, but all in vain.

The king had no rest, no pleasure, while this mystery remained unsolved.

"I will and must see her," he cried, "even if I search every hut in my kingdom."

He set off on a journey through the land from the north even to the south, making known as he went his command and desire, and thus it happened that he came to where Nitakert dwelt, and as the herald proclaimed in the open street the object of the king's journey, the answer came from many voices, "That sandal belongs to Nitakert, the lovely stranger; a vulture robbed her of it."

While the bystanders hurried off to Nitakert to communicate to her the herald's announcement, that officer flew back to the king, crying, "Hail to thee, oh king! at last we have found the maiden whom thou seekest."

In the utmost impatience the king moved forward, accompanied by his court. Nitakert had not yet recovered from her amazement when noise and tumult in the street attracted her attention, and running to the door beheld armed men advancing to the sound of cymbals and trumpets, and behind these came archers, followed by a herald, who cried with a loud voice, "Bow the head," and all the people in the street and on the roofs prostrated themselves, crying with loud voices, "Hail to our king, the Son of the Sun."

Now appeared the gilded carriage, drawn by magnificent horses, which in their turn were led by youths robed in white, and within the chariot stood the Son of the Sun, adorned with the red and white royal crown, servants walking on the right and left of him and behind him carrying long poles with fans or screens of ostrich feathers attached, which they held over his head.

The carriage stopped before the wine merchant's door, and the king entered; half an hour later the procession was again in motion, the music ringing out, and the cry of "Bow the head" penetrating the length of the street.

The people rejoiced and shouted "Happiness and blessing to our young queen," for by the king's side stood the lovely Nitakert. Flowers were strewn in the way of the royal chariot, feasts were prepared, accompanied by unfeigned signs of joy and love.

At length the queen arrived in the capital, delighted with everything she saw, but most of all she rejoiced that as time went on she possessed the love of her husband and the respect and devotion of the people. They were devoted to her, and, wrapped about as she was with the mystery of the sandal, they regarded her almost as a celestial being.

And Nitakert deserved this love. She was, in fact, the loving mother of her people; she brought comfort to the deserted, help to the poor, nursing to the sick. No house was too small, no hut too poverty-stricken for her to seek out, spreading happiness and blessing on all sides. Wherever she appeared care and anxiety fled and joy and peace entered.

Years went by, the lovely Nitakert rejoiced in the purest happiness; loving and beloved, she seemed to lack nothing, and had no idea that in all Egypt she had a single enemy.

Yet there were in the kingdom certain people who, holding fast to the ancient right of succession, had never forgiven the king for having so far forgotten what was due to Egypt as to raise a stranger to the throne, and determined to avenge this violation of the laws even at the cost of the king's life.

The secret band of malcontents bound themselves by a solemn oath, therefore, to murder the king and make Nitakert a widow. They carried out their wicked purpose, and we find the once lovely, happy Nitakert a pale, weeping woman, mourning, and wailing, and wringing her hands by the coffin of her beloved husband, with whom she would gladly have been buried. With tears she made the preparations for his burial. All imaginable signs of love and fidelity were lavished on the dead until, on the seventy-second day of mourning, the hour of burial arrived.

When a king of Egypt died the land mourned for seven weeks of ten days each, beside the day of the death and the day of the burial. During these weeks no sacrifice was made to the gods, no music was heard, no festival was kept, no meat eaten, no grapes or wine taken.

As the embalmed corpse was deposited in the western mountains, and the tomb closed, the sorrowing queen leaned on the walled-up door for a long time, praying and weeping. "Sleep well, my beloved," she murmured. "There is but little left for me to do. I will build my grave, and I will avenge thee. Then, and then only, will I come to thee."

Here, properly speaking, we should leave Cinderella's ancestor, for the tragedy and strong-mindedness which mark the end of Nitakert have no counterpart in our dainty little Cinderella, who is to look pretty and be happy ever after. Yet as there is something more to be told of the Egyptian queen, it would not be right to leave it unsaid.

The funeral over, the queen appeared quite changed. She ordered the master builder to come to her, and directed him to build a pyramid, which should contain a tomb for herself, and a subterranean chamber suitable for festal banquets. In the land of Egypt it was customary to seek shelter from the heat in underground rooms, therefore this was no startling direction.

When the plans for both had been discussed and decided on, Nitakert dismissed the master builder with the command that he was to spare nothing in order to finish the work as quickly as possible. Then she devoted herself to State affairs, and did all that came to her hands with such zeal and judgment, that the Egyptians scarcely missed their king.

With the exception of the secret band of murderers, the whole people were attached to her. Young and old, rich and poor, plebeian and aristocrat, had a deep personal love for her, and great respect for her judgment and power. Later generations bear record of her that she was, with the exception of Isis, the noblest and loveliest lady that ever shared the throne with the Son of the Sun.

But her beauty was no longer the same as before her husband's death; laughter never now lighted up her pale suffering features, a jest or joyous word never now passed her lips, and in her quiet moments her heart and thoughts seemed far distant.

Her favourite occupation when the business of the State had been attended to was to go out and inspect her pyramid. This was not being built of yellow lime or sandstone, as was the custom, but of granite, which was obtained far away on the southern borders of Egypt.

The whole year through thousands of workmen were occupied in breaking the stone, in hewing it, and conveying it down the Nile, and then with it forming the mighty monument. With the same zeal the workmen got on with the subterranean room, and when it was complete Nitakert decorated it with royal magnificence. Its inauguration was, however, still put off until the pyramid was finished.

At length, after six years of incessant labour and longing expectation, both works were complete. In the interior of the proudly soaring pyramid was the little burial chamber containing the granite coffin silently awaiting its dead, and the stones for building up the narrow entrance when the coffin should have received its burden.

No one knew, no one in the least suspected, what plan the unhappy Nitakert had hidden in her heart. For some time after the evil deed had been committed the murderers had feared detection and the vengeance of the queen, but time went by and they were still untouched, nay, more, they were left in possession of their offices and dignities. They had not hoped to have thus escaped, and now, after six long years, not one of them dreamed of any danger, the bitterness of death was passed.

It was at this moment, the works complete, the murderers secure, that the queen invited them to a grand banquet in the subterranean room to celebrate the completion of the pyramid. No individual guest knew who beside himself shared the honour of partaking of the royal feast, and when they were assembled they did not observe that of all those who six years before had sworn the king's death not one was absent. Nor were they aware that a wide canal had been constructed under the earth from the Nile to the pyramid, and was kept in bounds by a sluice or dyke outside the door of the ante-room of the very hall wherein they were sitting.

The adornments of the hall were splendid and costly, and hundreds of lights illuminated it. No one could have suspected the ruin to them all lurking behind the walls. The rarest wine sparkled in golden cups, the costliest viands appeared in priceless dishes. Everything which could rejoice the heart was provided in abundance. Gay music and dancing girls were there, and the guests agreed that it was the most splendid feast they had ever partaken of.

With bright eyes the queen glanced at the number of her guests and heard their demonstrations of joy with delight.

Towards the end of the banquet, when the pleasure was at its height, the pale lady suddenly glided out of the hall. She remained a moment standing in the outer room, while she cast a glance at her guests, and then with a steady hand drew back the bar of the sluice and darted up the steps.

Suddenly there sounded a thundering, rushing, and roaring; the folding door of the hall sprang open, and with frightful force the death-bringing stream pressed in.

Speechless with fright, motionless with horror, each one regarded the other. No scream was heard, no word spoken, no effort made to escape; he who stood remained standing, he who lay on the soft cushions did not rise, destruction came too swift and sure. Death came to them in a few seconds, the brimming cups still in their hands.

This was the vengeance of the woman from whom they had taken her dearest, her greatest treasure. As she had been robbed six years before of her whole happiness unexpectedly and unprepared, so should destruction come with lightning rapidity upon those who had dealt her this blow. She determined that they should lose their life just when it was sweetest to them, and before death overtook them that they should see it in all its grimness.

Nitakert in the meantime hurried to a neighbouring building, where for some hours a large fire had been burning; the floor was covered with burning coals, and the flames licked the walls. Here she sought and found death.

On the seventy-second day afterwards a long funeral procession moved towards the pyramid. As was the custom, the Egyptians sat in judgment on the dead queen and pronounced her worthy of honourable burial.

The people never forgot her, but cherished her memory and handed it down to their children and children's children with love and blessings.

More than four thousand years have passed since Cinderella's ancestor was laid to rest in her granite coffin within the pyramid she had built for herself, yet the guide of to-day points it out to the visitor, and tells a strange legend concerning it, which is easy to recognise. He also relates that sometimes in the clear star-lit nights a bright shimmer floods the pyramids, and a lovely woman is seen gliding round the small granite monument in which she was laid to rest, with a smile so intensely sorrowful that once seen can never be forgotten.

It is difficult to say where in this legend truth ends and fiction begins, but it assures us of one thing, that our Cinderella is of ancient lineage and of royal descent, and that the prince who marries her need have no fear of a mésalliance.

That we know anything definite about Cinderella's ancestor is due to the learning and research of Dr. Karl Oppel, who, by diving into old records and hieroglyphics, has made clear to us much that was unknown concerning ancient Egypt, its learning, its customs, its origin, and its history.

THE WRONG COLOUR.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

By LUKE LOVART, Author of "Too Fat," etc.

CHAPTER I.

IT was a fortnight before Christmas, and the weather was what is called seasonable. That is to say, the cold was intense, the sky was like lead, and the air was thick with snow-flakes.

People were waiting in the afternoon for the up express on the platform of the Swindon station. The platform was crowded, so was the refreshment-room, memorable as the scene of so many victories won by scalding soup over hurried passengers.

Amongst the travellers walking up and down on the platform were two young men, clad in ulsters, like the majority of their fellow travellers. They were about the same age, three or four and twenty, and might both be considered good-looking. One of them, however—the darker of the two—had such a quiet demure manner, and smiled so seldom, that he did not attract so much attention as his friend. The latter, with his laughing blue eyes, and fair curly hair, and slender yet athletic frame, looked the very type and model of a young Englishman of the better class. The cold and gloom of the weather seemed powerless to affect him; he laughed and chatted incessantly, as if in the highest spirits.

"It's great luck our meeting like this, Daventry," he said. "I never expected any thing less than to see you here."

"Still, people do meet at junctions, you know," said his friend, drily.

"Oh, of course! Still, you generally meet just the people you don't want to see—your tailor, for instance, who has just written for the tenth time to remind you that his 'little account'—no tailor ever yet had a big account against anyone—is much overdue, and an immediate settlement would be esteemed a favour. Now you, on the contrary, are just the fellow I did want to meet."

"Why?"

"First, because it's always a treat to have a chat with an old chum like you."

"I'm glad I'm of some use in the world," said Daventry. "But what's your second reason?"

"Secondly, because I've something particular to tell you."

"Well, what is it?"

"I'm to be married off hand. It's an awful joke."

"I should have thought it was exactly the reverse."

"Of course I'm not going to let it be done. I intend to preserve my independence."

"Bravo! But how is it menaced?"

"In this way. You have often heard me speak of my uncle—Uncle Jim. In fact, but for Uncle Jim we should never have known each other, as he sent me to Oxford. Well, Uncle Jim has a niece, who is supposed to be rolling in wealth, and he has taken it into his head that I ought to marry her."

"H'm. It seems to me, Cecil, that there is something to be said, after all, for Uncle Jim's plan."

"Looked at superficially, there is a good deal to be said for it, my dear fellow. In the matrimonial state one partner is supposed to supply what the other lacks. What I lack is money; she would supply it. Then, too, it seems the proper thing to keep it in the family. I suppose I shall be Uncle Jim's heir, but I don't know, and, in any case, he is a dear old fellow, though very obstinate, and I couldn't bear the idea of waiting for him to quit the scene. So, as I say, there is much to be said for the matrimonial scheme."

"Well? For I know you don't mean to stop there."

"Unfortunately, there's a great deal more to be said against it. To begin with, the young lady is a West Indian; she hails from Jamaica."

"You don't mean that she's black?"

"How am I to tell? I have never seen her, neither has Uncle Jim."

"Still, I suppose his sister was white."

"Well, you see, the girl's mother isn't quite his sister."

"Not quite his sister! I don't understand these delicate shades of relationship."

"The thing happened in this way. Uncle Jim's brother went out to the West Indies very young, and married a West Indian lady, whether white or coloured no one exactly knows. But he died early without leaving any family, and his widow married again. Of course, the second marriage was so entirely her own business that Uncle Jim never inquired about her second husband. He may have been a regular nigger for anything we know. Well, this second husband is gone now, leaving one child—the heiress—my cousin, as I call her. To his great astonishment, Uncle Jim got a letter the other day from the widow, saying that she intended to settle in England—would he receive her for a little while on her arrival? Of course, he wrote back at once to say how pleased he should be to see them, and since then he has got this idea that I should marry the girl so firmly in his head that I can't get it out again. But it is too preposterous."

"You would naturally like to know her colour first."

"Just so. But, whatever her colour, it doesn't follow that she would suit me. Besides, I don't want to marry. I've seen many nice girls, but not one nice enough to make me willing to give up my independence."

"And you will either marry for love or not at all?"

"Certainly, I won't marry for money."

"You forget that you are living in the nineteenth century."

"I don't see what that has to do with it. It doesn't make me nineteen hundred years old. I'm only twenty-three."

"Still, you should live up to the principles of your time. Nowadays money is everything."

"Well, money would never make me marry her, and I know you would be the last fellow to advise it."

"You seem to take it for granted that the young lady will at once accept anyone who offers."

"I don't know. Uncle Jim thinks she'd be sure to accept me."

"It is very wrong of him to foster your conceit in that way."

"Perhaps," said Cecil, more slowly, as if pondering on a new idea, "she might object to me. That would be a very simple way out of the difficulty, and Uncle Jim couldn't blame me then. You see, he has set his heart upon it, and I shall be sorry to disappoint him, as he's been awfully good to me. But one can't sell oneself body and soul to oblige even a pet uncle."

"Of course you'll have to meet the girl?"

"Exactly. That's what I'm scheming about now."

"How not to do it?"

"Well now, to cut it as short as possible. The two mulattos are expected at Grayhurst, my uncle's place in Kent, almost immediately, and my uncle wanted me to spend the next fortnight with them there. He knew I was idling away my time in the country, so I am going up to Oxford again, that I may be able to postpone my visit with a better grace. I don't intend to go down there till Christmas Eve. I shall only stay just over Christmas, so I shan't see much of them. But it's put a stop to my shooting, which is a nuisance. Hullo! here's my train at last. How late it is! Good-bye, old fellow; I wish you were coming with me."

"You must write and tell me how the comedy—or shall I say, tragedy? progresses."

"Certainly; but it's all a farce, you know. Good-bye."

CHAPTER II.

THE express laboured into the station over the snow-covered lines. There was a rush for the carriages, which were already pretty full. When Cecil had shaken hands with his friend, he found he was already too late to secure such a place as he wanted. In fact, all the carriages were full except one, which was avoided for a very evident and sufficient reason. At the window was a baby, which was taking advantage of the occasion to exercise its lungs to the fullest extent.

Cecil passed and repassed this carriage, but shirked it every time. He wanted to be quiet, and he didn't like babies. He was good-natured enough, and could make himself on occasion very popular with children. But a baby was a different thing. In his eyes it was a mere kind of elastic contrivance for making hideous noises, and otherwise rendering life a burden. At last, however, he had to come to a decision. The train was so late that the customary ten minutes were reduced to three, and the scalding soup defended itself against the passengers with even greater success than usual. He was just going to open the door and jump in when he heard a harsh, croaking voice from inside the carriage say, "Keep the child at the window; we don't want anyone else in here."

Cecil would have withdrawn, but it was too late.

"Jump in, sir, if you're going," cried the guard, and in he jumped, past the howling little dragon that guarded the entrance. Much discomfited, he threw himself back in a corner and glanced at his fellow-passengers. In front of him was the child, still squalling. It had been squalling before, because it had not been taken out of the carriage; it was squalling now, because it was not allowed to put its head out of the window, which the mother had already closed. The mother herself was a more attractive object. She was very young, and becomingly dressed in a dark travelling costume trimmed with fur. Her complexion was pale but exquisitely delicate, and there was something in the contrast between this pallor and the sparkling, roguish eyes that struck Cecil as being distinctly fascinating. As for the elderly lady at the other end of the carriage, she was such a mass of furs and shawls and railway rugs that he could not make much out of her. He had the impression, however, that she was by nature thin, not to say skinny, and that she had a nose with a very high bridge to it, which might indicate aristocratic descent. It was clear that she regarded his entrance into the carriage as a distinct intrusion. After a little preliminary sniffing, for which her nose seemed well adapted, she proceeded to formulate a kind of visible protest against his presence by building up a fortification of books and bags and bonnet-boxes between herself and him. There was ample room for this upon the seat, and it seemed to gratify the old lady. When her parallels were complete and she felt herself adequately entrenched, she began to talk to the younger lady in a way which seemed to Cecil the reverse of exhilarating. Her first remark was—

"We're a pair of idiots!"

The young lady smiled, revealing as she did so a set of the most dainty little teeth.

"I have never professed to be anything else," she said; "but why do you include yourself, aunt?"

"Because anyone with a grain of sense would have stayed at home on a day like this, instead of travelling. The cold is perfectly frightful. I believe the foot-warmer is frozen."

"Won't you wrap a rug round your feet?"

"Don't you see that I have a rug round them already? But it's of no use at all."

"I am very sorry. What is to be done?"

"If Gulcher was here, she would be able to do something for me. I never will travel without my maid again."

"But she is to meet you at Paddington, is she not?"

"Paddington! Yes; but that doesn't help me now."

"Can't I do anything for you? I wish I could."

"Dr. Brandison said I must never have cold feet."

"What a pity he didn't say how you were to help having them. That would have been more to the purpose, wouldn't it?"

"Oh, but he did say. He's not at all the sort of man to leave anything in a state of vagueness. He was most clear and decided."

"Still, it's no good, if you haven't the remedy with you, aunt."

"I have it with me, child—that's what makes it so provoking."

"I really can't understand you."

"Of course not. Everything must be put in black and white for an unsympathetic nature. But I don't choose to be so explicit before strangers. If we were alone it would be different."

Cecil felt more uncomfortable than ever. It was clear that the old lady's last remark was levelled at him.

"I am very sorry that my presence should inconvenience you in any way," he said mildly.

The old lady sniffed more vehemently than ever.

"I am not aware, sir, that I said it did," she remarked, in her most disagreeable manner.

If the old lady had been a man, Cecil would have fired up. As it was, he preserved his temper, and said, with a smile—

"I did my best to leave you the carriage to yourselves."

"A very pretty compliment!" exclaimed the old lady. "You hear that, my dear?"

"But," continued Cecil, "the train was so full that I was forced to intrude upon you. However, I will get out at the next station."

"We don't stop till we get to Didcot," remarked the old lady in a despairing tone.

"Well, I really can't get out of an express train when it's going at full speed. You can hardly expect that."

"I expect nothing, sir, from the present generation."

Cecil was staggered by the far-reaching pessimism of the remark, but he felt grateful that nothing had been added about "vipers." Still bent on conciliation, if that were possible, he now said—

"Meanwhile, I wish you would regard me as not being here at all. I will try to go to sleep, and, in any case, I promise you not to open my eyes."

"That's ridiculous!" said the old lady. "You can't neutralise your presence merely by closing your eyes."

"What else am I to do, then?" asked Cecil, growing desperate. It seemed quite impossible to mollify this she-dragon.

"I have not asked you to do anything," said the old lady. "And if I die of cold feet, of course it will make no difference to you."

Cecil did not answer. He even thought for one moment that he could have attended her funeral without requiring more than one pocket-handkerchief, she was so very disagreeable; but he dismissed the unworthy thought as soon as it presented itself, and glanced at the young lady opposite him. Unless he was greatly mistaken, there was an expression of amusement on her delicate features. Her baby was asleep, and as he looked at her she bent forward a little and whispered to him—

"I hope you will excuse my aunt; she is not very well, and the journey this cold day has upset her."

"I am only so sorry to inconvenience her."

"Pray do not mention it."

During this long colloquy the old lady had turned her back upon them, and was apparently engaged in unfastening some travelling-bag, for shortly afterwards there was heard from that corner a kind of gurgling fugue, in which the main theme was adhered to with surprising tenacity through a vast number of variations. When this melody at last came to an end, the old lady looked round with an air of such lamb-like innocence that it would have taken in a Bow Street magistrate but for the somewhat unnatural warmth that now suffused her countenance.

"I hope your feet are a little warmer, aunt," said her niece, demurely.

The old lady was certainly better; for she answered quite graciously—

"Thank you, I think they are a little. Dr. Brandison is really a most able man. It is quite astonishing to me the pitch of perfection to which the art of medicine has been brought nowadays. A good doctor seems to know exactly what will cure even the most obscure complaints. Take cold feet, for example. How are you to get at them? Foot-warmers are all very well, when they're warm, but, even then, they only warm the feet superficially. But if you go to a good doctor he can warm them internally—isn't it wonderful?"

Her niece hastened to agree with her. She did not add that Dr. Brandison was even more wonderful than her aunt represented him to be, inasmuch as he was in the habit of curing a whole number of complaints with the same medicine. In the present case the effect was so satisfactory that ere long the old lady fell asleep. Then Cecil looked again at the niece.

At this moment she dropped her right-hand glove, which she had just taken off. Cecil hastened to pick it up. As he did so, a letter fell out of his breast pocket on to the lady's lap.

"I beg your pardon," he said, as she handed it to him.

The lady murmured something by way of thanking him for her glove. Then she seemed to hesitate a moment before taking off her left-hand glove. Finally, instead of taking it off, she put on the right-hand one again.

There was a long pause, and then Cecil ventured to say—

"We seem to be travelling very slowly."

"Yes; but it doesn't matter so much now, as my aunt and the baby are both asleep."

"I was afraid you might find it tedious."

"Not particularly. By the way, I hope you won't think of getting out at Didcot on our account."

"I have to change there in any case," said Cecil, "as I am going to Oxford."

"I am sorry my aunt was in such a bad temper just now; but she doesn't mean all she says. She is really very good-hearted."

"Oh, indeed!" said Cecil, not without a trace of surprise in his tone.

"For instance, it is very good of her to take me up to town, as she is doing now."

The young lady looked so pretty as she said this that Cecil felt really grateful to her aunt for having given him, however unwillingly, the opportunity of seeing her. Of course, as a married lady, she could be nothing to him except a pleasant travelling companion, but that she certainly was. She seemed to have no objection to chat with him, and became, in fact, quite communicative.

"We have been to Bristol to meet a friend of my aunt's who comes from the West Indies," she said.

"Indeed," answered Cecil, with increased interest. "I am expecting to meet a lady from the same quarter very soon."

"Really! The lady I am speaking of comes from Jamaica."

"So does mine."

"You don't say so? It can't possibly be the same lady—Mrs. Matthews?"

"It is, though," said Cecil. "If she has a daughter named Kate."

"Precisely; there's a daughter of that name—the only one."

"How very odd!" said Cecil. "Do you know them well?"

"Yes, very well. Don't you?"

"Not in the least. I didn't know they'd ever been in England before. Is the young lady very beautiful?"

At this question Cecil's companion was unable to restrain a laugh, which seemed to imply that there was something eminently ludicrous in the idea of Kate Matthews being a beauty.

"Well, I mustn't say too much," she said.

"Still (with another laugh at the grotesqueness of the idea), no one, I think, would call her beautiful."

"Do tell me a little about her," asked Cecil, eagerly. "You see I don't know her in the least. She's absolutely nothing to me."

"Well, what do you want to know about her?"

"Of course she's white?" asked Cecil, dubiously.

"Ah, I see you know nothing about her. She isn't, of course, quite black, and she doesn't open every conversation with 'Yah! Yah!' But she's certainly very strange-looking. After all, it's a mere matter of taste, and some people rather like the negro features—there's a richness and fulness about them which you don't find in a European face."

"No, indeed," said Cecil, thankfully.

"She is considered very lively," continued the lady, "and has quite a fund of merriment."

"A sort of female Christy minstrel," thought Cecil.

"You don't know how she laughs about a cousin of hers, a young fellow fresh from Oxford. It seems he's dying with love for her, though he's never seen her."

"If he had seen her, it would have been still stranger."

"You are too severe. However, as a matter of fact, it is pretty well understood that her cousin is not so much in love with her as with her money, for I believe she is rich."

"It's a disgraceful falsehood!" exclaimed Cecil, indignantly.

"Dear me! What very strong language. Is he a friend of yours that you speak so decidedly?"

"Well," said Cecil, in some embarrassment, "I imagine I must be the cousin whom Miss Matthews judges so charitably."

"Indeed! I am sure I beg your pardon. I thought you said she was merely an acquaintance."

"I don't know what she is," said Cecil, pettishly. "She's not an acquaintance, for I've never seen her; and she isn't a cousin, for her father is no connection of mine; but it is quite clear that she is a most disagreeable and objectionable person, to be avoided as much as possible."

"You mustn't be too hard on her. After all, almost everyone marries for money nowadays."

"Well, I won't," said Cecil. "If I can't marry for love, I won't marry at all. I think it a most odious imputation, and Miss Matthews ought to be ashamed of herself for making it."

"Shall I tell her so?"

"I wish you would. It would save trouble in the end. If she already knows my opinion of her when we meet, she won't expect so much attention from me."

The conversation took another turn, and lasted until the train reached Didcot. Cecil found his companion very entertaining, and was more and more taken with her delicate beauty. Altogether, he was quite sorry when the train stopped and the time came for him to take his leave. Both the aunt and the baby had slept the whole time, to Cecil's great satisfaction. Now they both awoke simultaneously, the one with a cry, the other with a gasp.

"Are we there?" asked the old lady.

"Where, aunt?"

"Why, Paddington, of course."

"No. This is Didcot."

"Oh, dear, my feet are colder than ever. Does this gentleman get out here?"

"Yes," said Cecil; "I change here for Oxford."

He bowed to the old lady, or rather to her back, for she had already turned round in search of Dr. Brandison's famous panacea, wished the niece good-bye, patted the baby on the cheek, and left the carriage with more than a transient feeling of regret.

Arrived at his rooms at Oxford, he wrote the following letter:—

"My dear Daventry,

"Just a few lines to tell you of a curious coincidence. I travelled to Didcot with a most charming lady, who knows my cousin very well, and who confirmed all my worst fears about her. The best that can be said of her is that she is not absolutely black; and she has a most spiteful and malicious temper. And yet I find here a letter from my uncle pressing me to come to Grayhurst at once, and assuring me that I shall like her very much. I am afraid the poor fellow must be getting into his dotage if he thinks I can fall in love with a mulatto. But perhaps he has not seen her himself yet. Anyhow, I shall stay here till Christmas Eve. Dull as it is, I am thankful to be at a safe distance from the Jamaica beauty.

"Ever yours,

"CECIL WILSON."

CHAPTER III.

CECIL kept his resolution. For a fortnight he remained at Oxford, reading law and boring himself terribly. Then, in the afternoon of Christmas Eve, he started for Grayhurst. He timed his hansom to arrive there in good time to dress for dinner, and, as his uncle was out, he went up straight to his room. When he had dressed, he came down to the drawing-room, which he found tenanted by one lady only. To his astonishment and delight, it was the lady with whom he had travelled to Didcot.

"I'm so glad you're here!" he exclaimed. "I was afraid there was no one but the mulatto and her mother."

"She is certainly here," said the young lady, demurely.

"And how's the baby?" he asked, with a smile. "Quite well, I hope?"

"I believe it is; but I have not seen it since the journey."

Cecil looked at her in astonishment. For a mother she seemed to take but a very limited interest in the child.

"It was all a chapter of accidents that day," said the lady. "I had to be in London on some legal business, but my mother was too poorly to take me up, so my aunt very kindly took me instead. But she didn't much like the expedition, as you saw. Then, to make matters worse, we had to take up her little granddaughter to her mother in London; and, to crown it all, my aunt's maid couldn't accompany us, for she was already in London, and mine had to stop with my mother."

Cecil did not take much interest in these details. The one thing that did interest him—and he was surprised to find how very much it did so—was that the young lady was not married after all. He glanced involuntarily at her left hand. No; of course there was no wedding-ring upon it. Then he glanced again at her face. Yes; she was certainly very pretty, and the special refinement and delicacy of her beauty fascinated him more than ever. It was uncommon; it was not the pink and white of ordinary beauty. In a moment, with the impetuosity of his age and character, he formed a resolution. He would make desperate love to this girl. If she accepted him, well and good; she was the first he had ever met for whose sake he felt that he would be willing to sacrifice his independence. And even if she declined him, it would serve to protect him from the mulatto, and to convince his uncle that that scheme at any rate was hopeless.

It seemed to him that he made immense progress in a very short time. Every moment he felt was precious; for might not his cousin descend upon him? However, she did not come.

"HE TIMED HIS HANSON TO ARRIVE THERE IN GOOD TIME."

Presently his uncle entered the room and welcomed him with his usual cordiality.

"Ah," he said, with a beaming smile, "I see there is no need to introduce you."

At this moment a number of guests were announced and his uncle had only just time to whisper, "You will take her into dinner, Cecil," before he advanced to receive them.

There was a large party, and the conversation throughout the dinner was general. Still, Cecil managed to get a little confidential talk with his neighbour.

"By the way," he said, "though we didn't exactly need an introduction, I don't think I know your name."

"I promised Miss Matthews not to tell you."

"What a tiresome person that Miss Matthews seems to be! I suppose this is her revenge for my message to her. By-the-bye, where is she?"

"I don't see her anywhere. Her mother, I know, is not very well and is keeping her room."

"Oh, then I suppose the daughter is with her. What a mercy!"

His companion said nothing in reply, but began to speak on another topic. Everything she said had its own special charm for Cecil. He was already really in love with her.

After the party had separated for the night, Cecil received a visit in his own room from his uncle.

"The first moment I've had for a quiet word with you, Cecil," he said, throwing himself into an armchair. "Well, there's no need to ask you how you like the girl. You seem quite gone already."

"You're right, uncle. I'm afraid it isn't quite what you would like; but really I can't help myself."

"It is exactly what I like. Surely you know that."

Cecil stared.

"I thought you wanted me to marry the mulatto."

Uncle Jim burst into a fit of laughter.

"I don't know whom you mean by the mulatto; but this girl's your cousin."

Cecil started to his feet.

"You don't mean it really, uncle!" he exclaimed.

"Certainly; there's no doubt about it—Kate Matthews."

"Oh! She wouldn't tell me her name."

"So she has been mystifying you, has she? She's full of mischief, as playful as a kitten; but a dear good girl."

"Indeed she is," said Cecil, ardently, "and the prettiest I've ever seen. But I'm afraid she isn't a bit in love with me."

"You haven't given her time. Why didn't you come a fortnight ago, as I wanted you to do?"

"I wish I had!"

However, though one fortnight had been

"Well, I knew you didn't want me for that, Cecil. That point was cleared up long ago in the train, and I was very glad of it. You see, I had the advantage of you there, for I knew you and you didn't know me."

"How did you know me? I can't imagine."

"You forget the letter you dropped on to my lap."

"Oh, I remember now. But I did not think you had noticed the name."

"But I did, Cecil. Girls are sharper than you think. Do you know, I had quite a prejudice against you at that time."

"When you knew nothing of me! Surely that was rather cruel."

"I had been warned against you. I had been told that you were very handsome."

"Well, there's no great harm in that, is there? Only, unluckily, it isn't true in my case."

"No, that wasn't the worst," continued Kate. "I was told that you were very conceited."

"I wonder if that's true," said Cecil.

"Oh, there's something in it, you may be sure," said Kate, archly. "But the thing that really prejudiced me against you, was that everybody said that you were going to snap me up."

"Well, so I have," said Cecil, with an air of great satisfaction. "I think that shows my good taste."

"You don't understand. I have always had such a dread that, because I am rich, I should never be quite sure that I was really loved for myself alone. Well, you spoke out clearly enough about that in the train, and I began to like you even then."

"Well, you haven't any doubt now, dearest?"

Kate did not answer this question in words, but she nestled a little closer to Cecil, and they had been by no means far apart before. Then, all at once, she flew out of his arms and began to examine a palm-leaf with a minuteness of observation that would have done credit to Sir Joseph Hooker.

Cecil looked up in much astonishment and saw the explanation of the mystery. His uncle was advancing towards them.

"Yes," said his uncle, with what he fancied infinite tact and humour; "that is a date palm, and it forms an excellent setting for what is never out of date."

"THERE WAS A LARGE PARTY."

lost, another was found, and even a third, and by the end of that time things had got so far that Cecil ventured to propose. The event took place in the hothouse, beneath a palm which bent caressingly over the young couple. When what may be called the essentials were over, they indulged in one or two reminiscences.

"To think that after all you should care for the mulatto," said Kate, smiling.

"My only difficulty was your money, darling," said Cecil.

VARIETIES.

A COOKERY SCHOLAR.

"And so," said George, "you are really attending a cookery school, Miss Clara?"

"Yes," answered she, brightly, "and it is such fun."

"I suppose you can make nice bread already?"

"No," said she, "I have nothing to do with making bread; but I can make lovely angel cake. I am only taking the classical course."

BEFORE AND AFTER MARRIAGE.—Before marriage we cannot be too inquisitive and discerning in the faults of the person beloved, nor after it too dim-sighted and superficial.—Addison.

HOW TO BE HAPPY.

A man who was very sad once heard two boys laughing. He asked them—

"What makes you so happy?"

"Happy?" said the elder, "why, I makes Jim glad and gets glad myself."

This is the true secret of a happy life; to live so that by our example, our kind words and deeds, we may help someone else. It makes life happier here, and Heaven will be happier for the company of those we have, by God's help, brought there.

SPEAKING OF FRIENDSHIP.—Friendship is like a debt of honour; the moment it is talked of it loses its real name and assumes the more ungrateful form of obligation.

THE HAPPY FIRESIDE.—If people wish to live well together they must not hold too much to logic, and suppose that everything is to be settled by sufficient reason. Dr. Johnson saw this clearly with regard to married people when he said, "Wretched would be the pair above all names of wretchedness who should be doomed to adjust by reason every morning all the minute details of a domestic day." But the application should be much more general than he made it. There is no time for such reasonings, and nothing that is worth them.—Sir Arthur Helps.

WELL EDUCATED.—When you have learned to listen you have already acquired the rudiments of a good education.

DISHES FOR A CHRISTMAS PARTY.

By PHYLLIS BROWNE.

r this festive season, when so many people are on hospitable deeds intent, it is satisfactory to be able to add to our list of approved sweet dishes. It is hoped that the following suggestions and recipes will be acceptable.

Punch Torte.—Take half or three-quarters of a pound of Savoy finger biscuits—the quantity used must be determined by the size of the dish required. Make a syrup by boiling three or four lumps of sugar in half a teacupful of water, and adding the strained juice of a lemon. The amount of sugar needed will depend upon the acidity of the lemon. The syrup should be pleasantly acid and pleasantly sweet. Dip the finger biscuits into the syrup while it is hot, so that they may quickly soak through, and arrange them at once in a pyramid on the glass dish in which the torte is to be sent to table. The higher the pyramid the better, so long as it is not lop-sided. After the biscuits are in position, the syrup which drains from them should be taken up with a teaspoon and poured over the top, so that they may be thoroughly basted. Take the yolks of six fresh eggs, three wineglassfuls of sherry, and three tablespoonfuls of sugar. Put the yolks of eggs into a double pan, or if this is not at hand, into a jar which can be placed in a saucepan with boiling water round it. Pour the sherry over the eggs, and mix them a little, then add the sugar. There will not seem to be very much sauce, but before it is finished it will increase to three or four times its bulk. Put the saucepan on the fire, and whisk the mixture with an egg-whisk while the water boils round it, until it rises in a froth and begins to get thick and smooth. Take it off at once when it reaches this point, and let it go cold. A few minutes before the dish is served, pour the sauce by tablespoonfuls over and around the biscuits. Whisk the whites of the eggs to froth, sweeten them slightly, colour to a light pink with cochineal, and pile upon the preparation as a garnish. If more convenient, the biscuits may be soaked, and the sauce made some hours or even a day before the torte is wanted; but the sauce must not be poured over the biscuits until the last thing. Also, if preferred and for the sake of economy, good raisin wine may be used instead of sherry, as the process of boiling somewhat robs the wine of its distinctive flavour. This dish is very simple, very delicious, and not expensive when compared with preparations of a similar character, because no cream enters into its composition. The sauce was invented by Carême, the most celebrated cook of the present century, of whom it was once said that “if one were under the necessity of eating up either an elephant or our grandfather, it would be well that Carême should prepare the sauce.” Some people think that this sauce was one of Carême’s happiest efforts.

Bavarois.—(Half a dozen recipes in one.)—Blanch and bruise six bitter almonds, and put them, with the very thin rind of a fresh lemon, into a pint of milk. Let them infuse for a while until the flavour is well drawn out; then bring the milk to the boil. Sweeten it with five ounces of sugar, and pour it boiling upon the yolks of three eggs. Return the mixture to the jar or double pan, set it on the fire again and stir it till it is thick and smooth. Let it cool, then put with it one ounce of gelatine which has been soaked and dissolved, and half a pint of cream which has been whipped till firm. Put the preparation into a mould which has been rinsed first in hot, and afterwards in cold water: turn out and serve upon a glass dish.

The preparation now produced may be made into half a dozen sweets, according to the way in which it is finished, and flavoured, for the flavour may be varied in many ways. Vanilla and brandy, coffee, tea, fruit syrup, or what not, may be used instead of almonds and lemons; or two ounces of candied cherries and two ounces of candied citron cut small, or three ounces of preserved ginger, and one ounce of pistachio kernels blanched and chopped, can be stirred in when the cream is on the point of setting. Here we have variations of the Bavarois, every one of which is so unlike the other in taste, that no one would think they were made from the same recipe. The garnish also may be varied, because in no instance should the cream be put by itself into a mould; that would be a painful waste of good material. The cream will look very pretty if light coloured jelly, which will occupy space to the depth of about an inch, be allowed to set before the Bavarois (as the preparation of custard and cream is called) is poured in. It will look still prettier if the mould is completely lined with jelly before the Bavarois is placed within it. An easy way of doing this, and one which can be managed without ice, is to place a mould of a rather smaller size inside the mould that is to be used, and to fill the space between the two with liquid jelly. When this is set the smaller mould may be taken out, and the cream, which should be just on the point of setting, put in its stead.

When girls have a party on their minds, and intend to make a number of dishes of the sort described, it is an advantage to be able to calculate exactly how much material will be needed so that there may be no waste. If we get a clear idea of what we are aiming at before we commence proceedings, we shall save both time, labour, and money. Some girls would make each mould separately, but this would be a very wearisome business. Others would follow the recipe exactly, and take the chance of the quantities being right. The consequence would be either that their moulds would not be filled, which would be disappointing, or they would not contain all the cream which was made, which would involve loss. What they have to do, therefore, is to endeavour to make the exact quantity which will fill the moulds they have at command. To do this they must make their calculations from their moulds, which will, of course, vary in size and number in every household.

Collect the moulds that are to be used, therefore, in the first instance, no matter what their number, shape, and size may be. Half fill them with milk, then empty all the milk into one measure and measure it. It is to be used to make the custard, which will be the basis of each Bavarois. Next prepare the moulds, rinse them well first in boiling water, then in cold water, and remember they are to be left wet. Now decorate them in any approved way. The decoration ought to be done early, because it will need time to set. If coloured jelly is used it should have time to get firm before the cream is added; if any special decoration, such as preserved fruits, sliced pistachios, angelica, or silver or gold leaf is to be set in jelly, it should be placed in position, and then liquid jelly should be put gently over it with a spoon, so as to cover it entirely, and keep it from moving. This is a secret of successful decoration, to cover the garnish lightly with jelly, and to let the garnish become quite firm before the cream is placed upon it.

Measure the milk, and for each pint allow three-quarters of an ounce of gelatine in warm weather, and one ounce of gelatine in cold weather. Allow also for each pint of milk three eggs and half a pint of cream, and a tablespoonful of sugar for each egg. Put the gelatine to soak in good time. When giving recipes we are accustomed to say soak the gelatine for ten minutes; this is quite correct, as ten minutes will do for it; still, an hour is better, because the gelatine dissolves in a minute or two when it is thoroughly well soaked.

One way of saving time and trouble is to let the milk boil before pouring it on the eggs in making the custard. Many girls are afraid to do this. They think that it will make the eggs curdle. But if the milk is sweet and the eggs are good, there will be no fear of curdling, and if the ingredients are not good we should be fortunate if we discovered the fact now, before further mischief is done. The eggs should be lightly beaten and the boiling milk poured upon them, off the fire, and the two should be mixed very thoroughly before anything else is done. Also, after the eggs and milk are mixed, the custard should be thickened over the fire, but it should not on any account be allowed to reach the boiling point. If it did, it would curdle without doubt. To prevent this, it should be put into a double pan, or into a jug placed in a saucepan of boiling water, and stirred without ceasing until it becomes thick and coats the spoon. Then it should be taken off the fire at once, because if left it would become lumpy. Now every one who is accustomed to make custard knows that if milk and eggs are put when cool into a jug, and set in a saucepan of water to be stirred till thick, they are a long time before they become thick and smooth; indeed, they are so long, that oftener than not the individual who has to stand over the saucepan and stir, grows weary of her task, comes to the conclusion that the game is not worth the candle, and after a time in desperation pours the contents of the jug into an ordinary saucepan, sets it on the fire, and gets it burnt or curdled straight away. There is, however, no occasion for all this worry. If the milk is poured boiling over the eggs, and if the mixture is at once put into the double pan with boiling water round it, a few minutes will be sufficient to thicken it; and there will be no fear of spoiling it either, because being surrounded with boiling water it cannot boil, and custard spoils through being boiled. All we need to do is to be careful to keep the water boiling round it, and to keep on stirring it, making the spoon touch the bottom of the pan with every turn of the arm; then the custard will be everything that could be wished with no trouble at all. In making custard, as in many other of the more delicate operations of cooking, girls might avoid many an accident if they would but realise that no food can be brought up to the boiling point in a pan or jar that is surrounded with boiling water. This fact it is which makes a double saucepan so valuable.

Where a double saucepan is not available, however, and a jug has to be used instead, there is a danger ahead against which we need to be on our guard. It is this: the jug into which the hot custard is put must itself have been heated gradually, or it will be liable to crack and come in two pieces when put into the hot water. An accident of this kind is most annoying. When we have taken pains to make some excellent custard, we do not want to dilute it with a large quantity of hot water. More than once have I known this mischance to occur; and on one occasion the poor girl who had the custard in charge burst into a flood of bitter tears, wept long and loud, and refused to be comforted. One way to prevent the accident is to put the jug or jar which is to contain the custard, to get hot with the water which surrounds it; then it is hot enough to allow of hot custard being poured into it. A better way even than this is to provide ourselves with a porridge pan, or double pan. The inner pan of the utensil being made of white china, is so thoroughly sweet and clean that it is a satisfaction to use it, whilst it soon saves its price in preventing food being spoilt.

The custard being made, it may be left till cool; yet not left entirely, for it must be stirred every now and again to keep it from skimming on the top. The cream is the next consideration. I have before now spoken in detail of whipping cream, therefore the remarks made need not be repeated. It is, however, worth while to mention that when economy is a consideration, or when the richness of a large quantity of cream is considered objectionable, half the measure of cream may be taken, and white of egg used instead of the remainder. As the yolks only of eggs are needed for custard, whites of eggs are sure to be available. Of course, both the whites of eggs and the cream must be whisked till firm.

The order of making up the different creams is the same. The custard should first be flavoured. If brandy is to be introduced, a tablespoonful of the spirit will be sufficient for a pint of custard. If liqueurs are preferred, a wineglassful may be allowed. The custard must be cool, and the gelatine must be cool before the two are mixed; but neither must be cold, or they will not "come together" properly. The cream and white of egg should be added last of all, and the Bavaiois should not be moulded until it is on the point of setting.

When preserved ginger is to be used as a flavourer, it should be cut into very thin slices and stewed for a few minutes in its own syrup, then allowed to cool before it is stirred into the cool custard. Ginger syrup is usually served with this cream as a sort of sauce.

Rice Cream is a very simple preparation, but it is much liked by those who know it. Soak half an ounce of gelatine in cold water to cover it. Put three tablespoonfuls of Carolina rice into a saucepan with a pint of cold water. Let it boil up, then drain away the hot water and wash the rice in cold water. Drain it again, and boil it very gently with a pint of milk, till the milk is absorbed. Sweeten it pleasantly, and flavour it as approved. Boil a quarter of a pint of milk, pour it upon the beaten yolk of one egg, and stir the custard over the fire in the usual way till it thickens. Add this with the gelatine dissolved, to the rice, and last of all add one gill of whipped cream. Set a gallipot with a weight in it in the centre of a plain round mould, and arrange the rice around. Turn it out when cold, and fill the space occupied by the gallipot either with cream, which has been whisked till firm and coloured pink, or with stewed fruit of some kind.

Apple Cream.—One or two very excellent though simple sweet dishes may be made with apples, and these are generally liked because they are refreshing to the palate. It is important, however, that the apples chosen should be of a fine flavour. Some people have an idea that baking-apples are simply apples not good enough for dessert apples. This is a mistake. The fact is that it is much easier to choose a good dessert apple than it is to choose a good baking apple, and when there is any doubt about the quality of those which are offered to us, it is much the best to take a known "dessert" variety, such as Blenheim, Flanders, or Ribston pippins, rather than to take apples simply because they will fall. To make the cream, pare and core the apples, and cut them into quarters, then weigh them. Soak half an ounce of gelatine in as much water as will cover it. Put the apples into a jar with the rind and juice of a small lemon, and a quarter of a pound of loaf sugar. Cover the jar closely, set it in a saucepan of boiling water, and steam the apples till they fall. Take out the lemon rind and beat the apple pulp in a basin. Mix thoroughly with it the gelatine which has been melted over the fire, and when nearly cool add half a pint of cream which has been whisked till firm. A few drops of cochineal may also be added for the sake of colour. Put the preparation into a mould which has been rinsed in hot and afterwards in cold water and left wet, and turn out when stiff. When wine is not objectionable, it makes a change of flavour to put a glass of port into the apples while they are steaming.

Oranges and Cream.—Peel six or eight St. Michael's oranges, and carefully divide them into sections, freeing them entirely from pith. Put the strained juice and very thin rind of one lemon, also a little of the orange rind, into an enamelled saucepan with a cupful of water, and a cupful of loaf sugar. Boil to a clear syrup, then put in the orange sections and let them boil a few minutes. Take the oranges out, and let the syrup boil a little longer till thick, and if approved put a teaspoonful of brandy into it. Let the sections become quite cold, then place them in layers in a glass dish; sprinkle desiccated cocoanut over each layer, and moisten with the syrup. Pile whipped cream on the top. The cream should be arranged last thing before serving, but the syrup should be poured over the cocoanut a little while before the dish is required.

THREE FLOWERS.

A NEW YEAR PARABLE.

New Year stood at the World's threshold as the midnight bells died away into silence. In his hand he held three buds, white flowerbuds, folded tightly in their fresh green leaves. And in the hush that fell upon the sleeping city, a sound of heavenly music trembled through the air.

The New Year stepped very softly to a casement whence shone one little light, burning brightly through the darkness like a star.

A maiden was watching behind her mother's sick bed, and she rose and opened the window to greet the new comer.

"What will he bring, this strange New Year?" she said to herself as she looked out upon the night.

"I have brought you flowers from the garden of God," said the New Year, whispering among the ivy-leaves. "Take care of them, and when you see them open their petals, know that your Father is going to give you, and those you love, His greatest blessings, more than you can ask or think."

And when she looked upon the sill there lay three buds, the infant flowers of the snowdrop, the violet, and the rose.

So she took them reverently, and waited with patience till they should bloom.

The days passed, one by one, on their way up to God, and pale spring sunshine fell, like His smile, upon the frozen earth, but the maiden could scarcely rejoice that the winter was growing old; for the mother she loved so dearly seemed fading away as the snow-drifts faded, and the shadow of death lay upon the house.

"Oh! take her not away," prayed the maiden. "Spare her to me a little longer; let it be Thy will that she should live."

And as she wept, her tears fell upon the snowdrop that the New Year had brought her, and its petals stirred a little in their green sheath.

"His blessing is coming," said the maiden, awe-struck; "God's blessing, more than we can ask or think! What will it be?"

And all night long she watched beside her mother, till at the dawning the summons came.

The snowdrop opened wide its petals, and trembled with a new-born joy, and the tired soul, like a bird set free, soared up into the Infinite!

So God had given His servant "the blessing of peace!"

But the shadows deepened round the maiden, and her sorrow overwhelmed her. Lonely and anguish-stricken, she refused to be comforted.

"Is this His blessing?" she cried in her misery. "Oh, would I had never lived to see this New Year enter with such a gift!"

* * * * *

Presently, Spring reigned over the earth, and the sky was full of the glory of her presence. The trees that had stood so bare and patient in the winter storms grew radiant with their new foliage, and thrushes sang among the orchard blossoms.

Something in the balmy breezes that stole across the meadows brought a whisper of comfort to the mourner's heart.

"It is always sunshine and gladness where she is," thought the maiden; "can I dare to wish her back again? Oh, Father, make me contented to resign her; make me fit to meet her once again; forgive my murmurings."

And even as she prayed a subtle fragrance filled the air, and she saw that the violet had opened wide its dewy leaves, showing its heart of gold.

Then she knew that another of God's blessings had come to her—the blessing of resignation and the fragrant of patience. So she arose from the selfishness of her first sorrow, and began to live again.

It was not much she could do; she was but a poor and powerless girl, but she resolved, for her dead mother's sake, to do every day some deed of love and charity to those around her.

There was always somebody in trouble, some little sobbing child to be kissed, some hard-worked mother to be helped, some weary traveller to be refreshed and comforted, and in bearing the burdens of others she almost forgot the weight of her own.

But once (it was summer, a very hot and sultry day) she could not find any deed of love to do. All that she tried to accomplish she failed in; hard, impatient words rebuffed her, nobody seemed to want her pity or her help, and the twilight came and found her lonely and sorrowful.

"I have failed, my Father," she sobbed, "I have failed. Wilt Thou not let me work for Thee? Am I not fit even to do this?" A tiny breeze from the west caressed her cheek, and, looking up, she saw in the red sunset light that the rosebud had opened. There it shone, pure and beautiful, fold after fold of snowy whiteness veiling the sweetness of its heart.

And a voice, unearthly in its tenderness, came to her wondering ear.

"My child," it said, "the year has brought thee three blessings: flowers from my garden, peace and everlasting gladness for the beloved, patience and resignation for thyself. Now, this night behold I give thee what shall make glad thy heart, and the lives of all around thee; I give thee charity, the pure and perfect love without which thy life is lived in vain. Heed not the world's indifference or neglect. I have seen thy strivings, thy failings, thy risings again. Behold, I love thee, and in My presence thou shalt find the fulness of joy." So the rose blooms for ever in the maiden's chamber, and the years that come and go can never dim its purity. The flowers that come from the garden of God know no winter, for they are everlasting!

FLORENCE LESLIE HENDERSON.

THE LADIES OF THE OLDEN TIMES.

T has been justly remarked that "a woman's work is never done," if she be the mistress of a household, even in these days, when provisions are so easily attainable, articles of clothing sold ready made, and shops and markets often within a stone's throw. From the hour she rises till the lights are extinguished at night, domestic duties must occupy her thoughts and hands, in common with those outside the homestead, where, amongst her neighbouring associates, her relatives, and her pensioners, there are extra claims on her time and thoughts.

But if under circumstances so conducive to the furtherance of her work and her prospective arrangements she find her hands so full from morning till night, imagine what the pressure of her duties must have been, and what the tax of her powers of forethought and judgment in the olden times of this once "merrie England"!

Let us take a retrospect of what house-keeping was, as carried on in our great houses, in the Middle Ages.

No railroad nor coach communications lent their timely aid; no express office nor parcels post conveyed her household supplies; no shops nor markets invited a weekly visit, within a few miles' drive of her own door, unless, indeed, her domain chanced to be situate in or near the metropolis, or one of the great cities of those times, which were "few and far between."

Yet, circumstanced like this, consider the far wider range of a lady's field of work compared with the limits assigned to her now!

The great independent middle class, with which our country is now crowded, I may almost affirm did not exist in the times of which I write.

The population was mainly divided into the titled and untitled aristocracy and their retainers. Certain merchants and professional men were to be found in the chief cities, and ecclesiastics both regular and secular; the former living in large communities, as did the "religious" of our own sex. But all the same, the vast multitudes of independent respectable people, who have inherited the fruits of their own or their ancestors' industry or speculations, or who have not yet retired from professional or commercial business, and hold a special and honourable place of their own, in a country "whose merchants are princes"—this middle class exists nowhere else in Europe in such stupendous proportions, and was almost unknown in England in the Middle Ages.

The great castles of the nobility contained on an average some forty or fifty persons each, not to speak of the retainers and poorer folks immediately attached to them, in the small dwellings that were grouped together under their shadow. So also in the old country seats and halls of the untitled gentry the several households consisted of some thirty or forty persons, both male and female.

Imagine, therefore, what it must have been to provide for all these when a twelvemonths' stores had to be laid in. Meat had to be procured and salted at Martinmas; salt fish of various kinds in considerable quantities, barley and oatmeal likewise; baking for the whole community being then accomplished at home. They had no sugar, so honey was stored in lieu of it; and no coal, so firewood had to be cut down, chopped up, and piled ready for use; carpets being unknown for many centuries in these feudal halls, rushes were in great requisition, and had to be gathered and dried in great quantities, as the spacious floors needed a continual renewal of this primitive covering.

It was the practice in those times to observe many days in commemoration of various sacred or traditional events, to which certain viands, as well as curious customs, were consecrated. Thus the important cake for Twelfth Night needed almonds and raisins; the Christmas posset, cinnamon, ginger, and nutmegs; Sheer Monday its furmety; Palm Sunday its figs; All Hallows Eve its nuts; Good Friday, spices and currants for the hot cross buns, and many other days their respective commemorative esculents.

All these things had to be remembered, and provided for in suitable quantities, and in so doing not merely was the great household to be counted head by head, but the poor were never forgotten. The very title "lady," derived from the Saxon Heaflian, or l'af-dig, from Laf or Hlaf, a loaf, and dian, to serve, explains her title by her benevolent office of bread-server, it being the custom of ladies not only to carve for their family and guests, but to distribute food to the poor at their doors at stated periods.

Over and above all this there were no gin palaces and beer breweries supplying the country at large; but the mistress of each such mansion or castle had a still-room of her own, and manufactured the wines and cordials, as well as the herb teas, balsams, and perfumes, and brewed all the beer which served for every meal, and which has since been substituted by tea, coffee, chocolate, and cocoa. Of course the calculations necessary for procuring the component parts of all the above-named productions of the still-room required for such a multitude of persons, and then the superintendence of their manufacture, and the giving out day by day of the quantities necessary, must have increased the work and responsibilities of her who was indeed the guide of the house.

The paragon housewife described by Solomon in a period of the world's history far more remote very correctly as well as graphically describes the arduous and most extensive nature of the duties devolving on our own English ladies till within some two hundred years ago; for those which have been enumerated by no means filled up the sum total of all that devolved upon them. The clothing of the enormous household demanded the consideration of the mistress of the house from first to last. Beginning with the selection of the several qualities of yarn, and calculation of quantities to the completion of each garment—all devolved on her. She purchased the flax and the wool (cotton yarn was not manufactured in this country till about the year 1772, although calico was imported from India in 1631); and the carding, spinning, and weaving, the cutting out and making into every description of male and female attire, all had to be begun and completed at home. With the exception of the very costly articles, which could be purchased ready-made, if not always convenient to embroider them with her own and her maidens' hands, the whole community located in and around these feudal mansions were clothed in homespun, in the literal sense of the term.

Nor were the labours of the lady-in-chief completed with making a provision for some thirty or forty persons in the matter of food and clothing; for at least during the reigns of Henry VII., Henry VIII., and throughout that of Elizabeth, the castles of the nobility and gentry were academies for the youthful sons and daughters of families of gentle birth. The study of the dead languages, which was at one time confined to the ecclesiastics, spread among the nobility and gentry, and as young girls were placed in these baronial halls with the view to their obtaining a liberal education, as well as an introduction into the highest society in the land, the necessary supervision of their studies, their dress, manners, and introductions, constituted no trifling item amongst the duties of the lady of the house.

These young people were expected to learn and occupy themselves with the daily avocations of their patroness, assisting and attending upon her like daughters; and many of them remained permanently attached to those families. Languages, both modern and dead, music, including harp and lute, "siferinge," "wrightinge," "drawinge," tapestry work and all kinds of decorative stitchery, as well as spinning and plain-sewing, were all taught them freely in these ancient mansions during the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries; besides all the mysteries of the kitchen, still-room, and other extensive offices.

Thus the great ladies of those primitive times were models for their successors. If living in an age of much superstition, at least we trace in every letter of theirs, or other record of their sentiments, that God's good providence was ever acknowledged; their faith was simple, and unclouded with the materialism and scepticism of modern days; and they proved themselves indeed the nursing mothers of their country.

Before dismissing the subject of education, perhaps I should anticipate the inquiry of some reader as to how it was carried on at a still earlier period than the centuries specified during the three reigns before named.

In those still more remote periods the work was carried on in the great convents, which were subsequently assisted, and still later substituted, in the work by the great patrician houses. These conventual establishments were very different institutions from those at present existing, although respectively varying at that time in importance and wealth.

Here again on the lady-in-chief the great responsibilities of a large community of men and women devolved, over whom she ruled with little less than sovereign power. You will the better realise this when I tell you that an abbess presiding over one of these conventual houses exercised manorial jurisdiction, held a manorial court, and had a seat in Parliament. She had seneschals, esquires, gentlemen, yeomen, and (excepting the archers and other men-at-arms) she had the complete establishment of a baronial castle. As regards her women, she had nuns, lay sisters, an infirmareress (who was a medical practitioner and spiritual adviser), a cellareress who acted as steward, a precentrix, who not only led the choir, but united with this office that of librarian. There were also ladies who resided in the convent as boarders, all the scholars before-named, and servants both male and female.

As these great conventual establishments grew up all over the kingdom from the time of the mission of Augustine, they became, like the monasteries of the monks, the great seats of learning, the convent colleges for ladies being sometimes called "Shee Schools." The education given was of an extensive and very superior kind; and as the institutions were well endowed, no charge was made for it. The teachers were women of the highest reputation, and looked up to with extreme respect. One of the distinguishing characteristics of the ecclesiastical institutions was the fact, to which a passing allusion was made, that not only could scholars come and go freely, but there was no rule constraining ladies who desired an asylum within their walls to take religious vows. Thus, multitudes took refuge under the powerful protection of the abbesses, in those lawless and stormy days, to escape from undesirable marriages, the hands of unscrupulous enemies, or for the luxury of a quiet retreat in times of great affliction, where seclusion might be enjoyed at will.

These convent colleges gave place, more or less gradually, to the private academies into which our great ancestral mansions were constituted, as I have already described; and well was the work carried on till after the days of Elizabeth. Then ornamental needlework declined. Here and there it was practised, but it ceased to be an essential part of education. Time passed on, and a deterioration commenced, till in the early part of the eighteenth century idleness, frivolity, extravagance, and worse evils in their train, including profanity, characterised for a time the debased descendants of their virtuous, God-fearing, industrious, and learned predecessors.

In confirmation of what I say I need only bid you look at the pictures of the head-dresses of the eighteenth century, to show how utterly frivolous and useless members of society were a vast proportion of the ladies, and no less so the men, of that degraded period. More than this, I may remind you of the fact that an appeal was made to the editor of the Spectator to encourage greater industry amongst the girls of that deteriorated generation, which resulted in a recommendation that no girl should receive a man's addresses till she could appear in a suit of her own embroidery; nor be married until she had worked her pillows, and had made a child's mantle with her own fingers.

Happily there were those amongst them that rose superior to the times in which they lived, and a great alteration for the better was ushered in by the nineteenth century. A remarkable change has likewise gradually developed in the growth of the enormous independent middle class of society, of the schools and colleges, and the comparative poverty of the collateral branches of the nobility and gentry. This latter fact has greatly changed the style of housekeeping, and the power of the mistress of each reduced household is limited to providing for her own children and two or three servants. Nor has she assistants to aid her in the accomplishment of duties more extensive than those that Providence has laid upon her shoulders under the modern régime. Art in economising is one which in these latter days she has to learn: and a hard and painful lesson it is. And although her jurisdiction over a household is of a comparatively limited character, viewed in connection with that exercised by the great ladies of bygone times, a woman's work even now, if thoroughly done, is "never over," from morning till night.

For a summary of this work I would direct your attention to the article entitled "The Duties of Wives and Mothers."

Many of my readers are doubtless well acquainted with the foregoing facts, culled from our ancient records; so I must ask their indulgence for the sake of others less privileged than themselves.

With clearer religious light, stricter laws for personal protection, clothing and food ready prepared for use at their doors, and facilities of communication that decrease all a modern housekeeper's difficulties—the position of a matron of the higher classes in the present day is not without its due proportion of compensations.

The heavy tax which a free benevolence imposed on the ladies of olden times, in behalf of their poor retainers and others, is succeeded now by national poor rates; and the small subscriptions of a vast multitude of persons to charitable institutions of every description relieves the much impoverished gentry of a certain amount of pressure without the walls of their private dwellings.

We have, therefore, one and all, much cause for thankfulness to Him who appointed the little niche for us each; nor is a lady's condition so very inferior in comfort now, though the times be so greatly changed, as would at first sight appear. Our duties, whether married or single, are sufficiently numerous and onerous; and the wise amongst us would scarcely aspire to heavier responsibilities; and whatever our social position may be, may it be ours some day to hear those ineffably joy-giving words, "Thou hast been faithful in a few things . . . enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

SOPHIA F. A. CAULFIELD.

READING.

By THE HON. MRS. ROBERT BUTLER.

READING is the basis of all knowledge. Like the tree planted in the Garden of Eden, it opens our eyes to discern good from evil. It is unlimited in its capacities as well as in its effects, and has undoubtedly more influence over our life and character than any faculty we possess.

In the present day of compulsory education, the mechanical part of reading is moulded into the little plastic brain as soon as the eye can distinguish one letter from another; but how few reflect that, in teaching the child to connect certain sounds with certain letters, they are furnishing it with a talent which must influence its character, and may altogether regulate its future life.

My young readers,

"Standing, with reluctant feet,
Where the brook and river meet,
Womanhood and childhood fleet."

Let me entreat you to ponder over this stupendous power for good or ill with which you have been endowed. You cannot free yourself from the responsibility it lays upon you. Your mind is like a field. Reading is the seed which has been sown into it, and the cultivation of that seed rests entirely with you. You have three courses open to you: You may nourish your seed with wholesome learning, and it will become your greatest blessing; you may poison it with pernicious food, and it will become your greatest curse; or you may suffer it to remain untilld, and it will become like the pound laid up in a napkin by the unprofitable servant, bringing you condemnation instead of commendation. In the great day of reckoning, amongst all the talents God has given to man, He will look for the richest fruits from the mind made in His own image, and the wilful inaction or perversion of that mighty gift will be considered the worst of suicides.

Nature endows us with aspirations after all that is good and great, and education strengthens and invigorates those aspirations; but when the education of girls is nominally finished (I allude to those who are exempted by circumstances from working for their living), they are often taken from the school-room, and plunged suddenly into a vortex of society and excitement which, unless they shield themselves with very potent safeguards, will completely ruin all their intellectual tastes. Custom is cruel to them. It teaches them at their most susceptible age that their profession is to look pretty, to dress well, and to chatter merrily. It teaches them that they should shine in society, where "Poverty strives for riches, wealth sighs for rank;"

that their aim should be the acquisition of worldly advantages which they do not themselves possess, and that their final goal should be a brilliant marriage. And yet these victims of custom are destined to be wives and mothers; they are called to exercise their influence over the rulers of the land; their duty in later life is to become their children's guide and their husband's stay. Can we wonder that the whole foundation of the world is out of course? Oh, that girls would not be corrupted by custom! Oh, that they would realise that there is more happiness in being loved than in being admired, that their vocation in life is to promote "domestic happiness, the only bliss of Paradise which has survived the fall," and that their duty from earliest girlhood is to cherish those gifts and graces which will make them shine in the sanctity of home, and render their lives there true and useful.

"Happy, happier far than thou,
With the laurel on thy brow,

She that makes the humblest heart
Lovely but to one on earth."

My young friends, your character is now being moulded. You are forming habits and imbibing ideas from which you will never be free. As La Fontaine says—

"Certain age accompli
Le vase est imbibé, l'étoffe a pris son pli."
So now is the time for you to cultivate industry and diligence, and for you to resolve to direct your faculty of reading for your own good, and for the good of those with whom you may be connected.

With this view I would have you form a plan for reading. I would have you study some poet or historian, or philosopher, some writer that will guide your reason, ballast your will, wage war with your passions, and lift you into a higher moral atmosphere.

Literary advantages never abounded as they do at present. Early in this century books were very scarce, and even newspapers, which we would not blame our housemaid for leaving on the drawing-room table a day old, were then so prized that they used often to go the round of a whole country village. But in the present day there is mental food in which all can indulge.

You should choose your author as you would choose a friend—for the sympathy that exists between you; and his having written on a subject about which you wish to learn shows that you have tastes and interests in common.

"No profit goes where is no pleasure ta'en,
In brief, Sir, study what you most effect."

Having chosen your author, you should take a dictionary, and any other book of reference which would be likely to supply your subject with further information, and retire to some room, away from the bustle and noise of life, for a certain time daily.

You must be very weak-willed or unfortunately circumstanced if, by a little effort, you cannot appropriate to yourself such a retreat for regular reading. With these helpful surroundings you should proceed to make a friend, not an acquaintance merely, of your author. Concentrate your thoughts entirely upon his thoughts, and hold mental conversation with him. He will be very jealous. He will only bestow his good gifts where he has undivided possession of the heart and mind. Castles in the air and dreamy reveries are apt to intrude upon his dominion, and they are his mortal foes; but it is you, not he, who must exert your powers to drive them away, and the profit and pleasure he will shower upon you will be just in proportion to the effort you make to attend to him. If you do not understand any of his ideas at first, read the passage over again, as if you were attending to him explaining them to you, and you will soon experience that mind can commune with mind, in thought and silence, as powerfully and eloquently as in spoken language, and his ideas will become as clear to you as though they originated in your brain instead of his. You must never pass a word to which you cannot give its full meaning, or the name of a place or a person with which you are only vaguely acquainted. If such words or names present themselves, consult your books of reference before proceeding any further, and do not shut them up until you have obtained the required information. You may be tempted to postpone the investigation to a more convenient season, but that season, like a mirage in the desert, will never come, and the habit of slurring over words which you cannot wholly grasp is a fatal destroyer to all profitable reading.

In addition to your books of reference, I would advise you always to have an MS. book by your side in which to copy down any event that you wish specially to remember, or any thoughts which have specially appealed to you as being true and strengthening to your higher nature. That MS. book will be to you through life one of your most precious possessions, and in prosperity or in adversity, or in the great crises of your life, if you open it, you will find

"Such words have power to quiet

The restless pulse of care,

And come like the benediction

That follows after prayer."

And this regular reading I am urging you to undertake is no displeasing task. The acquiring of knowledge is pleasure, just as truly as the possession of knowledge is power. Intellectual enjoyment is more conducive to our happiness than any other enjoyment, but, in conformity to the law of nature, its capacity is progressive or retrogressive. The strongest man would soon become stiff and powerless without exercise, and a Shakespeare or a Newton would not have blessed the world with their talents without industry and application. Industry and application mean a certain struggle with our lower nature, but let us always remember that in the most trivial well-directed exertion we have a strong angel by our side, helping us, encouraging us, and crowning us with heaven's best gift, the crown of peace. And think of the reward in later years to those who have in their youth cultivated a taste for books. Great men and women have considered the power of holding unspoken intercourse with the minds of others their most valuable solace in all the vicissitudes of life. Macaulay calls books his "comforters in sorrow, nurses in sickness, companions in solitude, old friends who are never seen with new faces, who are the same in wealth and poverty, in glory and obscurity." An old English divine says, "Books are a guide in youth, and an entertainment for age. When we are weary of the living we may repair to the dead, who have nothing of peevishness, pride, or design in their conversation." Montesquieu, whose life was as calm as the unfortunate Madame Roland's was tempestuous, says he "never had an ennui which an hour's reading could not dissipate." And great thinkers have always been great readers from their early years.

Therefore, I would earnestly urge you to commence this systematic reading without delay. I cannot promise you that it will increase your appetite for excitement or amusement, but I can promise you it will do something better. It will give weight to your character and strength to your mind; it will shed over you an indefinable charm and attraction, and when sufferings come, as they must sometimes come in the brightest of lives, the power of being able to withdraw yourself temporarily from outward circumstances into the presence of the mighty minds, who being dead yet speak, will comfort you like angels' whispers.

And this habit may become twice blessed. One thought leads to another. Thoughts are all linked into one great chain. As Byron says, "Words are things, and a small drop of ink

Falling like dew upon a thought, produces

That which makes fœcunds, perhaps millions, think."

So that, by thus holding communion with great and wise minds, your own ideas and powers of expressing them may become so enriched that you in your turn may be enabled to leave your thoughts on the sands of time, and future generations may rise up and call you blessed.

CLARA'S CHRISTKIND.

By J. A. OWEN.

CHAPTER I.

CLARA STEINMETZ—Clärchen as she was always called—lived with her widowed mother in one room behind the apothecary's shop at the corner of Obst and Baum Streets, in the beautiful quaint old city of Nuremberg.

Herr Braun might have let his room with more profit to himself, but he was a kind, tender-hearted man, and he had become interested in Clärchen and her mother during poor Johann Steinmetz's long last illness; and still more so when he found that poor little Clärchen had also become a confirmed invalid, who needed tonics and a nourishing diet, which it tasked her mother's strength to the utmost to provide for. So when Fräulein von Sturmer, the rising artist, quitted one of the rooms in his house to go to larger apartments, he offered it to Mrs. Steinmetz.

"It is roomy, and has a cheerful outlook, and your little one will be more cheerful there when you are away from her," he added.

"But, dear sir, where in the world could I earn the money to pay the rent?"

"We will not quarrel about that; a high family of large means have just taken the two floors above; and they are paying so good a rent that I can afford to let this one room cheaply."

"Dear, good Herr Braun!" said Clärchen, when her mother took home the pleasant news, along with the malt extract and the oil. "Is he a handsome-looking man, mother? I mean has he a noble, kind sort of face?"

"He has a kind, open, cheery face, Clärchen; and when he sells you a bottle of physic he gives you a pleasant, benevolent smile, which seems to go as a blessing with the medicine; as though he would say, 'And I pray it may do you good.'"

"I thought so. I always picture to myself the faces of the people you see and tell me about. I shall watch for a sight of him when you go in and out, mother; and I will carve my Joseph for the Holy Family so that it shall be as like him as I can make it."

For Clärchen was always confined to her little bed now. The doctor, who came about once a week to see her, said her spine was very weak, and that she might have to lie on her back for a year or more. Happily she had, as she said to cheer her mother, a trade in her ten fingers—an art and genius, her mother always said; mothers are apt to be partial, and all love's geese are swans, you know.

Before Mrs. Steinmetz went to her daily work she always arranged Clärchen's bits of wood, carving tools, and one or two illustrated books on a table beside her bed, where she could easily reach everything. The mother went out to sew in well-to-do families. The money she received was little, still it was rather more than was usually given to daily seamstresses, for she could repair every kind of lace so beautifully that she was invaluable to many of the fine ladies of Nuremberg. As a special favour, too, she was allowed half an hour in the middle of the day to run home and give her daughter her midday meal, after eating her own dinner where she worked.

Sometimes a lady who had an invalid child of her own, and knew the needs and delicate appetites of such, would send with her a daintily-prepared little dish; but generally Frau Steinmetz got up early and prepared as nourishing a bouillon or stew as their means allowed, and left it in winter to cook slowly on the stove. When it was too warm to have a fire all the day, the meal was cooked early, and heated again over a little spirit lamp.

A lonely life for a girl of Clärchen's age—about fifteen years—to lead, six days of the week alone most of the day; had it not been for her wood-carving she often thought it would have been unbearable. But that proved an endless resource, and in time, as Herr Goldschmidt, the dealer, said, she would be able to make enough money to support herself—perhaps even to help her mother in paying for rent and fuel. Had he not been a greedy, grasping man, one of those who grow rich by the sweat of the brow of the poor and the needy, never paying a fair wage when he could get things for less, Clärchen would have been able to do that at the time our story begins. Her father had been an artist, and she had inherited his love for and sympathy with the beautiful, with a greater faculty for its embodiment, if she could only have the necessary education in her art.

"Johann Steinmetz's ideas and sketches are excellent, almost an inspiration at times," old Grauber, the art critic, used to say, "but his finished pictures are utter failures."

Clärchen would have liked to paint, but she found wood-carving more practicable, as requiring fewer appliances; and then it was cleaner work, and gave the mother less trouble about their room.

"Ah, that is heavenly, thou dear mother!" she cried, when she was moved on to her little bed in their new apartment. "And I can see the great house opposite as I lie here, the window is so large and high. And there are some pigeons—some doves, too! Ah, how good it was of Herr Braun to let us come and live in this beautiful room!"

Then she began to look about to see where the mother had placed all their little household treasures. A neighbour had invited Clärchen into her room whilst the removal had been effected, so it was all a sudden surprise and joy to the girl when she was carried in, and laid on her own little bed again. That bedstead was one of their treasures, for it was made of pearwood from an old tree that grew in her grandfather's orchard at Berndorf. He was dead now, and the small sum of money which had been her mother's portion had been exhausted during Herr Steinmetz's long illness.

On the wall opposite Clärchen, on each side of the window, two things she valued much were hung. One was what the Germans call a Christliches Hausgegen—"A Christian house blessing." This is found in many houses where the inmates are God-fearing people. The words are:—

"Where there is faith there is hope;
Where there is hope, love is;
Where love is, there is God;
Where God is, no want."

It was beautifully illuminated; the father had spent much time and pains over it. The picture that formed the pendant to this was a sketch in crayon, the last work the poor artist had ever done. Though only a slight sketch, it was his masterpiece. It represented the Lord Jesus taking the dead daughter of Jairus by the hand as He bade her "Arise!" I cannot tell you all the beautiful thoughts that picture had suggested to the poor girl lying opposite to it on her couch, nor how much help and comfort Clärchen had drawn from the story it told. In it the poor father had left a rich legacy to his child. Perhaps the consciousness that he must so soon leave his wife in the hands of the God who, whilst calling him away, said, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in Me," had inspired the artist when he drew that Divine face and that form, so full of power and dignity and love, as He bent over the sleeping maiden. Johann Steinmetz had drawn it the day he died, in those few hours of ease and rest from pain that often come when the end is near.

"I have had a heavenly dream, dear wife," he said, on waking that morning; "I seemed to see the Lord Jesus enter at the door there, and walk up to little Clärchen's bed; then I awoke. Give me a new canvas and my chalks; I feel so well to-day, and I think I could make a sketch for a picture. Perhaps I am going to get better again, after all."

He sketched rapidly for a while. When the outline was completed he turned the canvas towards his wife. "Annchen," he said, "it will be the best picture I have painted. I am tired now, and will sleep awhile."

The wife left him to go out for something that was needed; little Clärchen sat near her father, with her doll, and some beads she was threading for it. When her mother returned the child said softly, "Little mother, the father is sleeping so gently."

He was sleeping gently, indeed, for it was the sleep that knows no waking to care or want or sorrow. It was the sleep He gives His beloved! Two hands folded over the breast, a sweet smile on the lips, no other change; no sign of pain or struggle was there.

For some weeks life went on smoothly and pleasantly in the new home. Clärchen worked at her little figures with fresh inspiration and energy. She had only planned to carve Joseph and Mary and the infant Jesus, just one little group that she thought would sell easily at Christmas; but the pigeons and doves, as they flew to and fro, with their pleasant cooings which reached her when the window was open in the early morning, suggested other images; and soon she was covering her table with small blocks that were to be carved into oxen, an ass and her foal, sheep and two shepherds. She would have even the three wise men and their camels laden with offerings, if time permitted, before the booths in the market-place round the beautiful St. Sebaldus church displayed their Christmas stock.

Frau Braun, the apothecary's wife, who lived at the top of the house with her husband, little fat Karl, and her baby, brought the infant down for Clärchen to study its rounded little limbs and baby features. It seemed to the grateful girl and her mother as though the pilgrimage of life had suddenly led them into pleasant pastures and still waters; the hard, stony road was behind them, and no difficulties were in their way, no clouds on the beautiful blue sky overhead.

But one day Clärchen waited in vain for the mother to come and prepare her dinner. At half-past twelve she usually appeared, but that day one o'clock, two o'clock, all the hours up to five, sounded; the great bell of the church near seemed at each hour more full of sad omen than the last; and Frau Steinmetz had not yet come. The bouillon had wasted down and grown cold; the wood fire in the stove was burnt out, and Clärchen, at first faint with hunger, was now worn out with anxiety and distress.

At half-past twelve Frau Steinmetz had left the house of the kindest of her employers. This lady gave her a bowl of strong soup to take home for Clärchen, a very pleasant burden, but not easy to carry in the form it was. In crossing one of the streets a rough schoolboy ran up against the poor woman, causing her to spill some of the soup. Distressed by this, she did not notice a carriage that was being driven rapidly round a corner. A sudden flash across her eyes—a sharp pain in her head, and Frau Steinmetz was conscious of nothing further, until she came to herself, some hours later, in one of the wards of a large infirmary. It was late that evening before any news of her mother reached Clärchen.

In another room on the ground floor of the Apotheker's house two young Englishwomen were living. They became orphans when they were children, both their parents having died abroad; and after the expense of their education had been met, very little remained. Mary Graham, the elder of the two, was an artist; Helen, the sister, was a musician of great promise. To further Mary's studies they had come to Nuremberg for twelve months, and Helen had been so successful as to secure the appointment of English governess to the family of a wealthy hop merchant in the city. Only her mornings were engaged; in the afternoon she worked hard at her piano; and it had been a great joy to Clärchen in her lonely hours to listen to the sounds that reached her from her neighbour's room.

The afternoon of Mrs. Steinmetz's accident, Mary, the artist, had left for Rupprechtstegen, where she was to spend a week in order to make some sketches of the picturesque masses of rock and the fine trees in the Ankathal. Helen had practised longer than usual, being alone, and then, having eaten her evening meal, she sat down to enjoy a new book which had just arrived from England, but was soon disturbed by the sounds of sobbing coming from the room opposite to their own. At first she tried to read on, not liking to intrude on strangers. She knew a seamstress lived there, she had seen her come and go often, but she knew nothing of Clärchen. Her sister's life and her own were so full that she had not cared to make any acquaintances in the house where they lived.

At last she could not bear to listen any longer without trying to comfort, and she went out into the corridor and paced up and down a few seconds, until she had summoned courage to tap on the door of the room whence the sounds came. A voice, choked by weeping, bade her enter, and then she saw poor Clärchen lying in helpless misery on her little bed.

"What is the matter?" asked Helen, gently—she spoke German well—"Do tell me if I can help you in any way."

"Oh, my mother, my dear, dear mother!" was all Clärchen could bring out for some time. At last Helen drew from her that she had been alone all day, without food or fire, and, what was worse still, without any idea what could have become of her mother; something terrible, she was sure, must have happened to her.

Helen tried to comfort her, but in vain. As she sat by the bed with her arm thrown round the weeping girl, Frau Braun came in with the account of the accident. Leaving her with Clärchen, the Englishwoman, practical like most of her people, ran into her own room, brought wood and made a fire, then prepared some coffee quickly, and soon she had persuaded the poor child to swallow some and to eat a small roll, which revived her so much that she could relieve herself a little by talking of her mother and their life together to this new friend.

"I felt sure it was too bright and beautiful to last—this happy life that we have had since August, when we came into the house."

"But your mother will soon be well and at home again, I trust."

"I have never slept one night away from her; and it is terrible to think she is suffering away from me; she will fret so much thinking of me."

"I will go to the infirmary and ask if I may see her; and I will tell her that I am going to take care of you for her until she gets well again, and will bring back news of her for you before you go to sleep."

"How good you are, dear Fräulein; but it is too much for you to do, to take care of me; only if you would help me a little and tell mother you will, it will comfort her. Frau Braun is very kind, too, and she will help me, I know. Ah, how sad it is to lie here when the mother needs me."

"Now be good and say no more, little one. I must give a good report of you, you know, so as to ease the mother's heart. I will soon be back again. Auf Wiedersehen!"

In about an hour's time Helen returned bearing the good news that no very serious mischief had been done; but the doctor who had charge of Frau Steinmetz's case said she would probably have to remain for three weeks in the infirmary.

"And now, little one," said Clärchen's new friend, "Frau Braun and I are going to move you into my room. I am quite alone, and should really be glad of your company."

The thought of this almost took away Clärchen's breath; but Helen gave her no chance of declining, for she had already fetched the apothecary's wife downstairs again, and with the help of that lady's stout maid of all work Clärchen was lifted on her mattress and feather-bed and placed on that of Mary Graham, beside Helen's bed. Soon exhausted with the afternoon's anxiety and weeping, the little wood-carver was fast asleep, and Helen, well-pleased with the service she had been able to render, sat down again to her book to read for an hour before going to rest.

She could not concentrate her thoughts, however; so after watching the sleeper for a little, she began to examine Clärchen's work which the maid had brought in with her table.

"The figures are life-like, full of genius," she said to herself. "If only the Baron von Stockhausen could see them and this poor little invalid, what a great thing it might be for her and her poor mother. This little Christkind is positively marvellous."

But the Baron von Stockhausen was far away, and his friends did not expect him back in Nuremberg until after the New Year.

Instead of "Santa Klaus brought me this or that gift" at Christmas time, many German children say "the Christkind gave it me"; and among Clärchen's figures was one carved which represented this with great life and spirit. The Apotheker's lively little Karl, as he looked when he ran into the room with some small present for her, had suggested it. Clärchen always made her studies from life when it was possible. That was why the mother of the infant Jesus looked somewhat older than she need; but the expression of love and tender care on her face was perfect.

At first Clärchen slept very soundly amongst her new surroundings; but long before it was light she was awake, and this new trial of her mother's accident filled her with grief and anxiety. How could they possibly make up the week's rent? and for her food she must be a burden to her new friends.

Have you slept all through the night, little one?" asked Helen, as soon as she woke. The Grahams had also only one room, but it was a very large one, and a cleverly-devised curtain separated the end where the beds were from the rest of the room.

"I woke early. I cannot help thinking about the mother. I know she will not have slept well, either; being laid aside will cause her such grief."

"You must not give way to sad thoughts, child. There is nothing to trouble you to-day, and the future is in God's hands. Your mother's accident will probably only cause temporary suffering, and it has brought you a new friend, little one, who will do her best to help you both."

Tears, not from sorrow, sprang into Clärchen's eyes: she could only answer with the pressure of her thin little hands.

The woman who came daily to clean and dust and light the fire knocked at the door, and Helen had to jump up to let her in. Then she dressed herself quickly, and got breakfast ready—café au lait and new sweet milk rolls and butter.

"It is good," cried Clärchen. "I have not tasted milk roll since I was quite a little girl. I know it must seem very ungrateful to you to talk of our troubles just now."

"No, no, child; it will relieve you. I have half an hour perfectly free before I must begin my morning's work, so tell me all you like."

Clärchen heaved a long sigh.

"Well, dear Fräulein, it often makes me depressed, and I murmur because the dear mother, and father too, who was so good and patient, should have so many trials; and I also, who would like to work and help the mother, must lie here, and can only earn so few pence in a whole week."

"Ah, that is because the wretch to whom you send your figures pays you badly, then. Wait a while, and I will get someone I know, who deals more fairly, to give you some orders. But now as to your life having been full of difficulties and trials. My sister and I have had many troubles, too, and I have not always been able to trust as I ought; but one day a dear old music-master I had in London preached me a little sermon, which often helps me. As a child, I was supposed to have a great turn for music, and I delighted in playing from ear the pretty songs and tunes I heard. When I was older and had a very good master, he kept me constantly at work on scales and exercises, drilling me only in these. Not a single piece of music such as I had before delighted in, not even a sonata of Mozart's or Beethoven's, would he allow me to play. I cried bitterly over it some times, he seemed to have robbed me of a great joy. Well, one day I could not stand it any longer, and I gave vent to my dissatisfaction. 'Why may I not have a few pleasant pieces, such as my friends would enjoy as well as myself?' I cried, one day."

"Child," he said, gravely, 'you have the making of a true artist in you, that is why I keep you to these exercises, which are distasteful to you now. These fingers must be trained, that by-and-by they may beat out the divine music that will touch the soul as well as delight the ear. And the Great Master above deals so with us in the lesson of life, child, until He perfects us for the fuller life and joy that shall be hereafter.' I often think of his words, Clärchen."

Four weeks had passed away. Both mother and daughter had been well cared for; and now they were together again in their pleasant room. Frau Steinmetz was actually the stronger for her accident, for it had compelled her to have perfect rest and good food, and her mind had been kept easy about Clärchen, through Helen Graham's frequent visits. Helen delighted the mother with prophecies as to Clärchen's future. A great physician had been sent by the rich hop merchant to see and examine her thoroughly; and he had declared that there was nothing to prevent her growing quite a strong woman.

She was now fifteen years old: in two more years he hoped she would be capable of felling a tree as well as carving an image, he said, jokingly.

How happy his words made Clärchen! "Then I can go into the church of St. Sebaldus, where the dear father loved to be, Fräulein Helen! And I can copy the wonderful figures of the twelve apostles, and the infant Jesus, and the five wise and five foolish virgins on each side of the bride's door—"

"And, in fact, little one, you will soon become woodcarver-in-chief to the Imperial family," said her friend.

On the morning of Christmas Eve, Herr Braun—the jolly apothecary, Helen always called him, and she declared she never knew one before who did not look thin and dried up—was coming through the place round about the church, which was filled with the booths and stalls of the dealers in firs for Christmas trees, gingerbreads, toys, and figures of all sorts, in metal and wood, and even chocolate. He had ordered a tree, and Karl was bearing home in glee the royal figure which was to be fixed on its highest tip. On their way they passed a fine-looking man with a beautiful woman at his side. It was the rich Baron von Stockhausen—"Otto the noble," the two English girls always called him. Many a young artist had cause to thank and love him. Holding his cap in one hand and his long pipe in the other, Herr Braun approached the pair.

"Will your Excellency and your gracious wife look at a group of small figures carved in wood, which are in Peter Gutgesinnt's booth?" he said.

"I have heard of them already, Herr Braun, and have promised to have a look at them this evening. Just now we are pressed; we only returned home last night."

The good apothecary went on and smiled to himself as he thought of the fine tree they would have in their living room that night. He had actually bought Clärchen's Holy Family himself, with all the animals, the three wise men and their camels; and the two young English ladies whom he had learned to know well through Clärchen, had been so kind as to promise to come with Clara and her mother, and play and sing "Stille Nacht, heilige Nacht," as it was the custom every Christmas Eve at the Brauns. But he would leave the figures in the booth till evening, so that the Herr Baron could see them.

As soon as it began to grow dusk the place about the church was brilliantly lit up with the lamps of the dealers. Light also streamed from the beautiful Gothic windows of the parsonage opposite the church. The Baron's young wife, who was not German, was delighted with the gay scene as she walked from booth to booth with her husband. It was her first winter in Germany.

"Ah, here are the figures Miss Helen talked so much about! And in truth they are wonderful. Do look at this mother and child, Hilda; the soul in the woman's face and the perfect baby face of the infant. And yet there is also something of the Divine look of the child in the San Sisto Madonna. How much are they, Herr Gutgesinnt?"

"They are sold already, Herr Baron."

"All of them?"

"All but the little Christkind here, Herr Baron; but that, to my thinking, is the best of all."

"So it is, my friend. And what's the price?"

"Three marks, Herr Baron."

"Three marks! Poor little woodcarver! It ought to be three gold pieces, Hilda; but here is the money, Herr Gutgesinnt; we will give her the rest to-night."

That evening, a few hours later, just when a happy group gathered about a little representation of Bethlehem, in which Clärchen's figures had been artistically arranged after the pleasant German fashion, with miniature oxen, stalls, trees, a desert of sand, an oasis of palm trees, and pool made of looking-glass, by which the camels and the three wise men were stalking gravely, and whilst they sang to Helen's accompaniment the last verse of "Stilly Night"—

"Holy night! heralding dawn,

Far and near breaks the morn;

Breaks the day when the Saviour of men;

Bringing pardon and healing again;

'Holy, harmless and undefiled,' Cometh a little child!"

—a loud knock sounded on the door, and when the maid opened it she saw a tall man's figure standing there muffled up to the eyes, past all recognition, and a deep bass voice gave a Christmas greeting as he handed her a small parcel.

"For whom?" she asked. She was a sensible stolid young woman of few words.

"The little woodcarver."

"From whom?"

"Her Christkind."

That little parcel contained three beautiful gold pieces. They were the first of many more she received from the same purse. Clärchen is now studying art with the help of her kind patron. If she continues to grow strong, of which there is every human probability, she will soon be one of the first women artists in the world.

A CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

AT this season we are asked in every direction to give relief to the poor and needy, and it is generally found that at Christmas-time there is a greater willingness among Christian people to share their own comforts with those who are without any than at other times. For those who wish to help, there are plenty of societies and agencies to direct our charitable efforts, but there is one nation who till lately never applied to us for relief. "Our girls" will remember that an appeal was made in these pages, some years ago, on behalf of the distressed Jewish refugees, by the society formed for their relief after the terrible atrocities in Russia in 1881. This work has steadily been carried on ever since, and has in a quiet way dealt with large numbers of destitute people, who have been helped to go away where work was to be had, and with the chronic distress in Jerusalem, where about 20,000 Jews live in a terrible state of poverty and distress. This year there has been a serious drought in Jerusalem, and, as usual, the Jews have been the greatest sufferers, through their dilapidated dwellings and unrepaid cisterns. In reply to a letter sending three pounds, given specially for relief of this trouble, the appalling fact is stated that this year nine hundred little Jewish children in Jerusalem have died of want.

Will "our girls" help to make this Christmas a happier one for these poor people, and teach them by deeds of kindness that all Christians are not like those who have so cruelly treated and robbed them? They are a most grateful people, who never live on the bread of idleness if work and wages are to be had, and who never apply for relief till they have exhausted all means of obtaining a livelihood, however scanty. Want of space prevents further most interesting details being given, but information will be gladly afforded, and the smallest contribution thankfully received by

THE FROST SPIRIT.

He comes—he comes—the Frost Spirit comes
From the frozen Labrador;
From the icy bridge or the northern seas,
Which the white bear wanders o'er;
Where the fisherman's sail is stiff with ice,
And the luckless forms below,
In the sunless cold of the atmosphere,
Into marble statues grow!

He comes—he comes—the Frost Spirit comes!
And the quiet lake shall feel
The torpid touch of his glazing breath,
And ring to the skater's heel;
And the streams which danced on the broken rocks,
Or sang to the leaning grass,
Shall bow again to their winter chain,
And in mournful silence pass.

He comes—he comes—the Frost Spirit comes!
Let us meet him as we may,
And turn with the light of the parlour fire
His evil power away;
And gather closer the circle round,
When that firelight dances high,
And laugh at the shriek of the baffled fiend,
As his sounding wing goes by!

MISS ANGEL'S LAST CHRISTMAS.

CHAPTER I.

"And I spent my life
In living those golden dreams
Of things that might never be."

MISS ANGEL sat in the tiny parlour of her small house in a dingy street leading out of one of our busy London thoroughfares. The room was scantily furnished, and all of it looked worn and threadbare and colourless; "pretty nearly worn out," like its owner, one might say.

Very small was the fire before which the old lady sat this bitterly cold Christmas Eve; for Miss Angel's means were limited, and this season had been a special drain on them; when everything she could possibly spare from her own comfort had been bestowed on those in even poorer circumstances than her own—"to help to make a little Christmas for them," thought Miss Angel, as she glanced round her empty larder and almost empty wardrobe.

As long as she could make others happy Miss Angel was content to live, though for long years—specially since the death of her only sister Merilina, who had died nearly thirty years before—her life had been a lonely one. And year by year as it passed seemed to make it more lonely; for one by one old friends and acquaintances left the neighbourhood, or were called away to the unseen world beyond earth's changing scenes, leaving her almost like a stranded vessel on the shore.

Life had been a very chequered one to Miss Angel. Poor always, as a governess's life too often is, and poorer still in her old age, as her savings gradually dwindled and dwindled, till at last she had nothing left but a very small annuity.

Sad and lonely the lady felt as she sat thinking over the fire, for it would be the last Christmas she would enjoy in a home of her own. Her slender means could no longer support her, and she had been obliged, with the assistance of friends, to find admittance in a poor governesses' home at some distance on the other side of London.

Already she had given her landlord notice to quit, and was to leave the little house which had been her home for many a day, the last day of the old year. Yet as Miss Angel sat over the fire this Christmas Eve it was not so much of the present she was thinking as of the past. Her memory was very busy going over the days that had gone by, with all their varied lights and shadows, though, perhaps, for her the shadows had preponderated.

Once only had a gleam of brightness, bringing with it the promise of a happy earthly home, come to vary the monotony of her early-orphaned life. But one heavy cloud had eclipsed that brightness from her, and shadowed all her future with its felt darkness. That one cloud, for her at least, seemed to have no silver lining. What of that? Had not the Lord willed it so for her, and she had never rebelled against that will, though she had often wished it otherwise.

And now as she sat over her fire she was going over that one event in her life which had been its dividing line, only the latter half was so much the longest. Once more she was sitting by Ewan McReady, listening to his earnest words of love and entreaty. "Magdalene, dearest, do not let a trifle part us."

And she was answering, "It is no trifle to me, Ewan dear. You do not know what it costs me to say 'no.' But I dare not say 'yes' when God's express command is, 'Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers.' Oh, Ewan! if you love me, do not tempt me to disobey the Divine command!"

And so he had left her, and she had never seen him since, or heard of him through all the weary years that followed.

Stung almost to madness by her refusal, Ewan McReady had thrown up his appointment in the army and taken to a roving life, and gone to the gold-diggings. But what he gained there did not enrich him. In the bitterness of his soul he took almost a pleasure in working desperately to help any less successful comrade, and he left the diggings even poorer than he went to them to seek more congenial, or rather less unbearable, employment elsewhere.

But Magdalene Angel never heard of him; and whether he was alive or dead she did not know. For years and years she had prayed for him, and looked for his return; but he never came; and though she still went on praying for him, she had ceased to expect any answer in this world. And now old age was creeping on her apace, and she was sadly lonely. There was nothing for her to look forward to but drearier and darker days than even those that pressed on her now. Yet she never regretted the path she had taken, for there was One whom she loved even more than Ewan McReady, and His love had never failed her through all those sorrowful years. And after all no one could be to her what the Lord Christ was, for no one else understood her, and felt for her, and cared for her like He did. And His presence, realised and delighted in, did satisfy the nameless cravings of her soul.

What if life were solitary and dreary, the better part of it was yet to come, and she looked for that—

"What care the saints of God if they Through pain and grief are called away
To their reward?
What matters this short life of tears
That ushers in the countless years
With their dear Lord?"

Her reflections were suddenly interrupted by a ring at the bell, and presently Phillis, the little maid-of-all work, came up to say that it was "Mrs. Foster come to see her, and was waiting in the hall."

Mrs. Foster had been one of Miss Angel's Sunday-school class many years ago; and had married and gone to live on the other side of London. She seldom came to see Miss Angel unless driven to abject distress and starvation by her drunkard husband, and she was, probably, in such a plight now, or she would hardly have come all the way across London on Christmas Eve.

"Show her up," said Miss Angel, rather annoyed at the arrival of this unwelcome guest. But she squeezed down the unworthy thought, as words of Holy Writ came floating through her brain. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me;" and she knew that each opportunity of doing came but once, and if not used, would slip away for ever.

"I always thank God for giving me opportunities," she was wont to say when she heard people grumbling at the "many calls made on their charity." And so when Mrs. Foster appeared, all thought of annoyance at having her quiet time over the fire interrupted had gone.

The poor woman's haggard and sorrowful face told its own story, even before Miss Angel had got it out of her piecemeal. Her husband had been taken up at last in a drunken row and gone to gaol, leaving her and her five little children penniless. And the two small rooms she had furnished with the intention of letting had been vacant for months. No lodger would stay in a house where the landlord was in the habit of coming home in the middle of the night the worse for drink.

For a moment Miss Angel was at a loss what to do. Already her charitable resources had been taxed to the utmost. She had not a shilling left, save the one she had reserved for the Christmas offertory.

"You must have some tea," she said, in order to give herself time to think. And she led the way down to the kitchen, where she instructed Phillis to give the poor woman a comfortable meal; and then seized a moment, when her maid was busy with the boiling kettle, to abstract, unnoticed from the larder, a piece of steak and small Christmas plum-pudding, which had been prepared and laid aside for her own dinner next day. Phillis was to spend Christmas with her parents, so there would be no one to notice if she had not Christmas fare herself.

Then she returned upstairs, and carefully stowed away what she had collected in a small basket.

"This will at least keep them from starving on Christmas Day," said Miss Angel to herself; "and I must write to the vicar of her parish to get her more substantial help." And then she slipped in under the lid of the basket, though not without some reluctance, the shilling she had laid aside for the Christmas collection, carefully folded away in an old envelope long before, to ensure its not being spent before the day.

"Perhaps this is the way the Lord would have me spend it," thought Miss Angel; "and if I give only a penny in the plate to-morrow, He will see the shilling behind it."

With a lightened heart Mrs. Foster was dismissed, and Miss Angel had barely settled herself once more in her comfortable arm-chair by the fire, when another ring at the bell came to disturb her anticipated "afternoon's rest!" This time it was Miss Symes, one of the most indefatigable district visitors in the parish. Miss Symes was the "right hand" of the vicar, and few good works went on in his parish without her aid or superintendence. From morning to night she might be seen visiting the poor, or at the soup kitchen, or working clubs; and no kindlier heart ever beat under a somewhat plain exterior. But Miss Symes had one weakness among her many good qualities, and that was that she was always in a hurry. She never had time, or at least she never thought she had, to enjoy her work, and this perpetual haste marred much of the true kindness of her charities.

She now came into Miss Angel's little drawing-room with a rush, a well filled basket on her arm, and some sprays of holly in her hand.

A quick glance round the apartment satisfied her that Miss Angel had not indulged in the luxury of any Christmas decorations.

"Ah," she said, kindly, "I thought that very likely you would not have any holly, so I have brought you some. The berries are splendid this year. I always think people ought to have a sprig up in their rooms to remind them to be thankful for Christmas blessings." She had no idea how very little of what the world considers Christmas blessings fell to the lot of poor Miss Angel.

"No! I can't sit down," she continued, as Miss Angel asked her to be seated; "I really have not a minute to spare; not a moment, I might say. For all these Christmas dinner-tickets have to be distributed" (she disclosed a handful), "and also this basketful of grocery packets for the old folks at the almshouses. I really have so much to do this afternoon that I don't know how I am to get through it all! Good-bye, and a merry Christmas to you!"

And with that somewhat irrelevant wish she was gone, almost before Miss Angel realised her entrance.

The old lady stood motionless for awhile; then she began arranging the beautiful bright sprays, but without any definite idea how to place them. If only Miss Symes had added to her kindness by sharing five minutes out of her busy afternoon to place them in the mantelpiece vases, and over two or three of the pictures that hung on the wall, she would have enhanced the value of her gift a hundredfold. But she never thought of such a thing, or how a few kindly words would have cheered the old lady's solitary afternoon; so she rushed off to do fresh kindnesses, leaving each incomplete from the sense of haste that always pressed on her.

Miss Angel took long to arrange those few sprays of brilliant green and scarlet berries. How the sharp leaves pricked her fingers! The berries swam before her eyes, and only appeared a blurred mass of crimson through the tears that came welling up from some hidden fount of feeling. Her thoughts had flown to that wonderful story of long ago, which began on Christmas night when Christ was born. The holly's prickly leaves seemed but to remind her of the piercing thorns that formed His only crown on earth, and the deep-hued berries the red drops shed on Calvary.

Miss Angel sighed many times as she placed those few Christmas tokens of festivity round the room; "For surely," she said to herself, "the story of the Cross began at Bethlehem."

Oh! how often had she told the thrilling record of that wondrous tale to the children of her class, almost melted to tears herself as she tried to make it real to them; only to meet careless, indifferent looks, or, worse still, irreverent remarks from her listeners. And yet, if she had failed to benefit those she wished to reach, she had done good to her own soul the while, for every repetition of that wondrous story brought the child Christ nearer to her, till His presence filled all the place, and she knew and felt that she loved none else in comparison with Him.

CHAPTER II.

MISS ANGEL had barely settled herself once more in her armchair beside the fire when another ring at the bell came to disturb her intended afternoon's rest. And the next moment the vicar's son, young Frank Edmunds, was ushered into the room.

Now Frank was a great favourite with the old lady, and a strange kind of friendship had sprung up between the wild-spirited boy and herself, for which it would have been difficult to account. He was always welcome in Miss Angel's parlour whenever he chose to come (which was not seldom), and he generally made it a place of resort whenever he had had any tiff with his brothers and sisters, or got into disgrace with his father for unprepared lessons, and consequently a bad report from school. Such misdemeanours were, alas! of frequent occurrence.

But this afternoon all Miss Angel's usual remedies to soothe him into a better temper were fruitless, though she exerted herself to the utmost. Something was evidently weighing on the boy's mind beyond the unsatisfactory report from his schoolmaster for "idleness and mischief."

"Is anything the matter?" she ventured to ask at last, after the twentieth dead pause in the conversation.

"Matter enough," jerked out the lad, who had been longing for an opportunity to tell out all that was weighing on his mind. "I'm off to sea; and I have only come to—to wish you 'good-bye.' I did not like to go without that."

"Going to sea!" exclaimed Miss Angel; "and on Christmas Eve, too; impossible!"

"It's a fact," said Frank, doggedly. "I've had enough of being at home, and so I'm off." And then, bit by bit, the story came out. "It all came of that wretched school report. Father was in an awful temper about it, and says I shall never be anything but a disgrace to him. So I am not going to trouble him with my presence any longer."

"But you cannot mean—you do not intend to run away from home!" The words seemed to choke Miss Angel.

"That is just what I do mean," replied Frank. "I am off now to get a berth in the first vessel that leaves the London Docks. I'd work my way as cabin boy or anything across the world for nothing, and when I am once there I'll find something to do, never fear."

It was useless to argue with him in his present mood, and yet Miss Angel could not bear that he should run away like this in a mere fit of temper.

A loud ring at the bell rather startled them both. They looked at one another in mutual alarm.

"What if it is my father," said Frank, who was ready to leap out of the window, or make any violent exit to avoid his angered parent.

Miss Angel went to the door, where she met Phillis hurrying to answer the bell.

"If it is any visitor," she said, "show them up to the drawing-room, and light the candles there, and say I'll be up directly."

Then she closed the dining-room door, and they both listened intently.

Yes; it was the vicar! There was no mistaking his loud, trumpet-like voice. The runaway quaked in his shoes. And Miss Angel kept her hand on the handle of the door. Suddenly it received a violent push from the other side.

"Oh, please, ma'am, it's only Mr. Edmunds," explained Phillis, from without.

"Show him up to the drawing-room, and say I will join him in a minute," answered Miss Angel, from within. No one would have guessed from the tone of her voice how agitated she really was.

"Now I'm off!" cried Frank, as soon as he had satisfied himself that his parent was safe in the room overhead.

"Oh, Frank, don't go," pleaded the old lady, putting a detaining hand on his arm. "Do not do a hasty action which you will regret all your life."

"I tell you I will not stay at home to be lectured," cried Frank. "He is sure to have found out that I am here—and—and—I will not see him."

"It is simply ridiculous your trying to get work on the very eve of Christmas, and a Bank Holiday," replied Miss Angel, unable to keep him any longer. "You will only be wandering the streets. I will not let you go unless you promise me to return, and tell me what you have done."

"You won't betray me to my father, or any of my people?" he asked.

"I shall not need to do so," she answered, earnestly. "When you have quietly considered matters you will not wish to act like a foolish child, but like a man. And, oh! Frank," she added, "do seek Divine guidance; that, and only that, will lead you right."

And then she hastened upstairs, not daring to keep the vicar longer waiting, but dreading what the refractory lad would do during her enforced absence.

But Miss Angel was quite wrong in supposing that the vicar had come to her in quest of his runaway son. Mr. Edmunds was not even aware that his boy had left his own roof, having little idea how his hasty words had stung the lad's proud spirit. He came forward to meet Miss Angel with his usual affability, and no one to see him thus would have guessed how angry he had been scarcely an hour before. Alas! many a storm that as quickly passes leaves its devastating results behind.

CHAPTER III.

HAVE come on rather important business," said the vicar, as soon as he had exchanged greetings with Miss Angel.

"I am sorry—very sorry," began the poor lady, not knowing what to say, and dreading a scene under her own roof.

Mr. Edmunds was slightly surprised at her alarmed appearance.

"When I said my business was important, I might have added it was pleasant also," he said, thoroughly enjoying being the bearer of good news, and wishing to arouse the old lady's curiosity.

But Miss Angel showed no signs of interest. She was too pre-occupied with the thought of Frank to take in any other subject just then. The vicar saw that she was in no mood to be amused, and changed his tone immediately.

"I have just received a letter from a man of business—a lawyer unknown to me—asking if I can furnish him with your address, as some distant relative or connection of yours has died intestate, and you are the next-of-kin," and he held out the legal document to her.

She took it mechanically, her mind in a perfect whirl, and attempted to read it; but she could not see well without her spectacles, which she had left downstairs, and, besides, the phraseology of the letter was quite beyond her comprehension.

"I cannot understand it!" she said, quietly handing him back the paper. "I think there must be some mistake."

"No mistake whatever!" cried the vicar, cheerfully. "I should not have come here to raise your expectations merely to have them disappointed. You see from this paper that Mr. Thawless, of Grimthorpe, has died suddenly without leaving a will, and, after due investigation, the lawyer has found out that you are next-of-kin."

Miss Angel looked mystified.

"Mr. Thawless—of Grimthorpe. Ah! he was the gentleman in whose family my poor sister Merilina was governess long ago. She died there, poor thing, quite suddenly, and they were all so very kind about it, and sympathising. But that was thirty years ago, and they were so very distantly connected with us that we never counted them as relatives at all."

"Well, his family must have died off," said the vicar, "or you would not have come in for his neat little fortune. I congratulate you, Miss Angel; and I don't think the money could have come into better hands."

Miss Angel did not answer. She seemed dazed at the suddenness of the news. She pressed her hand to her head, and tried to collect her thoughts, feeling very much as if she was in a kind of nightmare, and would awake to find it was all a strange dream.

Mr. Edmunds rose to go, thinking she might "come to herself" more easily if left alone. She saw him to the door, and rang the bell for the maid, and then went slowly back to her seat.

"There must be some mistake!" she kept slowly saying to herself. She had grown so accustomed to get bad news, or disappointing notes, that she could not realise that anything good had really come to her.

CHAPTER IV.

WHILE the object of Miss Angel's anxious solicitude was passing through new and unexpected experiences.

On hurrying off from her door in fear of being stopped by his father, he had got into the first omnibus he met going into the City, taking his seat inside to avoid the possibility of being recognised by any of his companions in the street; and also for the sake of the warmth, for the wind outside was keen and bitter, besides a sprinkling of snow, which had begun to fall from the leaden-looking sky.

He glanced askance at his fellow-passengers, and was glad to find no one there whom he knew, so he huddled himself up in the further corner, where he remained till the omnibus reached its destination, when he alighted, and hastened to pursue the rest of his journey to the docks on foot.

Half running, half walking, he hastened on, anxious to secure some berth for himself before the short afternoon had quite faded. As it was he barely reached the dock before the gates were closed. However, he managed to get in unnoticed among the number of men and boys loitering about, and proceeded at once to a small merchant vessel that was lying in the basin—either just arrived from foreign parts, or on the point of starting on a fresh voyage. Frank's inexperienced eye could not tell which.

An elderly gentleman, in a heavy great-coat, and hat jammed over his eyes, was coming slowly up the companion ladder from the cabin below, and crossed the single plank that served as a bridge to the shore.

Edmunds made up his mind that this was the captain, and accosted him.

"Do you want an able lad as cabin boy?" he asked with some hesitation, despite his effort to appear free and easy.

The stranger paused in his hurried walk, and gave him a quick scrutinising glance.

"I'm not the captain," he said, "and I don't know where you will find him, for he has gone off to spend Christmas with his family." And the stranger was about to pass on, when a sudden thought seemed to strike him.

"You are running away from home, my lad," he said, looking Frank keenly in the face as he stood fidgeting before him. "You are running away from home. Take my advice, and don't do it."

"It's no business of yours," said Frank, doggedly. "If I've a mind to go to sea, why shouldn't I?"

"For the sake of the mother you leave behind," said the stranger. "Don't break her heart."

"I'd not have left home if she was there," answered the boy, with a sudden change of tone.

"Aye, but is there no one there to miss you, and long for you, and weep bitter tears over your running away? I knew a man once who acted very much as I fear you are acting now; he could not get his way in the Old Country, so he ran off to the New, and the first thing he saw when he reached the other side of the globe was a stray copy of an English newspaper, in which he read the death of the one being in the world whom he loved, and whom he had recklessly run away from in a fit of ungoverned petulance. I can tell you that for thirty years that man just knocked about, and toiled like a slave, merely to try and drive away thought, and now a dreary old age of loneliness lies before him. Ah, my lad, don't run yourself into thirty years of fruitless remorse by the foolish action of a moment."

But the idea of going home again after having run away was simply unbearable to Frank.

"I know my own business best," he said, turning coldly away. Very hot and rebellious was the heart beating under his double-breasted jacket at that moment; and he resented any interference of a stranger.

So he walked off down the dock, leaving the stranger looking pityingly after him. "Fine lad, that! A pity he should wreck his life on the angry impulse of a moment. Verbum sap.! but, alas, there is not much wisdom in hot-headed youth!"

And so Frank went up and down the wharf many times, but he could not find either the captain or mates of the vessel he had taken a fancy to; or, indeed, anyone to give him some trustworthy information about the outward bound ships in the docks. The only men and boys about the place were rough "hands," finishing off odd jobs in all haste before Christmas Day; and they had no time or inclination to answer his questions.

He grew weary and disheartened with wandering about. The place was strange to him, and in the dim light of the fast closing day looked weird and unprepossessing. More than once he fell over logs and coils of rope that he did not see in the semi-darkness. The wind was bitterly keen, and blew right on him across the river, so there was no possibility of getting out of it, whichever way he walked.

More than once he thought regretfully of the home he had left, and which had never before seemed so warm and inviting as it did now, when he felt that he had quitted it for ever. More than once he wished that he had heeded the stranger's words, and gone back to the home which he ought never to have quitted. If he had done so at once, his people need never have known that he had actually started from home to run away.

He turned back again in his aimless walk, and found the place deserted! All the workmen must have gone off at the ringing of the bell he had heard a short time since, but disregarded.

In his present mood he could not bear to be alone. He hurried to the dock gates—they were closed and locked, and no one answered his knocking on them.

This was indeed being shut up like a rat in a trap! Yet how was he to get out? The gates were far too high for him to scale, and the surrounding sheds and outhouses were an insurmountable barrier. What was he to do?

Wearily he sank at last on a heap of timber, and gave himself up to his own bitter reflections. What would his father say when he found that he had run away, and all because he would not listen to reproofs, which his conscience now told him were well-deserved? What would poor Bertha be thinking of his non-appearance? Patient, long-suffering Bertha, who had so often got herself into scrapes in trying to shield him! How ill he was requiring her constant love and goodness to him! And last, not least—what would poor Miss Angel be doing when she found that he had taken advantage of her being called away, to depart without a word of good-bye or thanks for all her kindness?

The snow was beginning to fall in large, heavy flakes; the evening air grew more damp and chilly, the darkness deepened till he could see little more than the dim outlines of his surroundings. He shifted his seat to a more sheltered position, turned up the collar of his coat, and drew his hat over his eyes. This was the result of his ebullient temper, and he would brave it out.

CHAPTER V.

INE-LOOKING lad that! and unmistakably the gentleman," thought the stranger, as he watched Frank's retreating figure. "I wonder where he comes from! A pity he should go off as an extra hand to sea. He'll regret it before he's been out a week. Anyhow, there'll be no getting any work to-night; and a few hours in the docks on this bitter evening will likely bring him to his senses before morning." And with that consolatory thought he went on his way.

Where that way led appeared rather doubtful; for he walked up one street and down another till he found himself exactly at the same place from which he had started.

"This will never do," he said to himself. "I must get a lodging somewhere for to-night. Alas! that I have no one in all the Old Country to welcome me back after these thirty years of absence."

He started on afresh; up one little dingy street, and mechanically turned to the right into another even more gloomy. One or two windows, however, had tickets in them, bearing the inscription, "Lodgings for a single gentleman," and he investigated them as he passed along. But they were not very inviting (to judge from the outside). "I should like something better my first night back in Old England," he said to himself as he passed from one to another.

He came at last to the end of the row of uninviting dwellings, and was about to retrace his steps, when a very worn and sorrowful-looking woman came up to the door close to him, and proceeded to open it with a latch-key.

The stranger inadvertently watched her (he always had a special feeling of pity for any woman in distress—he best knew why), and then raised his eye to the card in the window. "Lodgings for a single gentleman." Then he took a step forward.

"Do you keep lodgings?" he asked, addressing the woman with the sorrowful face.

"Yes," she answered, in a despondent tone.

"I would like to look at them," he said.

"Oh! I am afraid they would not suit you; they are so poor and plain; and I have had to part with some of the furniture to pay my rent," she replied, in the same hopeless tone.

"Oh, I don't want anything very grand," he answered; "just a bedroom where I can put up for a night or two, and a sitting-room."

She silently led the way through the nearly dark passage, up a narrow stair to the room above, the door of which she threw open and allowed her visitor to enter.

Certainly it was not a very inviting room. Everything was dingy and shabby, from the threadbare carpet to the olive green curtains; and the dim light of the candle which the poor woman proceeded to light only made the place appear more gloomy. A round table filled the centre of the apartment; and two or three chairs stood stiffly up against the wall at intervals. The small bedroom adjoining felt musty from disuse, and the stranger was on the point of saying that the apartments would not do, when the dejected face and attitude of the landlady made him change his mind. After all, he had often put up with far rougher fare, and been thankful for it.

"The rooms will do well enough," he said, "if you can cook me something soon, for I've had no dinner to-day and am hungry."

Yes, she could cook, but—and again she paused.

"Oh! I suppose you want part payment in advance," said the stranger, divining the cause of her hesitation; and diving his hand in his pocket, he brought thence sundry pieces of silver and copper coin. "There," he added, pushing the money across the table to her; "go and get coals and candles, for I hate being in the dark, and I want a good big fire to warm me. And let me have a hot supper as soon as you can, my good woman."

Off she went, leaving him the greasy candlestick with the tallow dip in it, which but served to "make darkness visible in that dreary place." He sauntered to the window, and stood gazing out into the street; but his thoughts were far away, and he did not notice the landlady's return with sticks, paper, and coals, with which she proceeded to light the fire in the rusty grate. But it had evidently not been used for long, and was damp; and the draught came down the chimney instead of going up it, so that the room was soon filled with smoke.

However, after throwing open the window, and much coaxing of the refractory coals and wet firewood, a fire was kindled at last, and gave promise of burning up in time.

"That will do," said the stranger, who objected to see the poor woman on her knees, doing the work of a pair of bellows till her throat must have been filled with dust. "Now get supper, and be quick."

After she had left the room to prepare the meal, the stranger still sat gazing into the uncertain flames. This was, indeed, a dreary home-coming! No one to expect him! No one to welcome him! No one to care what became of him! He almost wished he had remained at the Antipodes; where, at least, there would be no thought of home to mock the emptiness of his Christmas Eve. He had never taken into account the utter desolation of returning to a place where his very existence was forgotten.

Presently savoury odours of cooking came creeping up into the room from below, and with that the thought of the lad he had met on the wharf. He wondered if the boy had gone back to his home, or if he was still wandering about in the spirit of rebellion against parental authority. This night might alter the destiny of his whole life, as a night thirty years ago had altered his own life; and he would fain save another from what he had himself endured—aye, was enduring now, and would yet endure till death shadowed all things.

Acting on the thought, he rose, took up his hat, and went downstairs, and passed out once more into the bitter evening air.

A few minutes' smart walk brought him to the dock gates, but they were closed, and the crowd of loiterers that had been standing there when he passed through before had dispersed, and not a sign of anyone was near. For a minute or two he was uncertain what to do, and almost determined to go back to his lodging without pursuing his quest any further, when he observed a bell-chain evidently belonging to the dock gate. Perhaps there might be some night porter to guard within.

He pulled the iron chain, and a loud, discordant bell sounded through the stillness, but no one answered the summons, and he had to repeat it twice ere the watchman in charge came to the gate.

In answer to the stranger's inquiry whether he had seen a lad loitering about on the premises, he answered in the negative, adding that no one was likely to stay in the docks that night, as they were closed till after Christmas Day. However, on seeing the gentleman's evident disappointment, he offered to look round the place; "for may be," he said to himself, "he is the lad's father, only he doesn't like to say so, else why should he give me a shilling." And he clutched the coin which the stranger had thrust into his hand to quicken his wits and his movements. But though they searched every corner, the missing boy could not be found, and they were just about to give up the hunt as useless, when they observed some dark object lying beside an empty cask (which they had previously taken to be a coil of rope), but which on closer inspection turned out to be the runaway asleep, or pretending to be so.

"Come, come," said the stranger, laying a kind but firm hand on his shoulder, and giving him a shake; "this is not a night for you to make your bed in the open air."

Frank stood up sulkily, hardly knowing whether to be pleased at being thus released from his unwelcome detention in that weird place, or angry at being interfered with. He muttered something, but his captors took no heed; and he was marched off through the yard and dock gates before he was well aware of what was happening, till he found himself and the stranger alone in the miserable street beyond.

"You'll come with me to-night," the stranger was saying, "and we'll see in the morning what is to be done. No; you need not struggle like that," he added, as Frank became restive under his grip. "I could hold a lad twice your size as easily as I hold you now. There is no use your trying to get away, for I won't let you. You will just come and have supper and a bed with me to-night; you'll like it better than starving out in this sharp wind if you are as hungry as I am."

There was no withstanding this appeal, so Frank allowed himself to be led off, and very glad he was when he found himself seated beside a comfortable fire opposite his unknown friend

Soon the landlady appeared with a tray of hot viands, which she proceeded to arrange on the table, which was still lighted by the one solitary "dip" which she had first used.

"Let us have more light," said the stranger, drawing his chair to the table, and motioning to Frank to do the same.

The landlady hastened to comply, but the gas burners overhead had not been used for some time, and would not ignite. Match after match was lighted in vain, till the poor woman became almost flurried in her endeavours, while the stranger watched her with a strange kind of fascination. There was something in her face which attracted him, the patient look of one accustomed to suffer, and to suffer uncomplainingly. All unbidden, his thoughts had flown to another suffering face, one whose last appealing glance he had left unanswered, but which always stood before him when any case of distress presented itself to him. People had often wondered at so much pitiful tenderness in the rough Englishman; but that was because they knew nothing of the bitter memories that called it forth.

"Never mind about the gas," he said, at last; "another candle will do very well."

But the poor woman would not give up her efforts, for the credit of her lodgings; and, with many apologies for the delay, drew an old envelope from her pocket, which she tore in two, in a last attempt to produce a flame.

This time she was successful, and a blaze of light filled the room, and gave it almost a cheerful aspect. At the moment the stranger's eye fell on the remaining half of the torn envelope lying on the table, with the address on it turned towards him. He read it inadvertently, and started violently and changed colour; and the hand that rested on the back of his chair actually trembled.

The landlady saw him glance at the scrap of paper, and was about to remove it, having no idea of the shock it had brought to him, but he prevented her.

"Did you know the lady whose address is there?" he asked, as soon as he could steady his voice to speak, and retaining the paper in his hand.

Mrs. Foster—for it was she—had to come near and look at the paper, for she had not been aware that anything was written on the envelope in which Miss Angel had wrapped up the shilling she had given her that afternoon. It was an official-looking envelope, with Miss Angel's name in full, and "On Her Majesty's Service" printed on the top.

"Miss Magdalene Angel," she read, aloud. "Oh, she's a very good, kind lady! I was in her Sunday class long ago, and she has taken an interest in me ever since."

The stranger looked bewildered, gazing fixedly on the name on the scrap of paper before him. And after waiting a minute or two, not knowing whether to go or stay, Mrs. Foster raised the cover from the smoking steak, and withdrew.

This aroused the stranger to the remembrance that he had a guest to look after; but when he had helped Frank liberally, he relapsed into silence again, forgetting to help himself. Whatever appetite he had had was gone; he sat gazing into vacancy. Once or twice Frank ventured to make some remark, but the stranger did not appear to hear, so he pursued his meal in silence.

Suddenly the stranger roused up.

"What did you say?" he said, pushing his plate away and going back to the fire. Then, without waiting for an answer, he took up the candle and retired to the adjoining room. But presently he looked in again to say, "Mrs. Foster will give you a bedroom to-night, and we will talk over matters in the morning," leaving Frank in no small surprise at his sudden disappearance.

CHAPTER VI.

UT Frank was in no mood to spend the night as suggested, with the prospect of being walked off to his people on the morrow by this unknown stranger. He had not noticed the little episode about the old envelope, being engrossed at the moment in making out an old print on the wall representing the death of Nelson, and so was at a loss to imagine what had made his host so suddenly grave and silent. The boy grew restless, and wandered about the room in an aimless way, unable to fix his thoughts on anything. Suddenly he remembered Miss Angel, and a pang of self-reproach darted through him as he thought of the way he had parted from her. She would be sure to expect him back, and would very likely be sitting up for him. He made up his mind that he must go back to her just to say a proper "good-bye," for there would be no fear of meeting his father now. So he only waited long enough to make quite sure that his host had gone to bed, and then crept into the passage, and down the creaky stair, and after fumbling at the door for a short time found the fastening, opened it, and passed out into the street. Oh, how piercingly cold it was after coming from that warm room upstairs! Frank involuntarily shivered from head to foot, and felt thankful that he had not had to spend the night in the open dock-yard.

Fearful of his departure being discovered, he hurried along without any definite idea which direction he was going in, till he suddenly found himself by Westminster Bridge instead of Clerkenwell.

He quickly retraced his steps; running whenever he could do so without fear of exciting attention. But despite all his efforts, it was past twelve o'clock when he hurried up Pentonville Hill, and found himself once more in Percy Street.

Yes, there was her window with the shutter open. He had felt so sure she would be sitting up for him. However, there was no sign of her at the window, so he came to a sudden standstill, as he did not like to ring the bell, for fear of arousing the maid. Then a happy thought struck him. He had a supply of peas and his peashooter in his pocket, and he put them in requisition at once.

Miss Angel was enjoying a quiet dose over the fire, and the noise soon roused her.

"Ah, it's hailing!" she said to herself, slightly shivering, and drawing her shawl closer round her. "There it is again! What a sharp shower; and that poor, self-willed boy out in it. I wish I had locked him up in the dining-room, and not given him a chance of keeping me up like this. I wish I had told his father, and taken the responsibility off my own shoulders."

Another shower of peas at her window brought her to her feet with a heavy sigh.

"What a dreadful night! The hail seems positively pelting," she said to herself, as she went to the window. But when she drew the venetian aside and peered out, there was no sign of hail, but the figure of a boy gesticulating to her in the middle of the street, and with a sense of extreme relief she recognised the vicar's son.

Down she hurried (after snuffing the overgrown wick of her candle) to the hall; for Phillis had been dismissed to bed long ago, and everything was locked up for the night.

"Is it you, Frank?" she asked, before opening the door, and listening anxiously for the answer.

"Yes, Miss Angel, it is me." And the next minute he was safe in the hall, and being led into the dining-room by Miss Angel.

"What have you been doing, you bad boy?" she said. "Keeping me up at this time of night."

Frank briefly explained. "Indeed, I should not have been back here to-night," he concluded, "if a benevolent old gentleman, whom I met in the docks, had not taken it into his head that I was running away from home. He came and ferreted me out of my hiding-place, took me to his lodging, and gave me a hot supper and good advice."

"And he sent you home? How truly good; how kind!" said Miss Angel.

"Oh, no!" said Frank, with a laugh. "He thinks me safe in bed at his place! I only waited to make sure that he was asleep before I made my way here. I should have been back long ago, only I mistook the way, and lost myself in a perfect labyrinth of streets."

"Well, you must stay the night here, now," said Miss Angel. "There is the sofa in the back room, which is the only bed I can offer you, unless—" and she hesitated—"you mean to return to your home at once; I think you ought."

But Frank was in no mood of penitence, and would not listen to any suggestion about going back to his father. He was quite content to stay the night where he was, but it was with no thought of being the returning prodigal on the morrow. So Miss Angel did not press the point, and left him to come to himself, only taking care to lock the front door and carry off the key, so that there might be no chance of her unexpected guest running off in the morning before she was down. The poor lady's mind was quite in a flutter. How was she to account to Phillis for having the vicar's son sleeping in her house?

However, her ingenuity was not put to the test, for her little maid was in such a hurry to be off in the morning, that she quite forgot to open the sitting-room shutters. And Frank was so tired after the excitement and fatigues of the preceding day that he did not wake up till nearly mid-day; and when, at last he made his appearance, it was to find Miss Angel waiting for him, as she had been doing for the last two hours, at the breakfast table.

was a great disappointment to Miss Angel not to get to the Christmas morning service. But she could not leave Frank alone, especially as he was still in the same rebellious temper of the night before. So she busied herself with making what preparations lay in her power for dinner, spending most of the time in going in and out of the dining-room, alternately scolding, coaxing, and advising her refractory guest. Frank was cross and sulky, and would not be pleased; the liberty and fun he had promised himself on running away from home had dwindled into a set of unpleasant memories, and he could not make up his mind what to do.

"Go back to your father," suggested Miss Angel.

No, his temper would not let him.

"Why not go to church, and at least hear the sweet Christmas hymns?"

"What! go and be recognised by everybody! and have a regular scene before my father's parishioners?"

"Your father's church is not the only one," retorted the almost exasperated lady. "It is very irreligious of you wasting Christmas Day like this, and making me do so too. I do not know that I am right in letting you do it."

"Oh, if I am in your way I will go at once," he said, rising. "I thought you cared to have me. But I see I am mistaken," and off he went in a huff.

It was well for him that the hall door was still locked, and that the key was in Miss Angel's pocket. She heard him fumbling at the lock with a feeling almost akin to exultation.

Presently she went out to him.

"Frank," she said, her voice quivering a little, "show yourself a man, and don't act like a petulant boy. After I have put you up all last night, I am surprised at your even wishing to leave me with angry words on your lips."

The sentence had hardly slipped from her, when it vividly brought back another scene in her life; when another had parted from her with hasty words, and left her desolate ever since. The memory was too much for her at that moment, and she suddenly burst into tears.

Frank was surprised and shocked. He could not understand her distress, not knowing the cause.

"Dear Miss Angel, I beg your pardon! I never meant to vex you—indeed, I did not. I am not worth crying about," and he led her back to the dining-room and placed her gently in her chair.

She soon recovered herself, and looked up and smiled.

"If you are really sorry," she said, "you will go to church with me." She had such faith in the beautiful words of the service softening his obduracy. "You have prevented my going this morning, but I wish to go this afternoon, and you will go with me. Not to your church," she added, as he began to rebel; "there are lots of churches that have services in the afternoon—we will go to one of them." And so presently they set off together, going by all sorts of out-of-the-way byways for fear of meeting anyone they knew.

They had no exact idea where they were going, only "they would go into the first church they came to where there was an afternoon service." They had to walk some way to find one: and Miss Angel felt sadly knocked up and weary, and was nearly saying she could go no further. It did not seem a bit like Christmas Day to be trudging along she knew not whither, with this naughty, self-willed boy. But words of Divine command came floating through her brain. "As we have opportunity let us do good unto all men," and this was an opportunity which she dared not thrust aside. Oh! for wisdom to use it rightly, so that this young life beside her might not be lost as that other one had been!

Very fervent was the unspoken prayer that went up from her weary and heavy-laden heart that afternoon.

Presently they came to a small church of very unpretending appearance, in the midst of a very poor district, whose solitary bell was summoning worshippers to enter its folding doors. A few people were turning in, and Miss Angel proposed to her companion that they should do the same. She felt too tired to go further. Frank gloomily assented, and they walked in.

The building seemed nearly empty, and the pew-opener showed them into a pew in the centre aisle, where they awaited the commencement of the service.

Now it so happened that the vicar of the church had been suddenly taken ill that morning, and had written to Frank's father (who had two curates) to send him some assistance; and in the midst of his trouble and anxiety about his boy, Mr. Edmunds felt it to be a relief to have an excuse for not appearing in his own church, and had gone himself.

So the first thing Frank saw was his own father standing in the reading desk.

He would have rushed out of church at once. But Miss Angel was next the pew door, and he could not get out without passing her. So he made the best of his position by standing as nearly under the gas lamp as possible, so that a shadow might fall on his face and partially conceal it.

Quite unaware of his son's presence, Mr. Edmunds went through the service, his eye on the book before him, and his thoughts busied in anxious surmises as to where Frank might be. He had spent every available hour in searching for his boy at the various railway stations, but without finding the faintest clue as to his whereabouts. And when he got into the pulpit, he found that through some mistake he had not got the sermon he meant to have taken, but one about the prodigal son; and more than one of his congregation thought he had done it for some special reason when he gave out his text.

CHAPTER VIII.

was empty, though the breakfast things were neatly spread in readiness.

Ewan McReady rang the bell and desired Mrs. Foster to summon his young protégé, only to be told, to his complete surprise, that the lad had gone off the evening before.

"I was just getting his room ready," she said, "when I heard the hall door shut, and saw him hurrying down the street."

The stranger made no reply, but he mentally thought that the lad had in all probability gone home to his friends. In silence and abstraction he sat down to his meal, and after a good deal of time spent in doing nothing, sallied out into the street. He had not trusted himself to ask his landlady any further news of Miss Angel, but he had some idea of finding her somehow, somewhere, as he remembered the address on the envelope. So he sauntered off in the direction of Clerkenwell. But he did not know his way, and found himself hopelessly lost more than once. So that he was hours traversing unknown streets; and church bells were ringing for afternoon service when he was still a good way off from his destination.

He was passing a small church when he was attracted by two figures entering it: an elderly lady (on whom he scarcely bestowed a glance), and a young lad, whom he felt sure was the runaway of the previous evening. Curiosity led him to pause, and even to go two or three steps towards the door by which they had entered. Then the sudden stopping of the bell warned him that the service was about to commence.

Strange that in the wild chaos of his thoughts he had almost forgotten that it was Christmas Day. Now he remembered it, and determined to attend the service. It was so long ago since he had been at church on Christmas Day, and the idea was pleasant of once more seeing the house of prayer decked for the Christian festival. He had thought of it all so often in the far country, and learnt there to long for the privileges of worship which he had prized so little while he had them.

Very simple and unpretending was the service, and with a strange familiarity the old words came back to him. He forgot all about his guest of the night before, almost forgot other things far dearer to his heart, in the thrill that that simple service brought to him, and though when he knelt he hardly knew what he prayed for, yet one voiceless plea went up for pardon for the past, and grace to live a better future. And when the hymn was given out, despite the tune being somewhat new to him, he joined in it with a strength and vigour which made more than one of his fellow-worshippers look round at him.

"I love to hear the story
Which angel voices tell,
How once the King of Glory
Came down on earth to dwell.
I am both weak and sinful;
But this I surely know,
The Lord came down to save me
Because He loved me so."

Miss Angel, who was sitting only a few pews in front of him, heard the sonorous voice, full and deep, and trembled from head to foot. Only once before had she ever heard a voice like that, and that was so long ago, when she was hardly more than a girl, and now she was middle-aged. She could hardly wait for the service to end before turning to see the singer. Frank, however, had no such scruples, and glancing back he recognised at once the kind stranger of the night before. But his father was mounting the pulpit, and soon his thoughts were riveted by the sermon.

He heard of the ungrateful son running away to the far country, and staying there till cruel distress at last made him think of coming back to the home which he ought never to have quitted. He listened to the wonderful sequel to the story, of the father's love, despite the son's disgrace; of the welcome which greeted the wanderer, when in pitiful guise he came back to that outraged parent. "No doubt that yearning love would not suffer the father to rest without his boy, and he was on the look-out for him when he saw him a great way off," said the preacher, and Frank thought he saw his father's eyes bent on him.

But Mr. Edmunds had not seen his son. Only in that moment of supreme emotion he poured forth the fulness of a parent's God-given love to a rebellious child, in words which sank deepest into the very heart he least thought of reaching.

Miss Angel listened, too, and thought of the wanderer she had never ceased to pray for these thirty years.

Ewan McReady listened, too, and felt himself to be the wayward son described.

Not till Mr. Edmunds was leaving the pulpit did he observe his son seated next Miss Angel. The next moment he was striding up the church to his boy, and reached him as he was mingling in the little crowd passing out down the aisle.

No one noticed the meeting, for just then Miss Angel raised her timid eyes to see who had been singing that beautiful Christmas hymn behind her, and found his kind eyes bent on her with a never-to-be-forgotten expression of eager expectation and joy.

"Ewan!"

"Magdalene!"

The two familiar names burst from their lips simultaneously as hand clasped hand in mutual recognition.

Miss Angel took the unexpected meeting far more quietly than her long lost friend. Her small, gloved hand lay in the tight clasp of both his large, brown, weather-beaten ones, while he jerked out a few words of glad surprise, till they suddenly became aware that the church was empty, and the pew-opener waiting their departure to put out the gas.

Then they glanced round, and found the vicar and his son mutually reconciled.

Frank was the first to speak.

"Oh, father," he said, seizing his father's hand, and drawing him forwards to where Ewan McReady and Miss Angel were standing, "these are the two to whom you really owe my returning to you at all. Miss Angel would keep me all night, and—and—this kind gentleman found me far away in the dockyard and brought me back, though he was quite a stranger."

"A stranger no longer," murmured Miss Angel, while Ewan introduced himself to the vicar.

"An old friend of Miss Angel's!" cried the vicar, heartily. "I am glad, very glad, to meet you. Perhaps you have come to explain to her the good fortune I told her of last night, but which she would not believe."

"I had forgotten all about it," said Miss Angel, softly.

"Well, come home with me," said the vicar, "and you shall hear." And soon the little party were walking two and two back to Clerkenwell, Frank and his father in front, and Ewan McReady and Miss Angel in an ever-increasing distance behind.

"How did you find me out?" she was saying, hardly knowing what she was doing in the flutter of sudden and unexpected joy.

"Why, I learnt it from the landlady with whom I happened to put up last night. She dropped an envelope with your name on it, and I found she knew you well. Her name is Mrs. Foster," continued Ewan, as his listener looked puzzled, "and she said you had wrapped up some present for her in that very envelope I happened to notice."

"How little I thought what it would come to when I gave that shilling so unwillingly," thought Miss Angel; but she said aloud—"Tell me where you have been all these years."

"Almost everywhere," he answered.

"And you never thought of writing to or coming back to your old friends all these years?" she asked, with a touch almost of reproach in her voice.

He made no answer, and she looked up timidly into his face.

"Don't think that I reproach you," she said, "I had no right to expect it; but somehow I thought I might have heard."

"And what did you think of my silence?" he asked at last.

"That you had found new interests in a new life beyond the seas. Had you wished me to know, I knew you could have written."

"Shall I tell you why I didn't write?" he asked, slowly, and half pausing, and looking full at her.

His manner was so very grave, and there was something in his tone that almost startled her.

She withdrew her hand from his arm, and became white to the lips, as she tried to hurry after the vicar and his boy. A thousand thoughts rushed through her brain as she vainly strove to think what she ought to say. Perhaps he had a wife and children in that far-off land; or had brought them with him to see the old country. At last she said—

"I hope you did not think that I expected you to write; but I think you knew me well enough to know that I should be interested in anything that concerned you."

"What I was going to say concerned you," he said, slowly.

"Me!" she answered.

"Yes; in the papers I saw that which I do not care to name."

She guessed what he meant, but guessed quite wrongly. "And you believed it?" she asked, sadly.

"I could hardly do otherwise," he answered.

And drawing from his pocket a worn letter-case, he took from one of its recesses a small cutting from a newspaper and handed it to her.

She trembled so that she could hardly read it, and the tiny scrap was worn and rubbed with age and use. Yet there it was—the announcement of her own death some thirty years before.

"I cannot understand it," she said, pressing her hand to her brow to try and gather her thoughts. "It must have been when my only sister died, and her name was Merilina."

Ewan's eyes were bent on the paper. "It was a cruel mistake to have substituted your name for hers, even if it was through carelessness," he said at last.

They were interrupted by Frank running back to them with a message from the vicar—

"Father says he hopes you will come and have dinner with us," said the boy, breathlessly. "You know," he added in half a whisper to Miss Angel, "that they could not enjoy the feast without me, so they put pudding, and snap-dragon, and all the rest of it aside. But now, you must come; and you, too," he said, turning to Mr. McReady; "and we will all be happy together." And without waiting for an answer he darted off, leaving the two standing where he had found them.

It was Miss Angel's turn to be disconcerted now. There were a thousand questions she longed to ask her companion, but she did not know how to begin. How could she with the bitter memory of their last parting before her, and all the subsequent years of loneliness (which need not have been loneliness) for his sake? Ewan McReady saw her embarrassment, and hastened to relieve it.

"You asked me," he said, slowly, "what brought me home? I answer, a Divine Providence; and a Divine Providence not only gave me your address in a most unlikely way, but led me to enter the church where you were. Magdalene, dear, the old wall of separation is broken down between us. As a repentant wanderer I have come back to you, and now, will you not let me make up to you for all the thirty years of pain and loneliness that I have caused you?"

He paused from extreme emotion, and stooped to listen for her answer; and certainly she did not say "no" this time.

* * * * *

That was Miss Angel's last Christmas. I leave my readers to imagine what her next one will be.

[THE END.]

HOW THE WORLD IS PROVIDED WITH SWEETS AND BONBONS.

It may be sure that if any article of necessity or of luxury has obtained a world wide reputation, it has not been reached without many a struggle.

To gain the world's good opinion it is necessary to prove first the excellence of that which is offered, then that the materials used are the best, that the workmanship is perfect, and that the character of those who offer it can bear scrutiny.

Step by step must this position be reached; rarely is it effected by what is called a lucky stroke.

Competition is so great, and society's demand for the best of everything so urgent, that it is useless to enter the battlefield unprepared for the fulfilment of these conditions.

One has only to visit any large manufactory to see the giant efforts which are made to obtain and keep a footing on the world's platform. The expenditure of brain power, of money, and of labour is appalling.

When all this is put into operation to supply us with the necessities of life we are not so astounded, but when it is to provide the world with what are known as sweets and bonbons, it is marvellous that it can pay, and yet there is no doubt that it does so.

I will simply place on paper what I saw at my visit to Stollwerck's, in Cologne, the largest manufacturers of sweets in the world, in order to show that to supply the universe with certain articles, no matter what they be, requires giant strength, giant capital, giant brains, and giant reputation, and that it requires all these to work well together if the supply is not to fail either in quality or quantity.

The world, as I have said, is careful in placing suppliers on a pedestal, but when once there it is the suppliers' own fault if they do not retain their position.

Chocolates, bonbons, sweets of all kinds have become articles of commerce. The amount consumed in a year, the number of people occupied in their manufacture, the vast machines employed, the amount of sugar, of cacao, of fruits worked up, the branch trades employed—such as printing, paper making, casting of moulds, illustrating, and packing—the duty paid on the sweets consumed, the number of clerks employed to keep the accounts of such a consumption, would each and all form subjects of most interesting papers, and cause no little surprise at their vast proportions.

It was as a great favour we were permitted to see over this manufactory, which is a Gothic building near one of the gates of Cologne, and close to the Rhine. It occupies an immense space, and is altogether stately and imposing.

The outer door through which we entered was of stained glass, with the mottoes engraved in various colours on it: "Zeit* ist Geld" and "Eile mit Weile."

Through this we gained admittance into a gorgeous office, with handsome mahogany desks and brass rails, pillars supporting the roof, curtains of rich-looking stuffs and stained glass windows, where sixty-seven clerks were zealously writing or moving to and fro with quiet haste.

We noticed that the heavy account books were arranged upon shelves peculiarly constructed, which drop and form both drawers and desks—an invention of the firm.

So many books are daily in use that a truck is kept for the purpose of moving them about. While waiting in this office till one of the Brothers Stollwerck could speak with us, our attention was attracted by an enormous eagle on a pedestal. It is made of pure chocolate, and weighs about three cwt.; it measures four feet across its wings, and stands seven feet high.

We were shown into a small, round room

* Time is money. Haste with forethought.

opening out of the office, whose walls were hung, as we thought at first, with tapestry, but we found that it was cunningly painted, and was in fact a fresco.

The large stained glass window, with the trade mark wrought in glass, was, however, a reality, so were the velvet chairs, the parquetté floor, and the motto over the portal, "Vor beginnen wohl besinnen, lässt gewinnen." *

In a few minutes we were introduced to a Mr. Schilling, who undertook to guide us through this vast domain of sweets and bonbons.

Following him out of the office, we came into the immense courtyard, the air of which was laden with the perfume of chocolate.

This was no ordinary courtyard. It was so full of interest that we could not hurry through it. In it was the chemist's laboratory, the engineer's and draughtsmen's office, the gas works, and the engine room, with its tiled floor and monster engines, one of which is the largest in the world.

These machines are automatically fed with fuel by a device of the firm's own invention. A machine brings the coal up from the cellars—a hundred-weight at a time—and disperses it through the various channels, and then drops down again for another load, acting with perfect regularity through the long hours.

The engines so supplied were made on the premises, and work the three hundred machines in operation in various parts of the factory.

From this engine-room there is electric communication with at least fifty parts of the building, and in case of accident these monster engines can be stopped in a moment. This was done while we stood there in order to make it clear to us.

Last, not least, there is a splendid restaurant for the employés, two hundred of whom on an average daily make use of it. Coffee, soup, meat, and vegetables are served at a very small sum, and in an appetising manner, and a really good dinner can be had for fivepence or sixpence. This is found to be an immense boon to the workpeople, and would prove so equally in England if our great firms would adopt it.

Our first visit is to an immense room, to which the cacao nuts or beans are brought in sacks to be cleansed and roasted. These nuts are brown, somewhat greasy, and about as big as cherries, only a little longer. They are the fruit of a tree growing in the tropical parts of America, and are found twenty or thirty together within a fleshy pod, something like a cucumber in shape.

From time immemorial they have been employed as money in various parts of America, and were first made into chocolate in Mexico. The room to which these are brought is full of wonderful machinery. The process of cleansing is done by a giant cleanser in perfect silence, and the roasters, which are simply enormous, also perform their work in quiet.

We pass on from this to the room where the famous Brust bonbons or cough lozenges are made. It was the manufacture of these, by the father of the present proprietors in 1839, which first established the reputation of this firm. They are well known in all parts of the world, wrapped up as they formerly were in an old-fashioned yellow paper covering.

The machine by which they are made is extremely clever and intricate in its construction, and yet when seen at work looks so easy and simple that one thinks a child could work it. It is supplied with little round hollows, and a sheet of clear amber citron and sugar being put in at one end whole, comes out at the other in the form of round bonbons all slightly connected one with the other, but easily detached.

We are next taken to another large room, scrupulously clean and mosaic-tiled, where the cacao beans having been cleansed and roasted below, are here being crushed to powder and mixed with sugar at the rate of five tons a day. It is called the first chocolate room.

The cacao and the sugar fall into the machine through shoots from the ceiling without being touched by the hand.

All the machines, hydraulic presses, rollers, and mixers in this room, as elsewhere, are of the firm's own invention.

We pass on to where the chocolate is made and formed into a variety of shapes, and placed on marble slabs to cool and harden.

Five tons a day is the average amount made by means of the excellent machines, and from beginning to end the hand touches the material but once.

Some of the devices are most artistic; there were elegant antique vases, busts of famous men on pedestals, eggs for Easter beautifully painted and stencilled by artists, and containing all kinds of charming surprises.

Here, too, you might have fancied yourself in a toy factory; there were children's tea-sets, railway trains, little animals for Noah's arks, bundles of cigarettes, and a variety of games, all made of chocolate, and presenting a perfect fairyland to children if they only had a chance of entering there.

As soon as these articles were cold they were trimmed with a penknife in order to give them a smooth and polished appearance.

One thing particularly struck us in passing through the chocolate rooms—viz., that there was just as much trouble taken to make the peasant a good cup of chocolate as to provide the tables of the rich with dainties. The same good cacao and sugar are the foundation of both, and are worked in the machines in exactly the same way, the difference in the price arising from the mixture of vanilla and the elegance of the packing.

The cheapest chocolate costs 1s. 2½d. a pound, and makes sixteen cups, costing therefore three farthings a cup.

Vanille chocolate varies from 1s. 7d. to 5s. The last is known as Princess chocolate; a pound makes twelve cups, and costs therefore 5d. a cup.

A new kind of tonic chocolate was being made by the introduction of a decoction of acorns into the cacao and sugar.

English peppermint lozenges are made here in immense numbers, and are so called because they are manufactured of Mitcham peppermint.

At the end of the room where these are made stand two rows of huge cauldrons which turn round incessantly, making as they do so sugar almonds and caramels, or what children call "hundreds and thousands."

Another room was devoted to the making of ice wafers, and a peculiar kind of bonbons of which by some wonderful machinery a man and two girls can make 40,000 a day.

The next department we enter is the packing room, occupied almost entirely by girls, under the superintendence of forewomen, whose business it is to put the bonbons and chocolates into various bright-coloured papers with pictures and mottoes on the outside.

There were five hundred bright-looking, earnest German girls in this room working in sets of twelve at a table, each set with its own particular part of the packing.

We watched the sealing of all these packages with great interest, as it was by a process quite new, and enabled the girls to do it with the utmost rapidity and efficiency.

Room after room we passed through, seeing the boiling of the sugar, the making of biscuits, preserving fruit, extracting the syrup, manufacturing sparkling bonbons for making various drinks, till we were overwhelmed with the vastness of the work.

Nor was this all. There were the printer's rooms, where they turn out 300,000 labels a day, the carpenters' shops, the store rooms of papers and boxes, the pattern-making room, and many others. And yet the utmost order pervades the whole factory—no hurry, no confusion anywhere.

Owing to the number of self-acting machines in use, the Brothers Stollwerck are able to carry on this immense business with about 814 workpeople, a large number of whom are girls between the ages of thirteen and twenty, all under the care of staid, trustworthy women.

The sum paid in wages varies between £700 and £900 a week, and the weight of cacao and sugar used annually amounts to several million kilogrammes.

The duty alone paid on articles exported amounts on an average to £11,450 a year, which will give some idea of the enormous mass sent out into the world.

There is an ambulance corps attached to the factory, and composed of the operatives themselves, directed by a surgeon. The factory chemist is always on the spot to give aid in case of accident, which, however, is not frequent. Such as do happen arise generally from carelessness, and consist mostly of fractures of the arms, or loss of fingers. Three or four a year happen, rarely more. A chemist's shop is on the premises, so that no time is lost.

There is a home industry connected with this firm which employs many hundreds of people in the Black Forest and Thuringia, in the making of paper boxes.

This is but a rapid glance at the immense and complicated machinery employed in order to provide us with what are called sweets and bonbons. There are hundreds of points of interest connected with it which I am unable to touch upon, and which go towards making a result such as we have seen. If it call attention, however, to the fact that whatever is to be done in the world with success must be performed with every power we have, something will have been gained.

FOUND IN THE FOREST.
A TALE OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

By LILY WATSON.

Cuckoo! Cuckoo!

It was not in spring nor early summer that the cry was heard. The snow was on the ground; it hung heavily on the branches of the trees, and the skies were dark with the threatening of more to come. Even the roomy cottage interior where the cuckoo's note sounded forth was not so cosy and warm as usual. It was a pleasant place, with boards uncarpeted but spotlessly clean, and old oaken furniture free from dust. Round the walls hung many cuckoo clocks, and as they were set regardless of accuracy or uniformity, ever and anon the doors would fly open, and a bird would hop out to utter his monotonous note.

"UNTIL THEY WERE WARM AGAIN."

The sole occupants of the room were a mother and daughter. The mother was a young German woman, who had evidently in her time been pretty, with a doll-like prettiness that had now given place to a washed-out peevish aspect. Her fair plaits were carelessly braided, and her gown of dark blue homespun was covered with a crumpled apron. She was leaning back in a rocking-chair with her handkerchief pressed against her eyes, while the log fire on the hearth sank low and smouldered.

"Christmas Eve! Ah, Bertha, never, never did I think it would have been my lot to pass such a time. In my father's house, what gaiety and feasting! The Christmas tree, the Christ-child, the gifts for old and young! I have told thee, have I not, how many servants my father kept? Ah, now my parents are dead and gone. Little did they think their daughter was to come to poverty. When I was unmarried, then things were different, indeed. I was the belle of the neighbourhood. I cannot think," interrupted the mother, discontentedly, breaking off her reminiscences and fixing her eyes on the homely countenance of her child—"I cannot think, Bertha, how it is thou art not in the very least like thy mother."

It was true. The little square-set girl who stood humbly by her mother's chair was not at all like the fair, peevish young woman. She had no pretence in her features or bearing of being anything but a peasant child. Her shoulders were broad, her figure was short and sturdy, her hands and feet were large and capable, and her face was round, with a retroussé nose, large grey eyes, and a pleasant mouth. Homely and quaint was the little Teuton maiden, yet there was something touching in her humility of mien, something very lovable in her tender, anxious look bent upon her mother.

"Dear mother, do not fret," she responded. "We shall be rich by-and-by, never fear. Nobody can make cuckoo clocks as well as father." Here the speaker was interrupted by the whirr and bursting forth of one of the imprisoned birds, hoarsely crying, "Cuckoo! cuckoo! cuckoo! cuckoo!" followed by three solemn strokes. "The bird hears us and wishes to comfort thee, little mother," echoed Bertha, cheerfully. "Father is sure to sell plenty of his wares at Nuremberg, and will come home with good news."

"Don't speak of thy father," snappishly rejoined her mother. "He has left us here alone for Christmas, and no one is to know when he will be home. No Christmas present for thee, Bertha! He is so unpractical, he did not even get in wood enough to last us till his return—and nothing to keep Christmas with. There, there! I have no patience with the cuckoo clocks. Their cuckooing goes through my head."

"Father is so clever with his inventions," timidly suggested Bertha; "only see the beautiful nightingale and the musical box."

On a dresser at the upper end of the room was a large cage, in which a wooden nightingale stood stiffly on a perch. This was a chef d'œuvre of the absent father, the wood-carver, Ulrich Meyer. He was a man of considerable invention and powers of wood-carving, but he was unworldly and unpractical, and was not adroit in getting a market for his wares. The absence which his wife so bitterly deplored was for the purpose of trying to sell some of his handiwork at Nuremberg. This plan had been suggested to him by the Baron Gerhardt, the great man of the village, and he felt it was to be tried without delay, although the long journey would take him away from his wife and child at Christmas time.

Seeing her mother was still despondent, Bertha trotted to the further end of the room, took up with deep reverence the cage containing the wooden nightingale, placed it noiselessly on the table beside her mother, and turned a little key in the floor of the cage. The creature opened its beak and gave vent to a sudden shrill torrent of notes, that produced an effect directly contrary to what poor Bertha had expected. Frau Meyer leapt up, and with an angry exclamation sent the cage flying on to the floor. The nightingale uttered a most unmelodious croak, then whirled noisily and was silent, while with a look of horror Bertha rushed to pick up the treasure. Fortunately it was not injured, and the loyal little daughter breathed again.

"I have a great mind to burn the foolish creature and its cage!" cried Frau Meyer, passionately. "Thy father will never sell it! and scarcely any other fuel has he left us; the faggots are low in the outhouse. See what a miserable fire for Christmas time."

Bertha's loving nature was sorely hurt by these fretful complainings and reflections on the absent father. She could not help having a dim perception that in her mother's place, she, Bertha, would have bustled about to make things a little more cheery for the season, and have tried to take pleasure in the wonderful singing nightingale, that certainly, some day, would secure the fortunes of the family. But she was accustomed unconsciously to argue that her mother, born and bred in the comparative luxury of a wealthy farmer's home, could not be expected to adapt herself as peasant people did to their surroundings; it was the plebeian daughter's task to make things pleasant and comfortable.

"I will soon get some dried wood, dear mother," she said, coaxingly; "but thou wilt not burn the pretty nightingale while I am out? It would be a sinful shame, for it is precious. Some day it will, perhaps, go to some great foreign exhibition, and the emperors, kings, and queens will see it, and father will get a great deal of gold."

"Silly child! thy father has turned thy brain," responded the mother, a little more good-humouredly. "I shall not touch the ridiculous nightingale if thou art not here to make it sing and worry me."

This was sacrilege to Bertha. But without more ado she prepared to go into the forest that sloped up the hillside outside the village to get wood for firing. A knock came at the door as she was fastening up her gown over the stout petticoat, and the good-humoured countenance of a neighbour made its appearance.

"Good evening, Mistress Meyer. A happy Christmas to you and Bertha. Have you heard the news?"

"What news, Frau Hausmann?" demanded the other, rather haughtily. She held herself a little aloof from the neighbours, on account of her supposed superiority of birth and early surroundings.

The neighbour was not to be daunted.

"About the Baron's sister; her, you know, who married so badly and went to live in France, and her husband cut her off from all her friends, and turned out such a Taugenichts" (worthless fellow).

Frau Meyer's interest was roused at once, for this mésalliance of Baron Gerhardt's sister, gossiped about as all local news must be in a remote village community, had always seemed to her on a kind of parallel with her own experience in stooping to wed a man poorer than herself. Here the resemblance ended, but the silly vain woman liked to draw comparisons and sigh over her own hard lot "like that of the Baron's sister."

"She is dead, poor thing, and whether she has left children or not, no one knows," continued the informant. "The Baron is in a fine way about it. He talks of going to France to see, but he is awaiting letters."

Much chatter followed; Frau Hausmann expatiated as far as her limited stock of information would allow her, Frau Meyer sighed over the hardships of disparity in marriage.

"Have you heard that Ulrich, for instance, has gone to Nuremberg and left us alone? No Christmas tree! No presents for Bertha and for me!"

Bertha did not linger to hear the oft-repeated tale of her mother's imaginary woes. She fetched from an outhouse beside the cottage the little sledge, on which wood was collected, harnessed it by a rope round her stout waist, and set off.

It was a painful errand for the child. The ground was like iron; the snow, though not deep, was crisp, and gave no prospect of a thaw; the wind was biting. She could not help shivering as she stepped out of the warm room and looked at the snowy forest-clad hillsides rising above the quaint gabled village houses. Up yonder must she toil to fill her sledge. But it would mean warmth and cheerfulness for her mother; and would not her father be pleased when he came home to see the goodly store of firewood? Clad in her panoply of unselfishness, little peasant Bertha faced the cold and climbed the steep pathway to the wood.

Along the hillside through the midst of the forest ran the high road; but the child knew there was small probability of any one travelling on Christmas Eve up this secluded valley. It took a little away from the feeling of loneliness to know that there was a highway within reach, although there was no public conveyance to traverse it. Twilight was not far off, and as Bertha entered the solemn forest, with its shroud of snow, the tall bare trees standing gaunt and grim, she could not repress a shudder of awe.

She set busily to work to pick up all the dead boughs she could find, trying to forget that her fingers were blue with the cold. These faggots she arranged upon the sledge, and when at last she had a load as heavy as she could drag, she bound them into a bundle with the superfluous length of her rope. Then she gave a sigh of relief, as she thought that at last she might trudge home and warm her poor benumbed little body at the fire fed by her efforts.

Was it fancy, or did she hear a child's cry, pitiful, wailing, forsaken?

How should a child be alone in the forest at that hour? "It must be fancy," thought Bertha; and she was just starting downhill with her heavy load, when again she heard it from the dim recesses of the wood.

The kind-hearted girl, late as it was growing, bitter chill as was the night, left her bundle of faggots and ran into the forest in the direction from which the cry came. Guided by its sound, she hurried on, more and more certain it came from a child, and that the child was alone. Strange legends assailed her fancy, of wayfarers misled in the forest, and lured to death by mocking spirits. Perhaps this was one of the elves of whom she had read, trying to entice her into some pitfall? But Bertha hastened on.

No! it was no goblin, but a veritable child. Dressed in warm coarse clothing, a hood over its fair hair, its cheeks reddened by cold and crying, there it stood in the snow, a piteous, wailing little girl. When she saw Bertha, the little creature ran towards her, crying out something she could by no means understand.

"Perhaps it is a goblin after all, and the gibberish is a charm," thought ignorant Bertha; but she received the poor, shivering, frightened little soul into her honest arms, kissed its tear-stained icy cheeks, and staggered along under the weight of the child to the place where she had left her sledge.

What was to be done?

The child could not be left there, that was clear. Bertha could not understand a word she said, not even whether the "Justine! Justine!" she repeated was a name or not.

There seemed nothing for it but for Bertha to mount her upon the load, already so heavy, and draw her to the village. Then what would her mother say? She felt sorely perplexed; but a warm protecting tenderness was springing up within her heart for the little foundling. As she placed the child, pacified and quiet now, upon the faggots, the little creature held up its hands in piteous entreaty. Bertha took off its thick gloves, found the hands within were frozen, held them in her own, and breathed on them until they were warm again. Then she replaced the gloves, and nodding kindly to the child she started to drag her heavy load over the snow.

What hard work it was! Poor Bertha's red cheeks grew redder, her chest heaved and panted, she stopped many times in great distress.

But the little girl mounted on the faggots laughed and nodded, and the sight gave her courage. Sometimes she fancied the child was growing heavier, and remembered weird stories of fairy changelings, but when they reached the village the foundling was still the same, sitting triumphantly aloft.

"See there, Bertha Meyer!" cried one to another in great astonishment. "On this bitter cold evening she has been to the forest, and what brings she there? Whose child is that?"

Nobody could answer the question. Bertha had meanwhile in her simple little heart been revolving a plan of breaking the news to her mother. When the cottage door was reached at last, she cried to the astonished Frau Meyer—

"See, dear mother, the Christ-child has after all sent us a Christmas present. See the dear lamb I have found in the forest all alone and forsaken. I thought it was an elf, but now I know it is meant as our Christmas gift."

"Art thou crazy, Bertha?" cried the astonished woman. "Have I more in the house than will feed thee and me, that thou shouldst bring a stranger brat home on Christmas Eve? A pretty house, truly, to take in a charity child! I will have none of her."

"Oh, mother, but she is so sweet," pleaded Bertha, her honest eyes filling with tears, as she pointed to the little wanderer. "I could not leave her up in the wood to starve. Let her sleep in my bed, and have my supper; I will look after her and tend her."

The child had slipped down in front of the fire, and was regarding the blaze with sleepy eyes.

Frau Meyer did not feel it was part of her duty to say what Bertha should have done under the circumstances. She was only quite clear upon the negative side of the question, that her daughter had no business to saddle her with the responsibility of some unknown infant, that could not even speak good honest German. Was it not hard enough that a child of hers should have to go to the forest for faggots on Christmas Eve without that child bringing home a foundling to care for?

So she stormed and raged about the room, and then, as weak people do, fell into fretful, peevish complainings. "For at least two days here was another mouth to feed—as if she had not troubles and trials enough already," and so forth. Poor Bertha was in sad distress. But a diversion occurred, as one of the cuckoo-clocks uttered its familiar note.

The child, roused from her sleepy state, uttered a cry of delight, and trotted off to inspect the fresh wonder. She looked so bonny and so animated as she stood beneath the clock with upturned gaze, that even Frau Meyer's heart was softened towards her.

"Cou-cou!" cried she, and stretched up her little arms.

"After all she may be a Christian child," said the mother, grudgingly; "she knows what the clock says." But the height of joy was shown by the baby stranger when Bertha wound up the nightingale. She danced and jumped in ecstasy, and could scarcely be enticed away from the marvellous bird.

There was not much space in Bertha's little bed, but it was the kindly girl's first care to see that the stranger child was comfortably stowed away. The large eyes were closed as soon as the flaxen head touched the pillow. Both children slumbered soundly, but Bertha was up in the dark morning, very early, to light the fire, sweep the room, and dust the precious cuckoo clocks, before her mother stirred.

Then she had to wash and dress her stranger charge, who smiled and chatted and lifted her rosy lips to be kissed without any speech that Bertha could interpret.

"It is a pity she cannot understand," moralised the peasant girl, "or I might tell her about the dear Christ-child who came on this day to earth. I am sure He would be glad I brought home His little lost lamb from the dark forest. But I do not know what we must do if no one comes to claim her. Perhaps if I worked harder, and earned some money, mother would let me keep her to be my little sister. Oh! I would not mind what I did, she is so pretty and so dear."

As Frau Meyer sat at breakfast while the unwelcome guest played on the floor, and chattered to herself, she grumbled that she had never known, or expected to know, such a Christmas. It was to prove true in a sense that she had never dreamed of. For a sudden knocking came at the door, and in rushed Frau Hausmann with more news.

"Have you heard? Have you heard?" she demanded, breathless.

"What now?" inquired Frau Meyer. "You told us about the Baron's sister last night, you remember."

"There is a wicked attempt to extract money from the Baron. Late last night there came a flighty Frenchwoman to the castle with the strangest tale. She pretends she comes from the sister who died, and is the nurse to her only child. That when the poor lady lay a-dying, she said, 'When I am gone, take Adèle to my brother, the Baron Gerhardt. Her father does not care for her, and will never want her. My brother will be kind, and take her in and train her as a Christian child. You will get there about Christmas, and then even if he were angry with me his heart would be softened by the blessed season, and he will take in my baby and forgive all the past, and provide for you.' So the woman says she set forth, and in the forest yonder one of the traces broke in the harness of her carriage. She screamed and fainted and there was a great commotion, and when she came to her senses the child was gone. The driver was too busy attending to the carriage to notice what had become of her. Now, I ask you, Frau Meyer," concluded Frau Hausmann, "is any one likely to believe such a tale as that? No child to show for it! It is a mere trick to extract money. The Frenchwoman has come to the wrong man, and she will find herself in gaol before long, that I can tell her!"

"What was the Frenchwoman's name?" breathlessly asked Bertha.

"Justine, I think; and she can barely speak any German, and they say she is so hysterical she can hardly get out two reasonable words."

"Justine! That is the very name. We have the child here!" cried Bertha, clapping her hands in wild eagerness. "There she sits behind the rocking chair. I found her in the forest yesterday, wandering all alone. She must have run away while the driver was busy attending to the harness. And she is such a little darling. It is all quite true."

It would be in vain to try to describe the amazement of the two women as this explanation was gradually borne in upon their minds, nor how Bertha, from being a blundering stupid creature, suddenly became, in their estimation, a paragon of sagacity, good sense, and wisdom. The next thing to be done was obviously to take the child up to the castle and see if the surmise was correct. So, trembling with eagerness, Bertha dressed herself in her best, and carried off the little Adèle, who instantly responded to her name in a way that confirmed the story.

When I was travelling in the Black Forest last summer, I was resting beside a well in one of the wooded valleys that run up among the mountains when a young woman came to draw water. She was evidently not a native of the place, and as she lingered and seemed disposed to talk I addressed her in French.

"Madame is right, I am not a native of the village," she volubly rejoined. "Madame would perhaps wonder to hear that I came hither in charge of the little niece of Baron Gerhardt at the castle yonder! The child of his only sister, madame, a poor lady who died in exile. Ah! it was a difficult journey; snow on the ground, see you, and the horrible forest to traverse. It was on Christmas Eve, madame, and a fearful accident befel the carriage on the road. Figure to yourself the situation! I screamed and fainted, of course! When I recovered the child had disappeared. Nowhere could she be found. And conceive to yourself the stupid, brutal driver, who said he was too busy mending the trace to see after children, that the accident was slight, and that it was my business to keep my senses about me. Ah, quelle horreur! The snow on the ground, and for aught I knew, the pretty babe devoured by wolves!"

By the excited way in which this story was told I had little doubt that Mademoiselle Justine was of a highly emotional disposition, and not at all fitted to act rationally in any small emergency.

"The Baron would not believe me because I brought no child," continued she, "and said I was in league with the driver to get money from him. Imagine to yourself, then, madame, our joy when the dear babe was found safe and sound in the cottage of a woodcarver, whose daughter, in gathering sticks, had found her roaming in the forest far away from the high road. A mere accident! But so grateful is the Baron to this woodcarver's daughter that he must needs have her continually at the castle as companion to my sweet Adèle. And I, who was her trusted nurse, who brought her from France, was told I might stay as a housemaid, but was not fit to have the care of the little one. A governess, forsooth, must be had in my place. Nothing the Baron can do is too good for the Meyers. A frightful singing nightingale worth that!" and she snapped her fingers derisively, "he must needs buy for a hundred florins, and cuckoo clocks without end. The whole castle is noisy with them, day and night. Ah! but it is terrible. The fortune of those Meyers is made. Well for them, for the father could sell none of his rubbishy carvings at Nuremberg at Christmas. That shows how much they were worth. But the daughter is made much of and petted, forsooth, because, says the Baron, she saved Adèle in the time of need."

The Frenchwoman's black eyes flashed so angrily, and such spite was in her tone, that I hastily tried to divert her from the subject.

"Are you in the castle now?" I inquired.

"No, madame. I married one of the Baron's gardeners in the spring. I have now my own cottage, and I am glad to say I am independent. But I see my little lady often. Why, here she comes!"

A light pony carriage appeared driving

"SHE WAS EVIDENTLY NOT A NATIVE OF THE PLACE."

rapidly along the road as she spoke. In the round, beaming face of a girl about twelve years of age I had little difficulty in recognising the peasant Bertha, and nestling beside her was a sweet little chubby child, whose dress proclaimed her the Baron's niece. They nodded and waved to Justine, who responded by a salute in which affection and jealousy were oddly mingled.

I was so much interested in the story that I called upon Frau Meyer, and found that Justine's version was substantially correct.

Ulrich was kept supplied with work and customers, the future of his wife and daughter was provided for, and it was no idle fancy which had prompted Bertha on that Christmas Eve to think the stranger maiden was a gift from Heaven.

"AWS WELL DAT ENS WELL."

(AN OLD SUSSEX MAN'S TALE, TAKEN DOWN IN SHORTHAND BY ANOTHER "NATIVE.")

O I sez to meself as I was a-setten in de front gar'n, fur de ole ooman was a-brishin aboutinside, den I az to turn out; I sez to meself, sez I, "Dis want doo, Mahs Mart'n; I can't git at it no'ow, an I be sure ders summut wrong; but it want doo, doan't ye know, to say nuthin to my missus, cuzen 'er clapper doo goo so, sure-li, do she be purty long in de 'ed too, otherwhile." Well, I sez to meself, "I'll go an ax de doctor 'bout de Christmas peal. Ye see, our doctor 'e be de churchward'n; decent sort o' chap doo, but 'e ahn't never got 'itched (married) some'ow, lives jest away down yender gin de church'us. So, as I was a-sayin, I'd goo an ax 'im 'bout de peal, den I'd up an tell 'im all I knowed. So I 'ollers out to our Sue to bring me my bootlegs an de switch; I likes to 'ave me switch, cuzen (because) dares some monstus queer folks 'bout otherwhile. So I puts on me bootlegs, an sings out to de ole ooman dat I be gwine down to de doctor's, an I 'ollers out for Spider—dat's my 'treever as what de Squire 'isself gi' me two year agoo come tan-flawin'—an way I goos.

Well, let me see; dis was of a Friday, the Friday afore Christmas as Christmas come of a Sunday, an 'twas just gettin' dizzy like, an de doctor was jest come in; so 'e sez, "Come in, Martin," sez 'e, "an 'ave a glass beer, an I'll 'ave me dinner, an den we'll see 'bout business." So den pres'ny (presently) I axes 'im if we was to 'ave de Christmas peal, cuzen bein' of a Sunday I didn't jesly know, an den wen we'd settled dat, den I ups an tells 'im me business. Sez I, "Muster Bennet," I sez, "it's jes like dis 'eer. Dis mornin' I goos into de Oak, fur ole Smith was gwine to kill a pig, an we was gwine to 'ave a shillin raffle, cuzen we alveys 'as a raffle every Christmas, an de ole man alveys 'as some purty stuff to kill, den we engs it up de chimley wen we gets any, an it dries purty well time we wants it t' eat. Well, as I was a-sayin, I went in to pay 'im dis eer shillin, cuzen we alveys likes to pay as we goos, an me ole ooman is 'em tickler (very particular) 'bout dat, sure-li; well, when I goos in I sees a mighty fine sort o' chap a-settin on de settle, an I sez to myself, "Who be you den?" cuz dem sort o' chaps doan't goo down to ole Smith's not alveys, leastwise, mebbe dey gets one otherwhile. Well, 'e was 'avin summut 'ot, an 'is 'at was on de teable; howsomdever, drackly 'e sees me 'e claps it on 'is 'ed an pulls it a bit forard. So I sez, "Never you mind nawn (nothing) 'bout me," I sez; "I be on'y gwine to pay ole Smith fur ees raffle as comes off to-mor' night." So 'e looks sorter side at me an axes ef I'd 'ave a glass beer, and I sez "Thinkce," fur ole Smith 'e drahs (draws) some lamentable good beer 'bout Christmas.

So I sets down, an pres'ny 'e sez to me, sez 'e, "Be you gwine down to de park to-night?" an' I sez, "No;" I sez, "I be jest gwine 'ome soon's I've paid fur dis eer raffle. I on'y goos up de Rough, jest side ole Roggy's, dat's 'im what keeps de public side de ole mill." So den 'e axes me 'ow fur 'tis down to de park, an if Squire Wilson was dare still, an' if ees son was tome. "Son," sez I, "e ahn't got no son, ees ony got two gals—dat's Miss Wilson, as we calls 'er, an' Miss Eny." "O!" sez 'e, "Edith you means." "No I doan't," sez I, "dey calls 'er Eny, cuz 'er mother, as what's dead an gone dis eighteen year agoo de 24th dis next March, 'er name was de same." "O," sez 'e, "den de son's dead too," an' 'e looks at me queer like so es I didn't feel jestly cumf'ble. So I sez, "But dare want no son. Dare was Miss Wilson was de fust, an den Miss Eny was born de next year; an 'er poor mother, I 'members 'er. Ah! she was a nice lady as ever was—good to de poor, an never said nawn (nothing) 'bout it like some folks, as ony be good cuz folks should talk an talk 'bout it. Well, as I was a-sayin, 'er poor mother died purty close after wards, an de Squire's bin purty quiet ever sen (since) an doan't git 'bout like 'e did." Den de chap sez, "Doan't de Squire never goo out den?" An 'e seem mighty 'tickler to know all 'bout de Squire, an so I sez to meself, "What's yer leetle game? I bea'n't gwine to tell ye much, I can tell ye, 'bout de Squire, nit (nor yet) 'bout nobody else, not if I knows it, cuzen 'taint no business o' yourn." So den 'e axes me if 'e ever went after de dogs, an I sez, "E doan't goo after no dogs now, but ony jess gits out like in de af'noon jess fur a turn roun de parish mebbe, or up to de 'all, an ees alveys back afore dark;" an I drinks up me beer an out I goos, oodout payin fur de raffle, fur I was gettin purty riled; but it want doo to say nuthin 'bout de raffle to my ole ooman, cuz she be lamentable mad sure-li if I doan't alveys pay as I goo."

So de doctor set still, an' I set still; den 'e lights 'is pipe an axes me what sorter chap 'e was, an I told 'im all I knowed. So pres'ny 'e sez, "All right, Mart'n," sez 'e, "I be glad you told me, but doan't say nawn 'bout it not to nobody, cuzen if dey 'eers an it down at de park it'll put the ladies out, mebbe, an p'raps fur nuthin at all. But," sez 'e, "you git Bob Hallett de keeper, an meet me in de rockery at de park to-mor', dats Sat'dy, 'bout two, when de Squire's gone for ees drive." So I sez "Good night, sir, an thinkce" (thank you). Well, nex day I goos down to de hutches ood ole Spider, an Bob 'e gits 'is gun an we goos off down to de park, an de doctor 'e was a-awaitin. 'E 'adn't sin nobody nor nawn, so, sez 'e, "Mart'n," 'e sez, "you goo down de coach road, an Bob goo up de glasshouses, an den if dares en-thing, jess whistle—'em good whistle Bob 'as got ood ees fingers, sure-li—an den we'll all meet. An if dare bea'n't nawn, we ken all goo 'ome, an dare want be no call (occasion, cause) to tell nobody nawn 'bout it." So way we goos, an af' a bit de Squire 'isself come along; ee'd bin fur ees drive, an was all right. "Well, Mart'n," sez 'e, "ready fur Christmas?" "Yes, sir," sez I, "an I wish ye many an 'em, Squire." "Thinkce, Mart'n," sez 'e; "dare'll be a pickin' for ye in de kitchen as dare alveys is." "Thinkce kindly, sir," sez I; an den 'e went off, an I goos back to de doctor, an 'e said dare want nuthin to stop for as 'e could find out, an we'd better goo 'ome. Well, we was jess a-gwine up de 'ill be de church, when we see sumb'dy a-'ossback a-tarin down de 'ill like mad, an when 'e see de doctor, Jim, 'e 'ollered out, cuzen 'twas Jim de pos'boy up at de rectory—Jim a-'ollers out, fur 'e was all out o' breath a-goin so 'ard, sez 'e, "Please, sir," 'e sez, "dey be gone, an we doant know which way," an de gurt grummut 'e could'n say no more.

So den, to goo back like, de doctor 'e lives be 'isself sep at Christmas; den ees niece, Edith 'Anson, alveys comes down jess to make 'is puddins an make 'im a bit cumf'ble like, jess to cheer 'im up a bit, cuzen 'e be a bit lonesome. So den dis Miss 'Anson 'ad come down dat mornin', an cuz de doctor was a-gwine out—fur to goo long ood us down de park—she thought mebbe she'd goo up to de church an 'elp de ladies put up de 'olly an sich, an de young ladies from de park was dare, an dey knowed one an tother an-em (each other), so dat was all right. Well, pres'ny young Dick Mart'n, dats my brother's booy, 'e runs in de church an sez, "Please, Miss Edith," sez 'e, "dare a lady as what wants to speak ood ye." So she never thought no 'arm, purty creetur, an out she goes, cuzen she thought mebbe 'twas de pahson's wife, fur 'er sister want well, and so she couldn't goo to de church. Well, pres'ny it cum dark, an de ladies was a-gwine 'ome, an dey cawd, an dey cawd, but dey couldn't eer nawn. 'bout Miss Edith, an Miss Wilson she thought dat Miss 'Anson was 'avin a bit o' fun an was a-hidin, but dey waited ev'slong, an 'unted all over de church, but 'twant no manner o' good, an so dey went 'ome, fur young Dick said she went up to talk to sum lady as what 'ad sent 'im arter 'er, an dey went down to de rect'ry jess fur to make sartin like. Well, jess den up come de new chap in de gar'ns (gardens) an said dare was a 'oss an shay a-gwine like mad, an de driver 'e 'adn't got no manner o' 'olt of de 'oss ony jess fur't turn ees ed up Sandy 'Oller (Hollow). Well, dare want nob'dy knowed nawn 'bout de shay, an 'twas soon gone. Well, de church an de tower was sarched, for Mistus Morris—dats de pahson's wife—she 'adn't sin Miss 'Anson, an de doctor 'e was jess like mad. Well, nex day was a Sunday an Christmas Day, too, but dare want no peal, fur nob'dy'd got de 'art for 't, an der want nob'dy at de sarvice on'y pahson issell an ole Bates de clerk, an de river was dragged, but 'twant no good; an de women folks was all a-cryin, an some de men want much better, fur ev'body tuk to Miss 'Anson, an de Christmasin was a'most all forgot.

Well, Dick Osborne de p'leece (policeman), 'e 'unted all over de place, an all 'e knowed was dat a 'oss an shay a-drivin like mad was sin be Will Vinall an 'is missus a-goin pass de Cinder Farm, way on de Lewes road, an den sum'dy else see um way xp de North Common as ef dey was a-goin up de Forest, ur Crowbor mebbe, ur some other furrin parts. So Will Brooks 'e took de best 'oss in ees father's stable, an swore eed never come back dout Miss 'Anson, an off ee goos. Christmas went tejus slow, so did all de wile, an der want no dancin nor nawn, an all de folks was mighty glum, an Brooks ee come back an said de oss an shay 'ad stopped at Crowbor Gate dat night, an a lady got out an't an got some water fur sum'dy in de shay as what want well, but dey druv off 'gin drackly, nob'dy knowed where, an dey went tejus fast up de 'ill.

Well, Sat'dy night, as was New Year's Eve, de doctor, de pahson an ees wife, de Squire an both ees gals, an some more folks was a-settin at supper at doctor's house, an 'twas latish; mebbe bout one clock, fur dey'd all come to kip de doctor comp'ny cuzen ee was em bad an mis'ble, an de singers an de ringers was jess gone, when der come a rap at de door, an 'fore dey could git dere it opened, an in come Miss 'Anson, ood a big shaw' all over 'er purty 'ed, an 'er poor face looking dat bad sure-li; an she come in, she did, an she goos right slap down on de carpet at de doctor's fit. Dey picks 'er up, an puts 'er in de big chair what's alveys in de chimley carner, an dey rubs 'er 'ans; but she want no ways cold, on'y faint like, an' dey give 'er a drop o' sperrits, an' den she 'gin to look em-an-all better an come too, an fust she cried, an den she laughed, den she cried agin, till af' bit (after a bit; time) she seem to git straight like, but she did look lamentéable purty sure-li.

Well, dey makes up a biggish fire, an' all an 'em drawed roun', an when dey'd made 'er 'ave a bit an sup, den she ups an' tells 'em all 'bout it. It sims like, dat she was in de church when young Dick tells 'er a lady wants to 'ave a word ood 'er. So out she goos, fur she thought mebbe 'twas pahson's wife, an' de lady she was a-gwine a bit slow way up de track, cuz 'twas tejus cold, an so den she got axin 'er a lot o' queshtins, no 'count like (no importance); but 'twant de pahson's wife, nit nob'dy she knowed, an she kep all on a-wawkin an a-wawkin, den pres'ny dey gits to de top de road, where jess at de carner der was a shay an de door open, an den all of a minute, 'fore she knowed what was a-gwine on, a big shaw' was whipped all roun 'er 'ed an she was shoved right in de shay an 'way dey goos jess like de win, but she di't know which way, cuz it was so em dark sure-li, an der want no moon nuther. Den de shaw' was took off, an dey tied up 'er mouth cuzen she shouldn't 'oller; but law bless ye! she want 'urt in no manner o' ways, on'y tejus frountened, an de ooman never said nawn, an' she thought 'e was a man cuzen 'e was monstus strong, sure-li. Well, dey on'y stopped jess once, when de ooman got out an soon come back gin, an off dey goos agin.

Af' bit dey druv up to a big dark 'ouse, an she was took out an didn't 'member no more till de mornin, an she was in bed in de most purtiest leetle room she ever see, an der was a tejus nice-lookin gal side de bed, but she said she want to tell nuthin nit answer no queshtins. Well, when oze gal goos out in goos nother, an dey gives 'er de most beautifullest stuff fur't eat an drink, but bless you 'twant no manner o' use, leastwise not at fust, 'er 'art was all in 'er mouth like; but bunbye (by-and-by) she gets a leetle bit peckish an' jess 'ad what she wanted, an dare was ev' thing of de best an plenty an it, but she want no ways 'appy, an wanted to git away, but de plaguey gals ood never say nawn; an den de days goo one af' tother, an Friday come, an af' dinner dere was a rap at de door, an de gal sez, sez she, "'Tis me master," an out she goos, 'E was a likely-looking chap, but she never takes no count o' dat, an ups an at 'im; but it want no good what-somdever: 'e jess never opened ees mouth, leastwise not till she was purty nigh beat, an 'e never goos near dan de door. Den 'e sez, "Miss Wilson," sez 'e, so pleasant like. So she looks up quick like, and sez she, "I beant Miss Wilson," she sez. Den 'e turns jess as white, and looked dat bad, sure-li, and 'e sez, sez 'e, "Who be you den, if you beant Miss Wilson?" Den she sez she be de doctor's nicce, and den 'e sez, quite perlite like, dat 'e was mighty sorry der 'ad been a mistake, an bowed, an out 'e goos, an de gal goos in agin. So den pres'ny in comes nuther gal an sez, "Will de lady please be ready to goo 'ome to-mor"—dats Sat'dy, at nine clock, fur dey was gwine to send 'er 'ome; an den 'er 'eart goos jess like a gurt drum, an she was glad, sure-li, an mighty queer too, fur ye see she'd bin away from 'er frens sen Sat'dy, and was purty muchly worried.

Well, she gets ready 'fore de time, an den in comes the same ooman as what run off ood 'er, an de shaw' was put all over 'er 'ed, so she never see nuthin same as 'twas afore, an dey puts 'er in de shay, an a genlman sez, sez 'e, "Be werry gentle ood de lady, an werry careful," an 'way dey goos.

Af' bit de shay pulls up an she gets out, an der was a livery chap on a spare oss as 'a come behind, an she was put on de saddle afore 'im, an wrapped up careful so she din't get no cold, and dey trots on gentle an de shay goos back. Den pres'ny de oss stops, an de groom 'e begs 'er pard'n so perlite an puts 'er down, an 'fore she could git out de shaw' 'e was gone in de dark. Den she stans a minute 'fore she knows where dey've put 'er. Den she sees de lamp side de surgery door, an she jess flowed up to de 'ouse, an den dey knowed all de rest. Den she cries agin fur joy, an puts 'er 'an in 'er pocket fur 'er anksher (handkerchief) an 'twant dare; but dare was a leetle box ood de purtiest ring an necklace dat ever you clapped eyes an, an on de packet it said, "Ood sincere 'grets an 'polgies," an de shaw'—well, dat was jess de most beautifullest thing as ever was.

Well, dey never went out dat room to goo to bed till 'ard on four clock, an de nex day 'ow de bells did ring, sure-li, an ev'body was dat glad, an de Squire 'e kep open 'ouse all dat day an de nex, an de best an't was Miss 'Anson want none de wuss, on'y shook like.

Den after dun-a-many years it turns out dat a young feller at de college w'ere de Squire was too, 'e was a bit of a sneak, an de Squire 'e give 'im a thrashin, an de feller said 'eed make 'im suffer for't some day nuther. So den 'e never forgot nawn 'bout it, an meant to run off ood Miss Eny, dats de Squire's youngest gal, and den de ooman what come in de shay she knowed de ladies was at de church, an she axes young Dick Mart'n for Miss Edith, cuzen she didn't know jessly 'bout de names, an den she gets de wrong one. De Squire 'e was lamentéable mad, sure-li. He said 'twant de best way dat feller ever come in ees way, cuzen 'ee'd never forgit it if 'e did. Dats all 'bout dat, sir, an thinkee kindly; an 'ere's a 'appy new year to ye, sir, an many an 'em, an yer werry good 'elth.

Mahs—Master; Muster—Mr., is given to one in a higher social position. The Sussex native makes no use of the aspirate. See M. A. Lower on "Sussex Manners and Customs."

Don't, bean't, table, road, have peculiar vowel sounds, and in the case of road is not unlike that in the French word froide. Don't is decidedly of two syllables—doo-ahnt. So also "same, name," almost like "sa-um, na-um." A is prefixed thus: a-walking, a-going, a-brushing (brishin), a-saying. Boot-legs—big leather leggings reaching to the top of the leg.

Cuz, cuzen—because. Em, em-en-all—has no meaning specially. A sick wife may be "em bad sure-li"; a place may be a "em of a way off." So with "tejus" and "lamentable," and applied to good or evil. A thing may be "tejus good" or "tejus bad," "la-men-téable good" or "bad." Lamentable has equal accent throughout, each syllable being distinctly uttered, and the "téable" like "weighable." Surely is sure-li, —plain i. Put is like nut. Ood—with. Verbs rarely of past tense.

Grummut, like sneg (snail), dick (ditch), &c., is probably a fragment left by former invaders, French, Dutch, etc., who found Sussex and the South-Coast generally a "happy hunting-ground."

Two gals—no term of disrespect nor familiarity; so also "ole" (old).

Gurt—great. Gurt grummut—stupid fellow. Betsy telling her lover to go, will probably say, "Git out, yer gurt grummut."

After wards—afterwards, but not connected, and pronounced like ward of a hospital.

Nit—neither, nor. "No cheese, nit no butter, nit no bacon, nit nawn, not night; leastwise regon mus 'ave some bakker," says Mrs. Hodge to her grocer. Negatives are a prolific family.

Furrin parts. Before the introduction of railways, and even now in really country places, the natives are averse to going beyond a few miles from home, and a town, even a few miles away, may be considered as "foreign parts." See M. A. Lower for some good illustrations of this.

Glum—gloomy, long-faced. An em—of them; so also "an it"—of it. Dun-a-many—don't know how many.

CHRISTMAS COMES BUT ONCE A YEAR.

By MEDICUS.

"At Christmas play, and make good cheer,
For Christmas comes but once a year."

THAT is, I believe, the old couplet complete, though there are many versions of it. These differ somewhat in diction, but the inference from all is similar. Plenty of eating and drinking, "high jinks," and general jollity—these are what we are advised to lay ourselves out for at this season, because "Christmas comes but once a year."

For the time being common sense is to be thrown to the winds, prudence shown to the door, and discretion shut up in a band-box. There is a species of glorious recklessness about this advice, which would be simply amusing if it were not positively mischievous.

"At Christmas play." No matter whether you feel disposed to play or not, play you must. You must manufacture merriment for the occasion. Mirth must be assumed if it makes no signs of bubbling up spontaneously. Your face must be wreathed in ready-made smiles while you are putting the finishing touches to your toilet, and they must be worn all the evening. A real smile, remember, is as much the effect of reflex action from a tickled brain or mind, as a real sneeze is the result of a tickled nose. Well, we are not expected to manufacture sneezes in English society, but I sojourned once among a tribe of savages where, at the king's court, it was considered the height of good breeding for one lady to sneeze when introduced to another, or to sneeze over and over again when someone said a good thing, and the more a lady sneezed the more polished was she considered in manners. When the king strutted in, arrayed in peacock's feathers and a spear, all the court fell a-sneezing, and each lady tried to outdo her neighbour in the number and grace of her stérnutations. The king was a comical old fellow; he cocked his head to one side and watched to see that no lady took snuff of any sort, or rubbed her nose, and finally marched off to dinner with the sable beauty who had "sneezed the handsomest." The whole scene was very funny, and very ridiculous, but after all perhaps there is no more reason to be ashamed of a ready-made sneeze than a ready-made smile. Commend me to the genuine article in either case.

The French say the English take their pleasures sadly. The English may retaliate by saying the French take theirs madly, and both assertions are as nearly correct as possible. There are differences, however, in our islands. Had the Frenchman stated that the British take their pleasures sadly, he would have shot considerably wide of the mark. John Bull is the individual whom the shoe fits, and neither Sandy, Paddy, nor Taffy can wear it. And the reason is not far to seek. John Bull is notably a sitting bull, as the Sioux would say; his pleasures are proverbially and truly those of the table; supple, athletic, and even agile when very young, he, as a rule, develops a figure before he is forty, that, to say the least, is hardly fitted for the floor. Your true Celt, wherever found, is a bird of quite another feather. He is far more merry and mercurial; he is not born to squat; mentally and corporeally, he must be ever on the move. Sitting is not his favourite position, nor is eating his favourite pastime. John Bull likes to sit still and hear a song, Sandy must join the chorus; John Bull likes to sit and look at dancing, Sandy must join the dance, and foot it, as right well he can, on the light fantastic toe, and if the music be to his taste, only the suasion of a double barrelled gun could prevent him. See him on the wide green links at golf in summer, or on the lake in winter playing "the roaring game" on the ice, you would say, "Here is a man who does not take his pleasures sadly." And after a day's "play" is over, though he might well be expected to be tired, the dinner that follows is, in his estimation, only a secondary matter; the dance, and that alone, is the correct conclusion of a day's enjoyment.

Now I believe I bear the character among my readers of being rather a pleasant sort of an individual than otherwise, and in this festive number of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER I certainly have no desire to belie my good name. I would rather be condemned to stand for a given time on one leg, in a corner, than be considered the death's-head at the feast, the ghost at the banquet. Figuratively speaking, you will not find your Medicus going to an evening party with a bucket of cold water to dash over mirth and merriment, a box of blue pills in his waistcoat pocket, and a bottle of black draught bulging out his dress coat tails. No, "that's not me," as the little old woman said. Nevertheless, I know I will be doing right and not offending anyone if I give a few words of advice concerning what is called Christmas cheer. I will be doing right, and I will probably be doing good too, because a large number of our girls, both those who are young and those who are no longer young,

MOONLIGHT ON CARISBROOKE CASTLE.

By ANNE BEALE.

THE moon is up behind the castle walls;
Aslant the ivied keep her pale light falls,
Like glance of pitying angel on the cheek
Of death. In full-orbed beauty, grandly meek,
She looks upon the ruin in its gloom
As heretofore on yonder prison-room,
Where an ill-fated monarch sighed alone—
Nobler in sorrow than on England's throne.

Say, Queen of Night, untroubled in thy reign
By rival courtiers or the restless train
Of envious subjects—didst thou, pitying, shed
Thy beams as tears upon the disrowned head
Of him who dwelt, a captive, in the hold
Of this, a whilom fortress, stern and cold?

Say, when our martyr-king surveyed the sky,
And prayed for strength to live or faith to die—
Didst thou allure his worn and wearied soul
Up yonder, where th' untiring planets roll,
And suns and systems multiply, and stand
Or move in mystic round, at God's command—
Thence to the eternal Throne where Christ doth lead
Alike for king and peasant in their need?

Oh, Moon! if thus to thee the charm was given
To raise his lonely heart from earth to heaven,
Thy calm and spiritual light we bless,
And thank and love thee for thy tenderness.

will have an opportunity of reading this paper before Christmas actually comes.

You will, I flatter myself, believe me sincere when I say I wish you all a happy Christmas and a merry New Year. What I mean is this: that I wish you to be quietly happy and perfectly temperate in every way, on and about the 25th, so that you may begin the coming year full of health and hope, and therefore as merry as the larks that soar and sing in cloud-land. Could I wish you anything better? I do not think so.

If at this present moment I feel inclined to rail at anything, it is the adjective "merry" applied to qualify the hallowed and gracious substantive "Christmas." We cannot be gay to order; manufactured merriment is like a cork leg, elastic enough, perhaps, but only a very poor substitute for the genuine article. Besides, that species of happiness and jollity which depends upon a good dinner for its actual birth, is as sure to be followed by a relapse and by depression as day is followed by darkness. If the Christmas merriness has been very artificial, if we have really made too free with the good cheer with which the table groaned, then most assuredly we ourselves will have to groan next, and the week that precedes the New Year will be the dulllest week of all the fifty-two.

Very serious accidents used to occur in the olden times by the upsetting of the coaches which conveyed our forefathers to scenes of Christmas conviviality; but in these modern days the upsetting of one's digestion may prove quite as serious a business for some. Many and many a lingering and painful illness dates back to Christmas Day, and no further; but for all that, excess at table during what is called the "festive season" is the rule with young and old rather than the exception. Well, the young being possessed of more vitality, get somewhat easily over the results of indiscretion at table, but the aged do not. To them such indiscretion means nothing more nor less than a cruel shock to the whole system, nervous and muscular, with debility of every organ. At any other time of the year this would be bad enough, but in winter, with the wild, cold, and uncertain spring of this country still to be got over, it is dangerous in the extreme.

By indiscretion I do not wish you to understand errors in quantity so much as in quality, though indigestion, with all its attendant horrors, may spring from either or both.

The young, on the other hand, who, to put it very plainly, make a somewhat hearty dinner, place themselves at a very great disadvantage compared to their sisters who have been abstemious. Physiologically speaking, the brain is deprived for a time of a due allowance of well-oxygenated blood, and the possessor of such a brain is dull, weary, and a little wee bit stupid. She does not feel her own bright, clever active self; her spirits have to be forced, and this makes matters worse. A restless night or a heavy lethargic night is sure to follow, and she will awake unrefreshed and wrinkled. Now, mark this, please: I am not referring to wrinkles about the eyes; these do not grow in a night. There are wrinkles that may come and go, according to the state of health, which are no more visible at a short distance than are the lines in a fine engraving; but which, like these lines, determine light or shade, and, therefore, beauty. These are the real wrinkles young ladies should be afraid of, and a slight attack of indigestion or a single restless night may produce a very fine crop of them indeed, and the general effect, the tout ensemble, is hardly to be hidden by art. I do not mention the word "art" here in a sarcastic way. There are arts and arts, and for my own part I think a girl is not only quite justified in looking her very best for her own sake, but for the sake of those she mixes with in every-day life. In the matter of tight-lacing I am not even straight-laced. Support the figure by all means, but do not do so to the extent of displacing the liver and interfering with the action of the lungs, heart, and other vital organs; if you do so the health will speedily be deteriorated. And this deterioration will be first discernible in the complexion—the skin suffers; it becomes nerveless and starved, and as destitute of beauty of surface as a cake of hard dry soap; the eye becomes fishy, and gums and lips pale. Will art aid this state of matters? Well, cosmetics are tried, but they are nearly all poisonous, and eventually do harm that cannot be repaired. It has come to a pretty pass with any girl when she has to depend for her beauty on cosmetics. A little face-powder, however, is justifiable enough to protect the skin from atmospheric effects, such as frost or excessive sunshine, or even to hide natural defects, but certainly not to give false effect or to cover imperfections that attention to the health and fair play to the digestive organs would speedily remove. Dress well then, I say, by all means, and look well; a "dowd" cannot be perfectly happy unless she be deficient in self-respect; but on the other hand neither can a girl who depends entirely upon art or "get-up" for her personal appearance, for she must feel that she is—a—well, slightly succedaneous, so to speak.

Few of my readers, perhaps, have any adequate notion how much complete ease of mind has to do with female beauty. Self-consciousness means ruin to the nervous system, and if a girl cannot conduct her toilet in such a way as to be able to move in society without this haunting horror she had better stay at home for all the impression she is likely to make. But beautification means beatification to thousands, I am sorry to say, and in company the little morsels of minds such possess are centred all in self. If a man worth the name finds himself seated next one of these at a Christmas party, he will soon find out what she is. There she sits—every smile artificial, every action studied—as cold as a clay Samuel, as soulless as a draper's dummy, and he won't feel sorry when supper is over. "Christmas comes but once a year." Why, if he, poor fellow, is to have no better luck than this, he will hardly care if it doesn't come oftener than once in ten.

I give it as my opinion, then, that we will all enjoy our Christmas cheer much better if we are natural in dress and manners and all the rest of it, and if we determine to seek to please others more than to be pleased ourselves, I do not mind a bit that our girls should have quite a gay time of it before Christmas comes, in getting ready their dresses and in shopping, etc., but they must not forget the health. It is just before Christmas we should begin to take extra care of ourselves. The cold weather has just begun, and moderate, temperate living, with reasonably warm clothing and plenty of exercise, are the sine quâ non of comfort and happiness to come. What we desire specially to avoid is a chill. Of course the matutinal bath is the one and only prophylactic against colds. It braces the nerves, hardens the muscles, softens the skin, and makes the mind as lightsome and happy as that of the lark. But every girl cannot stand such wholesome ablution, and others think they cannot and so don't try; but abstemiousness in eating often works wonders upon the health and spirits, and if a girl can only manage to be hungry twice a day and eat in moderation afterwards, it is surprising what sweet sleep will be her guard, and how light and refreshed she will feel in the morning.

As to the actual food-cheer with which tables are said to groan about Christmas-time, it is generally good, but there is only one way of enjoying it, and that is by being abstemious at table. Here is a hint all should remember: no one is likely to over eat who eats slowly. Indeed, you can hardly eat too slowly. The Christmas dinner should, above all other dinners, be a feast of reason and a flow of soul, and just enough food should be taken to enable the body to sustain this exhilarating flow.

Our appetites and tastes will naturally be the best guides as to how much and what to eat during the festive season, but at the same time the digestibility or indigestibility of certain viands should be borne in mind by those who wish to keep bright and well.

Well-cooked, rather underdone roast beef, if not cut too thick nor flooded with gravy, is exceedingly suitable for Christmas in England. It should be tender, long-kept beef, however, and not too much fat should be used.

Turkey and goose—avoid the fat—are very digestible and nutritious. Apple sauce and stuffing of all kinds are bad for the delicate, or those who wish to retain a nice complexion.

Pork is dear at any price; gross, and often unwholesome. Game is excellent, excepting hare that has been long kept.

Too much fluid should be avoided, wines especially; for even in moderation they delay digestion. Vegetables should be eaten but sparingly; particularly the larger-leaved sorts.

Pastry and cheese and fruit go all in the same catalogue. The wise will simply trifle with them.

What about plum-pudding, so called? Why, it is simply a huge, ungainly ball of indigestibility. A remnant of barbarism that has been handed down to us from the days when people could breakfast well on a cold boar's head and a flagon of sour ale. Of course, Englishmen will hang on for many years to come to the raisined roll of flour and fat, with all the tenacity of the bulldog. It is an institution which the bit of holly and the drop of blazing brandy tend to foster, so they stick to it; and in nine cases out of ten it sticks to them.

The plum-pudding is not an intellectual viand; it never gave rise to a single brilliant thought or bright idea; but it has been the occasion of many a nightmare, and laid a solid foundation for many an attack of dyspepsia. But I need say no more, for sensible people only partake of the thing sparingly, and for fashion's sake, and few, I dare say, would be sorry were it superannuated and relegated to the workhouse. Our editor comes quietly in as I write. He has read my last sentences. He has sighed.

"Medicus," he says, "you're a bolder man than I took you for. Your intrepidity knows no bounds. You have actually levelled a lance at Christmas-pudding. Heigho!"

Well, I trust, readers, that, nevertheless, my paper will be none the less welcome, for if I am a bold man, I trust I am also a good one. Adios!

CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

BY HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

"WHAT shall we choose," we say, "for Christmas gifts?"
As the blest day comes round;
While wintry sunlight gilds the snowy drifts
That wrap the frozen ground.

"What shall we give to our beloved?" we say;
"What offering that shall be
Remembrance meet for this most holy day,
Which made us blest and free?"

Christ gave Himself to be our sacrifice,
That Christmas long ago,
When first He opened His unconscious eyes
In Bethlehem's manger low.

He gave Himself, when unto us He brought Goodwill, and peace, and love;
When by His life on earth, for us He bought Eternal life above.

Hath He not taught us what to give to all Whom He called brethren here?
Ah, now, while holy joy and gladness fall
Upon the closing year,

Let us, too, give ourselves, our work, our love,
To make their burdens less,
Who tread the path that leads to rest above,
In pain and loneliness.

My friends, God give you all good gifts, I pray—
While angels never cease
To sing in Heaven above their Christmas lay—God give you Christmas peace.

"MAGGIE BAG O' BONES."

By S. L. GIBBS, Author of "How Timothy Trotter Turned the Corner," "Honora Spencer's Mistake," etc., etc.

DON'T believe Maggie's real name was Bag o' Bones! Indeed, I don't see how it possibly could be so, as her mother was always addressed as Mrs. Brown, and her brother was known as Jim Brown; but the girl had answered to her strange name so long that she almost forgot she had another.

Of course Maggie was thin, very thin, with sharp features, and a wizened old woman's expression. The only good points she possessed were her eyes, big brown ones, with long curling lashes which she had a trick of lowering and looking through when spoken to.

She was not a bad girl, but she was most emphatically a "caution." The mischief she would do and help others to do, all the while looking so meek and innocent that, till people understood her little ways, she very seldom was blamed; but when folks did comprehend her, she frequently got the credit of things she did not do.

Maggie was one of those who are always restless because they have not found the work fitted for them. At present she tired of everything; she was thirteen, and she found school life a weariness, and determined on leaving it, so sought everywhere for a situation.

At last, after many fruitless attempts, she saw in the window of an old-fashioned bookseller's shop the announcement—"Girl wanted."

Maggie tumbled down the two or three steps to the dark little shop, where an elderly man, with spectacles on his nose, sat reading.

He looked up at her noisy entrance.

"Well, what is it?" he said, crossly. She did not look like a customer, and he had just reached a thrilling passage in his newspaper.

"You want a girl, and I want a place," said Maggie, abruptly.

The man gazed at her. "Well I never! I'm sure we don't want you; you'd never suit!"

"Oh, yes, I should!" replied Maggie, not rudely, but as a simple statement of fact. "I'm not particular, and you'd do nicely for me, I'm sure; I'm awfully handy, I am."

She folded her arms on the counter, and waited placidly for a reply.

Mr. Maver's feelings were too deep for utterance. He gasped once or twice, but no words came.

"You'd better think it over. If it's to mind children, I'm a dabster at that! Your good lady might leave them for ever with me, I'm that fond of 'em!"

The good man almost choked with indignation. Children! when he was an old bachelor, and almost hated the sight of a child.

Maggie would have found herself in the street in another moment, but that an elderly lady who had heard this brief conversation from the shop parlour came up, and laying her hand on her brother's shoulder, said quietly to the girl—

"My child, you have a very long tongue. Have you never been told that 'a still tongue shows a wise head?'"

"Lor! ma'am, what would be the good of my having a still tongue just now? I want a place, and if I don't tell you how clever I am, however are you going to know, I'm sure!"

This was a self-evident fact; there might be truth in the remark. Maggie saw her advantage, and proceeded to give her reasons for thinking herself suitable. Her remarks did not err on the side of humility. According to her own account, if they lost the chance of obtaining her services they would regret it as long as their lives might last.

The two elderly folks exchanged glances. Certainly the child was an original; but with all her odd ways she evidently did not intend to be rude. Far from it, she only thought it business-like to act as she was doing.

"I want a girl to help me in the house; she will have to sit in the shop sometimes, but I must have one I could thoroughly trust," said Miss Maver. "I should never think of engaging any girl without a character."

"Oh, that's all right! My governess'll give me a character; she'll be only too glad to get rid of me! I'll go to her and get it, and come back and let you know. That's all right, miss; I shan't be long."

She was out of the shop as quickly as she had entered it, and, rapidly traversing the streets of the little town, she entered the small ivy-clad schoolroom, where so many of her young days had been spent.

Miss Taylor sat alone writing. Maggie went up to her desk and exclaimed, "Please, governess, I've got a place, and I want a character!"

"Why, Maggie," said the astonished mistress, "this is very sudden!"

"Yes, I'm sure, but it's all right. I am going to work at a shop, only the lady said I must have a character. I told her I knew you'd give me one—you'd be only too glad to get rid of me!"

"Did you tell the lady that?" said the amused mistress. "What did she say?"

"I don't know, miss; I came away to you."

Miss Taylor shook her head gravely. "I am afraid, Maggie, that you have been such a naughty girl that the character I should have to give you would do you little good."

"Oh, don't worry about that, governess. They know I'm 'a caution,' but you could say I wouldn't steal anything—that's the sort of thing she wants; you could say that, miss, couldn't you?" Maggie's big eyes opened imploringly.

Miss Taylor assented gladly, and wrote:—"Maggie Brown is perfectly honest and truthful."

She gave this to the child with some good advice, which I am afraid Maggie hardly heard.

"Thank you, miss. Good-bye," she said, and was gone.

Quicker still she returned to the shop. "Here you are, miss. Now, please, when shall I come?"

The brother and sister had been talking the matter over, and had decided, though not without many misgivings, to give her a trial.

Maggie was told this, and with many expressions of joy she went home, to return the following Monday, as she said, "for good."

Maggie Bag o' Bones, three years later, was still very thin, but not quite so lean as she formerly had been; she had changed in other ways, too, during the time.

Nearly as abrupt still, but not rude, she had become deeply attached to her master and mistress, and they to her.

She had well sustained her character for honesty and truthfulness, and, indeed, had improved in all respects. She was still fearless, and would have accepted any danger gladly for the sake of Mr. and Miss Maver.

She seldom saw her own family. Her mother had married again. They had never agreed very well, and now Maggie said, "She rubbed her up the wrong way." Jim was in London and doing well. The new baby did not seem to belong to her, so the affection she would have had for her mother was devoted to Miss Maver, who, old maid and old maidish though she might be, had more influence over her for good than her mother ever had.

Maggie was always hoping for some grand opportunity of doing them a service. No such thing had yet arisen. If it came, would she be ready? We shall see.

It was a fine summer's evening. The little town was quieter than ever. It was not the season for visitors, and the waves beat on the pebbly beach without being disturbed by the little ones throwing stones into them.

But the bookseller's household was to be disturbed before night. A telegraph boy entered the shop with a message for Mr. Maver—the first telegram Maggie had seen. It was bad news, as such messages usually are—a summons from a married sister in London asking them to come at once, as she was in great trouble.

Maggie knew that Mrs. Bryant's life was a very unhappy one, though she did not understand what the exact difficulty was; so she hastened to assure the anxious couple that she could manage all right alone.

They could close early and get to London that night; the next day was Sunday, and one or both could easily return on the Monday in time to re-open the business.

This plan fell in with their views. The only drawback was leaving Maggie alone in the roomy, old-fashioned house, especially as the old man had received his rents that day too late to pay into the bank. They felt the girl was too young to bear such a responsibility.

Maggie scouted the idea with scorn, and declared, truthfully, that she did not feel the slightest fear. In the end her strong will prevailed, and she saw the old couple off, then turned into the house, shutting and fastening the street door after them.

The house did seem very quiet—the big clock certainly ticked louder than usual, and even Maggie gave a little jump when something moved against her legs, though it was only Tibbie, the black cat.

Laughing at herself, Maggie descended to the lower regions, fastening the doors securely, had her supper, and was preparing to go up to bed, when she heard a rap at the private door.

Visitors at such an hour were very unusual things, and Maggie, with a beating heart, prepared to answer the summons.

The door stood in a dark entry by the side of the house, and was not easily seen from the street. She took the precaution to put up the chain, and then opened the door.

An elderly man with a black bag in his hand, and in a very excited state, stood outside.

"What do you want?" she asked.

"Mr. Maver," was the reply.

"He's not in just now," answered the girl. "When—when will he be in?"

"Don't know; I'm sure."

"But I must see him at once. I'm his brother-in-law, Mr. Bryant; my dear wife's dangerously ill and longs to see him. I must take him back with me—even now I may be too late!"

Maggie's suspicions were disarmed, and she told him of the summons to London and their departure.

Mr. Bryant expressed his deep thankfulness to think they were already on the way to his dear, dear Annie; and exclaiming that he must hurry or he would lose the last London train, he hastened away.

Maggie fastened the door again and once more prepared for rest. She was too excited for sleep; she wondered whether he would catch the train or not, and whether the old people would be in time to see their sister alive.

Half an hour passed and another knock came. It was, as she expected, Mr. Bryant who had lost the train.

He said he was half distracted about his poor Annie, and asked her to let him sleep on the sofa that night.

The girl knew the sister's name was Annie, and when he showed her some envelopes addressed to Mr. J. Bryant, Bowden Street, London, she no longer hesitated, but asked him to walk in, and she would make him as comfortable as possible.

He stepped inside, and Maggie led the way to the kitchen, where the gas was still burning; gave him some bread and cheese and beer, and left him to get the spare room ready.

He said he felt much too anxious to eat, and buried his face in his hands as she left the room.

Maggie had been trained to be very quick and quiet in her movements, and she had no intention of moving softly when she returned to the basement floor in search of some soap for the washstand.

As she passed along the passage in the dark she glanced into the kitchen and started as though she had been shot—for the anxious husband was sitting enjoying his supper, rubbing his hands gently together, while a look of pleasure and intense cunning was on his face. The black bag stood on the table by his side; a large bunch of keys, evidently just taken from it, laid by the side of his plate.

Maggie had the presence of mind to pass on without attracting attention. In the dark wash-house she stopped to think. "What was she to do?" She felt sure he was a thief. She did not doubt his being Annie's husband, but hadn't she heard somehow that he was a disgrace to the family? How could she have been mad enough to let him in? What if he knew of the money and meant to steal it? "Not if I know it," said Maggie to herself, decidedly.

She forgot all about the soap, and returned to the kitchen.

If she had needed anything to confirm her suspicions, the man's conduct would have done it—the bag was closed, and he was resting his head in his hands in deep grief, but the food was eaten and the beer drunk.

"The spare room is quite ready, sir," she said.

He raised his head. Were his eyes full of tears?

"My good girl, I should be afraid to sleep in the spare room; the bed would certainly be damp. No, don't take any trouble for me; I must be up to catch the first train; my brother's bed will do for me!"

Mr. Maver's room, where the safe with all that money was! He should not sleep there if she could prevent it!

"Don't think master would like any one in his room," she remarked.

"I think he would," he said, decidedly. "At all events I mean to sleep there." He looked threateningly but still smilingly at the girl.

A bright thought struck her. She hesitated for a little, then said—

"You won't let me get blamed for letting you sleep there?"

"No, no, my girl, I'll see to that!"

Now for her bold stroke. Did he know where her master slept?

"But it's right up at the top of the house," she said, sulkily. "Master likes the top 'cause it's airy, and he can see the sea."

She waited in suspense for his reply.

"Oh, I don't mind that a bit! Bill always was fond of the sea."

Maggie could have jumped for joy. He did not know the arrangements of the house. If only she could act well enough not to rouse his suspicions.

"Very well, sir, if you don't mind I'm sure it don't matter to me! Will you come up now? It's awful late."

Maggie lit a candle, turned out the gas, and led the way. Up and up she went, with the man behind her, till she reached the top floor.

Doors stood on the right and left of the landing, and preparing to open the one on the right, the girl turned to light Mr. Bryant up the few top stairs.

The rapid ascent had taken away his breath, and as he stepped on the landing, and turned to enter the opened door, stooping as he went, Maggie knocked against his arm and sent candle and candlestick flying to the bottom of the stairs.

"Now you've done it, clumsy!" she said, rudely. "Whatever possessed you to knock my arm? Now I shall have to go all the way down again for another candle! Here," she continued, crossly, "that's your door! You'll find candle and matches on the mantelpiece right in front of you."

Without further parley Maggie clattered noisily downstairs, grumbling as she went.

She clattered down two flights, slipped off her shoes, and crept up again. Oh! would he go in, or follow her?

Mr. Bryant certainly was not a good-tempered person—cursing her, the light, the door against which he stumbled, the chair or something over which he fell, he groped his way toward the fireplace.

When Maggie heard the chair fall she felt safer, and praying for help and quickness, she flew up the remaining stairs, reached the door, and felt in the dark for the handle.

If he turned she must be discovered; but another curse reassured her, for he had tumbled over something else. She found the handle, drew the heavy door towards her, shut it and locked it. Then she tumbled down on the floor exhausted.

A loud hammering inside the room effectually aroused her. The man was alarmed and trying to find the door; her work was only half done. She remembered the bunch of keys; he must be more securely caged.

The house was an old one, very securely built, and the lumber room in which she had confined her visitor could be fastened outside by a bolt, but that would not be enough. She did not dare to call in any aid, for fear they might be confederates of the imprisoned thief; no, she must manage by herself alone.

She ran to her own room, got a light and matches, then went back and securely bolted the door.

"What are you up to, do you think?" raved the man.

"I'll tell you what I am up to pretty quick! I've locked you in, and there you'll stop till master comes home! You'll do very well till then—hope you'll enjoy yourself."

"Let me out—let me out!"

"Couldn't think of it at any price! You'd better have had the spare room; you'd have been more comfortable."

Mr. Bryant answered by kicking, cursing, and swearing what he would do when he got hold of her.

"Yes, sir, no doubt, sir, when you do catch me! Good-night!"

She went downstairs, fastening the oak door at the foot of the stairs leading to the top floor. The man was securely caged.

To say that Maggie did not feel very frightened now would not be true, but she bravely determined to wait without asking any outside help, at all events till the time was past at which she might expect her master.

Fortunately her endurance was not to be tried for so long, for about eight o'clock she heard another knocking.

Not to be again deceived, Maggie inquired who was there? Great was her joy to hear Mr. Maver's voice, and opening the door she admitted Mr. and Miss Maver.

They were very anxious to hear Maggie's adventures, for the telegram was a false one.

On arriving at their sister's, they found that she was quite well, and had not lived with her husband for some months, though she had been too ashamed to let them know of her troubles.

Mr. Bryant's conduct had been so bad that she had been compelled to go to a magistrate for protection, and now he was not allowed to molest his unfortunate wife, who was much better off without him.

They hastened back home full of alarm, and were delighted to hear of Maggie's cleverness.

Very soon two policemen appeared on the scene, and Maggie had the pleasure of seeing the man who had so frightened her taken away in custody, to answer for his misdeeds, which were many.

For some time Maggie felt very shaken by her adventure, but Miss Maver took her away into the country for a holiday, from which she returned so rosy and well that no one would recognise in Miss Margaret Brown, the adopted daughter of the old couple, our old friend Maggie Bag o' Bones.

WINTER WORRIES FOR OUR GIRLS.

By C. L. MATEAUX.

Draw this figure without removing the pencil once or returning over the same line.

A lady wished to divide this piece of land among her four little girls, so that each should own a garden of the same size and shape, with three rose-trees thereon. How did she manage it?

The latest thing seen in babies' dresses?—The nightdress.

Why is this nosegay like the "Pilgrim's Progress"?—Because it's a fine "book-ey?" When is it like a fish?—When it's "smelt."

A LITTLE PICKLE.

"Though we have no mouth, his tongue we have bitten."

Why is the Whooping Cough like this young lady? Because it's catching (s-ketching).

THE JESTER'S "SPELL."

What one English word is here? Disproportionableness.

Why is this dog like Ruskin? Because it's a great thin-cur.

Where do the little London birds fly to in the cherry season?—They fly to Peck'em.

I mentioned as I hurried by, A Scandinavian deity. O-din.

A THING TO BE AVOIDED.

STANDING

A little Miss Under-standing between us.

A man of awl work.—The Cobbler.

What would the boatman's children rather see than feel?—Smacks.

A PROVERB.

Charity begins a-tome.

I carry myself when I go out to fight.—Ensign.

My face is smooth—hard cuts and blows I bear; Yet fret not for me, I'm no longer there.—Ice.

We remain "Ewers" truly.

AND

TRANSPPOSITIONS.

What would any child find in nine thumps?
Punishment.

When a husband promises his wife a new blue silk dress, what can she find to grumble about?—That it's not to be sat-in.

TRANSPPOSED WORDS.

Great helps.
Lo I reign.
Go nurse.
No more stars.

Telegraphs, Religion, Surgeon, Astronomers.

When may a young woman be excused for dyeing her hair?
When she is quite light-headed.

My name, methinks, will not long be a-missing,
When I tell I'm for fighting, for wearing, for kissing.
A ring.

Tell me true, 'twixt you and me,
Whisper, love, what is to be?
'Tis a verb.

TRANSPPOSITION.

I took one off my bed, shook it about, dropped it out of window, and saw it scamper off to the sea.
Bolster, lobster.

Sam, arise—arm—remain near me—earn a name, sir—I am a miner—a man in a snare.
Out of what one word of seven letters can you make this and many more sentences?
Remains.

Why do some young ladies object to singing by themselves?—They say it's so-lo-w.

Make up twelve sentences out of "Select new events."
They are the same letters.

A rhyme showing how many times the word that may be sensibly used:—

Five thats may follow closely one another,
For be it known that we may safely write Or say—that that that that that writ was right.
Nay, e'en that that that that that that has followed Through six repeats, the grammar's rule is hallowed;
And that that that (that that that that began)
Repeated seven times, is right—deny 't who can!

LOGIC.

Prove the relationship of the steam engine to a quartern loaf.

Allowing that a steam engine be an invention and that bread be a necessity, therefore as "Necessity is the mother of invention," bread must be the mother to a steam engine.

Why should a little girl not complain of having a Roman nose?

Because she might get a snub.

We work together,
Many a one,
For should we differ
We are undone.
To-day we are here,
To-morrow afar,
When our breath fails us
We rest where we are.

Railway train.

When is a winter fire like a goddess of old?—When it's a roarer—Aurora.

QUEER FACTS.

Take two letters from money, and only one remains; but take money from any number of letters and it will make no alteration in them.

"Write" we know is written right
When we see it written write;
But when we see it written right,
We know it is not written right.
For write, to have it written write,
Must not be written right or wright,
Nor yet should it be written rite,
But write—for so 'tis written right.

That the first thing in a boot is the last.

In what word do we find that La is the middle, is the beginning, and the end?
Is-la-and.

A donkey back, a donkey back, a donkey back they'll go, Away to see the country sports, a long way off, you throw.
Fred mounted, and Fred hurried off; Joe cried, "This is unkind!"
But then his donkey came so late, he's just an hour behind.
Besides, Fred found a shorter way, by four miles nearer, quite,
Than that Joe travels; somehow Joe is never in the right;
And yet it haps they reach the place, together trotting in
To see the fun or hear the shouts of those who lose or win,
To marvel at the roundabouts, the clatter,
and the din.
Then as the clock strikes, home they start, agreeing now that Joe Shall travel by the shortest route, the one that Fred did go, While Fred shall take the other way, the four miles further ride.
He vows he will be home the first, if no ill luck betide.
Each hurries off at smartest space, yet Fred trots in with glee
Six minutes clear ere Joe comes up—all out of breath is he;
Though ready for a sharp debate ere they sit down to tea.
How far the fair by nearest way? at what pace each did go;
And what the difference per hour? yet neither seemed to know.
Fred says 'tis thus, Joe swears 'tis that. Dear reader—hat say you?
Pray reckon up for Fred and Joe, and give the answer true.

Fred, 10 miles an hour.
Joe, 8 miles an hour.
Fair, 20 miles away.

TWO HIDDEN PROVERBS.

Up rose a loud shrill-spoken miss. Much sharp advice she uttered
On this and that; they would not list, and some among them muttered.
Others would have her to sit down, and styled her "Mrs. Chatter."
The more they frowned, the more she talked—'twas waste, but then no matter;
They might not want to hearken, but they would not run away,
For tea and toast would ready be when she had said her say.
"Much would have more."
"Waste not, want not."

Elevenpence.

PENNIES AND CAKES.

Two country lassies, on a day,
Quite wearied out with making hay,
Decide 'tis time to dine.
So each brings out her little store
Of home-baked cakes and nothing more.
One maid has five—the other three—
They spread them out for all to see,
And quite contented seem to be,
Nor think their meal is scanty.
First fetching water from the spring,
They to enjoy themselves begin—
When a third maid comes nigh.

"A weary wanderer you see,
To help the hungry pray agree,"
She said, and sat beside them.
"I do not beg, as pence I own,
Yet naught can buy in place so lone.
Eight pence have I—nor less nor more—
Divide with me your tempting store,
And I'll divide my money."
She spreads her pennies near the cakes
As equal shares from each lot she takes
Of the five, and the three outspread.

They all gossip, and eat, and laugh aloud,
Ere the two go back to the haymaking crowd,
And the stranger resumes her way.
Yet, now comes the puzzle—how shall she pay
For the cakes they have eaten—it's plain to see That nothing remains of the five and the three.
Eight pennies—dear me—how divide them quite fair,
That neither may get any more than her share?
They reckon and jangle and count up again,
Till the schoolmistress passing, the matter's made plain.

Each girl received the third of eight cakes—that is $2\frac{2}{3}$ of the cakes.
The first having contributed— $2\frac{1}{3}$ of cakes.
Second $\frac{1}{3}$ of cakes— $2\frac{1}{3}$, $\frac{1}{3}$ —as 9 to 1.

DOUBLE ACROSTIC.

"Walk up! Walk up!" the showman cries,
"Herein the strangest sights will greet your eyes!"

This you may try, if you're lost in a wood,
Though if nobody hears, it will do little good.

He stares at the stars, and he looks very wise,
Yet what does he know of this world in the skies?

The pretty wild thing bounds in frolicsome play,
And ere harm can reach it, has bounded away.

She reads the fine poem, with smile and with sigh,
Then goes into these, though she scarcely knows why.

The summer is going when this bird flits by;
You do me each day of your life—or you die.

On horseback they met, and together did play
At a sport that delighted them all the long day.

'Twas a thing to be swallowed, a cure for each harm,
In the days when advertisement lent not its charm.

Nor form, nor size, nor colour, yet 'tis found
Where size and form and colour most abound.

Seen in our London streets, or felt at sea,
'Tis what no reader of this rhyme should be.

Two names are here, unrivalled their renown;
None more deserve the poet's deathless crown.
